if ſome men doe not reade the Scriptures, and ſtudy them, and ſearch into the hidden things of God, they ſin againſt juſtice or charity, but not againſt faith, if they retain all the articles of the Apoſtles Creed: and a man may be extremely to blame if he disbelieve many other things; but it is becauſe upon ſome evil account he disbelieves it, and ſo is guilty of that ſin which is his evil principle, as of pride, ambition, luſt, covetouſneſs, idleneſs, fear or flattery; but a man is not in any ſuch caſe guilty of hereſy. For hereſy being directly oppoſed to faith, and faith being compleated in the Articles of the Chriſtian Creed, it cannot be hereſy unleſs it be a contradicting of one of thoſe Articles in the words or in the ſenſe, in the letter, or in the plain, viſible, certain, and notorious explication of it. In the Apoſtolical Creed all the Chriſtian world is competently inſtructed: in theſe things there is no diſpute; and if they be ſimply believ'd as they are plainly deliver'd, it is the better. But in every thing elſe, every man according to his calling and abilities is to grow as much as he can in knowledge; that is, in edifying and practical knowledge: but in all things of ſpeculation, he that believes what he ſees cauſe for, as well and as wiſely, as heartily and as honeſtly as he can, may be deceived, but cannot be a Heretick, nor hazard his ſalvation. Salus Eccleſiæ non vertitur in iſtis. In ſimplicitate fides eſt, in fide juſtitia: nec Deus nos ad beatam vitam per difficiles quæſtiones vocat: in expedito & facili nobis eſt æternitas, ſaid S. Hilary. Faith is in ſimplicity, and righteouſneſs in faith; neither does God call us to eternal life by hard queſtions. Eternity ſtands ready and eaſily prepar'd.

Lib. 2. de Trin. in princ.

77. For I conſider, if any thing elſe were neceſſary to be believed unto ſalvation, this ſymbol could abſolutely be of no uſe; but if any thing be added to it and pretended alſo to be neceſſary, it cannot be entertained, unleſs they that adde it and impoſe it be infallible in their judgement, and competent in their authority: they muſt have authority equal to that of Chriſt, and wiſdome equal to that of the Apoſtles. For the Apoſtles in this ſummary of faith, declar'd all that was at that time neceſſary; and if any man elſe makes a new neceſſity he muſt claim Chriſts power, for he onely is our Law-giver: and if any declares a new neceſſity, that is not ſufficient, unleſs he can alſo make it ſo, for declaring it ſuppoſes it to be ſo already; and if it was ſo at firſt, the Apoſtles were to blame not to tell us of it; and if it was not ſo at firſt, who made it ſo afterwards?

78. But it is infinitely neceſſary that for the matter of faith, neceſſary and ſufficient faith, we reſt here and goe no further. For if there can be any new neceſſities, then they may for ever increaſe, and the faith of a Chriſtian ſhall be like the Moon, and no man can be ſure that his faith ſhall not be reproved; and there ſhall be innumerable queſtions about the authority of him that is to adde, of his skil, of his proceeding, of the particular article, of our own duty in inquiring, of our diligence, of our capacity, of the degrees of our care, of the competency of inſtruments, of chuſing our ſide, of judging of queſtions: and he that cannot inquire diligently, and he that cannot judge wiſely, and he that cannot diſcern ſpirits, and he that fears, and he that fears not ſhall all be in danger, and doubt, and ſcruple, and there ſhall be neither peace of minds nor Churches, as we ſee at this day in the ſad diviſions of Chriſtendome; and every man almoſt damnes all but his own ſect; and no man can tell who is in the right. Men diſpute well on both ſides; and juſt and good and wiſe men are oppos'd to one another;

ther; and every man seems confident, but few men have reason; and there is no rest, and there can be none, but in this simplicity of belief which the Apostles recommended to all the world, and which all the world does still keep in despite of all their superinduc'd opinions and factions; for they all retain this Creed, and they all believe it to be the summary of Faith.

79. But the Church of Rome pretends to a power of appointing new Articles of Faith; and for denying this, Pope Leo the 10th condemn'd Luther in his Bull added to the last Council in Lateran. For ad solam authoritatem summi Pontificis pertinet nova editio Symboli, A new edition of the Creed belongs to the sole authority of the Pope of Rome. So Aquinas: and Almain most expresly, The Popes of Rome by defining many things which before lay hid, Symbolum fidei augere consuevisse, are wont to enlarge the Creed. For Doctrina fidei admittit additionem in essentialibus, saith Salmeron, The doctrine of faith admits addition even in essential things. And in consequence to these expressions, they did adde the article of the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, in a Synod at Gentilli in France; and twelve Articles to the Creed in the Council of Trent, with the preface and postscript of the Athanasian Creed, damning all that doe not equally believe the Creed of Trent as the Creed of the Apostles.

2.22.q.1. a.10. Augusti. Tri. de Ancona q.59. art. 1. Novum Symbolum condere solum ad Papam spectat, quia est caput fidei Christianæ, cujus authoritate omnia quæ ad fidem spectant firmantur & roborantur. Idem art. 2. Sicut potest novum Symbolum condere, ità potest novos articulos supra alios multiplicare. Tom. 13. part. 3. disp. 6. § est ergo.

80. What effect and impress the declaration of any article by the Church hath or is to have upon the Conscience shall be discourst under the title of Eccleſiastical lawes; but that which is of present inquiry is, whether any thing can be of Divine faith in one age that was not so in the age of the Apostles: and concerning this it is that I say, that it is from the premisses evident that nothing can make any thing to be of Divine faith but our Bl. Lord himself, who is therefore called the Author and Finisher of our Faith; he began it, and he made an end. The Apostles themselves could not doe it, they were onely Stewards and dispensers of the mysteries of God; they did rightly divide the word of life, separating the necessary from that which was not so: so that their office in this particular was onely to declare what was necessary and what was not; no man, and no society of men could doe this but themselves, for none but they could tell what value was to be set upon any proposition: they were to lay the foundation, and they did so, and they built wisely upon it; but when they commanded that we should keep the foundation, they onely could tell us which was it, and they did so by their Sermons, preaching the same doctrine to the simple and the crafty, and by immuring the necessary doctrine in a form of words, and consigning it to all the Churches where they preach'd the Gospel.

81. For we see that all the world is not able to tell us how much is necessary, and how much is not, if they once goe beside the Apostles Creed: and yet it was infinitely necessary that at first this should be told, because there were so many false Apostles, and every one pretended authority or illumination, and every one brought a new word and a new doctrine; and the Apostles did not onely foresee that there would be, but did live to see and feel the heresies and the false doctrines obtruded upon the Church, and did profeſs it was neceſſary that ſuch falſe doctrines ſhould ariſe: and againſt all this that they ſhould not provide an univerſal remedy, is at no hand credible, and yet there was none but the Creed; this all the Church did make uſe of, and profeſs'd it to be that ſummary of Faith which was a ſufficient declaration of all neceſſary faith, and a competent reproof of all hereſies that ſhould ariſe.

82. But then that after all this any one ſhould obtrude new propoſitions, not deducible from the Articles of the Creed, not in the bowels of any Article, neither actually expreſs'd nor potentially included, and to impoſe theſe under pain of damnation, if this be not κυριεύειν τῆς πίστως, which S. Paul ſaid he had no power to doe, to have dominion or lordſhip over the faith, and κατακυριεύειν τῶν κλήρων, to lord it over Gods heritage, which S. Peter forbad any man to doe, I confeſs I doe not underſtand the words, nor yet ſaw or ever read any man that did. I conclude this with thoſe excellent words of Juſtinian which are in the Code, part of the Imperial law by which almoſt all the world was long governed: ὁρθὴ καὶ ἀμώμητος πίστις, ὡσπερ κηρύττει ἡ ἁγία τοῦ Θεοῦ καθολικὴ καὶ Ἀποστολικὴ Ἐκκλησία, καὶ οὐδένα τρόπον καινισμὸν δέχεται, This right and irreprehenſible faith (ſpeaking of the Apoſtolical Creed, part of which he there recites) which the Holy Catholick and Apoſtolick Church of God does preach, can by no means receive any innovation or change.

1 Pet. 5. 3.

Cod. lib. 1. de Sum. Trinit. & Cum recta.

83. I conclude therefore this Queſtion; In our inquiries of faith no mans Conſcience can be preſs'd with any Authority but of Chriſt enjoyning, and the Apoſtles declaring what is neceſſary. I adde alſo, that the Apoſtles have declar'd it in this form of words which they have often ſet down in their writings, and which they more largely deſcribed in their Symbol of Faith. For ſince, as Sixtus Senenſis ſays, Omnes Orthodoxi Patres affirmant Symbolum ab ipſis Apoſtolis conditum, that all the Orthodox Fathers affirm the Creed to be made by the Apoſtles, and they all ſay this is a ſufficient Rule of faith for all Chriſtians; here we ought to reſt our heads and our hearts, and not to intricate our faith by more queſtions. For as Tertullian ſaid well, Hæc Regula à Chriſto, ut probabitur, inſtituta nullas habet apud nos quæſtiones niſi quas hæreſes inferunt, & quæ hæreticos faciunt; Hereticks make diſputes, and diſputes make Hereticks, but faith makes none. For if upon the faith of this Creed all the Church of God went to heaven, all I mean that liv'd good lives, I am ſure Chriſt onely hath the keys of hell and heaven; and no man can open or ſhut either, but according to his word and his law: ſo that to him that will make his way harder by putting more conditions to his ſalvation, and more articles to his Creed, I may uſe the words of S. Gregory Nazianzen, Tu quid ſalute majus quæris? gloriam nempe quæ illic eſt & ſplendorem: mihi vero maximum eſt ut ſalver, & futura effugiam tormenta. Tu per viam incedis minimè tritam & inceſſu difficilem: ego verò per regiam, & quæ multos ſalvavit, What doſt thou ſeek greater then ſalvation? (meaning by nice inquiries and diſputes of articles beyond the ſimple and plain faith of the Apoſtles Creed) It may be thou lookeſt for glory and ſplendor here. It is enough for me, yea the greateſt thing in the world, that I be ſaved and eſcape the torments that ſhall be hereafter. Thou goeſt a hard and an untroden path: I goe the Kings high-way, and that in which many have been ſaved.

RULE XV.

In the Law of Christ there is no precept that wholly ministers to the Law of Moses; but for a time onely and less principally.

1. THis Rule I received from S. Irenæus; and they are his words as near as I could translate them. In lege Christi non est ullum præceptum veteri tantum legi inserviens, nisi ad horam & minus principaliter. For our Blessed Saviour descended like rain upon a fleece of wooll, and made no violent changes, but retain'd all the morality that he found amongst his Countrymen; he made use of their propositions, spake their proverbs, united their ejaculations into a collect of his own, for almost every word of the Lords Prayer was taken from the writings of the pious men of their Nation; he chang'd their rites into Sacraments, their customes into mysteries, their washings he made our Baptisme, their Paschal supper he converted into the Holy Eucharist: and still because he would be understood by them, he retain'd the Mosaick words when he deliver'd a Christian precept; for he knew his Father would send his Holy Spirit to be an infallible interpreter; and when the types of Moses pass'd into the substance of Christ, then the typical words also would be expounded in the senses of Evangelical duties.

2. For indeed it is not reasonable to suppose that our Bl. Saviour, who came to fulfil the Law in his own person, and to abolish it in his Disciples, to change the customes of Moses, and to be an eternal law-giver in the instances of moral and essential natural rectitudes, would give a new Commandement to confirm an old precept which himself intended to extinguish. No man puts a piece of new cloth to an old garment, nor a new injunction to an abrogated law; that is, no wise Master-builder holds up with one hand what he intends to pull down with both: it must therefore follow that whatever Christ did preach and affirme and exhort, was, although expres's'd in the words of the Law, yet wholly relative to the duty & signification of the Gospel. For that which S. Hilary said of all the words of Scripture, is particularly true in the sense now deliver'd of the Sermons of Christ: Sermo enim divinus secundum intelligentiæ nostræ consuetudinem naturamque se temperat, communibus rerum vocabulis ad significationem doctrinæ suæ & institutionis aptatis. Nobis n. non sibi loquitur: atque ideo nostris utitur in loquendo. God speaks to us and not to himself; and therefore he uses words fitting to our understandings. By common and usual expressions and such as were understood he expres's'd precepts and mysteries which otherwise were not to be understood. In Psal. 226

3. Thus when our Bl. Saviour delivers the precept of Charity and forgiveness he uses this expression, When thou bringest thy gift unto the Altar, and there remembrest that thou hast any thing against thy Brother, leave thy gift at the Altar, goe and be reconcil'd to thy Brother, and then come and offer thy gift. If Christ had said, When thou comest to the Lords supper and haſt any thing againſt thy Brother, &c. he had not been underſtood: but becauſe we know this is an Eternal precept, part of a moral & eternal excellency, a duty of Chriſtianity and a portion of Chriſts inſtitution, and we know that Chriſt pull'd down the Jewiſh altars and the ſacrifice of beaſts by the ſacrifice of his Eternal Prieſthood, and we alſo are ſufficiently inſtructed by what inſtruments and by what miniſteries the memory of that is conſerv'd and the benefits of it conveyed; therefore we alſo are ſure that by theſe words Chriſt intended to command us to be at peace with our Brother and with our enemy, when we come to offer prayers and to celebrate the memorial of his Eternal ſacrifice.

4 So when our Bl. Saviour told the Parable of Dives and Lazarus, and intended to repreſent unto his Diſciples that we are to expect Salvation by the ordinary miniſteries of the Church, and not to expect it by the way of miracle and extraordinary diſpenſation; he was pleas'd to ſay, They have Moſes and the Prophets, let them hear them. This was all which could be ſaid to them whoſe Scriptures were compleated in the writings of Moſes and the Prophets: but when our great Maſter had by his H. Spirit and by his Apoſtles and Diſciples perfected another inſtrument of ſalvation and repoſitory of Divine truths, the propoſition is to be inlarg'd to theſe. They have Chriſt and his Apoſtles, they have the Goſpels and Epiſtles, let them hear them; for if they will not hear and obey them ſpeaking in the Scriptures, neither will they be converted though one ariſe from the dead, and appear to them in the terrible dreſſes of affrightment.

5. When Chriſt whipp'd the buyers and ſellers out of the Temple, and urg'd the words of the Prophet, My Fathers houſe ſhall be called the houſe of prayer to all Nations; but ye have made it a den of theeves: although this was ſpoken to the Jewes, and of their Temple, yet Chriſt who knew this Temple was to be deſtroyed and not a ſtone left upon a ſtone, intended the piety of his Commandement ſhould laſt longer then the dying Temple; and therefore it is to be tranſlated wholly to the Chriſtian ſenſe. And although he would not have the Temple prophan'd ſo long as it was ſtanding and us'd for prayer and Divine ſervice, ad horam, as S. Irenæus his expreſſion is; even for an hour, taking care of that becauſe it was a holy place: yet the ſacredneſs and holy uſage of the Temple was leſs principally intended; but principally Chriſt regarded the Chriſtian Oratories and ſeparate places of devotion; that where God by publick appointment and the lawes was to be worſhipped, there the affairs of the world ſhould not intrude by the intereſts of a private and a prophane Spirit.

Rule XVI.

The Lawes of Jeſus Chriſt are to be interpreted to the ſenſe of a preſent obedience according to their ſubject matter.

1. That which is true to day will be true to morrow; and that which is in it's own nature good or neceſſary any day is good or neceſſary every day: and therefore there is no eſſential duty of the Religion but is to be the work work of every day. To confess Gods glory, to be his subject, to love God, to be ready to doe him service, to live according to Nature and to the Gospel, to be chast, to be temperate, to be just, these are the imployment of all the periods of a Christians life. For the Moral law of the Religion is nothing but the moral law of Nature, (as I have already proved *.) Naturaliter lex nostra est lex pietatis, justitiæ, fidei, simplicitatis, charitatis, optimeque instituta, said Cardan: and again, Christiani Jovem junctum habent cum Sole, illiusque diem colunt Dominicum: Sol a. significat justitiam & veritatem; Christiana autem lex plus continet veritatis, & simpliciores reddit homines. The Christian Law is nothing else but a perfect institution of life and understanding, it makes men wise, and it makes them good; it teaches wisdome, and it teaches justice; it makes them wise and simple, that is, prudent and innocent, and there is no time of our life in which we are permitted to be otherwise. Those who in the primitive Church put off their Baptisme till the time of their death, knew that Baptisme was a profession of holiness, and an undertaking to keep the faith, and live according to the Commandements of Jesus Christ; and that as soon as ever they were baptized, that is as soon as ever they had made profession to be Christs disciples, they were bound to keep all the Lawes of Christ: and therefore that they deferr'd their baptisme was so egregious a prevarication of their duty, that as in all reason it might ruine their hopes, so it proclaim'd their folly to all the world. For as soon as ever they were convinc'd in their understanding, they were oblig'd in their consciences. And although baptisme does publish the profession, and is like the forms and solemnities of law; yet a man is bound to live the life of a Christian, as soon as ever he believes the doctrine and Commandements of Christianity; for indeed he is oblig'd as soon as he can use reason, or hear reason. The first things a man can learn are some parts of Christianity; not to hurt any one, to doe all that he can understand to be good; that is, as soon as ever he begins to live like a rational creature, so soon he begins to live as Christ commanded: and since Baptisme (as to this relation and intention of it) is nothing else but the publication of our undertaking to doe that which in our very Nature and by the first and universal lawes of God to mankind we are obliged, to refuse to be baptized, or to defer it, is nothing but a refusing or deferring to own our natural obligation, a denying or not accepting the duty of living according to the law of Nature; which deferring, as it must needs be the argument of an evil man, and an indication of unwillingness to live worthily, so it can serve really no prudent ends to which it can fallaciously pretend. For Christianity being in its moral part nothing but the perfection of the natural law, binds no more upon us then God did by the very reason of our Nature. By the Natural law we are bound to live in holiness and righteousness all the daies of our life, and so we are by the Christian law; as appears in the song of Zechary and in very many other places: and therefore although when some of our time is elapsed and lost in careleſness and folly, the goodness of God will admit us to second Counsels, and the death of Christ and his intercession will make them acceptable; yet Christianity obliges us to obedience as soon as the law of Nature does, and we must profess to live according to Christianity, as soon as we can live by the measures of the Natural law, and that is even in the very infancy of our reason; and therefore Baptisme is not to be deferred longer: it may be sooner, because some little images of choice and reason, which must be conducted by the measures of Nature, appear even in infancy; but it must not be deferred longer; there is no excuse for that, because there can be no reason for so doing, unless where there is a necessity, and it can be no otherwise.

2. The effects of this consideration are these. 1. All the negative precepts of Christs law are obligatory in all persons, and all periods, and all instances. Nunquam licuit, nunquam licebit; it was and is and ever will be Unlawful to doe any action which God forbids to be done: and therefore to say I will be chast when I am old, I will be temperate when I am sick, I will be just when I am rich, I will be willing to restore when I die, is to measure eternity by time, and to number that which is not. In negatives there is neither number, nor weight, nor measure: and not to kill, not to blaspheme, not to commit adultery hath no time, and hath no proportion.

3. 2. This is also true in the positive Commandements of Christ, in respect of the inward duty; that is never to be deferred. The charity of almes, the devotion of prayer, piety to our parents, love of God, love of our neighbour, desires to doe justice; these are not limited to times and opportunities. The habits of them and the dispositions to action, the readiness and the love must for ever be within; because these are alwaies possible, and alwaies good, and alwaies necessary, and therefore cannot have accidental determinations from without, being workes of the inward Man, they depend onely upon the grace of God and the will of man; and that never fails, if this does not, and therefore are alwayes possible unless we will not; but they are alwayes necessary, whether we will or no.

4. 3. The external actions of duty are determinable from without, and by things which are not in our power, and by things which will not happen alwaies and in some instances, by our own will and meer choice. Thus a man is bound actually to restore but in certain circumstances; but to be ready and to love to doe it, he is alwayes bound. To say our prayers is limited by time and place, by occasions and emergent necessities, by use and custome, by lawes and examples: but to depend upon God, to expect all good from him, to glorify him, to worship him with all our heart, is not limited, but may be done in all the actions of our life, by actual application, or habitual intention, by secret purpose, or by open profession, by obedience and by love, or by the voice and hand. For to pray continually] which is the precept of our Bl. Saviour, is obligatory in the very letter, in proportion to the natural possibilities and measure of a man; that is, in all our actions we must glorify God, which is one of the parts of prayer, and we must endear his blessing, which is the other. But to kneel, or to speak, or actually to think a prayer, being the body of this duty and determinable by something from without, receives it's limit [according to the subject matter] that is, when we are commanded, and when we have need, and when we can, and in the proper season of it.

5. This Rule is also otherwise explicated by distinguishing the affirmative precepts of Christ, into universal and particular. Particular precepts are to be acted onely in their proper determinations, in special times, and pertinent occasions, because they are always relative to time and place, or person; person; they have a limited effect, and are but parts of a good life, and therefore cannot alone work out our salvation, but must give allowance of time and action to others, of the like particular and limited nature and effect.

6. But this is otherwise in the universal and diffusive, or transcendent precepts of the Religion, though they be affirmative. He that shall say, that because to love God is an affirmative precept, that it is onely obligatory in certain accidents, and times, and cases, and that therefore we are not always bound to love God, by the impiety of his conclusion reproves the folly of his proposition. Neither is it sufficient to say that we are indeed always bound to the habitual love of God, but not always to the actual; not always to doe an act of the love of God. For the love of God does not consist onely in the fancy or the passionate part, neither is it to be measured by the issues of any one faculty: and though we are not bound to the exercise of an act of passion, or intuition, or melting affection, that is, we are not always tied to a limited, particular, single effect of one grace, in all times; yet we are bound to doe an act of love to God, when we are bound to doe any act at all; for all our Religion, and all our obedience, and all our conversation is wholly to be conducted by the love of God: and although to love God be an affirmative Commandement, yet because it is a transcendent, or universal precept, and includes in it all those precepts, which by binding at several times, fill up all our time, and every of them being an act of obedience, is consequently an act and instance of our love to God, it follows, that there is no time in which we are not bound to love God; and to exercise acts of this grace does not depend upon times and circumstances.

7. Upon the accounts of this Rule it is very opportune, and certainly very useful, to inquire concerning the duty of Repentance; for upon this article the whole question of late or death-bed Repentance will depend, and consequently the eternal felicity or infelicity of mankinde: and therefore I have reason to reckon this to be the greatest Case of Conscience in the whole world; and it will appear so both in the event of the discourse, and in the event of things.

Question.

8. At what time precisely is every sinner bound to repent of his sins, so that if he does not repent at that time, he commits a new sin?

9. To this Question of At what time] the Church of Rome answers, At what time soever] For Repentance is as the precept of Baptism and Prayers. Neither this day nor to morrow precisely is it necessary to be baptized, but sometime or other; and if we pray half an hour hence, it is as much obedience as if we fall upon our knees at the instant of the proclamation. Adde to this, that since repentance (besides that it is an affirmative Commandement) is also a punitive duty, it is generally agreed upon Neminem in conscientia donec condemnetur ad pœnam exolvendam teneri, No man is bound to undergoe his punishment, till the instant that the Law determines him: and therefore when he is requir'd, when the day of humiliation comes, when there is danger that if it be not now done, it will not be done at all, then let the ſinner look to it, then he muſt repent, it cannot be any longer put off. This is the doctrine of the Roman Schools, and of ſome others, which they have purſued to dangerous and horrid propoſitions.

10. Scotus and his Scholars ſay a man is bound to repent upon Holidays, as upon Chriſtmaß, Whitſontide, or at Eaſter to be ſure. But Sotus and Medina very confidently reprove this propoſition as too ſevere, for this reaſon; Becauſe the Church having appointed many Holidays, yet when ſhe explicates the doctrine of Repentance, ſhe did ſuppoſe it to be ſufficient to compel the ſinner to repent once by the year: and although the end why the Feſtivals are ordain'd is the inward ſanctification of the ſoul, hæc tamen non eſt id quod per præceptum de obſervatione feſtorum injungitur, this is not it which was enjoyn'd by the precept concerning feſtivals, ſaith Reginaldus. For the Church (ſaith he) commanded onely the means to this interiour holineſs; ſo that if you doe the outward work, it matters not (as to the precept of the Church) whether that end be acquired or no: you diſobey the Church if you doe not hear Maſs; but though you be never the better, ſo you doe but hear Maſs, ſhe does not finde her ſelf griev'd.

Vide Reginaldum in praxi fori pœnitent. l. 5. de contritione cap. 2. ſect. 4.

11. By the way, it is obſervable that Scotus and the more ſevere part of them, which affirm a man to be bound to repent on every Holiday, doe not intend to ſay that by the law of God men are ſo bound, but by the law of the Church onely. Medina and the looſer part deny the Church to have determin'd this affirmative and indefinite Commandement of Repentance to ſo much ſeverity. But as to the law of God, they all pronounce a man to be free to repent once for all; once he muſt, but when that once ſhall be God hath not ſet down: and ſince God left it at the greateſt liberty, they doe not believe that the Church is ſo ſevere as ſome pretend, neither doe they think it fit ſhe ſhould; but if they never repent till the article of death, they prevaricate no command of God. For [Vera, atque adeo, ut expreſſit Navarrus in Enchir. cap. 1. n. 31. omnium communis ſententia eſt, tempus in quo peccator conteri tenetur (intellige per ſe, ſeu vi ſpecialis præcepti de contritione à Deo dati) eſſe imminentem articulum mortis naturalis, vel violentæ] So Reginaldus. The true and common opinion of all men is, that the time in which a ſinner is bound to have contrition for his ſins (meaning in reſpect of any Divine Commandement) is the article of imminent death, whether natural or violent. And in the mean time [There is no precept commanding that a ſinner ſhould not perſevere in enmity againſt God: there is no negative precept forbidding ſuch a perſeverance. Nay worſe, if worſe be poſſible, [even to reſolve to deferre our repentance [velle pœnitentiam differre, nolléque niſi ad aliquod tempus pœnitere] and to refuſe to repent till ſuch a day, is but a very little ſin (ſaith Sotus;) it is none at all (ſaith Medina) it is neither an act of impenitence, nor at all unlawful.

L. 5. cap. 2. ſect. 4. n. 23.

Idem ſect. 3. n. 21.

12. Theſe are ſad ſtories to be told and maintained by Chriſtian families, but therefore the more carefully to be look'd to, becauſe it is concerning the ſumme of affairs, and an error here is worſe then an over-ſight in a day of battel: for repentance being the remedy for all the evils of our ſoul, if the remedy be ordered ſo as that it come too late, or deferr'd till the diſeaſe increaſe to an intolerable and an incurable evil, the ſtate of our ſoul muſt needs be without remedy; and that in our Philoſophy is equivalent to deſperation.

But

13. But before I reprove these horrid doctrines, which so intirely and without dispute prevail in some Churches, I am to say two things. 1. If God hath left the time of our repentance and return so wholly without care and provision, though by the doctrine of some Romane Doctors the Church hath been more careful of it and more severe then God himself, yet neither the care of the Church, nor the ordinary provisions and arrests made by God can ever be sufficient to cause men to live well in any tolerable degree. For if God binds you onely to repent in the day of your death, or if he to hasten it will affright you with a popular judgement upon the neighbourhood, all those that escape the sickness, and all that have but little or no reason to fear it, and all those that can flie from it shall not repent, and indeed shall not be tied to it. And if we consider the event and impressions usually made upon our cities and villages by any popular judgement, we shall finde so very many to be unconcerned, that if this be the time of repentance, the duty will upon this account goe but slowly forward: very many shall have no need to doe it; and none will doe it but they that have: and if the fear of imminent death be the onely period, we may easily perceive what ill provisions are made for repentance, when even dying men will hardly believe that they shall die yet, but hope for life, till their hopes and powers of working expire together. But then because it is pretended that the Church hath made better provisions, and tied all men to communicate at Easter, and consequently to repent by way of preparation to the Holy Communion; I consider that the Church can onely tie them to the outward signification of repentance, as Confession, and the appendages of that entercourse; and if they omit the inward and more spiritual and essential part of this great duty, they may for this sin as well as for all the other repent in the day of death, and that is sufficient for the performance of the Divine Commandement. And since the Church requires no more but a periodical and a ritual repentance, the repentance of a Christian will be like the Persian feast, which they call'd vitiorum interitum, the destruction of impiety; upon the anniversary of which feast they kill'd all the venemous creatures they could finde, but they let them alone to swarm till that day came again: and that is the event of these ritual and anniversary repentances; at a set time there is a declamation made against sin, and some significations of the evil of it express'd, but when the solemnity is over, it returns in all the material instances; and there is no help for it in this doctrine, nor in the customes and usages of those Churches that entertain it. So that this doctrine must be acknowledged as a destroyer of good life: and though I know no artifices of escape from this, that are made use of, yet if there were, we are not to consider what is talk'd amongst Schoolmen to excuse the objection and to maintain the faction, but what is really and materially the event of it, as it is every day observed in the manners of men.

14. The other thing which I was to say is this, that this doctrine of the Roman Schools, which is the common sentence of them all, cannot be directly confuted, unless we fall upon this proposition [that a man is positively and directly bound to repent of his sin as soon as ever he hath committed it.]

15. For if there be not something in the nature of sin that must not be retain'd at all; if there be not much in the anger of God that must not be endur'd at all; if there be not obligations to the service of God that must not not be put off at all; if there be not great regards concerning the love of God without which we muſt not live at all; and laſtly, if there be not infinite dangers in our life, and that every putting our repentance off expoſes it to the inexcuſable danger of never having it done at all; then it muſt follow that repentance obliges no otherwiſe then alms, or ſaying our prayers, it is to be done in its proper ſeaſon: and the conſequent of that will be, that ſo it be done at all, we are ſafe enough if it be done at any time; and if you can deferre it till to morrow, you may alſo put it off till the next day, and ſo until you die. * And there is no avoiding it, as is evident to all rational and conſidering perſons: for to morrow and to day are both alike as to the affirmative command; and by Gods law we are not bound to it till the day of our death, if we be not bound to it every day. We muſt therefore chuſe our propoſition. Does God give us leave, if we have ſinn'd, to dwell in it, to forget our danger, to neglect the wound that putrifies? Is he pleaſed that we for whom he hath given his Son, we whom he hath adopted into his family and made members of Chriſt, we to whom he perpetually gives his grace, whom he invites by his promiſes, and calls by his Preachers every day, and affrights by his threatnings every hour, and incites by his Spirit, and makes reſtleſs by the daily emotions of an unquiet conſcience; that we whom he every day obliges, and no day neglects to doe ſomething towards our amendment and ſalvation; is he (I ſay) pleaſed that we ſhould in deſpight or contempt of all this abide in his diſpleaſure, and dwell in that ſtate of evil things, that if on any hour of ſo many days and weeks and moneths and years we chance to die, we die again and die for ever? Is this likely? Does God ſo little value the ſervices of our life, the vigor of our youth, the wiſdome of our age, the activity of our health, the imployment of our faculties, the excellency of our dwelling with him? Does he ſo little eſtimate the growth in grace, and the repetition of holy acts, the ſtrength of our habits, and the firmneſs of our love, that he will be ſatisfied with an accidental repentance, a repentance that comes by chance, and is certain in nothing but that it certainly comes too late? But if we may not deferre our repentance to the laſt, then we muſt not deferre it at all, we muſt not put it off one day: For if one, then twenty, if twenty, then twenty thouſand; there is no reaſon againſt one, but what is againſt all: but if we may not ſtay a thouſand days, then not one hour; and that is the thing I ſhall now contend for.

16. 1. I remember an odde argument uſed by Reginaldus * to prove that a man is not bound to be contrite for his ſins as ſoon as he remembers them; becauſe (ſays he) if he were, then it were but ill provided by God and the Church that Preachers ſhould call upon men to confeſs their ſins, to be ſorrowful for them, and utterly to leave them: for there is no queſtion but ſuch diſcourſes will often remind us of our ſins; and if we were then tied to repent, and did ſin by not repenting, then ſuch preachings would be the occaſion of many ſins, and the law would be an intolerable Commandement, and Chriſts yoke not to be endured; becauſe men doe not finde it ſo eaſy to repent upon every notice: ſo he. But this conſideration turn'd with the right end forwards is an excellent argument to enforce the duty which I am now preſſing of, a preſent actual repentance. For does God ſend Preachers who every day call upon us to repent, and does not God intend we ſhould repent on that day he calls to doe it? Doe the Prophets and Preachers of righteouſ-righteousnes bid us repent next year? Have they Commission to say, It were well and convenient if you would repent to day; but you doe not sin if you stay till next year, or till you are old, or till you die? To what purpose then doe they preach? Does not God require our obedience? Doe we not sin if the Preachers say well and right, and we doe it not? Is there any one minute, any one day in which we may innocently stay from the service of God? Let us think of that. Every day on which a sinner deferres his repentance, on that day he refuses to be Gods servant: and if God does command his service every day, then he every day sins on which he refuses. For unless God gives him leave to stay away, his very staying away is as much a sin as his going away, that is, his not repenting is a new sin.

17. And if by way of Objection it be inquir'd, By what measures or rules of multiplication shall such sins be numbred? whether by every day, and why not by every night, or why not by every hour, or every half hour? I answer, that the question is captious and of no real use, but to serve instead of a temptation. But the answer is this; 1. That the sin of not repenting increases by intension of degrees, as the perpetuity of an act of hatred against God. He that continues a whole day in such actual hostility and defiance increases his sin perpetually, not by the measures of wine and oile, or the strokes of the clock, but by spiritual and intentional measures; he still more and more provokes God, and in the eternal scrutiny God will fit him with numbers and measures of a proportionable judgement. 2. The sin of not repenting is also multiplied by extension; for every time a man does positively refuse to repent, every time a man is call'd upon or thinks of his duty and will not doe it, every such negative is a new sin, and a multiplication of his scores: and it may happen that every day that may become twenty sins, and in a short time rise to an intolerable height.

18. 2. He that remembers he hath committed a sin, either remembers it with joy or with displeasure. If with displeasure, it is an act of repentance; if with joy, it is a new sin; or if it be with neither, the man does not consider at all. But if it abides there, the sin will be apt to repeat its own pleasures to the memory, to act them in the fancy, and so endear them to the heart: and it is certain that all active considerations declare on one side or other, either for the sin or against it; and the Devil is not so backward at tempting, and the pleasure of the sin is not so unactive, but if ever it be thought upon without sorrow, it cannot easily be thought upon without some actual or potential delight: and therefore he that repents not, does sin anew. He that hath stoln is bound presently to restore if he can, and when it is in our hand it must also be in our heart to restore, and the evil must not be suffered so much as for an hour to dwell upon the injur'd person: so it is in the restitution of our hearts and our affections to God; there is an injustice done to God all the way by our detaining of his rights, the injury is upon him, he complains that we will not come in, and is delighted if we come speedily. Restitution therefore must be made presently; and for the satisfaction and amends for the wrong besides, God may longer expect, even till the day of its proper period.

19. 3. Does not God every day send something of his grace upon us? Does he not always knock at the door of our hearts, as long as the day of salvation ſalvation laſts? Does not he ſend his Spirit to invite, his arguments to perſwade, and his mercies to endear us? Would he have any thing of this loſt? Is it not a ſin once to reſiſt the Holy Spirit? And he that remembers his ſin, and knows it is an offence againſt God, and yet does not repent at that thought and that knowledge, does not he reſiſt the Holy Spirit of God, ſo moving, ſo acting, ſo inſinuating? Is not every good Sermon a part of the grace of God? Qui monet, quaſi adjuvat, ſays the Comedy, he that counſels you, helps you: and can it be imagined that he that reſiſts the grace of God twenty years is not a greater villain then he that ſtood againſt it but twenty moneths, and ſo on to twenty days, and twenty hours? Peccatorem tanto ſequitur diſtrictior ſententia quanto peccanti ei magna eſt patientia prorogata: & Divina ſeveritas eo iniquum acrius punit, quo diutius pertulit, ſaith S. Gregory. The longer God hath expected our repentance, the more angry he is if we doe not repent; now Gods anger would not increaſe if our ſin did not. But I conſider, Muſt not a man repent of his reſiſting Gods grace, of his refuſing to hear, of his not attending, of his neglecting the means of ſalvation? And why all this, but that every delay is a quenching of the light of Gods Spirit, and every ſuch quenching cannot be innocent? And what can be expounded to be a contempt of God, if this be not; that when God by his preventing, his exciting, his encouraging, his aſſiſting grace invites us to repentance, we nevertheleſs refuſe to mourn for our ſins and to repent? * This is the very argument which the Spirit of God himſelf uſes, and therefore is not capable of reproof or confutation. Becauſe I have called and ye refuſed, I have ſtretched out my hand and no man regarded: but ye have ſet at nought all my counſel, and would none of my reproof; I will alſo laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh. Is not therefore every call to be regarded? and conſequently is not every refuſing criminal? and does not God call every day? Put theſe things together, and the natural conſequent of them is this, That he who ſins & does not repent ſpeedily, does at leaſt ſin twice, and every day of delay is a further provocation of the wrath of God. To this purpoſe are thoſe excellent words of S. Paul, Deſpiſeſt thou the riches of his goodneſs and forbearance and long-ſuffering, not knowing that the goodneſs of God leadeth thee to repentance? That is, every action of Gods loving-kindneſs and forbearance of thee is an argument for, and an exhortation to repentance; and the not making uſe of it is called by the Apoſtle, a deſpiſing of his goodneſs; and the not repenting is on every day of delay a treaſuring up of wrath:

Αἰψα γὰρ ἐν κακότητι βροτοὶ καταγηράσκουσι,

Men waxe old and grow gray in their iniquity, while they think every day too ſhort for their ſin, and too ſoon for their repentance. But (if I may have leave to complain) it is a ſad thing to ſee a man who is well inſtructed in Religion, able to give counſel to others, wiſe enough to conduct the affairs of his family, ſober in his reſolution concerning the things of this world, to ſee ſuch a perſon come to Church every Feſtival, and hear the perpetual Sermons of the Goſpel, the clamors of Gods Holy Spirit, the continual noiſe of Aarons bells ringing in his ears, a man that knows the danger of a ſinner if he dies without pardon, that the wrath of God cannot be endured, and yet that without a timely and ſufficient repentance it cannot be avoided; to ſee ſuch a man day after day ſin againſt God, enter into all temptations, and fall under every one, and never think of his repentance, but unalterably reſolve to venture for it, and for the acceptance of it at the last: for it is a venture whether he shall repent; and if he does, it is yet a greater venture whether that repentance shall be accepted, because without all peradventure in that case it can never be perfected. But the evil of this will further appear in the next argument.

20. 4. He that does not repent presently, as soon as he remembers and considers that he hath sinn'd, does certainly sin in that very procrastination, because he certainly exposes himself to a certain and unavoidable danger of committing other and new sins. And therefore I cannot but wonder at the assertors of the opposite doctrine, who observe this danger, and signify it publickly, and yet condemn such persons of imprudence onely but not of sin. The words of Reginaldus, and according to the sense of Navarre, are these, Ad quod tamen tempus pœnitentiam differre esse salutem animæ in magnum discrimen adducere patet per illud quod ex D. Augustino refertur in cap. siquis: & cap. finali de pœniten. dist. 7. dubiam esse salutem illorum quos non ante sed post ægritudinem pœnitet. Ratio verò esse potest quod in eo cernatur interpretativus contemptus Dei, qui sæpius per gratias prævenientes illos excitat ac movet ad resipiscentiam, agendamque pœnitentiam, conterendumve de suis peccatis: nihilominus non curant atque negligunt. He that defers his repentance brings his Soul into manifest and great danger, according to the doctrine of S. Austin; for it is an interpretative contempt of God, who often excites them by his preventing graces to repent and to doe penance, and to be contrite for their sins, but they neglect it and care not. Now since thus much is observ'd and acknowledged, it is a strange violence to reason and to religion that it should not also be confessed to be the design and intention of God, his will and pleasure, the purpose of his grace and the Oeconomy of Heaven, the work of his Spirit and the meaning and interpretation of his Commandement, that we should repent presently. For when the question is concerning the sense and limit of an indefinite Commandement, what can be a better commentary to the law then the actions of God himself? for he understands his own meaning best, and certainly by these things he hath very competently and sufficiently declar'd it.

L. 5. prax. tom. pœnit. cap. 2. sect. 4. n. 23

21. If it be objected that these actions of the Divine grace are not sufficient to declare it to be a sin not to doe it, whenever the grace of God prompts us to repent, because we find that the Spirit of God does use rare arts to invite us forward to such degrees of perfection and excellency, to which whoever arrives shall be greatly rewarded, but if a man falls short, he does not sin; I reply, that the case is not the same in the matter of Counsel, and in the matter of a Commandement: For when the question is concerning the sense and signification, the definition and limit of that which is acknowledg'd to be a Commandement, the actions of the Divine grace signifying Gods pleasure and meaning, doe wholly relate to the Commandement; when the thing is onely matter of Counsel, then the actions of the Divine grace relate to that, and are to be expounded accordingly. But thus they are alike; that as God by his arguments and inducements, his assistances and aides declares that to doe the thing he counsels would be very pleasing to him; so they declare that what he commands is to be done, that he intends the Commandement then to bind, that whenever the one is good, the other is necessary. But his pleasure which he signifies concerning a Counsel, does not mean like his pleasure concerning a Commandement; but every thing according to the nature of the Subject Matter: for God having left the one under choice, and bound the other by a law, whatever ſignification of the mind of God comes after this muſt be relative to what he hath before eſtabliſhed, and does not now alter, but onely expound now what his meaning was before. Since therefore the queſtion here is to what preciſe time we are oblig'd in the precept of repentance, nothing is more reaſonable then to conclude, that then God intended we ſhould keep the precept, when he enables us, and exhorts and calls upon us to doe it, which becauſe he by his grace and holy Spirit does every day, this declaration of God is the beſt Commentary upon his Commandement.

22. But to return to the firſt purpoſe of this argument. He that knowes he hath ſinn'd, and will not kill it by repentance, leaves the affections to ſin remaining; an aptneſs to be tempted, a relation to the Devil, a captivity to luſt, and an impotency under his paſſion. For if ſin be a curſed Serpent, if it leaves any venome upon the Spirit of the man, if by committing ſin we are more apt to commit it ſtill, he that hath ſinn'd, and when he remembers it does not repent, keeps himſelf in the diſpoſitions to ſin, he dwells in the Temptation and the Neighbourhood: and becauſe every thing that invites and directly tends to ſin is ſymbolical and of the ſame Nature, the retaining of that very aptneſs by not repenting the old, muſt needs be a progreſſion and going on in ſin, and therefore a new ſin by interpretation.

23. And if we conſider but the ſad circumſtances of thoſe perſons who wax old in careleſneſs and contempt of duty, how dead their Spirit is, how every day they grow more unwilling to repent, how habitual their perſwaſions are in the behalf of ſin, how accidentally hard they grow, and by perceiving ſo long an impunity, and that things remain as they were 20. years agoe, and that though they ſinn'd then, yet they are well ſtill, and all the affrightments of the Preachers ſermons are but loud noiſes and harmleſs thunder, they grow confident and ſtill more careleſs; we ſhall find that their Spirit is in declenſion, and is continually, and ſtill further diſtant from the friendſhip of God. So ſometimes we ſee a healthful body by the diſorders of one intemperate meeting fallen into the beginnings of a ſickneſs. The Man it may be does ſo no more; but feeling his ſickneſs tolerable, and under the command of reaſon, he refuſes to take phyſick, and to throw out the evil principle which begins to ferment in the diſordered body: but Nature being diſturbed and leſſened in her proper vigor, goes on in her uſual methods as well as ſhe can; ſhe goes forward, but ſhe carries a load, which in a long progreſſion growes intolerable, not by it's own weight, but by the diminution of Natures ſtrengths. But when the evil is grown great, the Phyſitian is call'd for; who eſpying the evil ſtate of things is forc'd to reply, It is now very late, for nature is weak and the diſeaſe is ſtrong. I ſhall doe what art can miniſter, but I fear that Nature is incapable of relief. So it is in the Soul; the very deferring of taking Phyſick is an increaſing of the diſeaſe. For every ſin is Ulcus, ἕλκος ἀπὸ τοῦ ἕλκειν, it is an Ulcer and drawes all the humors thither for it's increaſe and nouriſhment: and that which is ſore will ſwell, and all the waters will run to the hole in the bank, and every finger to the wound that ſmarts, and every eye to the thing we fear: and therefore it hath been obſerv'd by the wiſe guides of Souls, that thoſe perſons who defer their repentance to their old age, their repentance comes off the harder, their penitential actions are the worse, their zeal colder, their care more indifferent, their religion less, their fears are trifling, their love starke and cold, their confessions formal and imperfect, every thing amiss, nothing right: but no repentance can be that which God intends, unless it begins betimes.

Vidi ego quod fuerat primò sanabile vulnus
Dilatum longæ damna tulisse moræ. Ovid.

Any one disease if let alone, though there be no new sickness supervening, growes mortal by meer delay, and incurable for want of timely remedy.

24. 5. Let us consider upon what account any man can defer his repentance and yet be innocent. It must either be because he loves his sin, or because he loves not God; because he either despises the Divine justice, or presumes upon his mercy; because he hath evil principles, or because he will not obey those which are good. It is positive impenitence, or it is privative; it is hardness of heart, or it is effeminacy of life; it is want of fear, or want of love: and whatsoever can come from any of these causes or beginnings can never be innocent. And therefore S. Ambrose his question was a good caution and a severe reproof. Quid enim est quod differas? an ut plura peccata committas? Why doe you defer your repentance? is it because you would commit more sins? That's most likely.

Sed quia delectat Veneris decerpere fructus,
Dicimus assiduè, Cras quoque fiet idem.
Interea tacitæ serpunt in viscera flammæ,
Et mala radices altiùs arbor agit. Lib. 1. de remed. amoris

He that sayes he will not repent of his lust to day, sayes in effect that he means to act it again to morrow; for why else should he put his repentance farther off?

Quid juvat in longum causas producere morbi?
Cur dubium expectat cras hodierna salus?

If you really intend your cure, it is better to begin to day then to morrow: and why should any man desire to be sick one day longer? Whatever can be in it, it is a disease and a very sickness of it self. There can be no good excuse pretended for it. For if carelesness, if the neglect of holy things can ruine us (as certainly a man may die with hunger as surely as by gluttony, by not eating at all as well as by eating too much, by omission as well as by commission) it will follow that the not repenting is fatal and damnable, because every delay is a Not-repenting till that delay be gone.

25. 6. The Scripture does every where call upon us for a speedy repentance. For God that commands us to pray every day, consequently commands us to repent every day. This argument ought to prevail even upon the adversaries account: For Navarre confesses, Extra tempus articuli mortis dantur casus in quibus peccator conteri tenetur per aliud, sive ex vi alicujus præcepti quod peccator ipse transgreditur, aliquid agens non contritus. When there is any distinct precept obliging to a duty which cannot be done by him that is not penitent, he that directly obliges to that other duty, does indirectly and consequently at that very time oblige to repentance. Thus when the Church obliges a Priest to consecrate and to communicate, because he who does so without repentance commits a deadly sin, the Church accidentally ties him at that time to repent. From these premisses I assume, that since God obliges us every day to pray, he also Apud Reginald ubi supra.

obliges us to doe that without which we cannot pray as God intends we ſhould: that is, to throw away all our affection to ſin, to repent of it and to forſake it. For the prayer of a wicked man is an abomination to the Lord, ſaid Solomon; and we know that God heareth not ſinners, ſaid he in the Goſpel, that is, thoſe who having ſinn'd have not yet repented, being unhappy in their haſty ſin, but more unhappy in their ſlow repentance: but it is the prayer of the repenting man which God will hear; & therefore our Bleſſed Saviour commanding us to pray and teaching us how, enjoynes us that we every day pray for the forgiveneſs of our treſpaſſes; as for our daily bread, ſo for our daily pardon: Panem noſtrum da nobis hodie, Give us this day our proportion of bread; and therefore alſo this day give us pardon; for we muſt return to day: Hodie for bread, and hodie for forgiveneſs and amendment. So the Pſalmiſt, and ſo the Apoſtle in his words, To day hear his voice and harden not your hearts; not onely expreſsly commanding us not to defer our repentance one day, but plainly enough affirming that every ſuch delay is an act of hardneſs of heart and obduration, and therefore a new ſin ſuperadded to the old. For although in Nature and Logick time conſignifies, that is, it does the work of accidents and appendages and circumſtances, yet in Theology it ſignifies and effects too; time may ſignify a ſubſtantial duty, and effect a material pardon: but of all the parts of time we are principally concern'd in the preſent. But it is remarkable, that though [Hodie; to day] ſignifies the preſent time, yet the repentance which began yeſterday, which took an earlier hodie, is better then that which begins to day: but that which ſtaies till to morrow is the worſt of all.

——Infelix infelicior ut ſit,

Ille ſapit quiſquis, Poſthume, vixit Heri.

For Heri and Hodie, yeſterday and to day, ſignifies Eternity: ſo it is ſaid of Chriſt, Yeſterday and to day, the ſame for ever. But Hodie and Cras, to day and to morrow, ſignifies but a little while. To day and to morrow I work, ſaid Chriſt, that is, I work a little while; and the third day, that is, very ſhortly or quickly, I ſhall make an end. That repentance is likely to prevail to a happy eternity which was yeſterday and to day, but if it be deferred till to morrow, it begins late and will not laſt ſo long. * To this purpoſe excellent are thoſe words of Ben-Sirach, Make no tarrying to turn unto the Lord, and put not off from day to day: for ſuddenly ſhall the wrath of the Lord come forth, and in thy ſecurity thou ſhalt be deſtroyed. Meaning that every day of thy life may be the day of thy death, therefore take heed, and defer not untill death to be juſtified, for God oftentimes ſmites ſinners in their confidence; he ſtrikes them in their ſecurity, in their very delay they are ſurpris'd, in their procraſtination they ſhall looſe their hopes, and the benefit and uſefulneſs of to morrow. For what is vain man that he ſhould reſolve not to repent till Eaſter? It may be at that very time he ſo reſolves there is an impoſtume in his head or breaſt, or there is a popular diſeaſe abroad that kills in three daies, or to morrows dinner ſhall cauſe a ſurfeit, or that nights drinking ſhall inflame his blood into a feaver, or he is to ride a journey the next day and he ſhall fall from his horſe and die, or a tile in the ſtreet ſhall daſh his brains out; and no man can reckon all the poſſibilities of his dying ſuddenly, nor the probabilities that his life will end very quickly. This queſtion therefore may be determin'd without the intrigues of diſputation. Let a man but believe that he is mortal, let him but confeſs himſelf to be a man, and ſubject to chance, and there is no more

requir'd of him in this article, but the consequence of that confession. Nemo Deo credens non se sub verbis ejus corrigit nisi qui diu se putat esse victurum, saith S. Austin, Whosoever believes in God will presently amend his life at the command of God, unless he thinks he shall live long. But what if a man should live long? is it so intolerable a thing to live vertuously when we are to live long, that the hopes of life shall serve to no other end but that sin may be continued and repeated, and repentance may be delayed? That's the worst conclusion in the world from such premisses. But however, he that considers that so many men and women die young, will have but little reason to conclude to so evil and dangerous purposes from so weak and contingent principles. When Theramenes came out from his friends house the roof and walls immediately fell down. The Athenians espying the circumstances of that safety, flock'd about him, congratulated his escape, and cried him up as a man dear unto the Gods for his so strange deliverance from the ruine. But he wisely answer'd, Nescitis, viri, ad quæ tempora & pericula Jupiter me servare voluerit, Ye know not, O Athenians, to what evils I am reserved. He said true, for he that had escap'd the fall of a house in Athens, was in a little while condemn'd by the Ephori of Sparta to drink the cold and deadly hemlock; he pass'd but from one opportunity of death unto another.

Οὐκ ἔστι θνητῶν ὅστις ἐξεπίσταται
Τὴν αὔριον μέλλουσαν εἰ βιώσεται. Eurip.

No man can tell whether he shall live till to morrow: and to put off our repentance when it may be there is at the very instant the earnest of death in thy heart or bowels, a stone ready form'd, hardned and ripe in the Kidneies, and will before to morrow morning drop into the bladder,

Mors latet in mediis abdita visceribus,

Death is already plac'd in the stomach, or is gone into the belly, then, that is, in any case to defer repentance, is a great folly and a great uncharitableness, and a contempt of all the Divine revelations concerning heaven and hell. Μὴ πίστευε χρόνῳ, of all things in the world doe not trust to time.

——Obrepit non intellecta senectus;
Nec revocare potes qui periere dies. Auson

In time there is nothing certain, but that a great part of our life slips away without observation, and that which is gone shall never come again. These things although they are dress'd like the arguments of Orators, yet they doe materially and logically conclude, That if to be uncharitable be a sin, he that defers his repentance in so uncertain a life and so certainly approaching death, must needs be a very great sinner upon that account, because he does not love himself, and therefore loves no body, but abides without charity. But our Bl. Saviour hath drawn this Caution into a direct precept, Agree with thine adversary ταχὺ quickly: The hope of Eternity which now is in thy hand may else be lost for ever, and drop through thy fingers before to morrow morning. Quanto miser in periculo versaberis, quamque inopinati rerum casus te abripient! Miserable man, thou art in extreme danger, and unlook'd for accidents may end thy talkings of repentance and make it impossible for ever. A man is subject to infinite numbers of chances; and therefore that we may not rely upon the future or make delayes, let us make use of this argument, Whatsoever comes by chance, comes upon the sudden. S. Greg. Naz. in Sanct. Bapt.

26. But becauſe this diſcourſe is upon the grounds of Scripture, it is of great force what was by the Spirit of God threatned to the Angel of the Church of Epheſus; Repent, for I will come unto thee quickly, and remove the Candleſtick out of its place unleſs thou doeſt repent: that is, unleſs thou repent quickly, I will come quickly. Who knows how ſoon that may be to any man of us all? and therefore it is great prudence and duty and charity to take care that his coming to us doe not prevent our return to him; which thing can never be ſecur'd but by a preſent repentance. And if it be conſider'd that many perſons as good as we, as wiſe, as confident, as full of health, and as likely to live, have been ſnatch'd away when they leaſt did think of it, with a death ſo ſudden, that the deferring their repentance one day hath been their undoing for ever; that if they had repented heartily, and choſen a good life clearly and reſolvedly upon the day before their ſudden arreſt, it would have look'd like a deſign of grace and of election, and have rendred their condition hopeful; we ſhall finde it very neceſſary that we doe not at all deferre our return, for this reaſon, becauſe one hours ſtay may not onely by interpretation, but alſo in the real event of things, prove to be that which S. Auſtin call'd [the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt] that is, final impenitence. For as he that dies young, dies as much as he that dies after a life of fourſcore years; ſo is that impenitence final under which a man is arreſted under the infancy of his crime, as much as if after twenty years grace and expectation, the man be ſnatch'd from hence to die eternally. The evil is not ſo great, and the judgement is not ſo heavy, but as fatal and as irreverſible as the decree of damnation upon the falling Angels.

Revel. 2. 5.

27. 7. When we ſee a man doe amiſs we reprove him preſently, we call him off from it at the very time, and every good man would fain have his unhappy friend or relative leave in the midſt of his ſin, and be ſorry that he went ſo farr; and if he have finiſh'd his ſin, we require of him inſtantly to hate it, and ask pardon. This is upon the ſame account that God does it, becauſe to continue in it, can be for no good; to return inſtantly hath great advantages; to abide there is danger, and a ſtate of evil; to chuſe to abide there is an act of love to that evil ſtate, and conſequently a direct ſin; and not to repent when we are admoniſhed, is a chuſing to abide there: and when ever we remember and know and conſider we have ſinn'd, we are admoniſhed by Gods Spirit and the principles of grace and of a holy Religion. So that from firſt to laſt it follows certainly, that without a new ſin, we cannot remember that we have ſinn'd unleſs then alſo we doe repent: and our aptneſs to call upon others to doe ſo is a great conviction that every man is oblig'd in his own particular to doe ſo.

Menand. Ἅπαντες ἐσμεν εἰς τὸ νουθετεῖν σοφοί,
Αὐτοὶ δ' ἁμαρτάνοντες ἐγιγνώσκομεν.

Since we are all wiſe enough to give good counſel, it will reproach us if we are not conducted by the conſequences of our own wiſe advices. It was long firſt, but at laſt S. Auſtin fell upon this way; nothing could end his queſtions, or give reſt unto his conſcience, or life to his reſolutions, or ſatisfaction to his reaſon, or definition to his uncertain thoughts, or a concluſion to his ſin, but to underſtand the precept of repentance to oblige in the very preſent and at no time elſe. Differens dicebam modò, ecce modò, ſine paululùm: ſed modò & modò non habebat modum. He would anon, and he would next week, and he would againſt the next Communion; but there there was no end of this: and when he saw it, sub fico stravi me flens, quamdiu, quamdiu cras, & cras? quare non modò? quare non hâc horâ finis turpitudinis meæ? I wept and said, how long shall I say To morrow? Why shall I not now by present repentance put an end to my crimes? If not now, if not till to morrow, still there is the same reason for every time of your health, in which you can say to morrow. There is enough to determine us To day, but nothing that can determine us To morrow. If it be not necessary now, it is not necessary then, and never can be necessary till it be likely there will be no morrow-morning to our life. I conclude this argument in the words of the Latine Anthology,

Converti ad rectos mores & vivere sanctè
In Christo meditans, quod cupit acceleret.

He that would live well and be Christs servant, must make haste, and instantly act what he knows he ought always to purpose, and more. To which purpose S. Eucherius gives this advice, which at first will seem strange, Propound to your self the example of the thief upon the Cross: Doe as he did. Yes, we are too ready to doe so, that is, to deferre our repentance to the last, being encouraged by his example and success. No: we doe not as he did, that is a great mistake. It is much to be wish'd that we would doe as he did in his repentance. How so? S. Eucherius thus resolves the riddle, Ad consequendum fidem non fuit extrema illa hora, sed prima. He did not deferre his repentance and his faith unto the last; but in the very first hour in which he knew Christ, in that very instant he did believe and was really converted: he confess'd Christ gloriously, and repented of his sins without hypocrisy: and if we doe so too, this question is at an end, and our repentance shall never be reproved.

28. 8. He that hath sinn'd, and remembers that he hath sinn'd, and does not repent, does all that while abide in the wrath of God. God hates him in every minute of his delay. And can it consist with any Christian grace, with faith, or hope, or charity, with prudence or piety, with the love of God, or the love of our selves, to outstand the shock of thunder, to outface the Canon, to dare the Divine anger, and to be careless and indifferent though he be hated by the fountain of love and goodness, to stand excommunicate from Heaven? All this is beside the sin which he committed; all this is the evil of his not repenting presently. Can a man consider that God hates him, and care not though he does, and yet be innocent? And if he does care, and yet will not remedy it, does not he then plainly despair, or despise it presumptuously? and can he that does so be innocent? When the little boy of Xylander saw a company of Thieves robbing his Fathers house, and carry away the rich Vessels, and ten Attick talents, he smil'd and whipt his Top. But when a child who was in their company stole his Top from him, he cried out and rais'd the neighbourhood.

Sic sunt qui rident, nec cessant ludere, sævus
Cum Satanas illis non peritura rapit.

So is he that plays on and is merry when his Soul is in the possession of the Devil: for so is every Soul that hath sinn'd and hath not repented: he would not be so patient in the loss of his money, he would not trust his gold one hour in the possession of Thieves, nor venture himself two minutes in a Lions power; but for his Soul he cares not though it stay moneths and years in a danger so great as would distract all the wits of mankinde, if they could understand it perfectly as it is.

29. 9. If there were nothing elſe, but that ſo long as his ſin is unrepented of, the man is in an unthriving condition, he cannot entertain Gods grace, he cannot hope for pardon, he cannot give God thanks for any ſpiritual bleſſing, he cannot love his word, he muſt not come to the holy Sacrament; if (I ſay) there were nothing elſe in it but the meer wanting of thoſe excellencies which were provided for him, it were an intolerable evil, for a man to be ſo long in the dark without fire and food, without health or holineſs: but when he is all that while the object of the Divine anger, and the right-aiming thunderbolts are directed againſt his heart from the bow in the clouds, what madneſs and what impiety muſt it needs be to abide in this ſtate of evil without fear and without love!

30. 10. The advice of S. Paul in the inſtance of anger hath ſomething in it very pertinent to this article, Let not the Sun goe down upon your wrath; that is, Doe not ſleep till you have laid aſide your evil thoughts: for many have quietly ſlept in ſin, who with horror and amazement have awak'd in hell. But S. Pauls inſtance of anger is very material, and hath in it this conſideration, That there are ſome principiant and mother-ſins, pregnant with miſchief, of a progreſſive nature, ſuch ſins which if they be let alone, will of themſelves doe miſchief; if they be not kill'd they will ſtrike; like as Quick-ſilver, unleſs it be allayed with faſting ſpittle, or ſome other excellent art, can never fixe: now of theſe ſins there is no queſtion but a man is bound inſtantly to repent; and there is no ſeaſon for theſe, but all times are alike, and the firſt is duty. Now how many are thus is not eaſily told; but it is eaſily told, that all are ſo of their own nature, or may be ſo by the Divine judgement, and therefore none of them are to be let alone at all.

31. 11. The words of S. Auſtin which he intended for exhortation, are alſo argumentative in this queſtion, Hodiernum habes in quo corrigaris, You have this day for your repentance. To morrow you have not. For God did not command him that liv'd in the time of Samuel to repent in the days of Moſes; that was long before him, and therefore was not his time: Neither did he command that Manaſſes ſhould repent in the days of the Aſmonæi; they liv'd long after him, and therefore that could not be his time, or day of repentance. Every one hath a day of his own. But when we conſider that God hath commanded us to repent, and yet hath given us no time but the preſent, we ſhall perceive evidently, that there is no time but the preſent in which he intended we ſhould obey him. Againſt this there can be no objection; for it is ſo in all other precepts whatſoever, unleſs there be ſomething in the nature of the action that is determinable by circumſtances and particularities: but in this there is nothing of relation to time and place; it may be done at any time, and is of an abſolute, irreſpective nature, of univerſal influence, and of abſolute neceſſity: and God could no more intend to morrow to be the proper ſeaſon of repentance, then he could intend the five and twentieth Olympiad to be your day for it; for the Commandement is preſent, and to morrow is not preſent; and therefore unleſs we can ſuppoſe a Commandement, and no time given us with the Commandement for the performing it, we muſt ſuppoſe the preſent onely to be it. If to morrow does come, then when it is preſent, it is alſo the time of your repentance. By which it is infallibly certain, tain, and must be confess'd so by all wise and rational persons that know the consequences of things, and the perswasion of propositions, that God in every present commands us to repent; and therefore in every present in which we remember our sin and repent not, we offend God, we prevaricate his intentions, we sin against his mercies, and against his judgements, and against his Commandements. I end this with the plain advice of Alcimus Avitus;

Dum patulam Christi cunctis clementia sese
Præbet, præteritæ plangamus crimina vitæ,
Pœniteatque olim negligenter temporis acti,
Dum licet, & sano ingenióque animóque valemus.

In which words, besides the good counsel, this argument is insinuated, That because we must repent even of the days of our negligence, and be sorry for all our mis-spent time, and weep for having stai'd so long from God, it follows that the very deferring of our repentance, our very neglecting of it is a direct sin, and increases the causes of repentance; and therefore makes it the more necessary to begin the sooner, by how much we have stai'd the longer.

Question II.

32. As an appendage to this great Case of Conscience, it is an useful inquiry to ask, Whether a man is bound to repent, not onely the first time, but every time that he thinks of his sin.

33. I answer, that he is; but to several purposes, and in differing measures and significations. If he hath never repented, then upon the former accounts, every remembrance of his sin is a specification and limit to the indefinite and affirmative Commandement; and the second thought of it, because the first not being attended to hath increased the score, and the time being so much the more spent, hath increased the necessity and the haste: and if the second be neglected, then the third still calls louder; and every succeeding thought does not onely point us out the opportunity, and the still proceeding season of doing it, but it upbraids every preceding neglect, and presses the duty stronger by a bigger weight of the same growing arguments. For no man is safe but he that repents at least to day; but he was wise that repented yesterday. And as it is in humane entercourse, he that hath done wrong, and runs presently to confess it, and offer amends, shall have easier terms of peace then he that stands out at law, and comes not in till he be compell'd: so it is in our returns to God; the speedy penitent shall finde a ready and a prepared mercy; but he that stays longer will finde it harder, and if he stays to the last, it may be not at all. * But then if we have repented at the first monition or memory of sin, we must never any more be at peace with it: it will perpetually make claim, it will every day sollicite, it will break into a flame upon the breath of every temptation, it will betray thy weakness and abuse thy credulity, it will please thy fancy and abuse thy understanding, it will make thee sin again as formerly, or desire to sin, to fall willingly, or very hardly to stand; & after all, if thou hast sinn'd thou art under a sad sentence, and canst not tell when thou shalt have a certain peace. So that whenever thou thinkest of thy sin thou hast reason to be displeased, for thou art always the worse for it; it: always in danger, or always uncertain: thou haſt always ſomething to doe, or ſomething to undoe; ſomething to pray for, and many things to pray againſt. But the particular cauſes of a perpetual repentance for our paſt ſins are reducible to theſe two.

34. 1. When ever we have ſinn'd, and fallen into the Divine diſpleaſure, we dwell for ever after in the dark: we are ſure we have ſinn'd, and Gods anger is plainly revealed againſt ſinners: but we know not how farre this anger will extend, nor when it will break out, nor by what expreſſions it ſhall be ſignified, nor when it will goe off, nor at what degree of ſorrow God will be appeaſed, nor how much induſtry ſhall be accepted, nor how many actions of infirmity ſhall be allowed; nothing of this is revealed. But we are commanded to doe an indefinite duty, we are to have an unlimited watchfulneſs, we are called upon to have a perpetual caution, a duty that hath no limit, but all our time and all our poſſibilities; and all the fruit of this is growing in the Paradiſe of God, and we ſhall not taſt it till the day of the revelation of the righteous judgement of God. In the mean time we labour and fear, we fear and hope, we hope and are uncertain, we pray and cannot ſee what will be the event of things. Sometimes we are confident; but that pertneſs comes it may be from the temper of the body, and we cannot eaſily be ſure that it comes from God: and when we are caſt down, it may be it is nothing but an effect of the ſpleen, or of ſome hypochondriacal propoſitions, or ſome peeviſh company, and all is well with us, better then we think it is; but we are under the cloud, and, which is worſt of all, we have always but too much reaſon to fear, and conſequently to be grieved for the cauſes of all this darkneſs, and all this fear, and all this danger.

35. 2. Beſides all this, our ſin is ſo long in dying, and we kill it with ſuch lingring circumſtances, and reprieve it ſo often, and it is often laid onely aſide until the day of temptation, and our repentance is ſo frequently interrupted, or made good for nothing, and even in our weepings for ſin we commit folly, that a man can never tell when he hath done, and when he is to begin again. For theſe reaſons we finde it very neceſſary to hate our ſin perpetually, and for ever to deplore our calamity in the Divine diſpleaſure, to remember it with ſorrow, and to ſtrive againſt it with diligence. Our ſins having made ſo great an alteration in our perſons, and in the ſtate of our affairs, we cannot be ſo little concerned as to think of them with indifference; a ſigh at leaſt, or a tear will well become every thought; a prayer for pardon, or an act of indignation againſt them; a Domine miſerere, or a Me miſerum peccatorem! Have mercy upon me, ô God, or, Miſerable man that I am! ſomething of hope, or ſomething of fear. Own it but as a cauſe of ſorrow, or an inſtance of thy danger; let it make thee more zealous or more patient; troubled at what is paſt, or cautious for the time to come: and if at every thought of thy ſin it be not eaſy to doe a poſitive act of repentance, yet the actions muſt be ſo frequent that the repentance be habitual; ever in preparation, and ever apt for action; ſeeking occaſions of doing good, and omitting none; praying and watching againſt all evil, and committing none. At this rate of repentance a man muſt always live, and in Gods time expect a freedome from ſin, and a confirmation in grace. But then as to the main iſſue of the Queſtion;

It

26. It is not intended that a man should every time weep when he thinks of his sins; sometimes he must give thanks to God for his escape, and rejoyce in the memory of the divine mercies, and please himself in the promises of pardon, and doe acts of Eucharist and holy festivity. But even these acts of spiritual joy, if they indear our duty, they destroy our sin; if they make us to love God, they make us to hate sin; if they be acts of piety, they are acts of repentance. So that when it is said, at every thought of your sin you must doe something of repentance, if you doe any act at all, this is nothing else but a calling upon us for the particulars, and to pursue the methods of a good life.. For repentance is the conversion of the whole man, an intire aversation from evil, and a full return to God; and every action of amendment, every prayer for pardon, and every mortification of our desires, every observation and caution against danger, all actions of a holy fear, and every act of hope, even our almes and mercy to Dan. the poor, is a breaking off our sins, and therefore an action of repentance. So that if there can be any time of our life in which a sinner may not serve God and yet be innocent, then it may be allowed at some time to think of our sin and consider it, and yet not to doe an act of repentance; but in no case else can it be allowed.

37. So that by this discourse we have obtain'd all the significations of Hodie to day, and they all relate to repentance. For though it signifies the present time as to the beginning of this duty, yet it signifies our whole life after that beginning, that is our Hodie, to day, we must begin now and continue to doe the same work all our daies. Our repentance must begin this day by the computations of time, and it must not be put off one day, yet it must goe on by the measures of Eternity. As soon as ever and as long as ever we can say Hodie, it is to day, so soon and so long we must repent. This is as certain in Divinity as a demonstration in the Mathematicks.

38. The summe is this; If by repentance we mean nothing but sorrow, then it hath it's season, and does not bind alwaies to all times. But if by repentance we understand a change of life, to which sorrow is onely instrumental and preparatory, then it is our duty alwaies to repent. That is, if you doe any thing at all, it must be good: even to abide in goodness, to resolve not to sin, to love not to sin, to proceed or to abide in innocence by choice and by delight, by custome and resolution, are actions of an habitual repentance; but repentance is never safe till it be habitual, but then also it is so much the more perfect, by how much it is the more actual.

39. To conclude this inquiry, we must pray often, but we must repent alwaies: and it is in these affirmative precepts as it is in the matter of life and eating; we must eat at certain times and definite seasons, but we must live continually. Repentance is the new life of a Christian; and therefore we must no more ask when we are bound to repent, then when we are by nature requir'd to breath. The motion must return speedily, or we die with strangling.

RULE

Rule XVII.

Becauſe the Lawes of Jeſus Chriſt were delivered in Sermons to a ſingle perſon, or a definite number of hearers, we are curiouſly to inquire and wiſely to underſtand, when thoſe perſons were onely perſonally concerned, and when they were Repreſentatives of the whole Church.

1. THis Rule I learn from S. Auſtin, Erit igitur hoc in obſervationibus intelligendarum Scripturarum, ut ſciamus alia omnibus communiter præcipi, alia ſingulis quibuſque generibus perſonarum: ut non ſolum ad univerſum ſtatum valetudinis, ſed etiam ad ſuam cujuſque membri propriam infirmitatem medicina pertineat. Some things are given to all; others but to a few; and ſome commands were to ſingle perſons and ſingle ſtates: God having regard to the well-being of ſocieties, and to the health even of every ſingle Chriſtian. That there is a neceſſity of making a diſtinction is certain, but how this diſtinction is to be made is very uncertain, and no meaſures have yet been deſcribed, and we are very much to ſeek for a certain path in this intricacy. If we doe not diſtinguiſh precept from precept, and perſons from ſtates of life, and ſtates of life from communities of men, it will be very eaſy for witty men to bind burdens upon other mens ſhoulders with which they ought not to be preſs'd; and it will be very ready for ſcrupulous perſons to take loads upon themſelves which appertain not to them; and very many will diſpute themſelves out of their duty, and ſay, quid ad me? I am not concerned here; and the Conſcience ſhall be unguided and undetermin'd while the lawes of order ſhall themſelves lye undiſtinguiſh'd and undiſcerned in confuſion and indiſcrimination. There muſt be care taken of this, or elſe caſes of Conſcience will extremely multiply to no purpoſes but thoſe of danger and reſtleſs ſcruple. The beſt meaſures that I know are theſe;

Lib. 3. de doctrina Chriſtiana c. 17.

2. 1. There are ſome precepts which are by all men confeſſed to be General, and ſome are every where known to be meerly Perſonal; and by proportion to theſe we can be help'd to take account of others. When Abraham as a trial of his obedience was commanded to ſacrifice his Son, this was alone a Commandement given to that man concerning that child, at that time, and to that purpoſe. So when he was commanded to forſake his Countrey and goe to Canaan, this was perſonal, and could not be drawn into example: and no man could think that if he ſhould kill his Son, or leave his country, he ſhould be rewarded for his obedience. For the Commandements given to perſons are individuated as the perſons themſelves are, by time and place and circumſtances, and a ſingular nature, a particular Soul: So is the Commandement alſo; it is made circumſtantiate by all that is in and about it: and the reaſon of a man and his obſervation is the competent and final judge of theſe things; and no man is further required to look after ſignifications of that which is notorious. Others alſo are as certainly and confeſſedly general; ſuch as were the ten Commandements to the Children of Israel; they were given to all the people, proclaim'd to the whole nation, expresly spoken to them all, exacted of them all, and under the same reason, and upon the same conditions. Now here are some proportions by which we may gues at others.

3. 2. For whatsoever related wholly to a person, or was determin'd by a circumstance, or was the relative of time, that passes no obligation beyond the limits and definitions of those circumstances. Upon this account all the Ceremonial and Judicial law of the Jewes have lost their obligation. The service that related to a Temple that is now destroyed, and was to be performed by a Priesthood that is expir'd, can no longer be a law of conscience. Thus the command which Christ gave that his Brethren should follow him into Galilee after the resurrection was wholly personal. The Apostles were commanded to untie another mans Asse, and without asking leave to bring him to Christ; the command was wholly relating to that occasion, and gives no man warrant to take another mans goods for pious uses without his leave. Circumstances are to actions like hedges to the grounds, they divide and defend, and assign every mans portion. And in these cases ordinary prudence is a sufficient guide.

4. 3. Whatsoever precept was given to many, if it was succeeded to by another that is inconsistent, or of a quite differing nature and circumstance, the former is by the latter declared to have been personal, relative, temporary and expir'd; & nothing of it can be drawn into direct obligation. When our Blessed Saviour sent out the 72. Disciples by two and two, he commanded them to goe without sword or shoes or bag, and that they should not goe into the way of the Gentiles. That these Commandements were temporary and relative to that mission appears by the following mission after Christs resurrection; by which they receiv'd command that they should goe into the way of the Gentiles, that they should teach all Nations. Therefore besides the special and nam'd permissions in this second legation, as that they might now wear a sword, that they might converse with Heathens, it is certain that those other clauses of command which were not expresly revok'd, are not obligatory by vertue of the first sanction and Commandement. And therefore if any man shall argue, Christ when he sent forth his Disciples to preach, commanded that they should not goe from house to house, but where they did first enter there to abide till the time of their permitted departure, therefore it is not lawful to change from one Church to another, from a less to a greater, from a poorer to a richer, will argue very incompetently and inartificially; for all the Commandements then given were relative to that mission: and if any thing were inserted of an universal or perpetual obligation, it is to be attended to upon some other account, not upon the stock of this mission and it's relative precepts.

5. 4. It is not enough to prove a precept to be perpetual and general, that it is joyned with a body of precepts that are so, though there be no external mark of difference. Thus we find in the ten words of Moses one Commandement for resting upon the seventh day from the Creation; it is there equally prescribed, but fortified with reasons and authority, more laboriously pres'd, and without all external sign of difference to distinguish the temporary obligation of this from the perpetuity of the other; and yet all the Christian Church esteem themselves bound by the other, but at liberty for this day. But then we understand our liberty by no external mark appendent to the Sanction, but by the natural signature of the thing. The nature of the precept was ceremonial and typical; and though to serve God be moral and an Eternal duty, yet to serve him by resting upon that day, or upon any day, is not moral; and it was not enjoyn'd in that Commandement at all that we should spend that day in the immediate service of God and offices of religion; and it was declar'd by S. Paul to be a shadow of good things to come, and by our Bl. Lord it was declar'd to be of a yielding nature, and intended to give place to charity and other moral duties, even to religion it self, or the immediate service of God: for though the Commandement was a precept meerly of rest, and doing no labour was the sanctification of the day; yet that the Priests in the Temple might worship God according to the rites of their religion, they were permitted to work, viz. to kill the beasts of sacrifice, which Christ call'd prophaning of the Sabbath, and in so doing he affirms them to have been blameless. From hence, that is, from the natural signature of the thing commanded,& from other collateral notices, we come to understand that in the heap of moral and Eternal precepts, a temporary, transient and relative did lie: and the reason why there was no difference made, or distinctive mark given in the Decalogue, is because there was no difference to be made by that Nation to whom they were given; but as soon as that dispensation and period was to determine, then God gave us those marks and notes of distinction which I have enumerated, and which were sufficient to give us witness. So that if a whole body of Commandements be published, and it be apparent that most of them are general and eternal, we must conclude all to be so, untill we have a mark of difference, directly or collaterally, in the nature of the thing, or in our notices from God: but when we have any such sign, we are to follow it; and the placing of the precept in other company is not a sufficient mark to conclude them all alike. Thus it was also in the first mission of the Disciples (above spoken of) in which the body of precepts was temporary and relative; but yet when our Blessed Lord had inserted that clause [freely ye have received, freely give] we are not to conclude it to be temporary and onely relating to that mission, because it is plac'd in a body of relative Commandements: for there is in it something that is Spiritual, and of an eternal decency, rectitude and proportion; and we are taught to separate this from the other by the reproof which fell upon Simon Magus, by the separate nature of Spiritual things, by the analogy of the Gospel, by the provisions which upon other accounts are made for the Clergy and the whole state Ecclesiastical, upon the stock of such propositions which provide so fully, that they cannot be tempted by necessity to suppose God left them to be supplied by Simoniacal entercourses. If there be nothing in the sanction of the Commandements or any where else that can distinguish them, we must conclude them alike; but if there be any thing there or any where else that makes an indubitable or sufficient separation, the unity of place does not make an equal obligation.

6. 5. When any thing is spoken by Christ to a single person, or a definite number of persons, which concerns a moral duty, or a perpetual rite of universal concernment, that single person, or that little congregation, are the representatives of the whole Church. Of this there can be no question; 1. Because as to all moral precepts they are agreeing to the nature of man, and perfective of him in all his capacities; and therefore such precepts must needs be as universal as the nature, and therefore to be extended beyond the persons of those few men. Now if it be inquir'd how we shall discern what is moral in the laws of God from what is not moral, we may be assisted in the inquiry by the proper measures of it which I have already described *. Those concern the matter of the Commandement; here we inquire concerning the different relation of the Commandement when the sanction is the same with these which are of particular concernment; that is, here we inquire by what other distinction besides the matter and nature of the thing we are to separate general precepts from personal, perpetual from temporal, moral from relative. And thus to inquire, is necessary in the interpretation of the laws of Jesus Christ; because there are some precepts moral and eternal, which nevertheless are relative to particular states under the Gospel.

* Lib. 2. Ch. 1. Rule 6. Nu. 65

But secondly, there are some precepts which are not moral, but yet they are perpetual and eternal, and concern every man and woman in the Christian Pale according to their proportion; I mean the precepts concerning the Sacraments and other rituals of Christianity. In order therefore to these Evangelical concerns it is to be noted, That whatsoever concerns every one by the nature of the thing, though it was at first directed personally, yet it is of universal obligation. Thus we understand all Christians that have the use of reason, that is, which are capable of laws, and have capacities to doe an act of memory, and symbolical representment, to be obliged to receive the Holy Communion: because although the precept of [Doe this, & Drink this] was personally directed to the Apostles, yet there is nothing in the nature of the Communion that appropriates the rite to Ecclesiasticks; but the Apostle explicates it as obliging all Christians, and it was ever so understood, and practic'd accordingly: all are equally concerned in the death of Christ, and therefore in the commemoration of it, and thanksgiving for it. Now thus farre is easy. But there are some interests that pretend some of the words to be proper to Ecclesiasticks, others common to the whole Church. I have already given account of the unreasonableness of the pretension in this Chapter *. But for the present I shall observe, that there being in this whole institution the greatest simplicity and unity of design that can be, the same form of words, a single Sacrament, the same address, no difference in the sanction, no variety or signs of variety in the appendages, in the parallel places, or in any discourse concerning it, to suppose here a difference, will so intricate this whole affair, that either men may imagine and dream of varieties when they please, and be or not be obliged as they list; or else if there be a difference intended in it by our Law-giver, it will be as good as none at all, he having left no mark of the distinction, no shadow of different Commandements, under several representations. If the Apostles were onely representatives of the Ecclesiastical state when Christ said, [Drink ye all of this] then so they were when Christ said, [This doe in remembrance of me:] the consequent is this, that either all are bound to receive the Chalice, or none but the Clergy are tied to eat the holy bread; for there is no difference in the manner of the Commandement; and the precept hath not the head of a man, and the arm of a tree, and the foot of a mountain, but it is univocal, and simple, and proper, and if there be any difference, it must be discovered by some clear light from without: for there is nothing within of difference, and yet without we have nothing but a bold affirmative.

* Rule 9. num. 7, 8, 9.

7. 6. When the univerſal Church does ſuppoſe her ſelf bound by any preceptive words, though they were directed to particular perſons, yet they are to be underſtood to be of univerſal concernment. Now this relies not onely upon the ſtock of proper probability, viz. that ſuch a multitude is the moſt competent interpreter of the difficulties in every Commandement; but there is in the Church a publick and a holy Spirit, aſſiſting her to guide, and warranting us to follow the meaſures of holineſs by which ſhe finds her ſelf oblig'd. For beſides that the queſtions of general practice are ſooner underſtood, as being like corn ſown upon the furrow, whereas queſtions of ſpeculation are like metals in the heart of the earth, hard to be found out, and harder to be drawn forth; beſides this, no intereſt but that of heaven and the love of God can incline the Catholick Church to take upon her ſelf the burden of a Commandement. If it were to decline a burden, there might be the more ſuſpicion, though the weight of ſo great authority were ſufficient to outweigh any contrary probability; but when ſhe takes upon her the burden, and eſteems her ſelf obliged by a Commandement given to the Apoſtles or to the Phariſees, or to any ſingle perſon among them, it is great neceſſity that enforces her, or great charity that invites her, or great prudence and caution for ſecurity that determines her, and therefore ſhe is certainly to be followed. Upon this account we are determined in the foregoing inſtance: and becauſe the Primitive Catholick Church did ſuppoſe her ſelf bound by the words of inſtitution of the Chalice in the Bleſſed Sacrament, therefore we can ſafely conclude the Apoſtles to be repreſentatives of the whole Church. Ad bibendum omnes exhortantur qui volunt habere vitam, ſaith S. Auſtin, All are called upon to drink of the Chalice, if they mean to have life eternal. For indignum dicit eſſe Domino qui aliter myſterium celebrat quam ab eo traditum eſt, ſaith S. Ambroſe; as Chriſt delivered it to the Apoſtles, ſo it muſt be obſerved by all: and therefore Durandus affirms that all who were preſent did every day communicate of the cup becauſe all the Apoſtles did ſo, our Lord ſaying, Drink ye all of this. For the Apoſtles were repreſentatives, not of the Clergy conſecrating (for they then did not conſecrate but communicate) but of all that ſhould be preſent. Nam quæ Domini ſunt non ſunt hujus ſervi, non alterius, ſed omnibus communia, ſaith S. Chryſoſtome, The precept of our Lord belonged not to this ſervant, nor to another, but to all. Now things that are of this nature, and thus repreſented, and thus accepted, become laws even by the very acceptation: and as S. Paul ſaid of the Gentiles, that they having not the law become a law unto themſelves; and our conſcience is ſometimes by meer opinion a ſtrict and a ſevere law-giver: when the Church accepts any precept as intended to her, (if not directly, yet) collaterally and by reflexion it paſſes an obligation; and then it will be ſcandalous to diſagree in manners from the cuſtome and ſevere ſentence of the Chriſtians, and to diſſent will be of evil report, and therefore at no hand to be done.

8. 7. When a precept is addreſſed to particular perſons, and yet hath a more full, uſeful, and illuſtrious underſtanding, if extended to the whole Church, there it is to be preſumed it was ſo intended; and thoſe particular perſons are repreſentatives of the Church. S. Auſtin extends this Rule beyond precepts, even to priviledges and favours; Quædam dicuntur quæ ad Apoſtolum Petrum propriè pertinere videantur, nec tamen habent illuſtrem intellectum niſi cum referuntur ad Eccleſiam, cujus ille agnoſcitur in figura figura gestasse personam, propter primatum quem in discipulis habuit. Some things are spoken which seem to relate particularly to the Apostle Peter, but yet they are better understood when they are applied to the whole Church. But this must needs be true in Commandements; for where nothing hinders it, the Commandement is supposed to be incumbent upon us; and therefore when the Commandement is better understood, and hath a more noble and illustrious sense, that is, promotes the interest of any grace remarkably, there the particular address must mean a general obligation.

9. 8. When any Commandement is personally addressed, and yet is inforced with the threatning of death eternal, that Commandement is of universal obligation. The reason is, because the Covenant of life and death is the same with all men; and God is no respecter of persons, and therefore deals alike with all: and upon this account, the words which our Blessed Saviour spake to some few of the Jews upon occasion of the Galilean Massacre, and the ruine of the Tower of Siloam, had been a sufficient warning and Commandement to all men, though besides those words there had been in all the Scriptures of the New Testament no Commandement of repentance. Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish] does mean that all the world should repent for the avoiding of the final and severest judgements of God.

10. But this Rule is to be understood onely in Commandements that are not relative to the differing states of men, but are of an absolute and indefinite nature. For where the Commandement is relative, and yet personally addressed or represented, there that person is the representative, not of all mankinde, but of that whole state and order. Thus when S. Paul said, There is a necessity laid upon me, and woe is unto me, if I doe not preach the Gospel, he was a representative of the whole order of the Curates of Souls. But when he said, I press forward to the mark of the price of the high calling, and if by any means I may comprehend, here he spake of his own person what is the duty incumbent upon all Christians, and he was a representative of the whole Church.

11. 9. When any good action is personally recommended upon the proposition of reward, it does not always signify an universal Commandement; but according as it was intended personally, so it signifies universally: that is, if it was a counsel to the person in the first address, it is a counsel to all men in the same circumstances; if it was a Commandement to one, it was a Commandement to all. Thus when Christ said to the young man in the Gospel, Goe and sell what thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; here the precept or the counsel is propounded under a promise: but because there is no threatning so much as implied, whether it be a command or no cannot be known from these words, nor from the appendant condition; because that which is not under command may be excellently good, and therefore fit to be incouraged and invited forward. But whether it was a precept or a counsel, that young man, though alone spoken to, was not alone intended; because the thing to which he was invited is an excellency and a spiritual worthiness in all men for ever that can and will receive it.

RULE XVIII.

Evangelical Lawes given to one concerning the duty of another doe in that very relation concern them both; but in differing degrees.

1. THis Rule I learn from S. Paul, and it is of good uſe in caſes of Conſcience relating to ſome Evangelical lawes. [Obey them that have the Rule over you, and be ſubject; for they watch for your Souls, as they which muſt give an account: that they may doe it with joy, and not with grief; for that is unprofitable for you.] Thus a Prelate or Curate of Souls is to take care that his Cure be chaſt and charitable, juſt and temperate, religious and orderly. He is bound that they be ſo, and they are more bound; but each of them for their proportion: and the people are not onely bound to God to be ſo, but they are bound to their Biſhop and Prieſt that they be ſo; and not onely God will exact it of them, but their Prelate muſt, and they muſt give accounts of it to their ſuperior, becauſe he muſt to his ſupreme; and if the people will not, they are not onely unchaſt or intemperate before God and their Biſhop, but they are diſobedient alſo. It is neceſſary that infants be baptized; this I ſhall ſuppoſe here, becauſe I have in * other places ſufficiently (as I ſuppoſe) proved it. Upon this ſuppoſition, if the inquiry be upon whom the neceſſity is incumbent, it will be hard to ſay, upon Infants, becauſe they are not capable of a law, nor of obedience; and yet it is ſaid to be neceſſary for them. If upon their parents, then certainly it is not neceſſary to the Infants; becauſe if what is neceſſary be wanting, they for whom it is neceſſary ſhall ſuffer: and therefore it will be impoſſible that the precept ſhould belong to others, and the puniſhment or evil in not obeying belong to the children; that is, that the ſalvation of infants ſhould depend upon the good will or the diligence of any man whatſoever. Therefore if others be bound, it is neceſſary that they bring them, but it will not be neceſſary that they be brought; that is, they who doe not bring them, but not they who are not brought ſhall ſuffer puniſhment. But therefore to anſwer this caſe, this rule is uſeful: It is neceſſary that the Parents or the Church ſhould bring them to baptiſme, and it is neceſſary that they be baptized; and therefore both are bound, and the thing muſt not be omitted. The Parents are bound at firſt, and the Children as ſoon as they can be bound; ſo that the precept leans upon two ſhoulders: if the firſt omit their ſhare in their time, there is no evil conſequent but what is upon themſelves; but when the children can chuſe, and can come, they muſt ſupply their parents omiſſion and provide for their own proper neceſſity. It is in this as in proviſions; at firſt they muſt be fed by the hand and care of others, and afterwards by their own labour and proviſions; but all the way they are under a neceſſity and a natural law of being provided for. * When S. Paul wrote to Timothy concerning the diſpoſitions requir'd in thoſe perſons who were to be Biſhops, it will not be very eaſy to ſay, of whom the defect of ſome of thoſe conditions ſhall be requir'd. A Biſhop muſt be the husband of one wife, that is, he muſt not marry while his firſt wife lives, though ſhe be be civilly dead, that is, whether divorc'd, or baniſhed, or otherwiſe in ſeparation. But what if he be married to two wives at once? Many Chriſtians were ſo at firſt; many, I ſay, who were converted from Judaiſme or Gentiliſme, and yet were not compelled to put away either. If a Biſhop be choſen that is a Polygamiſt, who ſins? that is, who is obliged by this precept? Is the Biſhop that ordains him, or the Prince or people that chuſes him, or the Eccleſiaſtick himſelf that is ſo choſen? The anſwer to this inquiry is by conſidering the nature of ſuch a law, which the Italians call il mandato volante, a flying or ambulatory Commandement, in which the duty is divided, and ſeveral perſons have ſeveral parts of the precept incumbent on them. He that chuſes and he that ordains him are bound for their ſhare, to take care that he be canonically capable; but he that is ſo choſen is not bound to any thing but what is in his power; that is, he is not oblig'd to put away her whom he hath legally married, and her whom without ſin he can lawfully retain: but becauſe that which is without ſin, is not alwaies without reproach and obloquy, and that which may be innocent may ſometimes not be laudable, and of a Clergy-man more may be requir'd then of another that is not ſo; they who call him to the office are to take care of that, and he which is called is not charg'd with that. But then though he be not burdened with that which is innocent and at preſent out of his power, and ſuch a perſon may be innocently choſen, when they who chuſe him are not innocent; yet when any thing of the will is ingredient on his part, he muſt take care of that himſelf. He may be choſen, but he muſt not ambire, not ſue for it, nor thruſt himſelf upon it; for here begins his obligation: there can be no duty, but what is voluntary and can be choſen; but when a man can chuſe he can be oblig'd. I doe not here diſpute how far and in what caſes this law does oblige; for of that I am to give account in the chapter of Eccleſiaſtical Lawes: but the preſent inquiry is, who are the perſons concerned in the obligation. It was alſo taken care that a Biſhop ſhould not be a Novice: and yet S. Timothy was choſen a Biſhop at the age of five and twenty years, and he was innocent, becauſe it was the act of others, who came off from their obligation upon another account. But if he had deſir'd it, or by power or faction thruſt himſelf upon the Church with that Canonical inſufficiency, he had prevaricated the Canon Apoſtolical: for to ſo much of it he was bound; but in what he was paſſive, he was not concerned, but others were.

2. But this is to be limited in two particulars. 1. In what the Clerk is paſſive he is not oblig'd; that is, in ſuch matters and circumſtances as are extrinſecal to his office, and matter of ornament and decency. Thus if he have been married to an infamous woman which he cannot now help; if he be young, which he cannot at all help, but it will help it ſelf in time; if he have an evil and an unpleaſant countenance, if he be deformed; for theſe things and things of like nature, the chuſers and ordainers are concerned; but the Clerk may ſuffer himſelf to be choſen, the law notwithſtanding. But if the Canonical impediment be ſuch as hinders him from doing of his future duty, there he may not ſuffer himſelf to be choſen; and if he be, he muſt refuſe it. The reaſon of the difference is plain: becauſe the Electors and Ordainers are concerned but till the Election is paſt; but the Elected is concerned for ever after: therefore although there may be many worthineſſes in the perſon to be choſen to outweigh the external insufficiency and incapacity, and if there be not, the Electors are concerned, because it is their office and their act, and they can hinder it, and therefore they onely are charg'd there; yet for ever after the Elected is burden'd, and if he cannot doe this duty, he is a sinner all the way; he is a Wolfe to the Revenue and a Butcher to the Flock.

3. 2. Though in matters of decency and ornament the person to be chosen is not so obliged but that he may suffer himself to be chosen if he be otherwise capable, because those things which are not in his power are not in his duty, yet even for these things he also is oblig'd afterwards; and he is bound not to doe that afterwards, which if it was done before, others were obliged not to chuse him. If a person was divorced before and married again, he may accept of a Bishoprick; but if he doe so afterwards, he is guilty of the breach of the Commandement: for he must not goe back to that door where he might not enter, but then he is wholly oblig'd; he alone, because then it is his own act, and he alone can hinder it. I say he must not goe back.

4. But if he be thrust back to that door, where if he had stood at first he ought not to have been let in; he is no more oblig'd at last then at first: he that does not govern his house well, and hath not his children in subjection, may not (by the Apostles rule) be chosen; but when he is a Bishop, and fals into the calamity of having evil and rebellious children, this is no impediment to his office directly, and does not so much as indirectly pass upon him any irregularity.

5. But then as to the rule it self, this instance is fit to explicate it. For Parents are tied to rule their Children, Masters to govern their Servants; but Children are also oblig'd to be governable, and Servants must be obedient. For in relative duties every man must bear his own burden, and observe his own share of the Commandement.

Rule XIX.

Custome is no sufficient interpreter of the Lawes of Jesus Christ.

1. Truth and the Divine Commandements need no prescription, but have an intrinsick warrant, and a perpetual abode; but that which is warranted by Custome, hath but an accidental obligation, and is of humane authority. The Lawes of Christ are wrought to be the parents of Custome; but Custome cannot introduce a divine law or obligation: our Customes ought to be according to Christs Commandement; but from our Customes we cannot conclude or inferre that this is the will or Commandement of Christ. This Rule is Tertullians. Veritati nemo præscribere potest, non spatium temporum, non patrocinia personarum, non privilegium regionum. Ex his enim fere consuetudo initium ab aliqua ignorantia vel simplicitate sortita, in usum per successionem corroborata; & ita adversus veritatem vindicatur. Sed Dominus noster Christus Veritatem se, non Consuetudinem, cognominavit. Quodcunque adversus veritatem sapit hoc erit hæresis, etiam vetus consuetudo.

De Virgin. veland.

No

No man can prescribe to truth, that is, to any proposition or Commandement Evangelical. For Customes most commonly begin from ignorance or weakness, and in time get strength by use, till it prevail against right. But our Lord Christ does not call himself Custome, but Truth. Whatsoever is against Truth, though it be an old Custome, is Heresy, notwithstanding its long continuance.

2. The purpose of this Rule is not to bar Custome from being of use in the exposition of the sense of a law or doctrine. For when it is certain that Christ gave the law, and it is uncertain what sense was intended to the law, Custome is very useful in the interpretation; that is, the Customes of the first and best Ages of the Church: and then the longer the Custome did descend, still we have the more confidence, because we have all the wise and good men of so many Ages concurring in the interpretation and understanding of the law. Thus the Apostle gave the Church a Canon, that we should in all things give thanks: the Custome of the Ancient Church did in pursuance of this rule say a short prayer, and give thanks at the lighting up of Candles. The history of it I have from S. Basil. Visum est patribus nostris beneficium vespertini luminis non silentio suscipere, sed statim ut apparuit gratias agere, They said grace for their light as well as for their meat. This Custome was good; for it was but the particular instance of a general duty. Cap. 29. de Spir. S.

3. But then Custome is to be allowed but as one Topick, not as all: it is the best argument when we have no better; but it is the most unartificial of all arguments; and a competent reason to the contrary is much to be preferred before a great and long prescribing Custome. Both these propositions are severally affirm'd by the Fathers of the Church. The first by S. Austin in his Epistle to Casulanus, In his rebus de quibus nihil certi statuit Divina Scriptura, nobis populi Dei & olim justi, statuta Majorum pro lege tenenda sunt: & sicut prævaricatores legum Divinarum, ita contemptores consuetudinum Ecclesiasticarum coercendi sunt. The holy Catholick Church is certainly guided by the Spirit of God, and therefore where the question is concerning any thing that is not clear in Scripture, the Customes of the Catholick Church are not to be despised; for it is to be presum'd (where the contrary is not proved) that she piously endeavours, and therefore is graciously assisted in the understanding of the will and Commandements of her Lord: and in this sense, Custome is the best interpreter, because there is no better, and no clearer light shining from any Angle.

4. Custome can thus in cases of destitution of other Topics declare the meaning of a law; but Custome of it self cannot be the interpreter of the will of Christ, or a sufficient warrant of a law, or immediately bind the Conscience as if it were a signification of the Divine pleasure: much less ought it to be oppos'd to any words of Scripture or right reason and proper arguments deriv'd from thence. And that is the other thing which I also said is taught us by the Fathers of the Church. So S. Cyprian, Frustra quidam qui ratione vincuntur consuetudinem nobis opponunt, quasi consuetudo major sit veritate, aut non fuerit in Spiritualibus sequendum si melius fuerit à S. Spiritu revelatum, In vain is custome oppos'd to reason, as if it were greater then truth: Not Custome, but that which is best, is to be followed by Spiritual Ad Jubaian tual perſons, if any thing better then Cuſtome be revealed by the Spirit of God.

5. All good Cuſtomes are good warranties and encouragements; but whether they be good or no is to be examin'd and prov'd by the Rule and by the Commandement: and therefore the cuſtome it ſelf is but an ill indication of the Commandement; from whence it ſelf is mark'd for good, or elſe is to be rejected as reprobate and good for nothing. Conſuetudo authoritati cedat: pravum uſum lex & ratio vincat: cum verò nec ſacris canonibus nec humanis legibus conſuetudo obviare monſtratur, inconcuſſa ſervanda eſt, ſaid Iſidore, Let cuſtome yeeld to authority, to law and to reaſon; but when it agrees with the laws of God and of man, let it be kept inviolate.

6. When Cuſtome is conſonant to ſome other inſtrument of probation, when it is apparently pious, and reaſonable, and of the analogy of faith, it is an excellent corroborative and defenſative of truth, and warrant to the conſcience; but when it ſtands alone, or hath an ill aſpect upon other more reaſonable and effective ways of perſwaſion, it is very ſuſpicious and very dangerous, and is commonly a very ill ſign of an ill cauſe, or of corrupted manners. Cedrenus tells that the Patriarch Abraham was wont to ſay that there is great difference between truth and cuſtome; that being very hard to be found, this, whether good or bad, being obvious to every eye: and which is worſe, by following cuſtome a man gets no comfort if it be in the right, and no great ſhame if it be in the wrong, becauſe he relies not upon his own reaſon, but the judgement of old men that liv'd long agoe, who whether they judged wiſely or fooliſhly muſt appear by ſome other way: but this he will finde, that it will be very hard to leave it, though it be never ſo fooliſh and ridiculous.

Hiſt. compend. ſive in initio, pag. 25.

7. Of what obligation in matters of practice, and of what perſwaſion in the inquiries of truth Eccleſiaſtical Cuſtomes are to be eſteem'd, I ſhall afterwards diſcourſe when I treat of Eccleſiaſtical Laws: but that which I would perſwade for the preſent is, that the Cuſtomes and uſages of the world are but an ill Commentary on the Commandements of our Bleſſed Lord.

8. 1. Becauſe evil is crept into moſt of the manners of men; and then a cuſtome is moſt likely to tranſmit her authority to that which ought to be deſtroyed. Inter cauſas malorum noſtrorum, quod vivimus ad exempla, nec ratione componimur, ſed conſuetudine abducimur. Quod ſi pauci facerent, nolumus imitari: quum plures facere cæperunt, quaſi honeſtius ſit quia frequentius, ſequimur, & recti apud nos locum tenet error, ubi publicus factus eſt. So Seneca complain'd. It is one great cauſe of our miſchiefs, that we are not led by truth, but led away by cuſtome; as if a thing were the honeſter becauſe it is frequent; and error becomes truth when it is common and publick. Excellent therefore was that ſaying of Pope Nicolas the firſt, Parvus numerus non obeſt ubi pietas abundat: magnus non prodeſt ubi impietas regnat, If right and Religion be on our ſide, the ſmalneſs of our company is nothing: but a multitude cannot juſtify impiety.

9. 2. Cuſtome in moral practices becomes law to men by preſſing upon their modeſty, and by outfacing truth and piety; ſo that unleſs the cuſtome have warranty from the law, it hath the ſame effect againſt a law as for

for it; and therefore in such cases is at no hand to be trusted, but at every hand to be suspected, lest it make it necessary that men become vicious. The customes of the German and neighbour Nations so expound the laws of Christ concerning temperance, that if by their measures it be defined, it looks so like intemperance, as milk to milk; and the common customes of the world expound all the laws of the Blessed Jesus so as to be truly obligatory at no time but in the danger, or in the article of death: but certainly it is but an ill gloss that evacuates all the holy purposes of the Commandement; and at the day of Judgement, when we shall see numberless numbers of the damned hurried to their sad sufferings, it will be but an ill apology to say, I did as all the world almost besides me, by whose customes I understood the laws of the Gospel to a sense of ease and gentleness, and not by the severity of a few morose Preachers. Poggius tells of a Neapolitan Shepherd, that against Easter going to Confession, he told his Confessor with a tender conscience and great sorrow of heart that he had broken the holy Fast of Lent, by chance indeed, but yet with some little pleasure; for when he was pressing of a new Cheese, some of the whey start from the vessel and leap'd into his mouth, and so went into his stomack. The Priest smiling a little at the phantastick conscience of the man, ask'd him if he was guilty of nothing else. The Shepherd saying, he knew of nothing else that did or ought to trouble him; his Confessor knowing the customes of those people upon the Mountains of Naples, ask'd him if he had never robb'd or kill'd any strangers passengers. O yes, replied the Shepherd, I have often been at that imploiment; but that we doe every day, and always did so, and I hope that is no sin: but the cheese, the forbidden cheese stuck in his stomack, because every one did abominate such meat upon fasting-days: onely the custome of killing and stealing had hardned his heart and forehead till it was not perceiv'd.

——dedit hæc contagio labem, Juven. Sat. 2
Et dabit in plures: sicut grex totus in agris
Unius scabie cadit, & porrigine porci,
Uváque conspecta livorem ducit ab uva.

10. Evil manners begin from one evil man, or from one weak or vicious principle, and pass on to custome, and then to be vertuous is singularity, and it is full of envy; and concerning the customes of the world it is ten to one if there be not some foulness in them. The advice therefore of S. Cyprian is a good compendium of this enquiry. Consuetudo quæ apud quosdam irrepserat, impedire non debet quo minus veritas prævaleat & vincat; nam consuetudo sine veritate vetustas erroris est: propter quod relicto errore sequamur veritatem; scientes quod veritas vincit, veritas valet & invalescit in æternum, & vivit & obtinet in secula seculorum. Custome ought not to prevail against any truth; but Truth which is eternal will live and prevail for ever and ever. Custome without truth is but a prescription of falshood and irregularity. Ad Pompei.

Question.

11. Upon occasion of this argument it is seasonable, and of it self a very useful inquiry, Whether the Customes of Jews and Gentiles, or indefinitely of many Nations, be a just presumption that the thing so practic'd is agreeable to the law of Nature, or is any ways to be supposed to be consonant to the will of God.

Answer.

Anſwer.

12. To this, ſome of eminence in the Church of Rome anſwer affirmatively; and are ſo farre from bluſhing, that many of their rites are derived from the cuſtomes of Heathens, that they own it as a thing reaſonable, and prudent, and pious, according to the doctrine and practice of Gregory ſurnamed Thaumaturgus, who (as S. Gregory Nyſſen reports) that he might allure the common people to the love of Chriſtianity, gave way that thoſe dances and ſolemne ſports which they celebrated to the honour of their idols ſhould be ſtill retain'd, but diverted to the honour of the Saints departed: and Baronius ſuppoſes it to be no other then as the Iſraelites taking of the ſilver and braſs from the Ægyptians, and imploying it in the ſervice of the Tabernacle. And in particular, the cuſtome of burning candles to the honour of the Virgin Mary he imputes to the ſame principle, and owns it to be of Heatheniſh extraction. The ſame alſo is in divers other inſtances avowed by [a] Polydore Virgil; by Fauchet [b] in his Books of the Antiquities of France; by du Choul [c], Blondus [d] and Bellarmine [e], who brings this as an argument for the doctrine of Purgatory, becauſe the Jews, the Turks, and the Heathens did believe ſomething of it; it being very likely, that what almoſt all Nations conſent in, derives from the natural light of reaſon which is common to all men: and upon this very thing Cardinal Perron [f] boaſts in the behalf of the Service in an unknown tongue; that not onely the Greeks, and many other Chriſtian Churches, but even all Religions, the Perſians and the Turks uſe it.

This pretence therefore is fit to be conſidered.

1. Therefore I anſwer, That it is true that the Primitive Church did ſometimes retain ſome ceremonies which the Heathens us'd; but they
13. were ſuch ceremonies which had no relation to doctrine, but might be made apt for order and decent miniſteries external. Such were the garments of the Prieſts, lights, girdles, faſts, vigils, proceſſions, poſtures, feſtivals and the like: and they did it for good reaſon and with good effect; that the people who were moſt of all amuſed with exteriour uſages, finding many of their own cuſtomes adopted into Chriſtianity, might with leſs prejudice attend to the doctrines of that perſwaſion which ſo readily complied in their common ceremonies. This did well enough at firſt, and was a prudent imitation of the practice of our great Maſter, who that the Jews might the eaſier paſs under his diſcipline and inſtitution, made the paſſage as ſhort, and the difference as little as could be; for ſince he would retain but two external miniſteries in his whole inſtitution, he took thoſe rites to which the Jews had been accuſtomed; onely he made their Baptiſms Sacramental and effective of great purpoſes, and ſome of the Paſchal rites he conſecrated into higheſt myſtery; retaining apparent footſteps, or rather bodies of their Government and Diſcipline Eccleſiaſtical. And this proceeding we find own'd and juſtified by S. Auſtin againſt Fauſtus the Manichee, and S. Hierome againſt Vigilantius, and Ephraim Syrus of old; and of later times by [a] Alcuinus, [b] Amalarius, and by [c] Gratian; and who pleaſe to ſee it more largely pleaded for may read Mutius Panſa his Oſculum Chriſtianæ & Ethnicæ philoſophiæ, and Nicolaus Mont-Georgius de Moſaico jure enucleando: and that it may be reaſonable from the ſervices of ſuch men from whom we juſtly abhorre to borrow ſome uſages, is excellently diſcours'd of by Mr. Hooker in his fourth Book of Eccleſiaſtical Polity.

But

14. But however this might fit the neceſſities and circumſtances of the infant ages of the Church, yet they ought not to be done eaſily, but ever with very great caution. For though it ſerv'd a preſent turn, yet it made Chriſtian Religion leſs ſimple and leſs pure; but by becoming a miſcellany it became worſe and worſe. It was or might be at the firſt a complying with the infirmities of the weak, a purſuance of S. Pauls advice ſo to doe; but when theſe weak perſons are ſufficiently inſtructed in the Religion, and that to diſſent is not infirmity, but peeviſhneſs and pride, or wilfulneſs, all compliance and condeſcenſion is no longer charity, but gives confidence to their error. For when the reaſonable diſcourſes of the Religion will not ſatisfy the ſuppoſed weak brother, he that complies with him confeſſes his the better way; and when learned men follow the ignorant to ſuperſtition, they will no longer call it compliance and condeſcenſion, but duty, and neceſſity, and approbation. A good man will goe a little out of his road to reduce the wandring traveller; but if he will not return, it will be an unreaſonable compliance to goe along with him to the end of his wandring. And where there is any ſuch danger (as in moſt caſes it is) we have the example of God himſelf and his Commandement expreſly given to the children of Iſrael, that they ſhould abſtain from all communion with the Gentiles their neighbours even in things indifferent; and that they ſhould deſtroy the very monuments and rituals, and the very materials of their Religion, leſt by ſuch a little compliance they be too farre tempted. And thus alſo they did ſometime in the Primitive Church; for Tertullian, becauſe the Gentiles us'd in the ſervices of their idols to ſit down immediately after they had prayed, would not have the Chriſtians doe ſo, though the ceremony of it ſelf was wholly indifferent. And when many Chriſtian Churches had taken ſome Gentile ceremonies into their Chriſtmas ſolemnity, being occaſioned by the Circumciſion of Chriſt falling on the Calends of January, or New-years day, they were not onely forbidden in the Council of Auxerre, but the Church did particularly appoint private Letanies, proceſſions, and auſterities to be uſed for three days within the twelve of Chriſtmas, ad calcandam Gentilium conſuetudinem, to deſtroy and countermine the ſuperſtitious cuſtomes of the Heathen, which by the compliance and fondneſs of ſome Chriſtians had diſhonoured the excellency and innocency of the Chriſtmas feſtivity; as we finde noted by the Fathers of the Synod of Turi. Sometimes there had been reaſon to retain theſe things: but when in the days of Perſecution ſome weak-hearted Chriſtians did ſhelter themſelves under the cover of ſuch ſymbolical ceremonies, and eſcap'd the confeſſion of Chriſtianity by doing ſome things of like cuſtome, or when the folly and levity of Chriſtians by theſe inſtruments paſs'd on to vanity or ſuperſtition, then the Church with care did forbid the retaining of Heatheniſh cuſtomes, which had been innocent but for ſuch accidents. In theſe things the Church may uſe her liberty, ſo that all things be done to edification.

15. 2. But if the cuſtomes and rites be ſuch as are founded upon any point of doctrine, whatſoever it be that derives from Pagan cuſtomes muſt alſo be imputed to their doctrines; and then to follow their cuſtomes, will be alſo to mingle the Religions, to blend light and darkneſs, and to joyn Chriſt with Belial. It had been a material objection which Fauſtus the Manichee made againſt the Catholicks, that they did remove the worſhip from idols, and give it to Saints and Martyrs. S. Auſtin, who was to anſwer

the Objection, could not juſtify, but did deny the fact, as to that inſtance and ſome few others: for the cuſtome of the Nations in ſuch caſes was no argument, but an objection. From theſe premiſſes it will appear to be but a weak pretence to ſay, that if many Nations and Religions agree in ſuch a ceremony, or ſuch an opinion, it will be ſuppos'd to come from the light of Nature. For there are not many propoſitions in all which Nature can teach; and we ſhould know but a very few things, if we did not goe to School to God, to Tutors, to experience, and to neceſſity. This pretence would not onely eſtabliſh Purgatory, but the worſhip of Images, and the multitude of gods, and idololatrical ſervices, and very many ſuperſtitions, and trifling obſervances, and confidences in dreams, and the ſacrifice of beaſts, and many things more then can well become or combine with Chriſtianity. When not onely ſome Nations but all agree in a propoſition, it is a good corroborative, a good ſecond to our perſwaſions, but not a principal; it gives advantage, but not eſtabliſhment, ornament, but not foundation to a truth: which thing if it had been better obſerved by the Chriſtians who from the Schools of Plato, Chryſippus, Ariſtotle and Epicurus came into the Schools of Chriſt, or from the Temples of Jupiter and Apollo into the ſervices of the Church, Chriſtianity had been more pure and unmingled then at this day we finde it. The ceremony of ſprinkling Holy-water was a Heatheniſh rite, us'd in the ſanctifications and luſtrations of the Capitol, as Alexander ab Alexandro relates: but becauſe this is not a ceremony of order or circumſtance, but pretends to ſome real effect, and derives not from Chriſt or his Apoſtles, but from the Gentiles, and relies upon the doctrine of the effect of ſuch ceremonies, it is not juſtifiable. Burning candles by dead bodies was innocent and uſeful to them that attended in the Vigils before interrement; but when they took this from the cuſtome of the Heathens, who thought thoſe lights uſeful to the departed ſouls, they gave a demonſtration by the event of things that they did not doe well: for the Chriſtians alſo deriv'd a ſuperſtitious opinion along with the ceremony, and began to think that thoſe lights did entertain the ſouls in thoſe cemeteries; and this produc'd the decree of the Council of Eliberis, that wax candles ſhould not be burnt in the day time, leſt the ſpirits of the dead be diſturb'd. Now when any falſe principle is in the entry of the ceremony, or attends upon it, or any ſuperſtition be in the progreſs or in the end of it, any ſcandal, or any danger, ſuch cuſtomes are not at all to be followed, ſuch rituals are not to be imitated or tranſcribed: that is, No Cuſtome is a warranty for any evil.

Can. 34.

Rule XX.

The meaſure of perfection and obedience expected of Chriſtians, is greater then that of the Jews, even in moral duties common to them and us.

1. IT matters not whether Chriſts law have in it more precepts then were in the law of Moſes: our work is ſet before us, and we are not concerned how much they had to doe; and in moſt of the inſtances which are, or are ſaid to be new Commandements, it may alſo be ſaid of them as it was was by the Apostle concerning Charity, This is a new Commandement, and this is an old Commandement; there being, at least in most instances, an obligation upon them to doe what was of it self good and perfective of humane nature, and an imitation of the Eternal law of God, a conformity to the Divine perfections. This is true as to the material part: but then because that which was an old Commandement is also made a new Commandement, and established upon better promises, and endeared by new instances of an infinite love, and we our selves are enabled by many more excellent Graces, and the promise of the Holy Spirit is made to all that ask him; it is infinitely reasonable to think, that because this new Commandement superadds nothing new in the matter, it must introduce something new at least in the manner, or measure of our obedience.

2. They and we are both of us to pray; but we are commanded to pray fervently, frequently, continually. They were to be charitable, and so are we: but they were tied to be so to their friends and to their neighbours, but we to our enemies; and though in some instances they were tied to be so, yet we are bound in more; more men are our Neighbours, and more are our Brethren, and more is our duty. They were to doe them no hurt; but we must doe them good. They were to forgive upon submission and repentance; but we must invite them to repentance, and we must offer pardon. They were to give bread to their needy Brother; but we are in some cases to give him our lives. They were to love God with all their Souls, and with all their strength: and though we cannot doe more then this, yet we can doe more then they did; for our strengths are more, our understandings are better instructed, our shield is stronger, and our breast-plate broader, and our armour of righteousness is of more proof then theirs was. Dares and Entellus did both contend with all their strength; but because Entellus had much more then the other, he was the better champion.

3. 1. This Rule does principally concern Christian Churches and Communities of men; that their lawes be more holy, that the condition of the Subjects be more tolerable, that warres be not so easily commenc'd, that they be with more gentleness acted, that the lawes of Christ be inforc'd, that malefactors be not permitted, that vice be more discouraged, that nothing dishonourable to Religion be permitted, that the Kingdome of Christ in all capacities be advanced, that his Ministers be honour'd and maintain'd according to the excellency of the present Ministery and the relation to Christs Priesthood, that the publick and honorary Monuments of it be preserv'd, and vertue properly encouraged, and great publick care taken for the advantageous Ministery of Souls, which are the proper purchase of our Redeemer, that in all things Christ may be honour'd by us more then Moses was by them, and that God through Jesus Christ be more glorified then he was in the Levitical government.

4. 2. This also concerns single persons; that they certainly abstain from all those imperfections of duty which were either permitted in the Law, or introduc'd by the commentaries of their Doctors, or inferr'd by the general declination of their first piety, and the corruption of manners. The Jewes would not take usury of a needy Jew, but of a needy stranger they would: but we must consider them with a more equal eye; we must be charitable to all; for to a Christian no man that needs and asks him is a stranger.

The Jewes had great liberty of divorces indulg'd to them; a Christian hath not the same: but in that in which he is permitted, he is not to be too forward.

5. 3. In matters of duty a Christian is to expound his obligation to the advantage of piety, to security of obedience, to the ease of his Brother, and the pressing upon himself; that whatever be the event of his temporal affairs, he secure his Spiritual interest, and secure justice though to the loss of his money, and in all doubts determine for duty rather then for interest: the Jewes went not beyond the letter of the Commandement.

6. 4. In the interior acts of vertue a Christian is to be more zealous, forward, operative and busy, frequent and fervent; he must converse with God by a more renewed entercourse, give himself no limits, alwaies striving to goe forward, designing to himself no measure but infinite in the imitation of the perfections of God, and the excellencies of his most Holy Son.

7. 5. In the exteriour acts of vertue Christians must according to their proportion be asham'd to be outdone by Jewes, not onely in what they did in obedience, but also in what they in good and prudent zeal for the law of Moses did expend or act. I say, what they did act in good and prudent zeal for their Law. Thus they adorn'd their Temple, freely gave contributions for it's support and ornament, lov'd all of their perswasion, endeavour'd to get proselytes; and therefore are in these things not onely to be imitated, but to be outdone, because all this was a prudent and zealous prosecution of their duty. But when in zeal they did not onely love their own Sect, but hate and persecute and were uncivil to all of another perswasion, this was Zeal indeed; but it was folly too and a work of the flesh, and therefore not to be imitated by Christians who are the servants of the Spirit.

8. 6. Where Christians are left to their liberty in those instances in which the Jewes were bound, Christians ought freely to doe as much as they did by constraint and by necessity: for then properly we doe more then they, when we voluntarily chuse what was impos'd on them: it is not more work, but it is more love. Thus the Jewes were bound to pay tiths to the Levites; we are commanded to maintain them honourably: but because tiths is not in the Commandement to us, we ought to supply the want of a Command by the abundance of love, and in this there is no abatement to be made but by what did concern the nation in some special relation, necessity or propriety. God was pleas'd to make the more ample provision for the tribe of Levi, because they had no inheritance amongst their brethren; they had no portion in the division of the land. Now because the Christian Clergy have a capacity of lands and other provisions, there is not all the same reason in the quantity of their appartiment as was in the assignation of the Levitical portion. Now when any such thing can intervene and enter into consideration, it must be allowed for in the proportions of increase which are demanded of the Christian. The Jewes gave great contribution to the Temple; but it was but one, and therefore it is not to be expected that every Christian Church in such a multitude should be adorn'd and rich like the Temple of Jerusalem.

7. Where

9. 7. Where Jewes and Christians are equally left to their liberty, it is infinitely reasonable & agreeable to the excellency of the Religion, that Christians should exceed the Jewes. Thus we find that at the erecting of the Tabernacle the Jewes brought silver and gold and other materials till they had too much, and the people were commanded to cease and bring no more. Now when an occasion as great in it self and more proportionable to the religion calls upon us for an offering and voluntary contribution, if the instance be in a matter as proportionable to the Gospel as that was to the law of Moses, the excellency of the religion and the dignity of the work and the degree of our grace and love require of us to be more ready and more liberal in equal proportions.

10. 8. In those graces which are proper to the Gospel, that is, such which are the peculiar of Christians, literally and plainly exacted of us, and but obscurely insinuated, or collaterally and by the consequence of something else required of them, it cannot be but that the obedience which we owe should be more ready, the actions more frequent, the degrees more intense; because every advantage in the Commandement hath no other end but to be an advance of our duty; and what was obscurely commanded can be but dully paid; while the Christians duty must be brisk and potent and voluntary and early and forward and intense, in proportion to greater mercies receiv'd, to a better law, to a more determin'd conscience, to a clearer revelation, to more terrible threatnings, and to the better promises of the Gospel: all which are so many conjugations of aide, and instances of a mighty grace. And therefore Christians are to be more humble, more patient, more charitable, more bountiful, greater despisers of the world, greater Lords over all their passions, then the Jewes were oblig'd to be by the consequences of their law.

11. 9. When this comes to be reduc'd to practice in any particular inquiry of Conscience, every Christian is not to measure his actions by proportion to the best, and the rare persons under the Mosaick law, in their best and heroick actions. For who can doe more then David did after he had procured the waters of Bethlehem to cool his intolerable thirst, but to deny his appetite, and refuse to drink the price of blood? who can doe more then he did and would have done toward the building of the Temple? who can give better testimony of duty to his Prince then he did to Saul? who can with more valour and confidence fight the battels of the Lord? who can with more care provide for the service of God, and the beauty and orderly ministeries of the Tabernacle? who can with more devotion compose and sing hymnes to the honour of God? In these and such as these David was exemplary; and so was Moses for meekness, and Job for patience, and Manasses for repentance, and Abraham for faith, and Jacob for simplicity and ingenuity, and Enoch for devotion: these in their several periods before and under the Law were the great lights of their Ages, and set in eminent places to invite, forward the remiss piety of others, alluring them by the beauty of their flames to walk in their light and by their example. And it is well if Christians would doe as well as these rare personages in their several instances. But as some women are wiser then some men; and yet men are the more understanding Sex, and have the prerogative of reason and of government: so though some persons of the old religions were better then many of the new (of the religion of Jesus Christ) yet the advantage and the increaſe muſt be in the Chriſtian Church, which muſt produce ſome perſons as exemplary in many graces as any of theſe hath been in any one.

12. 10. But then as to ſingle perſons; 1. Every man muſt obſerve thoſe increaſes of duty which our Bleſſed Saviour either by way of new Sanction, or new interpretation, ſuperadded to the old, in the Sermon upon the Mount.

2. Every man muſt doe in proportion to all the aides of the Spirit which the Goſpel miniſters, all that he can doe: which proportion if he obſerves, it will of it ſelf amount to more then the uſual rate of Moſes law, becauſe he hath more aides.

3. He muſt be infinitely remov'd from thoſe ſins to which they were propenſe, and which made God to remove them out of his ſight; ſuch as were idolatry, the admitting of ſtrange Gods, infidelity, obſtinacy, hypocriſy, and ſenſual low appetites: becauſe theſe were the crimes of an ignorant uninſtructed people in reſpect of what the Chriſtian is; and for a Chriſtian to be an idolater, or eaſily divorc'd, or incredulous, as they were, is therefore the more intolerable, becauſe it is almoſt remov'd from his poſſibilities; he can ſcarce be tempted to ſuch things who knowes any thing of the doctrine of the Goſpel.

4. There is no other poſitive meaſures of his duty, but that which can have no meaſure it ſelf, and that is love; and a Chriſtian muſt therefore exceed the righteouſneſs of the Subjects of Moſes law, becauſe they muſt doe all their works in faith and love: in faith, to make them accepted, though they be imperfect; in love, to make them as perfect as they can be. Now he that loves will think every thing too little; and he that thinks ſo will endeavour to doe more, and to doe it better: and Chriſtians that have greater experience of God, and underſtand the nature of Charity, and doe all of them explicitely and articulately long after the glories of an Eternal love, and know that all increaſe of grace is a proceeding towards glory, need no other argument to inforce the duty, and no other meaſure to deſcribe the duty of this Rule, but to reflect upon the ſtate of his religion, the Commandements, the endearments, the aids, the example, the means: all which are well ſumm'd up by S. John, Beloved, we are the ſons of God, and it does not yet appear what we ſhall be; but we know that when he ſhall appear, we ſhall be like him; for we ſhall ſee him as he is: And every man that hath this hope, purifieth himſelf as God is pure. That is, we are for the preſent children of God by adoption, ſeal'd with his Spirit, renewed by regeneration, juſtified by his grace, and invited forward by moſt glorious promiſes, greater then we can underſtand. Now he that conſiders this ſtate of things, and hopes for that ſtate of bleſſings, will proceed in duty and love toward the perfections of God, never giving over till he partake of the purities of God and his utmoſt glories.

1 Joh. 3. 2, 3.

I adde no more but this, That in the meaſures of the practice of this Rule there is no difficulty, but what is made by the careleſs lives of Chriſtians and their lazy and unholy principles. At the rate as Chriſtians uſually doe live, it is hard to know how and in what inſtances and in what degrees our obedience ought to be more humble and more diligent then that of Moſes diſciples. But they that love, will doe the thing, and ſo underſtand the Rule. Obedite, & intelligetis, Obey, and ye ſhall underſtand.

Concerning

Concerning the interpretation of the Laws of the most Holy Jesus, I know of no other material consideration here to be inserted. Onely there are several pretences of exterior and accidental means of understanding the Laws of Christ, which because they are deriv'd from the authority or from the discourses of men, they are more properly to be considered in the Rules concerning Humane Laws, which is the subject of the next Book, where the Reader may expect them.

CHAP. I.

Of Humane Laws in general; and what Obligation they paſs upon the Conſcience.

RULE I.

The Conſcience is properly and directly, actively and paſſively, under pains of ſin and puniſhment, obliged to obey the Laws of men.

1. THAT the Laws of God and Man are the great meaſures of right & wrong, of good and evil, of that which is to be followed and what is to be avoided in manners of men, and the entercourſes of ſocieties, is infinitely certain and univerſally confeſs'd. Since therefore Humane Laws are one moiety of the Rule and meaſure of Conſcience, and that we are bound to obey our lawful Superiours in what they command, it is naturally conſequent to this, that we acknowledge the conſcience bound, and that in Humane Laws as well as in Divine, though according to their ſeveral proportions, the conſcience ought to be inſtructed. And indeed there is more need of Preachers in the matter of Divine Laws, and more need of wiſe and prudent Guides in the matter of Humane Laws. For the Laws of God are wiſer and plainer, few and laſting, general and natural, perceiv'd by neceſſity, and underſtood by the eaſieſt notices of things; and therefore men have more need to be call'd upon to obey, then taught how; and therefore here the Preachers office is moſt neceſſary and moſt requir'd. But Humane Laws are ſometime intricate by weakneſs, ſometimes by deſign, ſometimes by an unavoidable neceſſity; they are contingent, and remov'd farre from the experiences of moſt men; they are many and particular, difficult and tranſient, various in their proviſions, and alterable by many parts and many ways: and yet becauſe the conſcience is all the way oblig'd, ſhe hath greater need of being conducted then in the other, where every wiſe man can better be a guide in the little intrigues, and every child can walk in the plain way.

2. But our firſt inquiry is, Whether the conſcience be oblig'd or no. For if Conſcience be not, then nothing is concerned but Prudence, and care that a man be ſafe from the rods and axes: but then the world would quickly find that fear would be but a weak defence to her Laws; which force, or wit, or cuſtome, or riches would ſo much enervate, or ſo often evacuate. And therefore the greateſt Caſe of Conſcience in this whole matter is, Whether it be a matter of Conſcience as well as of Prudence and ſecurity to obey the Laws of Man. And this queſtion is ſo dubious and unreſolv'd, that Cajetan and Henricus de Gandavo did ſuppoſe it fit to be determin'd by the Pope in Cathedra, as thinking it otherwiſe to be indeterminable. The reaſons of doubting are theſe;

3. 1. Becauſe God onely is Lord of Conſciences, he onely can diſcern the ſecret that is there, and he onely can puniſh there; and therefore to ſuppoſe any band upon conſcience from Humane Laws, would be to deveſt God of his royalty: none but he who is Καρδιογνώστης the ſearcher of the heart and mind of man can give laws to it; for none elſe can take cogniſance, or give a compulſory.

4. 2. The Conſcience is ſeated in the underſtanding (as I have already Lib. 1. Rule 1. prov'd,) but that is an imperious faculty that acknowledges no ſuperiour but God; becauſe he onely being infallible, he onely can inſtruct and inform it rightly, none elſe can have power over it. For the underſtanding hath a proper way of being rul'd. The will is rul'd by Empire, but the underſtanding by doctrine; that is govern'd by command, this by argument; the will by power, the underſtanding by truth: now becauſe God onely is truth, and every man a liar, God onely can rule the underſtanding, which is the Court of Conſcience.

5. 3. To ſubmit the conſcience to any law or power of man, is to betray our Chriſtian liberty: For Chriſt having ſet us free from all the bondage even of that Law which God himſelf made and gave to Moſes, he having alleviated the burden of rites and ceremonies, and left the Jews at liberty to be governed as they pleas'd themſelves, would not take off the laws of God to impoſe upon us the laws of Men; and there is no ſuch thing as Chriſtian liberty but a freedome from the law of Moſes, and the law of carnal ordinances, and the laws of men; for that which the Preachers ſpeak of, a liberty from ſin, and from hell, and the grave, 1. This is rather a deliverance then a liberty, a reſcue from an evil of another nature, not a ſtate of freedome and eaſe. 2. As many men have order'd their Theology, we are ſo farre from having a liberty from ſin, that they have left us nothing elſe but a liberty to ſin: and indeed we have no liberty or freedome from ſin as long as we are alive, but we are always in warre and contention, which is worſe then death; and ſo many men are always captive under ſin, and all men doe ſo often obey it, (and his ſervants we are to whom we doe obey) that we have little reaſon to boaſt of Chriſtian liberty in that ſenſe. 3. S. Paul uſing the word liberty, and ſpeaking of the advantages of Chriſtians in this, inſtances it onely in being freed from thoſe ordinances of Moſes, and the impoſitions which ſome Philoſophers or ſome ſects of men would bring upon the conſcience. 4. Liberty from ſin, or Chriſtian liberty in this ſenſe is nothing but a tropical expreſſion, a metaphor and ſimilitude, and therefore is not that real priviledge by which we were materially advantag'd upon the publication of the Goſpel of Chriſt. The reſult of which conſiderations is, That all Chriſtians are free men, ſervants of Chriſt, and of none elſe, it being an expreſs Commandement, and that ſtrengthned with a reaſon, Ye are bought with a price, be ye not the ſervants of men; which at leaſt muſt be underſtood of Conſcience, and the mind of men.
1 Cor. 7. 23.

6. 4. For granting it to be lawful for men to make Laws, yet that theſe Laws cannot bind the conſcience it appears plainly in this; that whatever Law

Laws of the Church are made concerning any rite or ceremony, let it be never ſo neceſſary or fitting that they be obeyed, yet the things doe not become intrinſecally neceſſary, and therefore are not to be thought ſo, leſt, expreſly againſt the Commandement of our Bleſſed Saviour, we teach for doctrines the commandements of men. To keep Holidays may be very good, ſo that we obſerve them to the Lord; but he that thinks it neceſſary and a direct duty, wrongs his own conſcience: which demonſtrates that Conſcience is free when every thing elſe is bound. You may faſt when you are commanded by your Superiour, but you muſt not think that faſting is a part of the Divine Service; that is, though man commands faſting, yet God does not: and then if man of himſelf does binde the conſcience, he hath a power equal to God, and can make Divine Commandements: but if man cannot doe ſo, then the conſcience is free, and not tied by humane Laws.

7. 5. If humane Laws doe binde the conſcience, then it is put into the power of man to ſave or damne his brother; not directly, but upon the conſequence of his obedience or diſobedience, which is all that is done by the Laws of God; and men ſhall have power to make more ways to the Devil, to make the ſtrait way to heaven yet ſtraiter, and the way to hell, which is already broad enough, yet wider and more receptive of miſerable and periſhing ſouls.

8. 6. Chriſt is the Author and finiſher of our faith, and ſo of every grace: that is, he onely can give it, and he onely can take it away. Since therefore that which makes a ſin, deſtroys the grace, no humane authority can make an action to be a ſin; becauſe no humane power can diſpoſe of grace or take it away.

9. 7. In the inſtance of civil power and civil Laws the caſe is more certain, for this reaſon; becauſe the civil power cannot remit ſins, therefore neither can they bind to ſin: and from hence it will follow, that ſuppoſing Eccleſiaſtical Laws doe bind the conſcience, yet the civil cannot. But then as for the Eccleſiaſtical power and Laws, they alſo are as invalid upon another account, becauſe the Church having no external compulſory, can onely bind in thoſe things where God hath already bound; and therefore can make no Laws of her own, but what are already made by a higher power, and conſequently cannot bind to ſin, but there where the conſcience is already bound by God. And if the Church ſhould inflict her cenſures for any thing that were not of it ſelf a ſin againſt God, as for not paying the fees of the Spiritual Court, for a poor mans working for his living upon a Holiday, the world would cry out of her; which ſhews, that where God hath not bound the conſcience, neither the Eccleſiaſtical nor the civil power can.

8. If humane Laws doe directly bind the conſcience, then it is as great a ſin to tranſgreſs a law of man, as to break a law of God; with our bare foot to touch the ground within the Octaves of Eaſter, as to call our brother fool; to eat fleſh on Friday as great as to commit fornication: which conſequent becauſe it is intolerable, ſo alſo is the opinion that inferres it. The concluſion is, In Chriſt Jeſus there is neither high nor low; that is, Chriſtian Religion hath no hand in this Heraldry of Secundum, ſub, & ſupra; but whatſoever difference of perſon, of order, and of Government is amongſt us, is by agreement: it is, as S. Peter calls it, ἀνθρωπίνη κτίσις, the ordinance of man; and for mans ſake it is to be obeyed: but the conſcience is ſtill at liberty where onely the commandement of man does intervene.

10. This opinion is taught by Fernandus Vaſquius a Spaniard, and he affirms that all the Gentlemen and common people of Spain (the Scholars onely excepted) are of this opinion: it was alſo taught by ſome of the Scholars of Calvin, and ſome Lutherans, by all the Anabaptiſts of Germany of late; and that upon the ſtrength of the firſt, the third and fourth argument; and formerly by Jacobus Almain, and John Gerſon, by Felinus, Cajetan, and Navarre, but they mean onely the civil Laws of Princes, upon the confidence of the ſixth and ſomething of the ſeventh argument; all which I have thruſt forward as farre as the nature of the queſtion would bear, and added ſome more: which I have done, not that theſe arguments ought to prevail, but that by the examination of them this great queſtion may have right done it, by being rightly ſtated, and fully cleared.

11. Firſt therefore to the main inquiry; it is certain as an article of faith, as neceſſary as any other rule of manners, that every Subject is bound to obey the juſt Laws of his lawful Superiour, not onely under fear of puniſhment from man, but under pain of the Divine diſpleaſure. 1. Becauſe the power by which men make Laws is the power of God: By me Kings reign, and the Law-givers decree juſtice, ſays the Wiſdome of God; that is, the Son of God, the Wiſdome of the Father, to whom he hath given all power in heaven and earth, he it is by whom, that is, by whoſe power and wiſdome, Kings reign. For this is the wiſdome, Ἦν Θεὸς ἔκτισε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, which God poſſeſſed from the beginning. The Lxx reads it ἔκτισε, creavit, which God created from the beginning; and this word the Arrians make uſe of to their evil purpoſes, but very weakly and againſt the faith of the original, where it is קנן Kanan poſſedit. This eternal Son of God, and the Wiſdome of the Father, the King of Kings and the Lord of lords, is the original of all humane power, and this is nothing but a derivative from him. For power is given you of the Lord, and Soveraignty from the Higheſt; and ye are miniſters of his Kingdome. And S. Paul expreſly and dogmatically affirms, There is no power but from God: the powers that be, are ordained of God. Whoſoever therefore reſiſteth the power, reſiſteth the ordinance of God. So that the Legiſlative or ſupreme power is not the ſervant of the people, but the Miniſter, the Truſtee and Repreſentative of God. 2. The power of the Sword is onely from God; for ſince no man is Lord of his own life, no man hath power to kill himſelf, neither hath he power to warrant any man elſe to doe it; for what he may not doe himſelf, he cannot commiſſion and impower any one elſe to doe. Vindicta mea, ſaith God, Vengeance is mine, I will repay: and it is Gods ſword with which the Magiſtrate ſtrikes; and therefore Kings and Potentates are Θεοῦ λῃτουργοὶ, and Θεοῦ διάκονοι, ἔκδικοι εἰς ὀργὴν, Gods deputies and miniſtring officials, in his name to be the avengers of his wrath: and as Chriſt ſaid to Pilate, Thou couldeſt have no power unleſs it were given thee from above, may be ſaid to all juſt humanes Powers, It is given them from above, not from beneath, from God, not from the people. The conſequent of which is this, If it be God that ſtrikes and pays vengeance by the hand of the Magiſtrate, then it is God who is offended when the law of the Magiſtrate is violated; for whoever ſtrikes is the party injured; and the Magiſtrate being Gods Miniſter, ſter, as he is the leſs principal in the juſtice done, ſo alſo in the injuſtice ſuffered. Dixit Deus quia Dii eſtis, It is God who hath ſaid to the Magiſtrates that they are Gods; that is, in the place of God: by his authority they ſtrike, and he is the injured perſon: and therefore he who is ſo ſmitten by the ſword of God, is a ſinner againſt God, for he puniſhes none elſe. Patet culpa, ubi non latet pœna. If God puniſhes, it is certain man hath ſinn'd, ſaid S. 12. But the thing is expreſly affirmed by the Scripture; for having dogmatically and fully ſignified that all humane juſt power is τῦ Θεῦ δυνάμις, ἀπὸ τῦ Θεῦ, διὰ τῦ Θεῦ, and ὑπὸ τῦ Θεῦ, they being the ſeveral expreſſions of Solomon according to the LXX, and of S. Paul in his own words, it is not content to leave us to find out the conſequence of theſe, but literally affirms the main articles. So S. Peter, Be ye ſubject to every ordinance of man, διὰ τὸν Κύριον for the Lords ſake; which S. Paul ſpeaks yet more explicitely, Wherefore it is neceſſary that ye be ſubject, not onely for wrath, but alſo for conſcience ſake. Sicut Chriſto, as to Chriſt, ſo be obedient to your Maſters, or temporal Lords; ſo the ſame Apoſtle: that is, by the ſame neceſſity, for the ſame reaſon, to avoid the ſame puniſhment, to have the ſame reward, and by the force of the ſame Religion, and that you may not prevaricate the laws of God, or doe violence to your conſcience. Nothing can adde light to theſe ſo clear words, they are bright as the Sun, certain as an article of faith, clear, eaſy and intelligible, according to the nature of univerſal Divine Commandements. S. [c] Chryſoſtom and [c] Theodoret urging theſe precepts, ſay, that we are not to obey out of courteſie, but of duty; not out of liberality, but neceſſity; that is, according to S. [c] Ambroſe and S. Auſtin, the fearful pains of hell and eternal damnation attend them that diſobey.

[c] [c] In Rom. 13. [d] Ep. 54. ad Maced. vide etiam S. Hieron. in c. 3. ad Titum.

And this whole matter is infinitely demonſtrated in this one conſideration: The Laws of man doe ſo certainly bind the conſcience, that they have a power of limiting and declaring, and making the particulars to become the Laws of God. For though the Divine Law forbids murder, yet the Law of man declares concerning the particular, that it is, or it is not murder, and by ſuch declaration, by ſuch leave or prohibition reſpectively makes it ſo. In Spain if a wronged husband or father kill the deprehended adultereſs, it is no murder; in England it is. For in Spain the husband or father is permitted to be Executioner, where notoreity is declared to be ſufficient conviction: here they are not truſted with it; and the Judge and the Executioner are perſons vaſtly remov'd. If a Law [e] forbids me to take my own goods from a Thief, it is theft to doe it, but it is no theft if the Law permits [f]. It is inceſt for the Uncle to marry with his Niece: it is ſo where the Laws have made it ſo, but it is not ſo of it ſelf, for it was not ſo always. Since therefore humane Laws can conſtitute an action in the habitude of a Divine Law, it is beyond all queſtion, it does oblige the conſcience.

13. 2. This obligation is paſs'd upon the conſcience, and there is this neceſſity of obeying: not onely in caſe humane Laws be firſt given by God in theſi, or in hypotheſi, that is, in words or in ſenſe, in direct affirmation or juſt conſequence, in ſubſtance or in analogy; but though the matter of the Law be in its own nature wholly indifferent before the ſanction and conſtitution.

ſtitution. The firſt concluſion I intended againſt the Anabaptiſt, and this ſecond againſt Gerſon, Almain, and the diſſenting Sectaries: and of the truth of it we have an inſtance in the perſon of S. Paul, who by his Apoſtolical authority gave an injunction which hath ever ſince been an Eccleſiaſtical Canon; and yet he alone and not the Lord gave the word, That a 1 Cor. 7. 12. believing wife or husband ſhould not depart from their unbelieving correlative, if he or ſhe reſpectively deſir'd to ſtay. It was a matter in which Chriſt had not at all interpos'd, but S. Paul made it a law to the Chriſtian Churches; and whoever ſhall prevaricate it ſhall bear his burden. And indeed it were a vain thing to ſuppoſe that all humane Laws were derived from the law of Nature, or the Divine poſitive; or that thoſe which were not ſo derived could not be good and reaſonable, and that the authority binding them were incompetent. For whatſoever is derived from the law of God cannot by men admit variety, nor ſuffer diminution, or goe into deſuetude, or be extinguiſh'd by abrogation: and then it would follow that no King could command any thing but what was neceſſary before he commanded it; and nothing could be a law to the Perſians, but what alſo did oblige the Greeks; and nothing could bind in the 125 Olympiad, but what was decreed before the days of Semiramis; and there were no law but thoſe of the Medes and Perſians; and there could be no proviſions made for new neceſſities, and the Government of Commonwealths could never be improved by experience, and all Law-givers were as wiſe at firſt as ever they could be. All which are ſuch fooliſh conſequences, that it muſt be granted, that whatever humane Power can juſtly ordain, or prudently, or neceſſarily, or probably, all that is bound upon the conſcience of the Subject certainly and to all events as the Laws of God himſelf. And therefore Plato ſaid well, That before the Law is made, men may judge of it, but after the ſanction, not at all: that is, it is ſo indifferent in its nature, that it is fit to be conſidered and diſputed; but when it is made a Law, there remains nothing but a neceſſary obedience. And to the ſame purLib. 5. Ethic. cap. 7. poſe Ariſtotle largely diſcourſes; for when he had divided the civil Law, πολιτικὸν δίκαιον, into φυσικὸν & νομικὸν, the natural and the conſtituted, he ſays, νομικὸν ᾧ, ὃ ἐξ ἀρχῆς μὲ οὐδὲν διαφέρει ὕπως ἢ ἄλλως· ὅταν ᾧ δῶνται, διαφέρει, The Law that is not natural, but decreed by man, in the beginning it matters not whether it be made or no; but after it is made, it is a great matter whether it be kept or no. But this whole affair is put beyond all ſcruple by the words of the Apoſtle, Obey your Maſters, not onely the good and gentle, but the moroſe and harſh; that is, not onely if what he commands be in it ſelf good and fitting, but if it be troubleſome, and uneaſy, and unneceſſary; any thing, ſo it be not unlawful: for every thing that God hath not forbidden, can be bound upon conſcience by a lawful Superiour. Either therefore all humane Laws are nothing elſe but commentaries on Scripture or the natural Law, or elſe are wholly unneceſſary, as being nothing but repetitions of the Divine laws: and there can be no new law made; or if there can, it muſt bind the conſcience: for all other things bind the conſcience by themſelves, and without humane conſtitution. If therefore any humane conſtitution, as ſuch, can bind the conſcience, it muſt be of ſuch inſtances which either are derivatives from the law of Nature, or of things which before the law did not bind at all, that is, of things which in their own nature are indifferent.

14. 3. That humane Laws bind the conſcience does not depend upon the

the intention of the law-giver; for when the arrow is ſhot out of the bow, it will hit or miſs by its own force and order, not by the intention of the Archer: and no law-giver can make a law with a purpoſe not to oblige the conſcience. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth this queſtion was much talk'd of, and little underſtood; and ſome diſcontented Recuſants under the Government of the Church of England had ſo talk'd the lawes themſelves out of countenance, that the legiſlative power durſt ſcarce own the proper obligation of an Eccleſiaſtical, or of a law relating to any thing of religion; inſomuch that when the wiſdome of the ſtate thought fit to confirm the ancient lawes of Eccleſiaſtical faſts, they ſuperadded this proviſo, That if any one ſhould affirm that theſe lawes were intended to bind the Conſcience, he ſhould be puniſh'd like the ſpreaders of falſe newes: and the jejunium Cecilianum, the Wedneſday faſt, was made without ſuch obligation. Now this is plainly to them that underſtand it, a direct artifice to evacuate the whole law: for a law that is made without intention to bind the conſcience is no law at all; for beſides that it is a plain giving leave to any man to break it that can doe it without obſervation, or can bribe the officers, or is bigger then the informers, or not eaſy to be puniſh'd, or that dwels alone, or that is himſelf a Miniſter of the law, beſides this, I ſay, it is directly no law at all. For all humane power being deriv'd from God, and bound upon our conſciences by his power, not by man, he that ſaies it ſhall not bind the Conſcience, ſaies it ſhall be no law, it ſhall have no authority from God; and then it hath none at all: and if it be not tied upon the Conſcience, then to break it is no ſin, and then to keep it is no duty: ſo that a law without ſuch an intention is a contradiction; it is a law which binds onely if we pleaſe, and we may obey when we have a mind to it; and to ſo much we were tied before the conſtitution. * * But then if by ſuch a declaration it was meant that to keep ſuch faſting-daies was no part of a direct Commandement of God, that is, God had not requir'd them by himſelf immediately, and ſo it was (abſtracting from that law) no duty Evangelical, it had been below the wiſdome of the contrivers of it; for no man pretends it, no man ſaies it, no man thinks it: and they might as well have declar'd that that law was none of the ten Commandements.

15. 4. Though Humane lawes doe not bind the Conſcience by the intention of the law-giver, but by the command of God, yet God does bind the law upon the Conſcience according to the intention of the power that decrees it. For though a Father cannot command his Son to doe a lawful and fitting ſervice, and by his intention make that the diſobedient Son ſhall not ſin againſt God, becauſe he cannot make diſobedience to be no ſin; yet by intending leſs obligation in the law, he makes the crime imputable in a leſs degree; that is, the authority is the leſs deſpis'd, there is leſs evil conſequent, the miſchief is ſmall, the inconvenience little. * And therefore the Doctors of the Canon law doe to very little purpoſe trouble this queſtion with inquiries after ſigns, when the intention of the Law-giver is to bind to Mortal, when to Venial ſins. For beſides that the diſtinction it ſelf is trifling according to their underſtanding of it (of which I have given a large account in a Diſcourſe on purpoſe) and beſides that the commands of Heathen Parents, and Maſters, and Princes who knew nothing of that diſtinction (if it had been right) did nevertheleſs bind their Subjects to obedience under pain of ſin; beſides theſe, I ſay, the law-giver does not at all make it a ſin, or no ſin: he onely intends it ſhould be kept, and to that purpoſe poſe binds it with penalties, and conſequently and indirectly binds the Conſcience: but God binds the Conſcience properly and directly; for the law is Divine in reſpect of the power and authority, but Humane in reſpect of the matter and the inſtance: and that is the meaning of theſe words put into the Rule. The conſcience of man is by Gods law properly and directly bound to obey the lawes of Men; not indirectly and by the conſequence of ſome other duty, but by a Commandement and the purpoſed ſolemn declaration of his will in this affair. But this I ſhall more fully explicate in my anſwer to the oppoſite arguments. Now becauſe although the law-givers intention does not directly make the diſobedience to be ſin or no ſin, yet becauſe indirectly it hath influence upon the action and the conſcience of the ſubject, it is uſeful that I ſet down the Rules and Meaſures of the difference; and how we may gueſs (for it can be no more) at the diſtinct obligations which from the diverſities of humane lawes are paſſed upon the Conſcience.

Rules of diſtinction, or the meaſures by which we ſhall prudently conjecture at the gravity or leſſening of the ſin of diſobedience to Humane Lawes.

16. 1. He that breaks a law which is eſtabliſhed upon great penalties, commits a great ſin. Becauſe it is regularly to be preſumed that the ſupreme power puts much upon it, when he is ſo earneſt for its obſervation. Rem quæ culpâ caret, in damnum vocari non convenit, ſaith the Law, Cap. 2. de conſtit. If there be no fault there ought to be no puniſhment; they are relatives, and correſpond alſo in their very degree. Quis dubitaverit hoc eſſe ſceleratius commiſſum quod eſt gravius vindicatum? ſaith S. Auſtin, If the puniſhment was more grievous, the wickedneſs alſo was the more intolerable: ut juxta menſuram delicti ſit & plagarum modus: that's the meaſure of punitive juſtice, that the number of the ſtripes be according to the meaſure of the iniquity. And concerning thoſe things where there is any doubt, the Subject is not to judge whether the law be very neceſſary or no; but to judge concerning the intention and mind of the Superior, and whether he thinks it very neceſſary: For he knowes beſt, and by his knowledg and his authority is the moſt competent Judge. This Rule hath no exception, unleſs it be evident that the puniſhment is impos'd for terror, and to affright men from doing that for which it is not very fit they ſhould be ſeverely puniſh'd: as if a Prince ſhould under pain of death forbid the hunting of a hare; the greatneſs of the puniſhment neither makes nor declares the fact more criminal then it is in its own nature under a law that forbids it under a ſmaller puniſhment. But if the caſe be doubtful, whether the law be of great purpoſes and deſign, the greatneſs of the puniſhment in a prudent and temperate government is the beſt exterior indication. But if the puniſhment be light & trifling, the offence is ſo too; for the legiſlative power can put no more weight upon it then it declares by puniſhment, but ſo much it does: and the Rule of Alfonſus à Caſtro is very uſeful here and in ſome other articles, Humana lex non magis gravat conſcientias quam corpora. For Gods Law adding energy and Sanction to the conſtitutions of man, binds ſo far as the Prince or as the Prelate binds: and this is fully ſignified in the words and commiſſion of Chriſt to his Church, Whatſoever ye ſhall bind on Earth, ſhall be bound in Heaven; for there our Bleſſed Lord conſtituting a Government in his Church, as already there was in the world, though though of another nature, and by compulſories external, and a proper juriſdiction (from which the Spiritual differs, as I ſhall explicate in the fourth chapter of this book) did promiſe to doe to them as to the Princes of the World; that is, verify their miniſtery of Lawes and Judgments. He indeed appointed other manners of coercion, and a diſtinct adminiſtration; but the power of giving lawes and judgments he gave then; and he gave it as firmly as to the greateſt Kings: that is, as he commands Subjects to obey their Princes, ſo alſo to obey their Spiritual Superiors; as he will puniſh the rebellious and diſobedient to Kings, ſo the diſobedient to Biſhops, and to Apoſtolical Prelates; that is, according as every Superior can and intends to bind by his temporal or ſpiritual penalty, God will verify it and condemn the ſame perſon with an eternal. Since therefore Gods verification of humane lawes and judgments is after the Sanction and for it wholly, it muſt alſo be according to it. He that binds what man binds, binds ſo much and no more; as therefore man intends the obligation, ſo God obliges the Conſcience.

17. 2. If the matter of humane lawes be great in it ſelf, to prevaricate thoſe lawes gives a proportion of greatneſs to the crime. 1. But this ſeldome happens but when a Divine law is complicated with the Civil; ſuch as the prohibition of publick ſtewes, the lawes for keeping daies of religion, the Lords day, Chriſtmas, Aſcenſion, and the Incarnation, the preſerving the perſons of them who miniſter to Religion ſacred, the immunity and intemeration of Holy things as well as holy perſons, the matters of Sacrilege, Simony, keeping of vowes, together with all ſpecifications and humane inſtances of Divine Commandements, as that Children ſhould not marry without their Parents conſent, that marriages ſhould not be conſummate before they be publiſhed. 2. To theſe alſo are to be added ſuch lawes which in their own nature contribute much to the publick ſecurity or advantage: as that men ſhould not in a City fire their own houſes, nor cut the damme of the Sea upon their own ground, that they ſhould not in times of peace fire a Beacon, nor tell falſe and diſheartning news to an army ready to joyn battel, nor make falſe Muſters when the Enemy is near.

18. 3. Though the matter of the lawes be in it ſelf light and trifling, yet if by reaſon of ſome preſent appendages, and viſible or probable conſequences it be great, the conſcience is tied to obedience under a great crime. For a ſingle ſouldier to fly from a battel is of it ſelf no great matter, were it not for the evil example; but becauſe it may affright the next man, and that may ſcare the rank, and the rank may diſorder the company, and ſo proceed to an intolerable miſchief, therefore the ſin is great by the proportion to the evil it is likely and apt to produce. To carry corn abroad is no great matter of it ſelf; but when the price is great and the plenty is little, the miſchief it does by accident is the meaſure of the ſin.

2. * Of the ſame conſideration it is, when an action of it ſelf light and impertinent is made the matter of a great ſcandal. To kneel or to ſtand at the Holy Communion hath been ſeverally uſed in divers Churches Ancient and Modern; but when a law is made that we ſhall kneel, and if I doe not kneel he that obſerves will think I doe no reverence to Chriſts body and blood, and by my example will learn to deſpiſe it, the Conſcience is burden'd with the ſin of irreverence ſomething, but very greatly with the ſin of ſcandal.

3. When

3. When the thing of it ſelf is indifferent, and yet the Cuſtome of it is paſs'd into ſuperſtition, or cauſes horror, or ſome notorious evil effect, the lawes that prohibit any ſuch thing doe bind the conſcience to obey under the pain of being guilty of the great evil that is introduc'd by it. To light up candles by dead bodies is as harmleſs as any thing; but if it be prohibited for the avoiding of ſuperſtition to which it miniſters in ſome weak perſons, the diſobedience hath its value not according to the action, but the evil intention to which it is ſuppos'd to contribute. Thus we find a title in the Canon law, de cadaveribus non exenterandis & in fruſta concidendis ut ad alia loca transferantur: and it is forbidden under the pain of the greater excommunication, that bodies ſhould be imbalmed, that is, unbowell'd and cut in pieces to be carried to other places of Sepulture remote from where they died. The thing in it ſelf was innocent and warranted by the practice of whole nations, and had countenance from the examples of Jacob and Joſeph; but it did light into the obſervation of people that thought it cruel, unnatural and inhumane, and there that opinion, not the nature of the action, gave the weight and value to the diſobedience.

4. When an action in it ſelf indifferent is by the law expounded to ſignify a ſin, though in it ſelf it doe not, nor in the heart of him that does it, the diſobedience to that law is an act of that ſin, or at leaſt of a ſcandal relative to it. Thus if a civil law were made to forbid women to goe in mens cloths, as preſuming them that did ſo were incontinent and wanton, ſhe that diſobeyed that law was really to be judged wanton, becauſe ſhe would doe that which the law ſo expounded; and her crime was great, not according to the thing it ſelf, but to the ſenſe of the law; ſhe deſpiſes her own reputation, does that thing which the law, by which the beſt judgments are made, judges to be incontinence, and therefore ſhe is juſtly to be condemned as an incontinent: and upon this account there was a law made; and it is recited cap. ſi qua mulier, diſt. 30. where women under pain of anathema are forbidden to appear in a mans habit; where the gloſs addes, ſcil. ob malum finem, if it be for an evil end, it is a ſin proportionate to that evil end: and therefore when the law declares beforehand, that it ſhall be judged to be a Miniſtery to that evil end, the action is that ſin which is ſo adjudged, & the conſcience bound accordingly. But this caution hath one limitation, viz. though the law expounds ſuch an action to be incontinence, and therefore ordinarily it is ſo to be judged; yet if it really be not ſo, but be done upon ſome great neceſſity or for ſome very good end, though till the publication & approbation of the cauſe, it be externally and legally diſhoneſt, yet the conſcience is clear: becauſe in an action that is indifferent, and condemn'd onely for a preſumptive end, when that preſumption fails in the particular, and the indifferent action ſerves really to a pious, a charitable, or a neceſſary end, the action is made good, and therefore the Conſcience is diſoblig'd. For that which is really ſo, prevails over that which is but preſumed ſo. Thus we find that S. Euphroſyna liv'd long in a Monaſtery of men; and the Church which took cogniſance of it, did, upon evidence of her piety and purity, after death declare her a Saint: and that S. Eugenia went in a mans habit [to avoid the perſecutors of Chriſtianity for a while] is told in the Menologion of the Greeks; and her memory as of a Virgin and Martyr is celebrated in the Greek Church upon Chriſtmas eve. And when Nonnus the Biſhop of Edeſſa had converted S. Pelagia, who from a common curtezan became a glorious Saint, after the ſuffering of moſt ſevere penances in the mount Olivet, ſhe eſtrang'd her ſelf from all probabilities of temptation from vain men men by living in a mans habit conceal'd all her life-time; and the Church keeps her memorial in honour upon the 8th of October.

5. If the matter of humane Laws be in it ſelf trifling and inconſiderable, yet if it meets with a people where it is eſteem'd a crime, and the laws forbid it upon that account of a publick diſ-eſtimation, it is to be preſumed that the laws doe condemn it equally to the publick fame; and therefore that the conſcience is bound accordingly. Thus in the days of Clemens Alexandrinus the Chriſtians thought it a very horrid thing to wear falſe hair; and ſaid Martial to Marinus, nothing is more deformed, nothing more unhandſome. Now though it be not ſo in it ſelf, yet when the hearts of men are generally againſt it, as it was then (though it be not ſo now) if any law had prohibited the wearing of Perrukes, the conſcience had been greatly obliged, for the law did lay much upon it, even as much as all the evil of the publick infamy did amount to. Thus to break a faſting-day which by cuſtome hath been obſerved in a Church, is a matter of ſmall account; but if a law have forbidden it, and forbids it there where it is commonly accounted a very high impiety, though of it ſelf it be not ſo, yet under ſuch a law in ſuch circumſtances it becomes ſo, and is to be valued accordingly. And upon this account are thoſe words of S. Chryſoſtome to be underſtood, Adveniente tempore jejunii, etiamſi quis millies urgeat, & infinita cruciet; & cogat vinum delibare, aut aliquid aliud quod jejunii lege non eſt licitum guſtare, patiendum potius eſſe, quam prohibitum tangere nutrimentum. It was accounted a great matter then to break an Eccleſiaſtical faſt: and therefore when a law is ſupported by ſuch an eſtimate, that law binds heavily; and it will be a great ſin to break it, unleſs there be a great cauſe to legitimate or excuſe it. In ſuch caſes we muſt endure a great inconvenience rather then diſobey.

6. Though the matter be little, yet if the Legiſlative power hath a particular eye and value upon it, however it be expreſſed, if ſuch a value be known or obſerved, the ſmalneſs of the matter is no argument of the ſmalneſs of the ſin. Thus alſo in the foregoing inſtance of Eccleſiaſtical Faſts are thoſe words of S. Baſil to be underſtood, ſaying, Non minus crimen eſſe violare jejunium Eccleſiaſticum, quam militi abjicere ſcutum in bello, aut ſtationem deſerere. Eccleſiaſticall Faſts in his time were the cogniſance of a Chriſtian, his defence and guard; and therefore not to keep them was as if a Souldier did throw away his ſhield in a day of battel, or deſert his ſtation. So the Prelates of the Church did then underſtand it, ſo they intended it. When a trifle is made a mark of union, as to wear a branch in warre, when the Superiour ſets his heart upon it; in this caſe the mind of the ſupreme becomes a law to his Subjects, in the former they become a law unto themſelves. Sometimes a ſmal inſtance is made the trial of obedience; and the Superiour hath a great authority, but a little dioceſe, or a few Subjects, or ſmall occaſions to rule in; in theſe and the like caſes, the ſmalneſs of the matter is not onely to be conſidered, but the interpretation and effort which the Superiour puts upon it. If he calls every ſuch diſobedience a contempt of his authority, and accounts it a diſſolution of that community where he governs, or a great violence of order; it is ſo in conſcience, that is, to be valued beyond the matter. For he that takes a little piece of iron from an iron forge does no great harm; but if he takes it from a lock or a chain, he diſorders the whole contexture.

19. 4. When an Eccleſiaſtical puniſhment is ſuperadded to a civil law, or a civil puniſhment to an Eccleſiaſtical law, it is to be preſumed that the law-giver puts much upon it, and therefore the conſcience is obliged to obedience under a great ſin. The reaſon is plain, becauſe he can by no means better and more earneſtly ſignify his purpoſe of obliging ſtrongly then by uſing both the ſwords: he binds more ſtrongly then all the terror of the civil puniſhment, who beſides that, calls in the aids of Religion; and that Prelate is paſſionately deſirous to ſecure obedience to his laws, when beſides the bands of God, he cals in to his help the cords of a man, and ſo ſecures it by all means. And therefore whatſoever is decreed under pain of ſolemn excommunication is therefore ordinarily preſumed to be of great band unto the conſcience, not onely by force of the firſt Rule *, becauſe it is a great puniſhment; but alſo becauſe the civil power does verify that ſentence, and inflicts ſome great temporal evil upon them that abide in contempt or diſobedience to the orders and cenſures of the Church.

* Numb. 16.

20. 5. The preceptive or prohibitive words in humane Laws ordinarily are no ſign of a greater obligation of the conſcience; that is, when the words of ſtrict command are the uſual ſtyle of the Court, as it is both in Civil and Eccleſiaſtick Courts. * 1. But if ſome laws are publiſhed with ſevere clauſes of command, and others on purpoſe and by deſign with leſſer and the more gentle, then the caſe is evident that there is a difference to be made alſo by the conſcience. And this is in particular made uſe of by the Franciſcans in the obſervation of the Rule of their Order. For, in Clementina, Exivi de paradiſo, § Cum autem, De verborum ſignificatione, it is determin'd that that part of the Rule of S. Francis which is eſtabliſhed by preceptive or prohibitive words ſhall oblige the Friers Minors under a great ſin, the reſt not; and this wholly upon the account of the different clauſes of ſanction and eſtabliſhment. * 2. Another exception there is to this Rule, for when the preceptive or prohibitive clauſes are reduplicated directly or by ſome ſolemn appendage, it is preſumed that the conſcience is highly bound. Such as are [We ſtrictly charge and command, we command in the vertue of obedience, upon your duty and allegeance, upon my bleſſing, as you will anſwer it at the dreadful day of Judgement, upon your oath, and ſuch like] And here the reaſon is plain, becauſe the Superiour calls in to his aid the intereſt of ſome other vertue beſides the obedience; as juſtice or veracity, hope or fear, the helps of God immediately, or a proper appeal to ſome other great tie of conſcience.

21. 6. However the laws were eſtabliſhed, yet according as they goe off, or goe leſs, or fall into deſuetude or diſobligation, ſo the band of conſcience grows leſs, till it be quite eas'd by abrogation; for the law binding by its eſtabliſhment, and the conſcience being bound by the life of the law, as the law dies the conſcience is at eaſe: and by this Rule S. Paul largely proves the Chriſtian Churches not to be obliged in conſcience to obſerve the law of Moſes, in the ſeventh Chapter to the Romanes.

22. 7. The contempt of any law, be the matter never ſo trifling, be the Law-giver never ſo unconcerned, be the publick intereſt never ſo little, yet if it be law, and ſtill in force, is a great ſin, and lays a great load upon the conſcience. Contemptus in omni ſpecie mandatorum pari pondere gravis, & communiter damnabilis, ſaith S. Bernard, All contempt of laws, be the matter

little or great, is highly damnable; and the reaſon he ſubjoyns a while after, Convertit in crimen gravis rebellionis culpam levis tranſgreſſionis, Contempt makes the ſmalleſt tranſgreſſion become a great rebellion. Becauſe here it is not the violation of the law, but of the authority; not the decree, but the power is undervalued, and ever accuſes the Law-giver of want of wiſdome, or ſuppoſes him to have no power. This is that which in Leviticus is expreſs'd by [Si ſpreveritis mandata mea, & anima veſtra faſtidierit judicia mea] a contemning the commandement, and that your ſoul hate and loath the judgements. Such a thing as this, is a deletery to the whole Law, and tears the knot that ties the mantle upon the Princes ſhoulders: and this is acknowledged even by them who believe that humane Laws doe not oblige the conſcience; for they confeſs that the conſcience is at leaſt bound ſo farre that the law be not deſpis'd. Now then beſides that this Rule is eſtabliſhed not onely by its own reaſon but by conceſſion, there is this advantage to be made of it; That if the conſcience be bound ſo farre that the law be not deſpis'd, then the conſcience is bound ſo farre that the law be obeyed if it can; that is, that it be always obeyed, unleſs there be a competent and ſufficient or probable reaſon to the contrary. And therefore it is remarkable that God calls the not obeying of his laws, a deſpiſing and loathing them in their hearts: Si judicia mea exhorruerit anima veſtra, ita ut non faciatis, If your ſoul ſo hate my judgements that ye doe them not; that is properly to deſpiſe them: and ſo it is in humane Laws; he that breaks them without cauſe deſpiſes them, for nothing elſe does make him not to obey. For this is a certain rule, Cauſleſly and contemptuouſly are all one. If therefore the adverſaries in this Rule doe affirm that the conſcience is bound to obey, unleſs there be reaſon to the contrary, then we agree together, and both with truth; and if there be any difference afterwards, it is onely in aſſigning what reaſons and what cauſes are ſufficient. But if they mean that the conſcience is onely bound not to deſpiſe the law, but may break the law when there is no reaſon for it, and if ſhe does, commits no ſin againſt God; then by deſpiſing the law they muſt mean ſomething that no Grammar and no Lexicon ever underſtood, and that none deſpiſes the law but he that rails upon it, and reviles it, or reproaches the authority directly; for indirectly he reproaches the authority that deſpiſes the law, and he directly deſpiſes, that for no reaſon diſobeys it: for if for no reaſon, then it is contempt, for elſe there can be no account given of the omiſſion; and nothing is a greater contempt then to eſteem the law ſo inconſiderable as to be leſs then nothing. He that thinks it unlawful hath a reaſon, real or imaginary: but he that thinks it lawful, and yet will not obey, and hath no reaſon why he will not, does deſpiſe it infinitely. Some ſuppoſe that to break a law frequently or cuſtomarily is contempt: But to this I aſſent not, becauſe there may be a laſting reaſon why the law is by cuſtome broken: indeed, if there be no reaſon, then the greater the cuſtome is, the greater is the contempt; but if there be a reaſon, neither one omiſſion nor twenty can be criminal. But in this particular I like well what is ſaid by the Lawyers, Ex conſuetudine indici præſumptionem contemptus, licet ipſa contemptus non ſit. It is a very great preſumption that whoever frequently breaks the law does deſpiſe it: and upon him that does ſo, the burden of proving that he does not, by proving his reaſon, is incumbent.

Lev. 26. 15.

Gloſſ. in cap. Metropolitanum 2. quæſt. 7.

23. Theſe are the meaſures by which we ſhall account concerning the degrees of obligation of conſcience to obey humane Laws. The uſe of them is this, That beſides they are helps to alleviate the ſcruples or the doubts of conſcience concerning the greatneſs of a ſin in this inſtance, and in proportioning our repentance and amends; they are alſo of great uſe both in the judging concerning the reaſons of diſobeying, that is, whether the reaſon be weighty enough to outweigh the impreſs and intention of the law, and alſo of judging what inconvenience is to be ſuffer'd to preſerve our obedience reſpectively to any law.

24. It now remains that for the confirmation of the truth and explication of the ſenſe of this rule, the objections made be conſidered.

25. To the firſt I anſwer, That to ſuppoſe humane lawes to bind the Conſcience is ſo far from deveſting God of his royalty, that it does very much eſtabliſh it; for it is a part of his Royalty to bind the Conſcience, and therefore he that ſaies, that God does bind the Conſcience to obey humane laws, makes no intrenchment upon that. For although humane laws doe bind the Conſcience, yet it is not by vertue or formal energy of the civil power, but by the authority and power of God; the King and the Biſhop are but Chriſts deputies, and his power they exerciſe, by his power they rule, and to his Kingdome they miniſter. And therefore the civil power does not take cognizance of the Conſcience, nor pretend a compulſory over it; but God does, and does exerciſe it when he puniſhes the Soul eternally for contempt and rebellion againſt the Princes of the people.

26. To the ſecond, We are to conſider, that when it is ſaid that Humane lawes bind the Conſcience, the meaning is, it ties us to duty, and we are guilty before God if we doe not obey man: and Conſcience is not here taken in the phyſical or natural ſenſe, for a practical underſtanding alone, but for the whole mind of man informed and commanded by God; in which mind one of the Principles or laws of God written there is, that we ſhould obey them that have the Rule over us: but beſides this, this whole argument is a plain paralogiſme; for it ſuppoſes that becauſe Humane laws are tied upon the Conſcience, that they are tied by man, not by God; which is againſt the true ſtate of the Queſtion: therefore if Conſcience were wholly a habit or an act, or the faculty of underſtanding, and conſequently in this laſt caſe ſubject to God alone who is truth, yet the truth remains unharm'd, for it is not man that rules in the Conſcience, but God who commands it to obey man, for fear of Gods diſpleaſure. Humane laws are but the material part in this obligation; the authoritity and command of God give it life & force upon the Conſcience: it is like the body prepar'd by the Father of the Country, into which God inſpires a living and an operative principle.

27. To the third the anſwer is eaſy and ſhort: for granting all that is ſaid, it not being material to the preſent inquiry whether it be true or no; it is a part of Chriſtian liberty that the Conſcience be ſervant to none but Chriſt, and whatever be the matter of humane laws, if it be not alſo the matter of a Divine law, the Conſcience is free from that matter of it ſelf, becauſe God being onely the Lord of Conſcience, and he not having by his law eſtabliſhed that matter, the Conſcience is free as to that matter. But then when a juſt authority ſupervening hath made a law in that matter, though the Conſcience was free from that matter, yet it is not free from that authority: not that the Conſcience is a ſubject of that authority immediately, mediately and ultimately, but becauſe God hath ſubjected it, and commanded it to obey.

Of Chriſtian Liberty.

28. But for the fuller ſatisfaction of Conſcience in this great article, it will not be amiſs to give a full, but ſhort account of the nature and pretences of Chriſtian liberty. In order to which S. Peter explicates this article moſt excellently, ſaying, Be ſubject to every ordinance of man διὰ τὸν Κύριον, for the Lord, that is, for his Commandement, and for the intereſt of his Kingdome, * and his power and his glory: for it is a portion of his kingdome, it is the deputation of his power; and he is glorified by our obedience, when the princes of the world by ſeeing our ready ſubjection have no cauſe to ſpeak evil of us; which was the very argument which the * Apoſtle uſes in this queſtion. And therefore S. Peter, who in this inquiry takes notice of our liberty, gives expreſs caution, that though we be free from many fetters and hard ſervices, yet we ſhould not pretend Chriſtian liberty as a cover for ſedition and rebellion and diſobedience, which he ſignally calls κακία, we render it malicioufneſs: and if it be us'd to expreſs the effects and evil conſequents, it is very well; but it relating here to the principle of the miſchief, it is better rendred, * Craftineſs, μὴ ἐπικάλυμμα ἔχοντες τῆς κακίας ἐλευθερίαν, not making this Chriſtian liberty a pretence and cover for your Craftineſs: for they well knew the artifices of the Devil, and that he would endeavour to aliene the hearts of ſubjects from their Princes upon pretence of Chriſtian liberty, and of heathen Princes from Chriſtianity upon ſuppoſition it was no friend to government; and ſo it fel out in the Gnoſticks and Valentinians: but againſt theſe evils the Apoſtles by the Spirit of God and the doctrine of the Goſpel made excellent proviſions. For as S. Peter ſo alſo S. Paul us'd the ſame caution in this article: for having preſs'd upon the Galatians to inſiſt upon their Chriſtian liberty, and not to be brought under the yoak of Moſes, leſt they ſhould ſtumble at the name of liberty, he charges them not to abuſe it, not to extend it beyond its proper limit, not to uſe it as an occaſion to the fleſh; and that it may be manifeſt where it was he intended to fix his rule, he inſtances in the matter of government, adding by way of explication, By love ſerve one another: that is, though you Chriſtians be all free, yet there is a bond of charity, by which you are tied to the rules of government and ſervice and ſubordination; in theſe things if you pretend your liberty, it will be but an occaſion to the fleſh, and a diſhonour to the Spirit. For our liberty is not a Carnal liberty, but it is a ſpiritual. If a ſlave be called to Chriſtianity, he is the Lords freed-man, but not Mans, he is ſtill a ſervant and commanded to abide in it, if in that ſtate he be called. And it is an excellent Rule which is given by Calvin in this particular, We ought to account that by Chriſtian liberty there is nothing gotten to us before men, but onely before God. And it is a horrible folly which abuſes ſome men, they think that they looſe their liberty unleſs they get poſſeſſion of it by doing againſt that part which is forbidden: not conſidering that if the matter be indifferent, then they may as well doe that which is by man commanded, as doe the contrary, they are as free to one as to the other; and therefore for civility, and for government, and for order, and for humanity ſake, ſince they muſt uſe their liberty one way, let them doe it that way which will at leaſt pleaſe God as well, and Man better. And for their Chriſtian liberty, that is in the Spirit, and they need no other teſtimony but the Conſcience it ſelf: for the Conſcience in this alſo is a thouſand witneſſes. And therefore truly and plainly the liberty that the Apoſtles ſpeak of is but a freedome from the dominion of ſin, and a freedome from the terrors and obligation of the Law: the firſt is a freedome of duty, the ſecond a freedome of priviledge; the firſt is a Commandement, the ſecond a ſtate of advantage; that is but a working, this is completed; that is deſign'd by Chriſt, this already wrought, and is the effect of Chriſts death, while the other is the product of his Spirit, and the buſineſs of the Kingdome of Grace. But let us ſee what is the proper and explicite effect of all this.

1. It is true that we are freed from ſin, that is, we are aſſerted into the liberty of grace and pardon; the band of ſin is broken, and we may be reſcued from the power and from the puniſhment of it: and what then? S. James anſwers this inquiry, Whoſo looketh into the perfect law of liberty, muſt be a doer of the work, that is, of the righteouſneſs evangelical; and this man ſhall be bleſſed in his deed. For it is Chriſt who hath ſet us free; but yet be ſervants of Chriſt: his Spirit hath made us free, and aſſerted us into the glorious liberty of the Sons of God; therefore we are debters, not to the fleſh, to live after the fleſh, but we muſt live a ſpiritual life, for to doe ſo is to perſiſt in our liberty; it is entring upon that poſſeſſion which God hath given us: but this is like the gift given to the ſons of Iſrael; all the land of Canaan was their portion, but they were to fight for it, and win it by degrees; but it was long before they were in quiet poſſeſſion, and ſo ſhall we when we are in the land of promiſe.

Rom. 8. 12.

2. It is alſo true that we are freed from the curſe of the law and the Spirit of bondage or ſervile fear, which was produc'd by the curſes threatned to every tranſgreſſor without the abatements of infirmity & the allowances of repentance; and we are adopted into a liberty of the ſons of God, we can cry Abba Father, and God will uſe us not with the ſevere rights of a Lord, but with the ſweeteſt meaſures of a Fathers government. And what then? what is the effect of this liberty? By the Spirit of God we cry Abba Father, by him we have this liberty, therefore we muſt live in the Spirit: for though we be not under fear, yet we are under love; we are not under the curſe of the Law, yet we are under the duty; not under the coercive power of the firſt covenant, yet under the directive power of the Eternal Commandement. For the Spirit of God makes us ſons, yet none are ſons but ſuch as are led by the Spirit; and we are freed from the curſe and condemnation of the law, but not unleſs we walk not after the Fleſh, but after the Spirit.

Rom. 8. 1, & 14.

3. It is alſo true that we are freed from the ceremonial Law, the law of circumciſion, of meats and drinks and carnal ordinances. And what then? uſe it charitably, and take heed leſt this liberty of yours become a ſtumbling-block to them that are weak. Some there are that extend this to a liberty from all things that are indifferent, as meats and garments, and daies, and ceremonies and the like. Now if they mean that we are not bound to theſe things by any law of God under the Goſpel, it is very true; that is, Chriſt gave us no Commandement concerning them. But if it be meant that theſe things are left ſo free that there can be no accidental and temporary obligation, rule or limit made concerning them, this is that I am now diſputing againſt. But that this is no part of Chriſtian liberty purchas'd by the blood of Chriſt, is evident, becauſe things in their nature indifferent, that is, concerning which there was no Commandement given, were alwaies free, and to say otherwise were a contradiction in the terms; and no drop of Christs blood could so vainly fall as to purchase for us what was done already by the nature of the thing. He onely rescinded the Laws of Moses concerning the instances commanded there; that is, those which were not indifferent, as being positively commanded, he return'd to their own nature, to be us'd in another dispensation, to be dispos'd of in another government, in a distinct manner, to other purposes, or (as occasion should serve) to be wholly let alone. But although Christ broke the yoke of Moses, and so left the instances and matters there us'd to their own indifference; yet he left it as indifferent to the Law-givers to make laws concerning them; for he gave no commandement that they should always be left indifferent as to external usages. Under Moses they were tied upon the conscience by God himself, and therefore unchangeably during that whole period; but now they are left to a temporary transient use and ministery, to doe good, or to promote order, or to combine government: and if Governors had not a freedome to use them in government, as well as private persons to use them if they would in their own persons, Christian liberty had been made for Subjects, and denied to Christian Princes and Christian Priests.

4. There is yet another liberty called the liberty of glory, or the glorious liberty of the children of God; that is, the Redemption of our bodies from disease and pain, from death and corruption: but for this we must stay till the last adoption: For what Christ is by generation and proper inheritance, that we shall be by adoption if we belong to him. Now of Christ in his Resurrection it was said, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. That was the last generation or right of Sonship, to which when we are adopted we shall be partakers of the glory; but that was at Christs Resurrection, and this shall be in ours. Rom. 8. 21. Acts 13. 33.

5. Now here being in the days of the Apostles so much talk of liberty, and that in so many instances, and (without question) made the subject of many Sermons, and much Table-talk, and many disputes, and us'd as an argument to perswade strangers, and to comfort the faithful, and the Devil being so ready to make use of any prepared lust, or mistake, or ignorance, or fancy; it could not be but many weak and many false persons did instantly dream of a temporal liberty, that Sons were free from the laws of Parents, Wives of Husbands, Servants of Masters, Subjects of Princes: the Apostles knowing how great a confusion this would be to all relations and states of men, and what an infinite reproach it would be to the Religion, stopt this avenue of mischief, and not onely dogmatically describ'd the duties of all inferiours, but took care also to doe it in those places where they had occasion to speak of Christian liberty, that there might be no pretence to doe evil. For Christianity neither could nor ought to have been received, if the Preachers of it had destroyed Governments. The effect of this discourse is plainly this, That Christian liberty does not warrant disobedience to humane Laws, or liberty from their obligation. Whereas therefore the Apostle says, Ye are bought with a price, be not ye the servants of men; it is not to be understood of the conscience or mind of men, as the objection affirms, but onely is an advice of prudence, to the purpose of the preceding words in the 21. verse, If thou mayest be made free, use it rather: that is, since it is more convenient for the advantages of Religion, and the service of Christ, by the price of whose blood you are 1 Cor. 7. 23.

redeemed that ye may ſerve him all your days, therefore you who are free, be not eaſy to give or part with your liberty, but uſe your ſtate of liberty for the advantage of the ſervice of Chriſt; for that nothing elſe is meant, appears in the words he immediately ſubjoyns, Brethren, let every man wherein he is called, therein abide with God: that is, your being the ſervants of men is not inconſiſtent with your ſervice of God, nor that ſervitude incompoſſible with Chriſtian liberty. But yet ſuppoſe that the interpretation us'd in the objection be right, and that, Be not ye the ſervants of men, is to be underſtood of the conſcience or mind of man; yet, ſave onely that it was not ſo intended by the Apoſtle, it can doe no harm to this Queſtion: for the underſtanding and the mind may be free, when the hands are tied, and a man may have the liberty of opining and judging, when he may not have the liberty of acting, which is all is pretended to by the Empire of humane Laws. For as Origen excellently, This is nothing but an intellectual liberty, concerning which let a man contend in an intellectual and Evangelical manner, that is, by good arguments and the ſpirit of meekneſs, and there is no harm done. This is the whole ſumme of the doctrine of Chriſtian liberty. Concerning which if any man deſire to reade more words, and longer diſcourſes, and ſome intrigues, he may pleaſe to ſee them in Driedo, who hath written three Books, and Belliolanus, who hath written twenty Books of Chriſtian liberty.

Vide etiam Franciſci de Silveſtris opuſculum de Evangelica libertate.

29. To the fourth I have already anſwered both in the beginning and end of the anſwer to the former, and it proves nothing but what is granted. For to uſe the ſame inſtance; You may faſt when you are commanded by your Superiour, but you muſt not think that faſting is a part of the Divine Service. It is true, it is no part of Divine Service, the faſting of it ſelf is not, but the faſting in obedience is. For though man commands faſting now, or ſo, and God does not, yet God commands that we ſhould obey thoſe commands of men; and then the conſcience is συνείδησις Θεοῦ, the conſcience of God, or toward God, it is his ſubject and ſervant, and his liegeman: and yet at the ſame time the law of man pretends not to rule the conſcience immediately, and therefore the conſcience is free, and may judge the thing of it ſelf to be no Divine Commandement; but the will is not free, and the duty is bound upon that, when the underſtanding is at liberty. Errat enim ſi quis putat ſervitutem in totum hominem deſcendere; pars enim melior excepta eſt. Corpora obnoxia ſunt, & adſcripta Dominis, mens ſui juris eſt, ſaid Seneca, and from him Aquinas. The whole man is not in ſubjection; the body indeed is under Lords and Laws, but the mind is free as aire.

If a man have but a right underſtanding that it is all one before God to eat fleſh or egges, milk or fiſh; that to him it matters not whether you wear a red or a white garment in your times of ſolemn prayer; this is enough, ſays Calvin [lib. 3. cap. 19. §. 10. inſtit.] he need not tie himſelf to either, but if he does, his conſcience is ſtill free, though his action or choice be determined. And ſo it is though the law of his Superiour determines him.

De benefic. 3. 2. 2x q. 104. art. 5.

30. To the fifth I anſwer, by denying the conſequence of the argument. For though humane Laws doe bind the conſcience, yet it follows not that it is put into the power of man to ſave or damne his brother; becauſe humane Laws bind the conſcience, but not by force of humane authority preciſely, or in it ſelf, but by virtue of the Divine Commandement: and therefore a Prince cannot make a law and threaten damnation to the breakers of it, becauſe he cannot inflict it; but he may ſay, that he that breaks it will ſin againſt God, and God will inflict damnation upon the rebellious and diſobedient. But then whereas it is objected that this makes the broad way way to hell broader, it is a meer ſcar-crow; for God onely can inlarge or ſtreighten this way efficiently and formally; but objectivè & occaſionaliter, by way of inſtance and occaſion, by giving new laws to endear obedience in new inſtances when it is for the publick good, hath in it no inconvenience: every Miniſter of the Word and Sacraments, by every invitation of his people to a more ſtrict Religion, does make the damnation of the diſobedient greater, and by every check of conſcience, and by every opinion of our own we become a law unto our ſelves, and make the way of our converſation narrower; and every offer of grace, and every call of the Spirit does adde moments to the eternal miſery of them that doe reſiſt; and yet it were not well to be without them, for fear of that accidental evil. For it is to be conſidered that theſe aids, and all good Laws are intended for good to us, and will bring good to us if we obey; but the very reward it ſelf being offered, makes alſo our puniſhment juſt and reaſonable if we refuſe. Ex te tua perditio. The Law is not in fault, but the rebellious man ruines himſelf, who by occaſion of the Law might have receiv'd an increaſe of glory if he had pleas'd.

31. To the ſixth the anſwer is given in the premiſſes: Humane authority does not make the action of diſobedience to be a ſin. It makes that the not compliance of the Subject is diſobedience; but it is the authority of God who makes diſobedience to be a ſin: and though no humane power can give or take grace away; yet we may remember that we our ſelves throw away Gods grace, or abuſe it, or neglect it, when we will not make uſe of it to the purpoſes of humility, charity and obedience, all which are concerned in our ſubordination to the Laws.

32. The ſeventh objection hath two parts; the one concerns the civil power, the other the power Eccleſiaſtical. Concerning the civil, it is affirm'd to be unreaſonable that the power which cannot remit ſins ſhould bind to ſin; & therefore the civil power cannot bind the conſcience, becauſe it cannot remit the ſin to which it binds. In which argument there are four terms, and therefore it is a perfect fallacy. For it is true that it is reaſonable that the power which binds ſhould alſo looſe: but that the civil power cannot looſe in the ſame ſenſe in which it can bind is falſe; for the civil power can untie that which it hath tied, unleſs by tying be meant tying to one thing, and looſing be meant of another. The civil power binds to obey; the ſame power can untie this band, by diſpenſing with the perſon or abrogating the Law. But when it is ſaid, the civil power cannot remit the ſin, therefore not bind to ſin, it is a Sophiſm, becauſe binding and looſing doe not ſignify in the ſame manner. For it does but accidentally bind to ſin, and in the ſame manner it does alſo eaſe the conſcience: it makes the Law to which God binds the conſcience; it takes off the Law, and from the conſcience God takes off the obligation. But becauſe it does not by it ſelf bind the conſcience, but occaſions the conſcience to be bound by God, therefore it hath nothing to doe to remit the ſin, for that muſt be the act of God; but the Law can looſe what it bound, and where it bound, and as it bound, that is, not the ſin, but the ſubject matter, the inſtance and the occaſion.  But now concerning the Eccleſiaſtical power, the objection ſays that it hath no power to make Laws, but ſuch as are in the matter already decreed by God; and therefore it does not bind but what God hath bound already; and conſequently hath of it ſelf no power to bind the the conſcience. To this I anſwer, 1. that it is true, neither the Eccleſiaſtical nor the Civil power does by its innate authority oblige the conſcience; but both powers can make Laws, to the obſervation of which God doth oblige conſcience. 2. It is an error to ſay that the Eccleſiaſtick power cannot make laws in things not decreed by God. For the ſupreme Civil power is alſo Eccleſiaſtical if it be Chriſtian, and hath a power in the external regiment of the Church; and therefore to make Laws in ſuch parts and accidents of Government in which God hath left no ſpecial direction: and for the proper power of the Eccleſiaſticks, that alſo extends beyond the giving commandements in matters of expreſs duty commanded by God; as I ſhall make appear in its own place. 3. If it were granted that the Church could not make Laws in things not decreed by God, yet when God hath decreed the thing, the Church can make Laws concerning the order of the things, the meaſure and the manner, the number and the weight, the adjuncts and the circumſtances; and that's a field large enough for her to make Laws to oblige the conſcience. And therefore although it were ridiculous and contemptible, injurious and uncharitable for the Church to paſs her greateſt cenſures upon perſons that tranſgreſs bono animo, or through unavoidable infirmity, in ſmall inconſiderable inſtances, circumſtances and unconcerning forms of law and unconſider'd ceremonies; yet the ſmalleſt thing may be plac'd ſo as to be of great concernment; and when theſe things accidentally become great, the cenſures of the Church may be prudently and charitably inflicted. But what power the Church hath in making Laws will afterwards be conſidered in its place; thus much was of preſent neceſſity for the anſwer of the objection.

33. To the laſt there might be many anſwers given, It may ſuffice that the argument is expreſly falſe; for ſuppoſing that humane Laws doe directly bind the conſcience, it does not follow that it is as great a ſin to break the Laws of Man, as to violate the Laws of God: that it is a ſin it does follow, but not that it is ſo great. For the law of God againſt idle words does oblige the conſcience, but it does not therefore follow that it is as great a ſin to talk idly as to kill a man. But this Sophiſm relies upon this falſe ſuppoſition, That all things that bind the conſcience doe bind in the ſame degree, to the ſame meaſures of iniquity. For if they doe not, then humane Lawes may bind the conſcience, and yet they may be broken at an eaſier rate then the Commandements of God. 2. But then I adde, that this is according to the ſubject matter, and the evil conſequent of the action. For ſuppoſe a Prince oppreſſed by a Rebel party, as Pompey was by Caſar; Photinus that told the King of Egypt where he lay hid did a greater fault then if he had rail'd upon Pompey, expreſly againſt the Commandement, thou ſhalt not ſpeak evil of the Ruler of the people. To open the ſecrets of a King may be a greater ſin, and doe more miſchief, and proceed from greater malice then to call my brother Fool. For a Souldier to deſert his ſtation may be a greater crime then to ſteal a ſhilling. 3. And yet it cannot be denied, but that there is great difference between the Laws of God and the Laws of Man in their obligation. Concerning which, in order to many caſes of conſcience, it is fit that I give account.

The

The difference of Divine and Humane laws in their obligation.

34. 1. The law of God binds the Conſcience immediately, and by the right of God; the law of man binds the Conſcience mediately, and by the interpoſition of the Divine authority: ſo that we muſt obey Man for Gods ſake, and God for his own.

35. 2. The laws of God bind the will and the underſtanding; that is, we are bound to obey, and bound to think them good. But humane laws meddle not with the underſtanding; for that's a Prince, and can be governed as he can be perſwaded, but ſubject to the empire of none but God: but the will is the ſubject of humane laws; not onely that the will be bound to command the inferior faculties and members to obey and doe the work of the law, but of it ſelf preciſely it is bound: for it is not enough that we doe the outward works, but the will muſt be of it ſelf obedient. Whatſoever ye doe, doe it heartily, ἐκ ψυχῆς ἐργάζεσθε, doe it from your very Soul; that is, cheerfully, willingly, without murmuring: ὡς τῷ Κυρίῳ, καὶ οὐκ ἀνθρώποις, for ye doe it not to men, but to the Lord. Col. 3. 23.

36. 3. The Divine laws are laſting and perpetual; but humane laws ceaſe to bind the conſcience, by deſuetude, by contraition, by contrary reaſon, by intolerable inconvenience, by diſpenſation, and laſtly by abrogation.

37. 4. Divine laws oblige the Conſcience not only to an active obedience, but to activity and earneſtneſs to doe them, to ſeek opportunities, to omit none to doe them preſently. Humane laws oblige to an active obedience, but not to a ſpontaneous offer, and ultroneous ſeeking of opportunities. It may be a ſin, it is alwaies an infirmity, to ſeek for excuſes and diſpenſations in Divine laws; but it is lawful by all fair means to ſeek to be freed from the band of any humane law that is not of publick concernment, and is of private incommodity. A man may decline a burden of the law, or ſeek a priviledge and exemption. The Citizens of Rome were tied to keep guards in courſe, and doe other duties; but he that had three children, had a right of exemption; and he that hath none may lawfully deſire and petition for the priviledge. The burden of a humane law may be thruſt upon another, if it be done by juſt and charitable means; but in the laws of God every man muſt bear his own burden chuſingly and delightfully.

38. 5. Humane laws onely conſider the outward action, not the ſecret opinion; you muſt obey Man, when at the ſame time without ſin you may believe the law to be imprudent, or imperfect, or fit to be annull'd. But in the laws of God we muſt ſubmit our moſt ſecret thoughts, and we muſt be ſure ſo to obey humane laws, as we keep for God the prerogative of his: but though to God we muſt give account of our thoughts, yet humane laws meddle not with them at all. Cogitationis pœnam nemo meretur, ſaith the law, ff. de pœnis.

39. 6. Humane laws oblige onely that they be not deſpis'd, that is, that they be not tranſgreſſed without a reaſonable cauſe: but the laws of God muſt be obeyed in all caſes; and there is no cauſe to break them, and there can be no neceſſity upon us to commit a ſin. In the obedience to humane humane laws we may ſuppoſe there was a weakneſs in the Sanction, they could not foreſee the evil that was future, the inconveniences upon ſome men, the impoſſibilities of many, the intolerable burden upon others: and therefore although a reaſon is alwaies to be had when we doe not obey, and that a good one; yet the reaſon and the goodneſs of it is not to be the greateſt and the beſt, or to be exacted according to the ſtricteſt meaſures of neceſſity alone. For though the laws of God bind to obedience without diſpute, without diminution, without excuſe, and in all neceſſities and accidents that can ſupervene; yet beyond that which is good, that which is equal and probable and profitable, humane laws doe not bind: but of this in the ſequel.

40. 7. He that deſpiſes the law of God, dies for it; and he that neglects it is accounted to deſpiſe it: the not doing it is by interpretation a contempt of Gods law. He that deſpiſes humane laws, is alſo guilty before God: but he onely is accounted to deſpiſe it, that voluntarily and without reaſon diſobeys. But he that out of the multitude of other affairs, or an incurioufneſs of Spirit, unknowingly or ignorantly neglects it by not thinking of it, is in moſt caſes innocent before God; but is tied to ſubmit to the puniſhment if he be requir'd and deprehended. This onely is to be added, that a great and a diſſolute negligence even in humane laws is ſo far from excuſing the breach of the law, that it doubles the guilt: Diſſoluta negligentia prope dolum eſt, ſaith the law, ff. mandati, l. fidejuſſor, & ff. de action. & obligat. l. 1. §. Is quoque. A geat negligence is accounted malice.

41. 8. Ignorance of the laws of God excuſes no man, becauſe it is ſufficiently revealed to every man; and he is not onely bound to inquire much if there ſhould be need, but there is alſo ſo clear a communication of them, that a little inquiry will ſerve the turn, and therefore no man is here excus'd by ignorance. But in the laws of man ignorance is eaſier pleaded, and does more excuſe, and does unavoidably happen to many men in very many caſes; and they are leſs bound to inquire, and a leſs matter makes the ignorance probable and quit from malice: of all which a prudent and a good man is to be the Judge.

42. 9. When Divine and humane laws are oppos'd, theſe muſt alwaies yield to thoſe; and without diſpute God is to be obeyed rather then Man; and although we muſt obey Man for God, we muſt never obey Man againſt God: and therefore it was excellently counſell'd by Ben-Sirach, Let not the reverence of any man cauſe thee to ſin.

43. 10. As a conſequent to the former, all the Miniſters of Juſtice are bound to be more ſevere in exacting obedience to Gods laws then to their own in an equal or like matter; they muſt be eaſy in the matter of their own laws, and zealous for God: and this alſo does prove that where the effect, and the appendages and circumſtances doe not alter it, it is in the whole a leſs ſin to break a humane law then to break a Divine; that is, although both are ſins, yet in the nature of the action it is of a leſs degree of crime to break the law of our ſuperior then of our ſupreme, of Man then of God.

11. Divine

11. Divine laws are impos'd upon the people; but humane laws are
44. impos'd indeed, but commonly by their conſent, explicite or implicite, formal or interpretative, and without acceptation in a ſweet regiment may indeed, but are not uſually paſs'd into the ſanction and ſacredneſs of laws. For the civil government is not abſolute, and meer and ſupreme; but in ſome ſenſes, and to ſome purpoſes, and in ſome degrees, limited, conditional, precarious and mixt, full of need, and ſupported by them who are to be rul'd, who therefore are to be regarded. Vide Rule 6. of this chapter.

12. Some adde this; the Divine laws bind both in publick and in private, the humane in publick onely: that is, becauſe humane laws take no cogniſance of what is ſecret, therefore neither doe they of themſelves bind in ſecret. But this although in ſpeculation it hath ſome truth, yet when it is reduc'd to practice, the conſideration is different. For though Mans laws know not what is in ſecret, & therefore cannot judge; yet God, that binds humane laws upon our conſciences, knows the moſt ſecret breach of laws, and he judges and diſcerns. But this hath ſome difficulties in it, and many very material conſiderations, & therefore is to be diſtinctly handled in ſome of the following pages. This onely for the preſent. When in private we can be excus'd or innocent before God; in that private, & in thoſe circumſtances humane laws oblige not. But Gods laws equally oblige both in publick and private, reſpectively to the ſubject matter. Of themſelves humane laws have nothing to doe with private actions; that is, neither with the obligation, nor the notice. Rule 4. of this chapter.

45. There are many other material differences between the laws of God and man, as to their obligation upon Conſcience; which I ſhall afterwards explicate upon the occaſion of particular rules. The great ſumme of all is this, ſo far as relates to Conſcience; the law of God binds ſtronger, and in more caſes then humane laws. A breach of a humane law is not ſo great a ſin, nor is it ſo often a ſin, as a breach of the Divine; the advantage both in the extenſion and the intenſion being (as there is all reaſon it ſhould) on the part of God; that God who is in all, may be above all.

46. Thus they differ, but in order to the verification of the Rule, it is to be remembred that in the main obligation of Conſcience they doe agree. The Divine law places things in the order of vertue and vice; and the Sacraments are therefore good becauſe they are appointed by Chriſt, our great Law-giver, and in the old law the eating of ſwines fleſh was therefore evil becauſe it was forbidden by the law of God. For all the goodneſs of Mans will conſiſts in a conformity to the will of God, which is the great rule and meaſure of humane actions. And juſt ſo it is in humane laws according to their proportion and degree: when the law of the Church commands faſting, to doe ſo then is an act of temperance as well as of obedience, and to diſobey is gluttony; and to wear cloth of gold is luxury when the law commands us to wear plain broad cloth. To give great gifts at marriages and feaſts may be magnificence; but if the law limits to a certain ſumme, to goe beyond is pride and prodigality. This is the work of God, though by the hands of Moſes & Aaron: for it matters not by what means he effects his own purpoſes; by himſelf, or by his power adminiſtred by ſecond cauſes. The ſumme is this, which I repreſent in the words of S. Gregory Nazianzen, Submittamus nos tum Deo, tum aliis, tum iis qui Imperium in terra gerunt: Deo quidem omnibus de cauſis; alii autem aliis propter charitatis fœdus, principibus denique propter ordinem; publicæque diſciplinæ rationem. Let us ſubmit our ſelves to God, to one another, and to Orat. 17.

Princes: to God for all the reaſon in the world; to one another for charity's ſake; to Princes for order's ſake, and the account of publick Government. But if we refuſe to obey Men, God will puniſh us; and if we refuſe to obey God, even the Prince ought to puniſh us; and both promote the intereſts of the ſame Kingdome. Rule II.

Humane laws doe not oblige the Conſcience to an active obedience, when there is an imminent danger of death, or an intolerable, or very grievous evil in the obedience.

1. This Rule is to be underſtood to be true regularly and ordinarily, and in laws purely humane; that is, ſuch which are not commentaries or defenſatives of a natural and a Divine law. For if the forbidden action have in it any thing that is intrinſecally evil, then the action muſt not be done, though to ſave our lives: for no ſin ought to be the price of our life, and we ought not to exchange an eternal life for a temporal. Here our Bleſſed Saviour's words are plain, Fear not them which can kill the body; and what profit have you, if you gain the whole world and looſe your own ſoule? and it is better to goe into life maimed and blind, then having two feet or two eyes to goe into hell fire; and God is to be obeyed rather then man; and he that would ſave his life ſhall looſe it; and divers others to the ſame purpoſe. Now when any thing of this nature is the ſubject matter of a humane law directly, or if the violation of any thing of a Divine Commandement be the conſequent of the breach of a humane law, then the humane law binds to its obſervation though with the loſs of our lives.

2. But the queſtion here is concerning meer humane laws eſtabliſhed in an indifferent matter; and in this it is that the Rule affirms that humane laws doe not bind to their obſervation with the danger of life. The reaſons are theſe,

3. 1. Becauſe the end of ſuch laws is onely the good and convenience of the lives of the Citizens. Omnibus à natura bene informatis inſitum eſſe ut nemini nemini parere velint, niſi utilitatis cauſa & legitimè imperanti, ſaid Cicero, Lib. 1. Offic. Nature her ſelf teaches all wiſe men to obey Princes that govern by laws, and for the good of their Subjects. They therefore being wholly made to miniſter to the circumſtances of life, muſt not by our lives be miniſtred unto; nothing being more unnatural and unreaſonable then that a man ſhould be tied to part with his life for his convenience onely. It is not worth it, it is like burning a mans houſe to roſt his egges.

4. 2. Eye for eye, and tooth for tooth, and all that a man hath he will give for his life: it is indeed the voice of nature and of this world, there is no capacity to receive any good when our life is gone; and therefore nothing of this world can make a man recompence for his life. That Law therefore that pretends to doe advantages to our life, if it ſhall alſo require our life for the ſecuring ſuch advantages, takes away more good then it pretends to give, and makes the ſubſtance leſs principal then the acceſſary.

5. 3. If humane Laws doe admit of equity (as it is confeſſed by all men) there is no caſe ſo favourable as that of ſaving of our life: either then we are to ſuppoſe the Laws to be made of a rock, and to yeeld to nothing, but for ever to be a killing letter, and an inſtrument of the hardeſt bondage; or elſe at leaſt to be ſo compliant as to yeeld to her Citizens in the caſe of life and death.

6. 4. All humane power is given to man for his good, not for his hurt; for edification, not for deſtruction. But it very often happens, and it is ſo in moſt laws that are meerly humane, that the good of the particular law is not ſo great as the ſaving the life of one man; and if ſuch laws ſhould not yeeld to the preſervation of ſo precious a life, it were a law made for evil and not for good, a ſnare and no defence, an enemy and no guardian or friend.

7. 5. Neceſſity is the band, and neceſſity is the ſolution of a law. Neceſſitas facit licitum quod aliàs licitum non eſt, ſaith Alexander ad l. ſi ex toto, ff. de legibus. To the ſame purpoſe is that of Seneca, Neceſſitas magnum humanæ imbecillitatis patrocinium, quicquid cogit, excuſat, Neceſſity makes every thing lawful to which it does compel. But of all neceſſities that is the greateſt which is the ſafety of our lives, and a reſcue from death: this caſe therefore is greater then the band of humane Laws.

8. 6. The laws of God in precepts purely affirmative doe not oblige to an actual obedience in the danger of death. That is, in ſuch poſitive laws of God which doe not involve a negative, of an intrinſick malice againſt a law of nature or of prime rectitude, the laws of God intend not to oblige, when death ſhall be the reward of him that does obey. Thus the Maccabees brake the reſt of the Sabbath to defend themſelves againſt their enemies; and the Prieſts for the uſes of Religion, and the Diſciples of Chriſt to ſatisfy their hunger; and Chriſt was their Advocate. Thus David and his followers did eat the Shew-bread expreſly againſt the commandement, but it was in his great need; and Chriſt alſo was his Advocate and defended the fact: and if a probable neceſſity, that is a great charity and relief, which is but the avenue and the addreſs of an extreme neceſſity, be a ſufficient excuſe from the actual obſervation of a law of God, poſitive and affirmative, much more ſhall an extreme neceſſity excuſe from ſuch a law, and therefore yet more ſtrongly does it conclude againſt the preſſure of a humane law in ſuch caſes. And therefore the Church hath declared that the Eccleſiaſtical laws of faſting doe not oblige in caſe of ſickneſs or old age, or journey and great laſſitude, cap. conſilium de obſervatione jejunii: and thus alſo no man is bound to goe to Church on a feſtival to hear Divine Service when an enemy lies in wait to kill him: that is, the laws of the Church were intended for the good of the ſoul, and therefore not ſuffer'd to doe hurt to the body; and as God affirms he will have mercy and not ſacrifice, and therefore himſelf makes his own laws, that can yeeld at all, to yeeld to the occaſions and calls of mercy: ſo does the Church in the imitation of God, whoſe laws and gentleneſs is our beſt meaſure; not that every little excuſe and trifling pretence can excuſe, but the danger of death, or ſickneſs, or ſome very great evil reaſonably fear'd; of which I ſhall by and by give an account.

9. Although the Rule thus underſtood be certain and evident for theſe reaſons, yet there are ſome adverſaria or ſeeming oppoſitions very fit to be conſidered; becauſe although they doe not evacuate the intent of the Rule, yet they give limit and further explication to it.

10. 1. Cajetan affirms every law that binds under pain of mortal ſin, does alſo bind to obedience though death attend it; and his reaſon is, becauſe we muſt rather die then commit a ſin: and therefore let the inſtance be what it will, if it ties to obedience by obliging the conſcience, it is a ſin to diſobey, and rather then ſin we muſt chuſe to die. 2. * And that no man ſhould queſtion the power of the Superiour in obliging to ſuffer death, we find by the practice and conſent of all the world that Princes can call their Subjects to battel, and command their Officers upon dangerous ſervices, and the Souldiers are bound not to deſert their ſtation; and the Maſter of the Ship was oblig'd to put to Sea in a ſtorm when Cæſar bade him. 3. * For ſince the law is intended for a publick good, the private intereſt (be it never ſo great) is not to be put in ballance againſt it. And therefore as it is in the Laws of God, and in the confeſſion of faith, the brave ſons of Eleazar did ſuffer death with torments rather then eat ſwines fleſh, and the Martyrs gave their lives in a willing ſacrifice rather then deny their faith: ſo in their proportion it muſt be in the laws of men, they muſt be kept up though we die for it. Melius eſt ut unus quàm Unitas, It is expedient that one man die for the people, one member for the whole body, rather one then the unity be diſſolv'd, and the community ruin'd.

11. To theſe things I anſwer, firſt, that the propoſition of Cajetan is not true in its latitude. For whatever binds to obedience under pain of ſin, does not intend to bind to obedience with the loſs of our life under ſin. It is true that we muſt rather die then ſin; but we doe not ſin in not obeying, when he that obeys ſhall die for it; and that being the queſtion ought not to be preſum'd by any opponent in prejudice of truth or probability. Humane laws bind to obedience, and Gods law annexes the penalty of ſin; but then Gods law coming in to ſecond mans law, ſeconds it but in what it would oblige. But humane Laws doe not intend, regularly and in all caſes to be obeyed with the loſs of life or limb; and when the Law does not ſufficiently expreſs ſuch intention, we are to preſume for liberty liberty and mercy. * Now that which follows is true in ſome ſenſe; the publick is to be preferr'd before the private, and the ſupreme power can oblige the Subjects to ſuffer death or to venture their lives: but this cannot be in all caſes. For if in all, then is the Magiſtrate the Lord of life and death, which is Gods peculiar; but if he could in no caſe, then he were not the miniſter of life and death, which is communicated to the Magiſtrate. The inquiry therefore now is, ſince regularly he cannot, and yet extraordinarily the ſupreme power can tie on his laws upon our ſhoulders with the cords of death, in what caſes this is true, and in what it fails.

12. 1. When a Law is decreed by man with the appendage of a penalty of death for its ſanction, it can bind to obedience though death be in it. For ſince the matter of the law is by the Legiſlative power valued at the price of our lives, and by accident the very keeping of it as well as the breaking is ſet at no leſs price, the evils of either ſide being equal, the preſumption and advantage muſt be on the part of juſtice and the law, not for injuſtice, tyranny and diſobedience. And ſo much the rather, becauſe that the obedience ſhould cauſe death is but rare and accidental, not foreſeen, but ſeldome happening; but the law threatning death to the diſobedient is a regular, conſtant, obſerved, and declared proviſion: and therefore that which is for good, and regularly is eſtabliſhed by the fear of death, is not to be put out of countenance by a contingent, rare and extraordinary fear, and which alſo is intended for evil; for which in this caſe there could be no proviſion, and therefore there ought to be no regard. But this holds onely in caſe that death on either ſide be equally certain; for if it be certain the obedient man ſhall die by the hand of a Tyrant, or an accident that is prepar'd, and it be likely he may eſcape from the hands of the law by concealment, or by the relief of equity or charity, then the natural right of ſelf-preſervation will be his apology; this man deſpiſes not the law, but extricates himſelf as well as he can, and for a reaſon, which of all conſiderations meerly humane is the greateſt.

13. 2. When the Tyrant power threatens death to obedient Subjects, for no other end but that the Subject ſhould contemn the law, then the Superiour can oblige us to obedience though we die for it. For it is in this as in thoſe poſitive and affirmative laws of God, which although they yeeld to ſave the Subjects life, yet they will never yeeld in the corruption of the Subjects manners: that is, they yeeld in charity, but not to ſerve a Tyrants luſt. And thus we underſtand the reaſon of the difference between the ceſſion of the law of the Sabbath in the caſe of the Maccabees, and the not ceſſion of the prohibition of ſwines-fleſh in the caſe of the Jewiſh ſubjects. For the fear of death was equal to them both: if the Princes did not fight upon the Sabbath, they ſhould be cut in pieces; and if the Subjects did not eat ſwines-fleſh, they ſhould die with torments. But they preſerv'd themſelves, and theſe did not, and both were innocent. The reaſon of the difference is plainly this; They that offer'd ſwines-fleſh to theſe did it as enemies of the Religion; they that fought with thoſe upon the Sabbath did it as enemies of the Nation, onely they would take advantage by the prohibitions of the Religion. Now when death is threatned by the enemies of the Religion, it is with purpoſe to affront it, or deſtroy it; and therefore if the Mother and her ſeven ſons had complied, it had been a renouncing of their faith and their religion, and a contempt of their law; which could not be ſuppoſed in the other caſe of the Princes, not onely becauſe both the Princes and the Army could not be ſuppoſed to be deſpiſers of the law, but alſo becauſe that very breaking of the law, was with fighting in the defence of the law and the whole Nation. And ſo it is in humane Laws: The ſacredneſs of the Authority may be eſtabliſhed with our life; and becauſe to contemn them is always a ſin, we muſt rather die then doe it, though the matter of it ſelf be leſs and doe not require it. But this is alſo to be limited. For it is true that we muſt rather die then contemn the laws, but yet he that breaks them for no other reaſon then to ſave his life, is not a contemner of the law, for he hath great reaſon, and a great neceſſity; and therefore it is not contempt, but is to be preſum'd the contrary, therefore this is to be underſtood, when

1. Either the law expreſly commands we ſhould die rather then break it. Or

2. Hath declar'd that in ſuch circumſtances to comply ſhall be a contempt by interpretation. Or

3. When it is notorious that it is ſo intended by the Tyrant power: and

4. The Law-giver expreſly requires our fortitude and reſiſtance; for unleſs it be in ſuch caſes, though the law can bind, yet it does not. The ſumme is this; when death is likely to be the conſequent of obedience by accident and the chance of things or the providence of God abſtractly, then it is not to be expounded to be contempt. Becauſe in ſuch caſes God tempts not. But when an enemy or a Tyrant power tempts with the fear of death, he does it in defiance of the law or the authority, and therefore here we muſt obey and die. And this diſtinction is very much to be regarded. For if a Prince or an Eccleſiaſtick Superiour make a Law, it is to be preſumed that they doe it not (for they have no intereſt to doe it) in deſpite of chance to binde to obedience in the danger of death: and therefore it is a rack of their power to extend it to ſuch a caſe. But they may have intereſt and publick neceſſity to exact this obedience when an oppoſite power threatens death, that they may deſtroy the Law.

14. 3. The ſame alſo is the caſe of [1] Scandal, or [2] injury to Religion, or [3] the Confeſſion of our faith, in all which caſes we are oblig'd to die rather then break a poſitive law of God or Man. And this is that which S. Auſtin ſaid, Satius eſt fame mori quam idolothytis veſci, It is better to dit with hunger, then to ſave our lives by eating things ſacrificed to idols. That is, when the ſo doing is an interpretative renunciation of our religion, or the laws of our Superiour forbidding it, or is a ſcandal to a weak brother. And this is it that S. Paul ſaid, I will eat no fleſh as long as the world ſtands rather then cauſe my brother to offend. But in this there is no difficulty.

Lib. de bono conjug. cap. 16.

15. 4. Humane Laws bind to their obſervation though with the danger of death, when that danger is either expreſly in the law, or in the matter and inſtance of it annexed to the obedience. Thus the ſupreme Power can command the Curates of ſouls to attend a Cure in the time of the Plague, to goe to Sea in a ſtorm, to ſtand in a breach for the defence of the Army. For in theſe caſes he that hath power to doe it, hath expreſly commanded it; and to undergoe the danger of death is of the ſubſtance of the action and obedience, and is neither beſides the intention nor the knowledge of the Law-giver: and therefore if the Law did not bind to obedience notwithſtanding the danger of death, it were no law at all. For to a Prince commanding commanding to goe to Sea in a ſtorm, it is in vain to ſay it is a ſtorm; and that Souldier is a fool that tells his General he is afraid to die, when he ſends him upon an honourable ſervice.

16. 5. But all theſe caſes are to be provided ſo that they be in gravi materia, that the cauſe be great, and the neceſſity urgent, and the publick good concerned, for mens lives are not to be jeſted away: and though Scipio Major had power to carry his three hundred brave fellows (that he ſo boaſted of in Sicily) to the African warre, yet he had no power to command them to run up the neighbouring Tower and leap headlong into the Sea for bravery and to ſhew his power.

17. 6. One thing more is to be added. In thoſe caſes in which humane Laws doe oblige even in the danger of death, they doe not oblige but for their whole portion; that is, when the whole end of the law is not deſtroyed or hazarded by the diſobedience, but that the caution and end of the law may be ſecur'd and obſerv'd in all or in the greateſt part; a man may then by not obſerving the law, ſave his own life and be innocent. And this is the rule of Aquinas, and it is very reaſonable, Quando eſt cauſa rationabilis, & non impeditur finis legis, non peccat mortaliter qui non obſervat legem, Upon a juſt cauſe a man may without a crime break a law, when by ſuch tranſgreſſion the end of the law is not hindred. As if a law be made that corn ſhall not be tranſported, becauſe of an imminent famine, and for the preſervation of the Citizens, if any man to ſave his life ſhall comply with an inevitable accident and neceſſity, and carry ſome abroad, his neceſſity is a juſt excuſe, becauſe he hath not deſtroyed the end of the law, ſince his proportion and lading cauſes no ſenſible detriment to the publick: and though every ſingle man muſt not pretend that his ſingle proportion will be no great matter (becauſe that is not ſufficient unleſs there be a great neceſſity to doe it;) yet when there is ſuch a neceſſity, it will ſuffice that he did it not but upon a violent need, and what he did was not a deſtruction to the end of the law; and his example cannot have any evil effect of it ſelf; for other men cannot ſay, Why may not I as well as he? Unleſs the neceſſity be as exemplary as the action, and unleſs they be in the like evident danger of death, they cannot pretend to the like impunity. They that are in no danger may not, but he that is may, when the Subjects ſafety can ſtand with the ſafety of the publick. For although the head may expoſe one member to loſs and amputation to preſerve the whole, yet when the whole can be ſafe without it, the member may preſerve it ſelf and refuſe to be cut off: and nothing is greater then the ſafety of a part, but the ſafety of the whole.

18. But the Rule affirms that not onely danger of death, but the avoyding of a very grievous and intolerable evil is ſufficient to excuſe diſobedience to humane Laws from being a ſin. But this is particularly to be conſidered in the following Rules.

Rule III.

The Laws of our Superiour that are not juſt and good, doe not oblige the Conſcience.

1. Laws are publick miſchiefs if they bind to injuſtice; and therefore to eſtabliſh any thing that is unjuſt or evil is againſt the nature of Laws, and the power of the Superiour, and the intendment of the Supreme. For God gives to no man power above or againſt himſelf.

Now a Law is unjuſt upon many defects.

2. 1. If it be made by an incompetent perſon, that is, one who hath no authority. Cajus and Sejus were fellow-ſervants to Ruricanus. Cajus commands Sejus to goe to plough. Sejus demands, quo jure? And he was in the right. Cajus was the wiſer man, and he was the older, and better imployed, but he was not his Lord. Par in parem imperium non habet, ſays the Law.

Clement. Exivi de Paradiſo, de verb. ſignif.

3. 2. If it be made in an incompetent and undue matter. When Saul commanded the man of Amalek, Sta ſuper me, & interfice me, Fall upon me and kill me; he was indeed a Prince, but in that matter he could make no law, and therefore was not to be obeyed. And the Ancients tell that when Mercury was accus'd for the murder of Argus, though he pleaded that he did it by the command of Jupiter, yet the Gods did not acquit him: and though Marc Anthony did worſe for his own revenge to kill Cicero, yet Pothinus did ill too when he kill'd the brave Pompey, though at the command of his Maſter Ptolemy.

Antoni tamen eſt pejor quàm cauſa Pothini;
Hic facinus Domino præſtitit, ille ſibi.

Anthony was infinitely to be condemn'd, and Pothinus not to be juſtified. And upon this account, every law made againſt Religion, or any thing of Divine ſanction and commandement, is void, and cannot oblige the conſcience. To which purpoſe who pleaſe, may read an excellent diſcourſe of S. Bernard in his ſeventh Epiſtle which is to Adam the Monk. Upon this account a Thief cannot begin a preſcription againſt the right of the juſt owner, becauſe his theft being againſt the law of God, cannot begin a juſt title by the laws of men. Thus although the laws * permit a man to poſſeſs what by an unjuſt price or bargain he hath acquir'd, yet becauſe this is unjuſt and uncharitable to deceive his neighbour, the injurious perſon is bound to reſtore, and is not indemnified before God by any warranty from the contrary civil law: Ye ſhall not lie, ſaith our Lord God, nor deceive every one his neighbour: and let no man defraud or circumvent his neighbour in bargaining, ſaith S. Paul. χρῆ τὴν ἀγορὰν ἀψευδῆναι, ſaid the old Attick law, from the voice of nature; which Cicero well renders, tollendum eſſe ex rebus contrahendis omne mendacium, no lie muſt at all be uſed in bargaining: and therefore the law of man to the contrary is invalid; though I ſuppoſe the civil Law intends onely to barre an action in the outward Court, but not to give warrant to the conſcience.

3. Humane

4. 3. Humane laws may be unjuſt when a juſt power in a competent matter paſſes on to exceſs, and goes beyond it's bounds. He that excommunicates one that is not of his Dioceſs does not oblige the excommunicate perſon by the ſentence: and Pilate had nothing to doe with the Holy Jeſus till Herod had ſent him back to him; for to his juriſdiction he did belong. Thus if a Prieſt or a Biſhop abſolves a guilty perſon, he binds himſelf, but looſes not the other. For no exceſs of power produces any effect of law, or tie upon the Conſcience. And to this purpoſe is that Rule of the law, Sententia non à ſuo Judice lata, nulla eſt: which is excellently rendred by S. Paul, What art thou, O man, who judgeſt another mans ſervant? Upon this account, all humane laws preſcribing to the Conſcience, or giving bounds to the thoughts, are null. For in theſe things God onely is Judge, and all other Judicatories are incompetent: I ſay all other judicatories; for as for ſentences declaratory of a Divine law, that is not under this reſtraint. But of that in it's own place.

Cap. at ſi Clerici. in princip. de Judi. Rom. 14.

5. 4. Humane laws may be unjuſt, by a defect of the juſt and due end; that is, when the law does not contribute to the publick advantage, but wholly to his private who made the law. If the law be apt to miniſter to the publick good, whatever the private intereſt and deſign of the Prince be, it may ſpoil the man but not the law. If a Prince eſpying the luxury of feaſts and garments make ſumptuary laws, and impoſe fines upon the tranſgreſſors, and does this onely to get the money, indeed he is not a good man; but ſo long as the law is good, it does oblige the Conſcience. The enemies of the memory of K. Henry 8. of England pretend that he annull'd the Popes authority in England onely upon deſigns of luſt and revenge. Suppoſe this true; yet as long as he did good, though for evil ends, it is the worſe for him, but not for us; but if the Prince does not, yet the law muſt intend the publick benefit: and that alſo is the duty of the Prince. Non proſpectantes proprii jura commodi, ſed conſulentes patriæ atque genti, ſaid the Fathers of the eighth Council of Toledo. Kings muſt not look after their own profit, but make proviſions for their country and their people. Officium eſt imperare, non regnum, To rule is not empire, but office, ſaid Seneca; and therefore the Greeks call Kings ἄναχτας, ἀπὸ τῦ ἀνακῶς ἔχειν, ſaies Plutarch, that ſignifies perſons appointed to take care and to defend the people.

Cap. 10. Epiſt. 91.

Tu civem patremque geras, tu conſule cunctis,
Non tibi, nec tua te moveant ſed publica damna.

Claudian. ad Honor.

Take care of the publick, not of thy particular, and let the common calamity move thee moſt: and ſince the power it ſelf is deſigned for the publick good, the laws muſt be ſo too. And therefore when the law ſaies that a law ought to be a common precept; that is, pro communi utilitate ſtatutum, ſaies the gloſs, that is, it muſt be for the common good. Conditur utilitatis gratiâ lex, ſaies Plato, every juſt law is made for the good of the people: and from him Marſilius Ficinus defines a law to be, a true manner of governing, which by profitable ways tends to the beſt end, that is, the publick good; and Iſidore ſaies, Lex erit omne quod ratione conſtiterit, duntaxat quod religioni congruat, quod diſciplinæ conveniat, quod ſaluti proficiat, A law is that which agrees with reaſon, that is conſonant to religion, and accords with diſcipline, and is profitable and does good. And therefore if a Prince make a law which is for his own profit, and not for the publick good, he is a Tyrant; and his laws have no ſanction but fear, and noe tie at all upon the Conſcience.

L. 1. ff. de legibus. In Hippia. Lib. 3. cap. 3.

Conſcience. And this is the doctrine of Ariſtotle, Ὁ μὲν γὰρ τύραννος τὸ ἑαυτῷ συμφέρον σκοπεῖ· ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς τὸ τῶν ἀρχομένων· A King and a Tyrant differ very much: A Tyrant conſiders his own profit; a King the profit of his people: and under this conſideration comes that Prince that laies grievous burthens upon his people. Τοὺς γὰρ τὰ μεγάλα μὴ ὅθεν δεῖ λαμβάνοντας, μηδὲ ἃ δεῖ, οἷον τοὺς τυράννους, πόλεις πορθοῦντας, καὶ ἱερὰ συλῶντας, οὐδὲ λέγομεν ἀνελευθέρους, ἀλλὰ πονηροὺς μᾶλλον καὶ ἀσεβεῖς καὶ ἀδίκους, Thoſe that take great ſumms from them they ought not, and thoſe which they ought not, as Tyrants, deſtroyers of Cities and robbers of Temples, we doe not call them Covetous, but wicked, and impious, and unjuſt. And therefore they who doe ſuch things by laws made on purpoſe, doe it by tyranny, and therefore not by law, or juſt authority, & conſequently by none. In ſuch caſes we muſt ſuffer as it happens: but we may avoid the burden of the law, where we can peaceably and privately. For all ſuch things as are againſt the good of the ſubjects, the law it ſelf declares to be no law; that is, to be more then the ſuperior hath right or leave to doe. Nulla juris actio aut benignitas patitur ut quæ ſalubriter pro hominum utilitate introducuntur, ea nos duriore interpretatione contra ipſorum commodum producamus ad ſeveritatem, ſaies the law, l. nulla, ff. de legibus: No law, no charity ſuffers us to make that by interpretation hard and againſt their profit, for whoſe profit it was firſt decreed by a ſalutary ſanction. And therefore it is obſervable that all laws doe infinitely decline all harſh ſenſes, and are ambitious of gentle and benign interpretations; which is in the whole world the greateſt declaration that law-givers as they ought not, ſo they profeſs they doe not intend to grieve the ſubject by an unequal burden. It was a Princely ſaying of Trajan, when he put a ſword upon the thigh of the Prefect of the Prætorian bands, Cape hunc, & ſi quidem rectè & ex utilitate omnium imperavero, pro me, ſin aliter, contra me utere, Uſe this ſword on my behalf if I govern rightly and to the publick benefit; if not, uſe it againſt me. That was too much, but his purpoſe was excellent; he knew it was his duty to rule by that meaſure onely; beyond that his power was incompetent. Ὁ δὲ μὴ τοιοῦτος, κληρωτὸς ἂν τις εἴη βασιλεύς, ἢ δὲ τυραννὶς ἐξ ἐναντίας ταύτῃ, He that does not ſo, is a King by fortune, but indeed a Tyrant, and any thing rather then a King. τὸ γὰρ ἑαυτῷ ἀγαθὸν διώκει, ſaies Ariſtotle, For he purſues his own, not his peoples good: and that is φαυλότης μοναρχίας, the ſtain of Monarchy, that is, plainly Tyranny. Tiberius ſaid well, Dixi & nunc & ſæpe alias, P. C. bonum & ſalutarem principem, quem vos tanta & tam libera poteſtate inſtruxiſtis, Senatui ſervire debere, & univerſis civibus; ſæpe ac plerumque etiam ſingulis, neque id dixiſſe me pœnitet. A good and a gentle Prince ought to ſerve the profit of his Nobility, his Senate and Citizens; not onely all but each ſingle Citizen, as there is occaſion: and therefore Rudolphus of Auſtria was very angry with his Guards for hindring petitioners to come to him; Let them come, ſaies he, for I was not made an Emperor to be ſhut up in a box. Sinite parvulos ad me venire ſaith our Bl. Lord, the King of Kings, and the Lord of Lords, Suffer my little ones to come unto me. But the reaſon and demonſtration of all is contained in thoſe words of Seneca, ſaying a Prince ſhould think with himſelf, Ego ex omnibus mortalibus placui electuſque ſum qui Deorum vice in terris fungerer, I am choſen from the heap of mortals to ſtand in the place of God, to doe as he does; that is, to doe all things juſtly, and to doe all things for the benefit of the people: now ſince the Prince hath his power from God, he can have no power to doe otherwiſe then God does. Admittere in animum totius reip. curam & populi

Ethic. lib. 8. c. 10.

Lib. 4. Eth. cap. 1.

Ubi ſuprà.

De Clement. 1.

populi fata ſuſcipere, & oblitum quodammodo ſui, gentibus vivere; noctes omnes dieſque perpeti ſolicitudinem, pro ſalute omnium cogitare. So Pliny deſcribes the office of a Prince, to take care of the whole republick, to live to them not to himſelf; daies and nights to ſuffer anxiety in thinking for the profit and welfare of all. This is the limit of a Princes power ſo far as he relates to Conſcience. For beyond this the Conſcience is not bound. The body is, and we muſt ſuffer patiently the evil which we cannot deprecate; but laws that are made to purpoſes beyond theſe meaſures doe no waies oblige the Conſcience. He is the Miniſter of God for thy good, ſaith S. Paul; otherwiſe he is not Gods Miniſter, and hath to other purpoſes none of Gods authority, and therefore cannot oblige the Conſcience to an active obedience in ſuch where his power is incompetent to command.

6. 5. Thus, when a law by the change of things or caſes is become an enemy to the common good, it is not to be obſerved, ſaith Aquinas; and he gives this inſtance: A law is made that in the time of ſieges the gates of a City be alwaies kept ſhut; but the guards are not tied to obey this law, when the citizens fly thither from the danger of the enemy: and ſo in all equal caſes, concerning which this is the Rule.

7. The Prince is to be preſumed good and gentle; and if he be not ſo, he is to be ſuppos'd ſo, and made ſo at leaſt by fiction of law: whatſoever therefore caſe does happen in which the Citizens are grieved, it is to be ſuppoſed that it is beſides the intention of the law, and was not in the previſion of the Prince; but we are to rely upon this, That he who is good and gentle, and a Father of his Country, would, if he were here and obſerved this evil, untie the law, that he might not tie us to the evil: and becauſe he is not here, but his will is here, the law with ſo much evil to us is not to be obſerved; for his leave to break it is to be preſumed.

8. 6. Hither is to be reduced the injuſtice of unequal diſtributions; ſuch as is, a law forbidding beggers to goe from place to place to ſeek relief, when there is no relief at home; the law of commanding every village or pariſh to provide for their poor, which indeed is piouſly and charitably intended, but becauſe when it is reduc'd to practice it falls heavily upon ſome, and others touch it not with the top of their fingers, the law which was good in theſi, proves unjuſt in hypotheſi, and therefore does not oblige the Conſcience; but they who are under it, may not onely ſeek relief by petition, but by avoiding it where they can piouſly and charitably, according to the meaſures by and by to be deſcribed. For it is the voice of natural juſtice and reaſon, which S. Paul urges to his charges, not that there ſhould be eaſe to one and burden to another: this is againſt equity, as having in it ſo great diſproportionate inequality.

9. 7. Laſtly, of the ſame conſideration it is, that in the making laws of burden, there be equality and proportion between the burden and the cauſe of the impoſition; that the burden be not greater then the evil it intends to remedy, nor the remedy greater then the diſeaſe needs, nor yet greater then men can bare. For what is exceſſive in theſe caſes, is againſt the charity and juſtice of the Prince, and is matter of rapine and impiety, not of ſubſidy and prudent proviſions: and therefore though it may oppreſs the ſubject, who hath no remedy but prayers and tears; yet the Conſcience is at liberty, and may procure remiſſions by any waies of peace and piety.

10. But in the reducing of this to practice, theſe cautions are to be obſerved.

1. That though the conſcience be free from all laws which are unjuſt upon any of theſe accounts, yet that the law be not diſobeyed with the ſcandal and offence of others, it muſt be ſo done that none be taught to rebel, or evacuate the law upon pretences and little regards, nor that our duty and religion be evil ſpoken of, nor that the Superiour be made jealous and ſuſpicious. When our Bleſſed Saviour had proved himſelf free from tribute, and that in conſcience he was not bound to pay it, yet that he might not give offence, he ſubmitted to the impoſition. And this caution is given by all the Doctors, who follow Bartholus in it, capite 1. de conſtitutionibus.

11. 2. The inconvenience of the republick muſt not be trifling and contemptible, but ſo great as muſt in the judgement of good and prudent men be a ſufficient cauſe of annulling the law, ſo great as muſt reaſonably outweigh the evil of material diſobedience. And therefore in the injuſtice of unequal diſtributions, and impoſition of taxes, we are not to complain for every little preſſure, nor yet to weigh the proportions in gold-ſcales; for it is a greater duty of charity that the Subject quietly bear a little load for peace-ſake and example and compliance, then it can be of duty in the Prince to make ſuch exact, curious and Mathematical proportions.

12. 3. The inconvenience and injuſtice muſt be certain, notorious, and relied upon, before it can be made uſe of to the breach of a law. For it is no warranty to diſobey, that I fancy the law to be unjuſt: & therefore in this caſe the beſt ſecurity we can have is, that either it be ſo declared by the voice of all men, or the more ſober accents of the wiſe men, or be evident in it ſelf according to the ſtricteſt meaſures; for where there is a doubtful caſe, the preſumption always is for obedience, not againſt it: for although uſually in doubts, the preſumption is for liberty, yet that is either between private perſons, or when the Superiour makes a doubt concerning his own laws, then he is to judge for liberty and eaſe; but in our own caſes, and in diſpute with a law, the preſumption is on behalf of the law, becauſe ordinarily that is the greateſt intereſt, and the greateſt reaſon.

13. 4. When there is a favourable caſe for breaking a law, if we have time and opportunity we muſt ask leave of the Superiour. Becauſe as that does honour to the Superiour, and gives value to the law; ſo it is the greateſt courſe of ſecurity, becauſe it makes him Judge who onely can complain. But to this we are not oblig'd if the caſe be evident, or if the danger of evil be imminent and ſudden, and there be no time or opportunity to require it: In theſe caſes a leave is to be preſumed, or elſe it need not, for the law does not oblige.

14. 5. This is to be practis'd onely when the law is againſt the publick good. For if it be ſtill conſiſtent with the publick intereſt, though it be againſt the good of a particular perſon, the law hath left a power of diſpenſation in the appointed Miniſters; but a private perſon may not ſo eaſily break the law, at leaſt he is tied to other conditions, and more caution, and a ſeverer conduct; of which I am to give account in the Chapter of the Diminution of Laws. But for the preſent, the difference is onely in ſpeculation: for notwithſtanding the perſonal inconvenience, the law does ſtill bind the conſcience of the Subjects in general; but if it be againſt the publick emolument, then the law ceaſes, and it does not oblige. In the firſt caſe the particular is to be relieved by a way of his own; of which I am afterwards to ſpeak: but in this caſe the conſcience is at liberty. Thus when the Church makes a law that upon a certain day the people ſhall meet in publick, and ſpend their day in faſting and prayer; it is a good law, and may be for the publick good, though Petronia and Abbatilla be with child and cannot faſt: All are bound, but from theſe the yoke may be lifted up for the preſent. But if a Church make a law that all the Clergy ſhall loſe their livings and their office if they marry; here there is a miſchief to the publick, to a whole order of men; and the law cannot doe ſo much good accidentally, as it directly does miſchief. And the confeſſion of Suarez upon another occaſion, but in this very inſtance, is remarkable, Cuſtodiam virginitatis eſſe opus ſupererogationis, quod neceſſariam non habet conjunctionem cum fine publici commodi; & ergo non poſſe præcipi lege humana, That virginity ſhould be kept is a work of ſupererogation, that hath no neceſſary conjunction with the end of any publick good; and therefore cannot be enjoyn'd by a humane law. Either then the law of the Church of Rome forbidding the Clergy to marry, does not tie them to be Virgins, but gives them leave to fornicate; or if it does tie them to a Virgin ſtate, ſhe makes a law which is not for the publick good, and therefore in which ſhe hath no competent authority. This therefore is an unjuſt law, and does not oblige the conſcience. Δεδιδάγμεθα ἀρχαῖς καὶ ἐξουσίαις ὑπὸ Θεοῦ πεταγμέναις τιμὴν τὴν ὀφειλομένην ἀπονέμειν, ſaid Polycarpus; We are taught to give to Princes and the powers ſet over us by God ſuch honour and obedience as may not hurt us.

Lib. 3. de legib. cap. 30. n. 11.

RULE IV.

A law that is founded upon a falſe preſumption, does not oblige the Conſcience.

1. THE caſe is this; Franciſco Biretti a Venetian Gentleman, full of amours, & us'd to vain and wanton addreſſes, courts Julia a Senators daughter, but with ſecret intent to abuſe her and ſo to leave her. Marco Medici the Father of Julia by threats and harſh uſages forces his daughter Julia to conſent to a contract with Franciſco: who perceiving himſelf ſurpriſed, and that the matter was paſs'd further then he intended it, reſolv'd to make the beſt of it, to make a contract, to lie with her, and ſo to leave her. He does ſo, ſurpriſes her in the careleſs hours of the day, and the nakedneſs of her ſoul, and with flatteries mingled with the affrighting name of her harſh Father, acts his intention, and then purſues it till he was weary of her, and then forſakes her. She complains, and deſires remedy. The law declares their congreſs to be a marriage. But in the mean time Franciſco paſs'd into Sicily, and there married Antonia Peronetta a Sicilian Lady; her he lov'd, intended to make her his wife, and did ſo. Now the law preſumes that after contract, their congreſs did declare a marriage, cap. Is qui fidem, and cap. Tua nos, de ſponſal. for it ſuppoſes and preſumes a con-

ſent, and yet withal ſays if there was no conſent, it was no marriage. Here Franciſco is condemn'd by the preſumption, and reliev'd in conſcience. For if he did not lie with her affectu maritali, but onely intended to abuſe her, he was indeed extremely impious and unjuſt; but he made no marriage, for without mutual conſent marriages are not made. Yet becauſe of this, the law could no way judge but by outward ſignifications, and ut plurimùm, for the moſt part it is ſo that contract and congreſs doe effect as well as ſignify a marriage, the law did well to declare in the behalf of Julia: but Franciſco, who knew that which the law could not know, was bound to make amends to Julia as well as he could, but to purſue the marriage of Anthonia and dwell with her. For the preſumption upon which this law was founded was falſe; the congreſs did not prove a marriage, for it was never intended: the preſumption was probable, but fail'd in this inſtance, and therefore in this caſe did not oblige the conſcience. Conſcience is to be guided by preſumptions when it hath no better guide; but when it hath a certain truth to guide it, it is better then the beſt preſumption or probability. * Beſides this, when a law is made upon a ſuppoſition, and relies upon that alone, in caſe that ſhould fail, it is to be preſum'd that the Law-giver does not intend to bind. When the men of Ægina were at warre with the Athenians, they made it death by their law for any Athenian to be ſeen in their Country. But when Plato was made a ſlave and was carried thither by a ſtorm, one of the Citizens ſav'd his life by an artifice, and did it according to the intention of the law. For the law being founded upon a preſumption that if an Athenian came thither, it was for evil to their Town, they could not ſuſpect that Plato had ſuch an evil intention, when they knew his caſe and his ſad ſtory; and therefore ought to judge him quit from the burden of that law. Dom. Joſeph of Carreras a Spaniard walking one night in Sivil, was taken by the Alcalde, and found to have arms about him, againſt the Law; but carrying of him to priſon they found at the end of that ſtreet a man newly murdered: the law preſum'd him to be the murderer, as it does aptly ſuſpect ſuch perſons who at unſeaſonable times walk arm'd: he was accus'd, but finding friends was acquitted for his life, but ſentenc'd to maintain the widow and children of the dead man. He knew himſelf innocent, and therefore was not bound in conſcience to maintain her, becauſe the law relying upon a falſe preſumption, was a dead letter, and could not bind.

2. But that there be no error in the practice of this, we muſt diſtinguiſh of preſumptions. One ſort is in matter of fact, the other is upon preſuppoſition of dangers uſually ariſing: that is of juſtice, this of caution. The examples which I have already brought are all meer and unmixt preſumptions of fact; in which caſes the rule does hold without exception. But in preſumptions of caution it is otherwiſe. The law does irritate and evacuate the contracts of minors, becauſe they being weak and indiſcreet, it is preſum'd that they doe it fooliſhly whatever they doe; and it is fit that the laws ſhould be their defenſatives againſt the evils of their ignorance. But now ſome minors under ſixteen years of age are of a ripe wit, and competent judgement, and have craft enough to make a bargain, to conſider what they promiſe, and to beware of the artifices of evil men. But yet although the preſumption of the law fails as to their particulars, yet their parents may annul their promiſes, their vows, and their profeſſions, though the preſumption of the law in their caſe doe fail. The reaſon of the the difference is this: In preſumptions of fact, if the truth of the fact fails, the whole foundation of the law does fail; for the foundation is indiviſible, and the law had no other ſupport; if any thing of it fails, it all fails. But in preſumptions of caution, or of preſuppoſition of danger which does uſually happen, it is wholly otherwiſe; for though it does fail in ſome inſtances, yet it is true in moſt, and that is ſufficient to ſupport a law, which looks after that which is moſt common, not after rare emergencies. And therefore the law in this caſe does not in proper ſpeaking rely upon a preſumption, but a certain judgement; for it is certainly true that it is ſo moſt commonly; and it is preſum'd ſo of every particular: at leaſt the law knows not how to diſtinguiſh them, and therefore is a juſt and a wiſe law, conducing to the publick benefit, and conſequently is a good meaſure to the conſcience.

3. Onely this caution is to be inſerted, That if a minor make a contract, as if a young man under 16, or a maiden under 14 make a contract of marriage, although this is not valid in law till their years of conſent be completed; yet if they have a mature judgement otherwiſe then the law did preſume them to have, they are tied in conſcience to verify this contract, if all thoſe conditions were obſerved which could make the act valid in the law of nature, becauſe no civil law can evacuate a natural; and where they are naturally able, they are by their own act under that law naturally oblig'd: but this, although it be an eſſential conſideration as to conſcience, yet it is wholly extrinſecal to this Rule.

4. But there is one diſtinction more of uſe to the explication of this Rule: Laws founded upon preſumption are either laws of favour or laws of duty. Thoſe that are made in favour may be made uſe of onely when that ſuppoſition upon which it is founded is really true, but muſt not be us'd to the prejudice of any, whether it be true or falſe. And of this nature, or reducible to it, is the caſe that Cicero de Oratore ſpeaks of. A Roman Citizen ſuppoſing his onely ſon to be dead, declares a kinſman to be his heir. The ſon afterwards appears; and by a true preſumption that if his Father had ſuppos'd him living, he would not have diſinherited him, is reliev'd againſt a falſe preſumption which ſuppos'd him dead. And it hath left a ſtain upon the honour of Davids juſtice and friendſhip with Jonathan, that when he had liſtned to the falſe information of Ziba againſt his friends ſon Mephiboſheth, and gave the land to the informer; he yet upon a right notice of the cauſe reſtor'd but half. For this cauſe, ſay the Doctors of the Jews, God divided his Kingdome, and gave the bigger half from his Grandchild Rehoboam to his ſervant. But if the laws be matter of duty, and enjoyn ſomething that is good or uſeful to the publick, whether the preſumption be right or wrong, they doe oblige: and the reaſon is, becauſe the preſumption, whether it was in fact or in caution, yet it was not the whole foundation of the law; or if it was alone built upon it at firſt, yet it is ſupported by other arguments ſtrong enough to affirm the law. If a law were made in England, that whoever comes not to Divine Service in publick Churches ſhould be puniſhed by a mulct of 20 li. a moneth, the fine of Recuſancy, upon a preſumption that he that is abſent is ſo indeed, this law were as much incumbent upon them that are not Recuſants: for although the law was at firſt made upon that preſumption, yet becauſe otherwiſe it commands a very good act, which alone and without the preſumption were a ſufficient inducement to the law, the Conſcience of thoſe who are, and thoſe who are not in the firſt preſumption are equally oblig'd.

Rule V.

Humane laws doe bind the Conſcience to or from an act in ſecret, as well as in publick.

1. SOme things are ſecret or private in their own nature, ſuch as are onely the prerogative of God to judge of; as the word of the mind, the thoughts of the heart, the deſires and repudiations of the affections, the inclinations and tendencies to an object, love and hatred, the pleaſures or diſpleaſures of the fancy, acts of judgment and underſtanding. Theſe God onely knowes, and he onely puniſhes. * Others are ſecret, but yet they are ſuch onely by accident, and for want of proof: and theſe alſo are more or leſs; for ſome are ſeen by one witneſs, and ſome by more; and they that are ſeen, either are brought to judgment, or not. Now according to the parts of theſe diſtinctions, this Rule is in ſeveral manners to be verified.

2. 1. Thoſe actions which were done in ſecret, but under the obſervation of a few, when they are brought to judgement change their nature, and become publick, and therefore are equally under the power of the Law, as if they were done in the Market. For in the Law, that is called Notorious which is either declar'd in judgment, or prov'd by witneſſes, or evident by the intuition of the fact. And that actions, in this ſenſe at firſt ſecret, are ſubjicible to laws, is clear by the very examination of witneſſes and the whole proceſs of law. For the Judge takes notice of no other notoreity: if a Judge ſees a thing done, he cannot puniſh it; he muſt witneſs it, and another puniſh it. All that is notorious to the Judge muſt firſt be ſecret, and then publick; that is made manifeſt or notorious by witneſſes and ſentences of Judges.

3. 2. Some actions are ſecret, becauſe they can be proved onely by one witneſs. Now it is true that in ſome caſes one witneſs is ſufficient, as in the caſe of treaſon; or in caſe of confeſſion, for his own witneſs againſt himſelf is as good as ten thouſand: when it is ſo, it is manifeſtum as before, and therefore the ſame thing is to be affirmed of it. But if it be ſecret, ſo that it cannot be competently proved, it is true that the law does not puniſh it, but it fain would; and therefore declares that the private action is a diſobedience and tranſgreſſion.

4. 3. If the action be done wholly in ſecret, then indeed the criminal Judge takes no notice of it any more then a man abiding in the city does of his country houſe on fire before he knows of it; but as one is an unknown calamity to the man, ſo the other is an unknown tranſgreſſion of the law. For that the thing is known or unknown it alters the caſe as to the puniſhment, yet nothing at all as to the offence, the ſcandal onely excepted and the example. Now that the law does intend to forbid ſuch actions, it appears by the acts of ſcrutiny, and the proceedings againſt ſuch as come accidentally cidentally to be diſcover'd. If a ſuſpicion doe ariſe or any probability, any fame or rumor, the law begins her proceſs, ſomewhere by torture, ſomewhere by examination upon oath, and ſometimes gives ſentence upon conjectures. Now if to this it be replied, that this is the beginning of publication, and the law proceeds onely in proportion to its being publick; I anſwer, that it is true, ſhe can proceed no otherwiſe: and therefore if the queſtion here had been whether ſecret actions were puniſhable by humane laws, I ſhould have anſwer'd otherwiſe, and ſo the lawyers diſpute it: but here the inquiry being whether the Conſcience be oblig'd, I am to ſay that the publication of it does not make it to be a ſin; this reveals the action, & the law declares or makes it to be a ſin; for a man is not hanged for theft unleſs he be diſcover'd, but if he be, then it is for his theft he is puniſhed, not for his diſcovery. The conſequent of which is this; that if the action be againſt the law, be it never ſo ſecret, it is a ſin: and here is the advantage of the wiſdome and Oeconomy of God in the verification of humane laws; he confirms the laws of men, and he binds in heaven what they bind on earth, and he alſo knows in earth what is done in the moſt ſecret corner, and judges accordingly.

5. 4. But as for thoſe things which are ſecret in their own nature, ſuch which are not onely not known, but not cognoſcible by humane laws and judicatories, the caſe is much more difficult, it being generally taught by Divines that no humane laws have power to preſcribe internal acts; and conſequently that whatever we think or wiſh, ſo we doe the thing that is commanded, the law of man is ſatiſfied.

Queſtion.

Whether humane laws can command or forbid inward acts.

6. But having as well as I could conſider'd the ſecret of this thing, I reſt finally upon this account. It being certain and confeſſed that the laws of Man have power to conſtitute actions of themſelves indifferent, into the order of vertue and vice, making that to be inceſt which before the law was not, and that to be theft which in other countries is lawful, and ſo in other inſtances; if the law does change the action onely ſo as to make it meerly to be an inſtance of obedience or diſobedience, then the law hath no power over internal actions: for man is not the Lord of Conſciences and minds, and we are not tied to obey any man commanding an internal act; his judicatory here is not competent, his authority is not ſufficient. For it ſerves no end of the publick, and it hath no judicatory, no cogniſance, and no intereſt: and it were as fooliſh as for a King to ſit upon the ſtrand and command the waters not to flow to his feet. * But if the law of man have chang'd an action not onely to an inſtance of obedience or diſobedience, but plac'd it alſo in the order of ſome other vertue or vice, as by changing it to inceſt, or adultery, or chaſtity, or temperance reſpectively, then the law of man hath power over the Conſcience even in the moſt ſecret act; not directly, and by the energy of its own power, but indirectly, collaterally, and by accident, by reaſon of the laws of God. The reaſon is plain: becauſe it is not lawful to commit adultery, or murder, or inceſt in our heart; the law therefore that conſtitutes this action and makes it to be murder, does consequently oblige the Conscience not so much as to desire it. Voluntas facti origo est, quæ ne tunc quidem liberatur quum aliqua difficultas perpetrationem intercepit. Ipsa enim sibi imputatur, nec excusari De Pœnit. poterit per illam perficiendi infelicitatem operata quod suum fuerat: so Tertullian: The will is the original of action; and is not free'd when she is hindred from doing what she would. Her own act is imputed to her; for though no event succeeded, yet she did all her part. Thus in the Canon law Clementin. 1. § verum de hæreticis, the inquisitor of heretical pravity is excommunicate if either out of hatred or hope of gain he condemn the innocent, or for love and favour absolve the criminal: upon which the Gloss observes that the Superior can punish the sin of the heart, though it never proceed to action; and to this Gloss Panormitan and Adrianus doe consent. Now if it be objected that here is an action external complicated with the internal, and that the law proceeds against that, not against this; I answer, that it is certain the law cannot proceed to sentence against the internal, unless it be some way or in some degree publick: but that which I affirm is, that the law forbids the internal, or commands it, and that, in case the action be plac'd in the rank of vertue or vice distinct from the meer obedience or disobedience, and this is a pregnant instance of it; for the condemning the innocent is therefore the more forbidden and the more condemned because it is presum'd to proceed from hatred. And therefore Cato argued well in behalf of the Rhodians, against whom it was mov'd in the Senate that a warre should be made, because they had some little light conjectures that they were not well affected to them; and because some of the Rhodians had mov'd that they might help Perseus the King of Macedonia, in case peace could not be obtained for him: Cato made an oration in their behalf, affirming it to be unreasonable to punish them because they had a mind once to have made a warre. But this was therefore well said of Cato, because there was no proof that the Rhodians did intend it, and secretly or openly decree it. If they had intended it, it was penal, and when the intention had been prov'd, it might have been more reasonable to proceed to punish their breach of friendship. And this the Rhodians themselves confessed, that the Romans warr'd justly with Perseus for intending a warre against them; but he so intended it, that he did something towards it; but no City, no nation would destroy them who did nothing towards the evil which they secretly intended. Quis hoc statuit unquam, aut cui concedi sine summo omnium periculo potest, ut eum jure possit occidere à quo metuisse se dicat ne ipse posterius occideretur? said Cicero; He indulges too much to his fear, and destroies the publick, that will kill any man whom he is pleas'd to fear, or say that he would first kill him. And the reason of that is, because there can be no sufficient proof of the secret thought, without it break forth at least into words and decrees and preparations. But Injuriam facit, qui facturus est, said Seneca. If it appears he was about to doe a mischief, he is guilty; his secret was criminal: and that is it which is punished as often as it can.

7. And this is more evident in the civil Law, l. si quis non dicam rapere, C. de Episcopis & Clericis. Where the very thought of ravishing a Virgin is punished. It is true, this thought was declared by the attempt or addresse to it: but because it was not consummate, it is evident that humane Laws bind to more then to or from the external action. The law that punishes the criminal before he hath acted the evil, punishes the internal principally:

cipally: for in the addreſs & firſt preparations nothing is done but the diſcovery of the thought; but when the thought is ſo diſcovered, & the action is not done, if the man be puniſhed, it is not for the action, but for the thought. And to this purpoſe is that of Cicero in his Oration pro T. Annio Milone; Niſi fortè quia perfecta res non eſt, non fuit punienda: perinde quaſi exitus rerum, non hominum conſilia, legibus vindicentur. Minus dolendum fuit, re non perfecta, ſed puniendum certè nihilo minus. Not to puniſh the fault becauſe the miſchief was not done is as much as to ſay, that the laws are not avengers of evil purpoſes, but of evil events onely. Indeed if the miſchief be not done, we grieve the leſs; but if it was but intended, we puniſh it never the leſs. And to this Seneca in his controverſies gives teſtimony, Scelera quoque, quamvis citra exitum ſubſederunt, puniuntur. The ſame with that of Periander, μὴ μόνον τὰς ἁμαρτάνοντας, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰς μέλλοντας κόλαζε, not onely thoſe that doe, but thoſe that would ſin are to be puniſhed. And to this ſenſe all thoſe laws which puniſh the affection, though the effect follows not, are to be underſtood, as Cap. pro humani, §. Sacri, de homicidio l. 6. & l. quiſquis, C. ad legem Juliam majeſtatis; & cap. 1. de ſchiſmaticis, §. omnem, l. 6. & l. Fugitivus, ff. de verborum ſignif. l. Divus, ff. ad leg. Cornel. de Sicariis.

8. But this is alſo further manifeſt in the differences of chance-medly, manſlaughter, and wilful murder; where the action being wholly differenc'd by the thought of the heart, proves plainly that the thoughts alſo are puniſh'd by humane Laws ever when they are manifeſt. And if the Divines and Lawyers would diſtinguiſh in this queſtion the puniſhment from the crime, the Court external from the Court of Conſcience, they would not erre in this article. For although a mans thoughts without ſome external action are not puniſhed, becauſe they are not known; yet they could not be puniſhed when they are known, if they were not puniſhable and criminal in themſelves even againſt the laws of man. And therefore when Ulpian had ſaid, Cogitationis pœnam nemo patitur: Accurſius addes, Si ſtatum in finibus cogitationis eſt. No man can be puniſhed for his thought; that is, if it proceeds no further; for then it is known to none but God. L. 18. ff. de pœnis. l. fugitivus. ff. de verbor. ſignific.

9. Upon this account we find ſometimes in Laws, commands expreſly enjoyning the internal action. Thus when the Council of Lateran had complained of ſome Clerks and Prelates that either wholly omitted their office, or ſaid it negligently, it addes, Hæc & ſimilia ſub pœna ſuſpenſionis penitus inhibemus, diſtrictè præcipientes in virtute obedientiæ ut Divinum officium nocturnum pariter & diurnum, quantum eis dederit Deus, ſtudioſè celebrent pariter & devotè: viz. that they ſay their office diligently and devoutly; which becauſe it is an act of the heart as well as of the outward man, it gives a clear evidence in this inquiry. But above all is that Novel of Juſtinian, which the late Greek Books have brought to light, it never having been noted by the Latine interpreters, in which the Emperour commanded that inſolvent debtors who by misfortune, not by their crimes, were made poor, if they ſwore their inſufficiency, were to be freed from all further trouble; and the Creditors that refus'd to obey the edict ſhould pay ten pound of gold; and διὰ μόνην ὀργὴν θυμοῦσιν, for their meer thought of doing otherwiſe ſhould be put to death. I end this with the ſaying of the Jewiſh Doctors, Quicquid ſapientes vetant palàm fieri, id etiam in penetralibus vetitum eſt, Whatever the wiſe men forbid to be done in pub- Novel. 135.

lick, the ſame muſt be underſtood to be forbidden in your cloſet. It was the ſaying of Rabbi Bachai.

Rule VI.

Humaine Laws, before ſufficient promulgation, doe not oblige the Conſcience.

1. AS the faults of Subjects are not cognoſcible without publication; ſo neither are the wills of Princes. Leges ſacratiſſimæ quæ conſtringunt hominum vitas intelligi ab hominibus debent, ſays the Law, l. leges, C. de legib. & conſtit. But in this there is no difficulty: all that is made is in the aſſignation of the ſufficiency of the promulgation. A Spaniſh Lawyer, Selva, and he alone, ſo farre as I have heard or read, affirms the very ſolemn edition of it and declaration in the Court or Council to be ſufficient. But as he ſpeaks it wholly without reaſon, ſo he is to be rejected without farther trouble. Others require one proclamation in one or more places, according to the greatneſs of the Province or Juriſdiction; but it can never be agreed poſitively how much is enough. Therefore ſo farre as our conſciences can be concerned in it, theſe following propoſitions are certain, and they are ſufficient.

De benefic. q. 22. n. 14.

2. 1. It is not neceſſary that laws in their promulgation be ſo divulged, as that the notice of them reach every ſingle ſubject. Not onely becauſe in moſt laws all perſons are not concerned, but alſo becauſe it is morally impoſſible; I mean in a great Province, where the laws are commonly of greateſt concern, and the promulgation more to be regarded and more diligently endeavoured. For laws of men are not like the Sun, ſearching into all corners; but as the law it ſelf is ſuch as regards that thing which happens moſt commonly, ſo the promulgation is of a ſymbolical nature, and can arrive but to moſt perſons.

3. 2. In all Princely and ſweet Governments there muſt be ſuch a publication of laws as muſt be fit to miniſter to the publick neceſſity and the publick duty, that the laws be no ſnares, but piouſly intended, prudently conducted, ſufficiently communicated, and reaſonably exacted with abatement of all thoſe deficiencies which are incident and unavoidable to mankind; ſo that if what be in Council judg'd ſufficient for promulgation, doe not prove ſo in the event of things, and in the Province, the defect be put upon the inſufficient publication, not upon the account of diſobedience.

4. 3. Be the publication legally ſufficient, or not ſufficient, it is certain that the conſcience is not tied by the law, till it be known. I doe not ſay but that the prevarication may be juſtly puniſh'd, becauſe the law may be publiſhed as well as is morally poſſible, or prudently and civilly is requir'd, and yet ſome may inculpably be ignorant of it. But be it ſo or otherwiſe, it is impoſſible that they who know not of it can obey; and if they cannot, they cannot be oblig'd: for that is no law, but madneſs, which obliges a man to that which is impoſſible.

4. The

5. 4. The care and ſufficiency of publication is wholly incumbent upon the Law-giver, not at all upon the Subject; that is, the Subject is not bound to ſeek after the law, but onely to ſee that he doe not turn his ear from it, or ſtudiouſly decline it, or endeavour to be ignorant. For a law, though it be for good to the publick, yet to the particular being a reſtraint upon our natural or political liberty reſpectively, no man is bound to ſeek his own fetters, or put the burden upon his own neck, but to wear it well when it is impoſed: but to refuſe to hear is the firſt act of diſobedience; but to hear is the firſt inſtance of obeying; therefore till he hath heard, he is oblig'd to nothing. This hath no limitation or exception but this. If the Subject hath heard there is a law, he is bound to inquire after it, for then it is ſufficiently publiſh'd: the Law-giver hath done his duty; But before he hath heard, it is to him as if it were not; and that which is not cannot be numbred, cannot be accounted for. The firſt is ſufficient to oblige him, he is bound becauſe he knows, the will of the Law-giver hath bound him; but then he muſt inquire for his own ſake, for otherwiſe he cannot perform his obligation.

6. 5. Although as to conſcience the former meaſures are certain, yet the Legiſlator hath power to declare when the promulgation is ſufficient for the nullifying of all contracts intervening, or evacuating priviledges, and changing all exteriour events of law; becauſe the being of all theſe depends upon the will of the Prince and of his law. Onely when this is reduc'd to practice, in the matter of contracts, if they were valid by the law of nature, he that did contract is oblig'd to ſtand to it, if the other requires it; but if it be his own advantage, he is bound to quit it, if the other recedes and makes uſe of his advantage. For the law can tie him to ſuffer inconvenience for the publick intereſt, but not to doe any evil. Thus if Titius contract with Mævius to carry twenty Tun of wheat from Sicily to Rome, and before the contract a prohibition of ſuch contracts was legally publiſhed, and yet he heard not of it; he is bound to obey it: but if Mævius, who is like to be the gainer, ſtand upon his right of juſtice and natural conſent, Titius muſt make him amends, but he muſt not tranſport the corn. But this is in caſe they be not both Subjects of the ſame Prince. And the reaſon of this is plain, becauſe the ſtranger hath a natural right by juſtice and ſtipulation, but the Subject hath a law upon him; therefore the other is not tied to quit that, but the Subject muſt obey this: not to doe an injury, for no law can oblige him to that; but to ſuffer one that is tolerable and is outweighed by the publick advantage. But if they be both the Subjects of the ſame law, the law that forbids one to make the contract, does alſo by implication forbid the other to exact that which is illegal. So that although the law cannot diſoblige Titius from verifying a contract that is valid in the law of nature; yet Mævius can remit his right, and the law can tie him to that.

7. This holds in all things where the parties can give conſent to the invalidating of the contract. But ſometimes they cannot, and then the rule of conſcience is, ſtandum eſt juri naturali, whatever was ratified by nature and religion muſt remain for ever. The Council of Trent makes a law that all clandeſtine marriages ſhall be null: ſhe publiſhes the law, and declares it from a certain time to be valid. A poor Vine-dreſſer in the Valtoline hears nothing of it, but gets the daughter of his Maſter the Farmer with child after after contract per verba de præſenti. The law is urg'd upon him; the parties are both threatned, and are in that fright willing to recede. But they were told by a prudent Confeſſor, that they could not conſent to any ſuch ſeparation: and he told them truly. For in marriage there is a neceſſitude contracted by a law of nature, and not onely a mutual right tranſmitted to each other, but there is a band of Religion, a Sacramental tie, or relation that God hath joyn'd, and no man can put aſunder. But until the contract is paſs'd ſo farre as that it is become a marriage in the law and ſtate of nature, the prohibition ought to prevail upon them.

8. Laſtly, in priviledges there is no difficulty, becauſe the law is not bound to give any at all; and therefore may reſtrain them at any time, without giving a reaſon. Thus if a law were made that all illegitimate children that were born after the death of the Emperour Maximilian ſhould be uncapable of a Prebend or benefice in a Church; he that heard not of the law might juſtly be put out after ſolemne inveſtiture. For no man is injured, becauſe he hath not a favour done him.

Rule VII.

That a law ſhould oblige the Conſcience, does not depend upon the acceptation of the Law by the people.

1. This Rule hath ſuffered great prejudice, not onely by the contrary opinion of the Civilians and Canoniſts, who in very great numbers oppoſe it, but by all perſons almoſt who live under Governments Democratical, or doe not well conſider the powers and conſequents of government. But the caſe in ſhort is this;

2. All Governments in the world did either begin right or wrong. If right, it was by Divine appointment, or by the multiplication of the poſterity of a Patriarch, and the ἀυξησις increaſe of Paternal Government. This is the natural way, and this is founded upon natural reaſon, and a Divine Commandement. This hath in it no evil, and no queſtion, and it is the juſt beginning of Monarchy, it produces no other Government.

3. But if the Government comes not this way, it comes in wrong. Either from tumults, by neceſſity and evil experience being forc'd to permit and eſtabliſh an order and government; or directly by warre and violence; or elſe in the deſtitution of a Governour when all are left to themſelves, and none hath power over them, they may doe what they liſt, and order things as they pleaſe, and part with as much power as they think fit, and keep ſome to themſelves, and confound all politick principles, and divide power, as two earneſt diſputants doe divide the truth when they have torn her in pieces, each part running away with that ſhare that comes next his hand.

4. Now from theſe beginnings of Governments ſeveral Republicks and Principalities have been eſtabliſhed; and when it hapned that any famous Government government entred the wrong way, they became exemplary to others in their polity and in their principles, and made their actions become rules to others. Thus it was that the Roman people, keeping the legiſlative power in their own hands, made Kings and Conſuls and officers at their pleaſure, but their conſent was alwaies demanded when a law was to be made, as is affirmed by Aſconius Pedianus in orationem pro C. Cornelio, and by Budæus and Zaſius in l. 2. ff. de origine juris. Theſe laws were made in a convocation of the people in thirty Courts, and were called Curiatæ, as is affirm'd by Suetonius in Auguſto, and in Cicero in his epiſtles to Lentulus: they were alſo called Populares by Cicero in his orations. Now this people ſo largely reigning over the world, and being exemplary by their wiſdome and their laws, did eaſily tranſmit this licence unto the people of moſt Nations, who needed but little teaching to bridle the power of their Princes, to which they were but too much tempted by that libido regnandi, that luſt of empire which poſſeſſes the greateſt part of the world; and by their own ſtrength, which they often made their Kings to feel, and would not lend to them in their needs but upon hard conditions. * Adde to all this, that many princes have been gentle and kind, and many wiſe, and would not put a bridle upon ſuch an untam'd beaſt without their own conſent; not onely that they might obey more willingly, but leſt they ſhould not obey at all, as knowing it to be better that they ſhould be rul'd as they pleaſe, then not at all.

—— Libertatis ſervaveris umbram
Si quicquid jubeare velis——

This phantaſtick liberty the people would ſeldome be without; and they muſt have what they were reſolv'd on; for when they pleaſe, they are all Kings.

5. Upon the account of theſe and ſome other cauſes it is come to paſs that in many places laws have their binding power onely by the conſent of the people; in their tribes and Courts, or by their repreſentatives, or by their manners and cuſtomes: and from hence come theſe ſayings of ſome very wiſe men; Lex nullam vim obligandi habet niſi ex more; ſo Ariſtotle: and, Leges promulgatione conſtitui, firmari autem uſu, ſaies Gratian: and the civil law moſt expreſsly, Ipſæ leges nullâ aliâ cauſâ nos tenent quam quod judicio populi receptæ ſunt, The reception and approbation of the people is the onely firmament and Sanction of the law. Now that the civil law ſaies it, it was ex more Romanorum; among the old Romans it alwaies was ſo: and Ariſtotle ſpeaks at the rate of him who had been bred under the popular government of the Greeks, and therefore it is no wonder that any of them ſpeaks ſo: but as for the words of Gratian, Laurentius and the Arch-Deacon expound them to mean that the laws receive from the uſe of the people firmitatem ſtabilitatis, non authoritatis; that is, de facto they are made more firm and laſting by the conſent and manners of the people, but not de jure more obliging; according to that of Tertullian, Neque civis fideliter legi obſequitur ignorans quale ſit quod ulciſcitur lex. Nulla lex ſibi ſoli conſcientiam juſtitiæ ſuæ debet, ſed eis à quibus obſequium expectat: caterum ſuſpecta lex eſt quæ probari ſe non vult; improba autem ſi non probata dominetur. A Citizen does not faithfully obey that law (meaning of going to warre) who knows not what that is which is to be puniſh'd. For that a law is juſt is owing in part to him that is to obey it. That law is to be ſuſpected ſpected which will not indure a trial; but if being tried it be rejected, it cannot prevail without injuſtice.

Lib. 2. Polit. c. 6. § leges diſt. 4. l. de quibus ff. de legibus.

6. Having now by this narrative laid open the ſecret and foundation of this opinion, and prevented the objections that can be made, the Rule is certain and eaſy. The conſent of the people gives no authority to the law; & therefore is no way neceſſary to the Sanction and conſtitution, ſave onely to prevent violence, rebellion and diſobedience. But becauſe I am not writing rules of policy, but rules of conſciẽce, I am to ſay, that if the legiſlative power be in the Prince, that is, if he be ſupreme, he is to decree the law; but whereever the authority be, that authority is derived from God, and is onely leſs then him: and although a horſe ſometime cannot be ruled without ſtroakings and meat and gentle uſages, yet for all that his rider is his Maſter: and he that ſaid, obey them that have the rule over you, and ſubmit your ſelves to every ordinance of man for the Lords ſake, whether to the King as to the ſupreme, &c. did not appoint the ſupreme to rule by a precarious power; and if he who hath authority makes a juſt law, either the people are bound to accept the law, or they deſpiſe the authority. And indeed it is a contradiction in the terms, that a law be impos'd, and yet that it be no law of it ſelf; that is, that the effect of the cauſe ſhould be a neceſſary condition in the cauſe it ſelf; and that it's own work is nothing, unleſs what it does work give it force. It muſt be a law before they accept it, and if it be a law they are bound to accept it; and therefore their accepting cannot make it a law.

7. In popular governments the people have their ſuffrages in the legiſlative; but then it is becauſe they govern: but when they have not the legiſlative, he that hath it muſt not ask them leave to uſe it, when God hath given him power. They indeed who ſuppoſe Kings to be truſtees and miniſters of the people have ſome pretence (if they ſuppos'd true) to affirm the acceptation of the people to be neceſſary. But yet if they did ſuppoſe true, it were indeed a pretence but no more. For when the King is choſen, and is by the people (that I may uſe the expreſſion of Tiberius) tantâ tamque liberâ poteſtate inſtructus, inveſted with a Princely power, and the legiſlative; he, by himſelf or by his Senate, according to the conſtitution of the province, is to make the law, and to puniſh them that break it, and not to ask them if they will pleaſe to obey it. Lex inſtituitur cum promulgatur, ſaies the Authentick: and therefore whoſoever does not obey, whether it be a ſingle perſon or a multitude, they ſin againſt God; it is diſobedience in a ſingle perſon, and rebellion in the multitude. All which is true with the proviſos of the former rules, that the laws be upon all their juſt accounts in all other things obligatory.

8. This Rule does alſo fail in all arbitrary conventions and precarious governments; in ſuch which have no coercitive power but what is by voluntary conceſſion; ſuch which can convene and diſſolve at pleaſure, as Colleges and Fraternities. For as they meet at pleaſure, ſo they muſt be governed as they pleaſe; their power comes not from God, but from man; and their authority is equivocal.

9. Some inſert one caſe here, ſaying that if a law be refus'd by the greater part of the people, then ſingle perſons are excus'd, becauſe it is to be ſuppos'd that the Prince cares not that ſingle perſons obſerve the law, ſince ſo little little will ſerve no intereſt. But if this were true, yet there is in it ſo much caution to be us'd, ſo many proviſos, and ſo much probability to the contrary, that it were as good that it were not true; for it cannot give reſt or peace to the Conſcience. For 1. whether the Prince doe ſecretly give leave or no, is a preſumption of infinite uncertainty. 2. The contrary may very well be ſuppos'd; for he that is troubled at the rebellion of many will not give leave to one to diſobey. 3. If theſe few ſingle perſons doe ſubmit, they become good examples, and are confeſſors for the reputation of the Kings wiſdome and authority. 4. What is evil in the whole is ſo in every particular; becauſe the people is but an aggregate body of ſingle perſons. 5. We muſt not follow a multitude to doe evil: and all rebellion is of that nature, that it is as the ſin of witchcraft; and who would be a witch becauſe all the Country is ſo? 6. He that partakes of other mens ſins ſhall alſo partake of their puniſhment. Upon theſe accounts, I judge it very unſafe for any ſingle perſon to reſiſt a juſt law of a juſt ſuperior, upon hope of eſcaping in the Croud. * But this Rule is onely true when the law is juſt and good for publick profit and uſefulneſs of the people. For if it be an unreaſonable law, it binds not as a law, but as by promiſe and contract; that is, it does not bind by the ſanction of the law, but the acceptation of the people. And ſo the ancient lawyers are to be underſtood; Lex præcepti tollitur, ſi moribus utentium non recipitur, The obligation of the law is taken off, unleſs it be receiv'd into the manners of the Subjects. But the inſtance tells in what ſenſe this is true. The Pope and Council cannot command continence to a certain ſort of perſons after promotion againſt their wills; quia continentia eſt res quæ poteſt perſuaderi, imperari autem non, Becauſe continence is a thing that may be perſwaded, but not commanded. The matter of the law is to be order'd according to the meaſures of the third Rule; but ſuppoſing that, this Rule is certain.

* Rule 3.

RULE VIII.

Humane laws of indifferent matter doe not oblige the Conſcience of the Subjects out of the dominions of the Superior.

1. EXtra territorium jus dicenti, non paretur, impune, is a famous ſaying in the Canon law, A man may ſafely diſobey the law of his Prelate if he be out of the Dioceſs. And the reaſon is, becauſe beyond his Dioceſs he hath no juriſdiction; and beyond his juriſdiction a Prince hath no power. Lex eſt jus proprium civitatis, ſaith the law; The law hath no power beyond it's own city. Thus anciently, in the Province of Canterbury the people did not faſt upon S. Marks day; but if they were within the Province of York they were tied to the common law, or cuſtome of the Church beſides. Thus alſo it is in maritime places, eſpecially in places of publick Trade and Merchandize: if the ſeveral Subjects ſhould keep the ſeveral Laws of their own Princes, it would cauſe great confuſion and diſorder upon the place of Trade; and ſince it is certain that ſtrangers muſt live by the laws of the Country where they ſojourn, it is certain they are not tied to the laws of their own, becauſe they may be contrary.

Cap. 2. de conſtitut. n. 6.

2. 1. But this hath divers limitations. For 1. It does not hold in the ſubſtantial matters of religion, where the religions of the Country differ. It is not lawful for a Subject of England to goe to Maſs in a forein Country; not onely upon ſuppoſition that the office is ſuſpicious or to be blam'd by the meaſures of the Divine Law, but if the laws of our Country have upon other prudent and juſt conſiderations forbidden it. The ſons of the Church of England profeſſing under the government Epiſcopal may not lawfully communicate in the Huguenot Churches with them that believe Epiſcopacy to be Antichriſtian or unlawful, becauſe this does relate to the evil and detriment of thoſe laws and that government and that authority under which we ſtill are tied. But in the ceremonial and ritual part of religion, where the religion is the ſame, we are not tied abroad to our Country cuſtomes. A Subject of the Church of England may ſtand at the Holy Communion, or eat it in leavened bread, if he come into Proteſtant Countries that have any ſuch cuſtome: and the reaſon of this is, becauſe the contrary would give ſcandal, to which our own laws neither doe nor can oblige abroad; and if any be offended at our different ceremonies at home, he muſt look to it, we are not concerned in any thing, but to obey our Superiour, and quietly to render a reaſon to our brethren.

3. 2. This Rule does not hold in ſuch laws which are the ſpecification of the Divine laws. Thus if a Subject of England ſhould be in Spain, and there ſee his Daughter diſhonoured, or his Wife conſent to her ſhame, and take her in Adultery; he may not kill her, though in Spain it be lawful for them to doe it. The reaſon is, becauſe ſhe is not a Subject of Spain, but hath an habituall relation to England, and therefore it is Murder if it be done by an Engliſh Subject. Concerning all his own Subjects, the Prince of the Countrey and the Legiſlative is to give limits to the indefinite lawes of God; and the reaſon is that which S. Paul gives, becauſe he who hath the rule over them is to give an account of their Souls. Every law therefore is to acquit or condemn herown Subjects: and therefore if a Spaniard does diſhonour the bed of an Engliſh Subject in Spain, it is lawfull there to kill him; becauſe his own Princes law condemns him, and gives leave to the injur'd perſon to be Executioner. All theſe particulars rely upon the ſame reaſon.

4. 3. This Rule does not hold, when though the Subject be abroad, yet the action does relate to his own Country. Thus it is not lawful abroad to coyn or counterfeit the money of his Country, to rail upon his Prince, to prejudice his Subjects, to violate his honour, to diſgrace his Nation, to betray the ſecrets and diſcover the Counſels of his Prince. Becauſe the evil done out of the territory being an injury to them within, is as if it were done within. When the diſpute was between the Athenians and Thebans about their confines, and the parties ſtood at a little diſtance, diſputing and wrangling about the breadth of an acre of ground, Timotheus ſhoots an arrow and kills a young Theban Gentleman. The Thebans demand that Timotheus be put to death by the laws of Athens, as being their Subject: they refuſe to doe ſo, but deliver Timotheus to the Thebans, giving this reaſon, He ſhot the arrow within the Athenian limit, but it did the miſchief within the territory of Thebes; and where the evil is done, there and by them let the criminal be puniſh'd. Being abroad is no excuſe cuſe in this caſe. If a Subject ſhoots an arrow into his own Country, though he bent his bow abroad, at home he ſhall find the ſtring.

5. 4. If the action be ſomething to be done at home, the Subject abroad is bound to obey the ſummons of the law. When Henry the ſecond of England commanded all Prelates and Curates to reſide upon their Dioceſes and charges, Thomas Becket of Canterbury was bound in conſcience, though he was in France, to repair to his Province at home. The ſumme of all is this, A law does not oblige beyond the proper territory, unleſs it relate to the good or evil of it. For then it is done at home to all real events of nature, and to all intents and purpoſes of law. For if the law be affirmative, commanding ſomething to be done at home, at home this omiſſion is a ſin: Qui non facit quod facere debet, videtur facere adverſus ea quæ non facit, ſaith the Law, The omiſſion is a ſin there where the action ought to have been done. But if the Law be negative, Qui facit quod facere non debet, non videtur facere id quod facere juſſus eſt. He that does what he is forbidden to doe is anſwerable to him who hath power to command him to doe it. L. Qui non facit ff. de regulis juris.

6. This Rule thus explicated is firm; and is to be extended to exempt or priviledged places, according to that ſaying of the Lawyers, Locus exemptus habetur pro extraneo, He that lives in an exempt place, lives abroad.

7. By the proportions of this Rule it is eaſy to anſwer concerning ſtrangers, whether they be bound by the Laws of the Nation where they paſs or traffick. For in all things where they are not oblig'd by their own Prince, they are by the ſtranger, and that upon the ſame account; for if they who are abroad are not ordinarily bound by the Laws of their Country (except in the caſes limited) it is becauſe the juriſdiction and dominion of their Prince goes not beyond his own land; and in ſuch caſes the place is more then the perſon: but therefore it muſt goe ſo farre, and be the perſon what he will, yet in the territory he is under the law of that Prince. He is made ſo by that place. It is Lex terræ, the Law of the land in which he is: and in the peace of that he ſhall have peace, as God ſaid to the Jews concerning the land of their Captivity.

RULE IX.

Obedience to Laws is to be paid according to what is commanded, not according to what is beſt.

1. WHen Lacon was fighting proſperouſly, and had prevail'd very farre upon his enemies, it happened that a retreat was ſounded juſt as he was lifting up his hand to ſmite a conſiderable perſon; he turned his blow aſide and went away, giving this reaſon to him that asked him why, It is better to obey then to kill an enemy. But when Craſſus the Romane General ſent to Athens to an Engineer a command to ſend him ſuch a piece of timber towards the making of a battery, he ſent him one which he ſuppos'd was better; but his General cauſed him to be ſcourged for his diligence: and Torquatus Manlius being Conſul commanded his ſon not to fight that day with the Enemy, but he eſpying a great advantage fought and Vide A. Gellium lib. 1. cap. 13.

beat him and won a glorious victory, for which he was crown'd with a triumphant lawrel, but for his diſobedience loſt his head. It is not good to be wiſer then the laws; and ſometimes we underſtand not the ſecret reaſon of the Princes command, or the obedience may be better then a good turn, or a better counſel; which is very often ill taken, unleſs it be requir'd. Corrumpi atque diſſolvi officium omne imperantis ratus ſi quis ad id quod facere juſſus eſt, non obſequio debito, ſed conſilio non deſiderato reſpondeat, ſaid Craſſus in A. Gellius.

2. Thus alſo it is in the obſervation of the Divine Commandements: when God hath declared his will, and limited our duty to circumſtances and particulars, he will not be anſwered by doing that which we ſuppoſe is better. We muſt not be running after Sermons, when we ſhould be labouring to provide meat for our family: for beſides that it is direct diſobedience in the caſe now put, there is alſo an error in the whole affair; for that which we think is better then the Commandement, is not better: and this God declared in the caſe of Saul, Obedience is better then ſacrifice. No work is better then that which God appoints.

3. This is to be underſtood ſo that it is not onely left to our liberty, but it is alſo rewardable, for the Subject to prevent a Commandement, and to excell the meaſures of the Law in the matter of a Commandement, when to doe ſo we know will be accepted, and is to the pleaſure and uſe of the Prince. Thus Aſtyages preferr'd Chryſantas before Hyſtaſpes, becauſe he did not onely obey as Hyſtaſpes did, but underſtood the mind of the Prince, and when he knew what would pleaſe him, did it of his own accord. But then this is upon the ſame account, it is obedience, onely it is early and it is forward.

4. This alſo is to be added, that if the choice of the Subject differing from the command of the Prince be very proſperous and of great benefit, the Prince does commonly ex poſt facto allow the deed; that is, he does not puniſh it. P. Craſſus Mutius and T. Manlius did otherwiſe; but they were ſevere and great examples. But when it is not puniſh'd, it is not becauſe it does not deſerve it, but becauſe it is pardon'd: for if it ſhould miſcarry, it would not eſcape vengeance: and therefore though the proſperous event be lov'd, yet it came in at a wrong door, and the diſobedience was criminal. Δεσποτου μὲν ἐστι μόνον ὁ ὑπιτάττειν· δὲλων ὁ πείθεσθαι, Maſters are to command, but the province of ſervants is to obey, ſaith S. Chryſoſtome.

5. This Rule is to be underſtood according to the intention, not according to the letter of the law; for if the intention of it be that which is better, it is evident that is to be done which is better in the intention, not that which is commanded in the letter. But of this in the Chapter of interpretation of Laws.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of Laws Penal and Tributary.

RULE I.

It is lawful for Christian Magistrates to make penal Laws, not onely pecuniary and of restraint, but of loss of member and life it self.

1. WHatsoever is necessary is just; that is, that must be done which cannot be avoided: and therefore the power of the Magistrate in punishing the transgressors of their laws of peace, and order, and interest, is infinitely just *; for without a coercitive power there can be no government, and without government there can be no communities of men; a herd of wolves is quieter and more at one then so many men, unless they all had one reason in them, or have one power over them. Ancus Rex primus Carcerem in Romano foro ædificavit, ad terrorem increscentis audaciæ, says Livy. King Ancus seeing impiety grow bold, did erect a prison in the publick markets. When iniquity was like to grow great, then that was grown necessary. And it is observ'd that the Macedonians call Death Δαν. from the Hebrew word DAN, which signifies a Judge, as intimating that Judges are appointed to give sentences upon criminals in life and death. And therefore God takes upon himself the title of a King and a Judge, of a Lord and Governour; and gives to Kings and Judges the title of Gods, and to Bishops and Priests the style of Angels.

1 Chron. 29. 12. 1 Tim. 6. 15. Psal. 82. 6.

2. But here I will suppose that Magistracy is an ordinance of God, having so many plain Scriptures for it; and it being by S. Paul affirmed, that he beareth not the sword in vain, and that they who have done evil ought to fear; and of himself he professed that if he had done ought worthy of death he did not refuse to die; and a caution given by S. Peter, that Christians should take care that they doe not suffer as malefactors: and it being made a note of hereticks that they are Traytors, that they are murmurers, that they despise dominion, that they speak evil of dignities; and that we are commanded to pray for Kings and all that are in authority, for this reason, because they are the appointed means that men should live a peaceable and a godly life; for piety, and peace, and plenty too depend upon good Governments: and therefore Apollo Pythius told the Lacedemonian Embassadors that if they would not call home Plistonax their King from banishment and restore him to his right, they should be forc'd to till their ground with a silver Plough; that is, they should have scarcity of corn in their own Cities, and be forc'd to buy their grain to relieve the famine of their Country: for so the event did expound the Oracle; they grew poor and ſtarv'd becauſe they unjuſtly ſuffer'd their King to live in exile. Adde to theſe, that we are often commanded to obey them that have the rule over us; to be ſubject to every ordinance of man; that Rulers are not a terror to good works but to the evil, and many more to equal purpoſes.

3. Neither ought the precept of charity and forgiveneſs, which Chriſt ſo often, ſo earneſtly, ſo ſeverely preſſes, evacuate the power of Princes. For the precept of forgiving offendors does not hinder parents from correcting their offending children; nor Maſters from chaſtiſing their rebellious ſervants; nor the Church from excommunicating them that walk diſorderly: theſe things rely upon plain Scriptures, and upon neceſſity, and experience; and they doe evince thus much without any further diſpute, that ſome puniſhment may ſtand with the precept of forgiveneſs; or at leaſt, if he who is injur'd may not puniſh without breach of charity, yet ſome one elſe may. And if it be permitted to the power of man to puniſh a criminal without breach of charity; the power of the Magiſtrate muſt be without all queſtion; and that ſuch a power can conſiſt with charity there is no doubt, when we remember that the Apoſtles themſelves and the primitive Churches did deliver great Criminals over to the power of Sathan to be buffeted, even to the deſtruction of the fleſh, that their Souls might be ſav'd in the day of the Lord. S Paul delivered Elymas to blindneſs, and S. Peter gave Ananias and Saphira to a corporal death.

4. But the great Caſe of Conſcience is this. Although all puniſhments leſs then death may like paternal corrections conſiſt with charity (for they may be diſciplines and emendations) yet in death there is no amendment; and therefore to put a man to death flagrante crimine, before he hath mortified his ſin, or made amends for it; that is, before it is pardon'd, and conſequently to ſend him to hell, is the moſt againſt charity in the world, and therefore no man hath power to doe it: for God never gave to any man a power to diſpenſe juſtice to the breach of charity; and that diſpenſation which ſends a man to Hell, is not for edification, but for deſtruction.

5. To this I anſwer, 1. That it is true that whatſoever is againſt charity is not the effect of juſtice; for both of them are but imitations and tranſcripts of the Divine attributes and perfections, which cannot be contrary to each other. But when the faults and diſorders of mankind have intangled their own and the publick affairs, they may make that neceſſary to them, which in the firſt order and intention of things was not to be endur'd. Thus we cut off a leg and an arm to ſave the whole body; and the publick magiſtrate, who is appointed to defend every mans rights, muſt pull an honeſt mans houſe to the ground to ſave a town or a ſtreet: and peace is ſo dear, ſo good, that for the confirming and perpetuity of it, he may commence a warre which were otherwiſe intolerable. If therefore any evil comes by ſuch miniſteries of juſtice, they who introduc'd the neceſſity muſt thanke themſelves. For it is neceſſary it ſhould be ſo; though it be but a ſuppoſitive and introduc'd neceſſity; onely he that introduc'd it, is the cauſe of the evil; not he that is to give the beſt remedy that he hath.

6. 2. No man is to anſwer for an accidental effect that is conſequent to his his duty. In omni diſpoſitione attenditur quod principaliter agitur, ſaies the law, l. ſi quis nec cauſam, ff. ſi certum petatur. I am to look to what is principally deſign'd, not what accidentally can happen. If I obey God, it is no matter who is offended. If I ſee that my neighbour will envy me for doing good, and his eye will be evil becauſe I am good, I am not to omit the good, for fear his Soule periſh; when my good is rather apt to doe him good then evil: he is to anſwer for it, not I, for nothing that I doe makes him evil, he makes himſelf ſo by his own choice. There are many men that turn the grace of God into wantonneſs; and abuſe the long ſuffering and patience of God, and turn that into occaſions of ſin which God meant for the opportunities and endearments of repentance; but if God ſhould leave to be gracious to mankind in the ſame method, out of charity and compliance with the intereſt of the Souls of ſuch miſerable perſons, as they would be never the better, ſo the other parts of mankind would be infinitely the worſe.

7. 3. It is true that Charity is the duty of every Chriſtian; but as all Chriſtians are not to expreſs it in the ſame manner, ſo there are ſome expreſſions of charity which may become ſome perſons, and yet be the breach of anothers duty: and ſome may become our wiſhes which can never be reduc'd to act; and becauſe that is all we can doe, it is all we are oblig'd to doe. When Vertagus was condemn'd to die for killing the brother of Aruntius Priſcus; the poor Father of the condemned man came and beg'd for the life of his miſerable ſon; but Priſcus out of the love of his murder'd brother beg'd with the ſame importunity that he might not eſcape; and both their effects were the effects of charity. The charity of a Prelate and a Miniſter of religion is another thing then the charity of a Prince. A Mother ſignifies her love one way and a Father another; ſhe by fondneſs and tender uſages, he by ſevere counſels and wiſe education; and when the Miniſter of religion takes care concerning the Soul of the poor condemn'd man, the Prince takes care that he ſhall doe no more miſchief, and increaſe his ſad account with God. The Prince and the Prelate are both of them Curates of Souls and Miniſters of Godlineſs; but the Prince miniſters by puniſhing the evil doer and rewarding the vertuous, and the Prelate by exhortation and doctrine, by reproof and by prayer, by Sacraments and diſcipline, by the key of power and the key of knowledg. The effect of this conſideration is this; that the magiſtrate by doing juſtice in the preſent caſe does not doe againſt charity; becauſe he does miniſter to charity in the capacity and proper obligation of a Magiſtrate, when he does his own work, which being ordain'd for good and not for evil, the office is then moſt charitable and moſt proper for him, when he miniſters to charity in his own way that God hath appointed him. By his juſtice he miniſters to the publick Good, and that is his office of charity. That is his work; let others look to their ſhare.

8. 4. The cutting off of a Malefactor is ſome charity to his perſon, though a ſad one; for beſides that it prevents many evils, and forces him to a ſpeedy recollection, and a ſummary repentance, and intenſe acts of vertue by doubling his neceſſity; it does alſo cauſe him to make amends to the law; and that oftentimes ſtands him in great ſtead before the Tribunal of Gods juſtice; paullum ſupplicii ſatis eſt Patri; God is ſometimes pleas'd to accept of a ſmall puniſhment for a great offence; and his anger many times goes not beyond a temporal death, and the cutting off ſome years of his life.

9. 5. That which concerns the Magiſtrate is, that he be juſt and charitable too. Juſtice of it ſelf is never againſt charity; but ſome actions of ſuppos'd charity may be againſt juſtice. Therefore the Magiſtrate in that capacity is tied to no charity but the charity of juſtice, the mercies of the law; that is, that he abate of the rigor as much as he can, that he make proviſions for the Soul of the criminal ſuch as are fit for his need, that if he can delay, he doe not precipitate executions. In what is more, the ſupreme, the law-giver is to take care, and to give as much leave to the miniſters of juſtice as can conſiſt with the publick intereſt. For here it is that there is uſe of that propoſition, that all men are not tied to all the exterior kinds and expreſſions of charity, but as they are determin'd accidentally. It will not be ſuppos'd that the Judge is uncharitable if he doe not preach to the condemn'd criminal; or if he doe not give him money after ſentence, or viſit him in priſon, or goe to pray with him at the block; theſe are not the portions of his duty: but as his juſtice requires him to condemne him; ſo his charity exacts of him as Judge nothing but the mercies of the law.

10. 6. That which is neceſſary to be done, is not againſt any mans duty, or any precept of Chriſtianity. Now that ſome ſorts of perſons ſhould be put to death is ſo neceſſary, that if it were not done it would be certainly, directly and immediately a very great uncharitableneſs; and the Magiſtrate ſhould even in this inſtance be more uncharitable then he can be ſuppos'd to be in putting the criminal to death. For a high-way thief and murderer if he be permitted does cut off many perſons who little think of death; and ſuch as are innocent as to the Common-wealth, are yet very guilty before God: for whoſe Souls and the ſpace of whoſe repentance there is but very ill proviſion made, if they may live who ſhall ſend many Souls to hell, by murdering ſuch perſons who did not watch and ſtand in readineſs againſt the ſad day of their ſudden arreſt. If all ſuch perſons were to be free from afflictive puniſhments, the common-wealth would be no ſociety of peace, but a direct ſtate of warre, a ſtate moſt contrary to governments; but if there were any other leſs then death, the gallies and the Mines, and the priſons would be nothing but nurſeries of villains, which by their numbers would grow as dangerous as a herd of Wolves and Lions: and if ever they ſhould break into a warre, like Spartacus and his rabble, who knows how many Souls ſhould be ſent to Hell for want of time to finiſh their repentance?

11. 7. If the condemn'd Criminal had never any time to repent, if he had never thrown away any opportunities of ſalvation, he had never come to that paſs; and if he have, who is bound to give him as much as he will need? And if it be unlawful for a magiſtrate to put a criminal to death that hath not ſufficiently repented, then no villain ſhall ever die by the publick hand of juſtice; and the worſe the man is, the longer he ſhall live, and the better he ſhall eſcape: for in this caſe, if he reſolves privately that he never will repent, he hath blunted the edge of the ſword, and weakned the arme of juſtice for ever that ſhe ſhall never ſtrike.

8. God

12. 8. God hath given a commiſſion to Magiſtrates which they muſt not prevaricate: if therefore a Criminal falls under the rods and axes of the Conſuls who are Gods Miniſters for good to them that doe well, and for evil to them that doe evil; it is not the Magiſtrate who is to be blam'd, but the hand of God that is to be rever'd, who by this hand cuts him off, and it may be therefore thus cuts him off becauſe he will give him no longer time. However the Magiſtrate is to look to his rule, not to rare, and accidental events; which are onely in the power of the Divine providence and in the will of the Man to prevent.

13. 9. No man can ſay that a condemn'd Criminal that makes the beſt uſe of his time after ſentence, or after his juſt fears of it, or after the apprehenſion of the probabilities of it, ſhall certainly be damn'd for want of more time. For as no man knows juſt how much time is neceſſary; ſo neither can he tell how deep the repentance of the Man is, nor yet how ſoon God will return to mercy. Therefore upon ſo great uncertainties, and the preſumption and confidences relying upon ſuch a ſecret, to omit a certain duty is no way allowable. It is true there are amongſt ſome wiſe and pious perſons great fears in this caſe; but fear is very good when it is made uſe of to good purpoſes, to obſtruct the courſe of ſin, but not the courſe of juſtice. And ſome men fear in other caſes very bad; which yet ought not to be made uſe of to preſerve the lives of Murderers. Some fear that all Papiſts ſhall be damned, and ſome ſay that all Proteſtants are in as bad condition; and yet he that thinks ſo, would ſuppoſe the caſe too far extended if it might not be conſiſtent with charity to put (for examples ſake) the gunpowder Traytors to death, till they had chang'd their religion. Whatſoever we fear, we are to give our brethren warning of it while it is time for them to conſider; but theſe doubtful diſputes muſt not be us'd as artifices to evacuate the purpoſes and defenſatives of laws. And ſince the Magiſtrates cannot know what the ſentence of God concerning ſuch perſons ſhall be, they may hope well as readily as ill, and then there is no pretence to arreſt the ſentence beyond the prudent and charitable periods of the law.

14. 10. No change in government, no alteration of laws, no publick ſentences are to be made or alter'd upon the account of any ſecret Counſel of God; but they are to proceed to iſſue upon the account of rules, and meaſures of choice, and upon that which is viſible, or proved, that which is ſeen and heard, that which God commands and publick neceſſities require; for otherwiſe there can be no rule, no orderly proceedings, no uſe of wiſe diſcourſes, but chance and fear and irregular contingencies muſt overrule all things.

15. 11. The Magiſtrate gives ſentence againſt Criminals for ſingle acts, not for vitious habits; for concerning theſe he hath nothing to doe, and if the Criminal periſh for theſe, it is onely chargeable upon his own account. But if by the hand of juſtice he dies for a ſingle act; the ſhorter time that is uſually allowed to thoſe that are appointed to die may be ſo ſufficient that if the Criminal make full uſe of it, his caſe is not ſo deſperate, as that the objection can prevail: for if there be nothing elſe to hinder him, it may be very well; but if there be any thing elſe, that he and not the Magiſtrate was firſt to have conſidered; for himſelf knew of it, the Magiſtrate did not.

12. Every

16. 12. Every man that lives under government knows the conditions of it, thoſe publick laws, and the manners of execution; and that he who is ſurpris'd in his ſin by the Magiſtrate, ſhall be cut off like him who by a ſudden ſickneſs falls into the hands of God. It is a ſudden death, which every man ought to have provided for; onely in this caſe it is more certain, and to be expected: and he that knows this to be his condition, if he will deſpiſe the danger, when he falls into it, cannot complain of the juſtice of the law, but of his own folly which neglected life, and choſe death and ſwift deſtruction.

See the Doctr. and Practiſe of Repentance, chap. 5. ſect. 5. p. 280.

17. Though from theſe conſiderations it appears that the pretence of charity cannot evacuate that juſtice which hath given commiſſion to all lawful Magiſtrates, and warrant to all capital ſentences, and authority to all juſt warrs, in which it is more then probable many will be kill'd that are not very well prepared: yet this power of inflicting capital puniſhments muſt not be reduc'd to act in trifling inſtances, for the loſs of a few ſhillings or for every diſobedience to command; it muſt not be done, but in the great and unavoidable neceſſities of the Common-wealth. For every Magiſtrate is alſo a Man; and as he muſt not neglect the care and proviſions of that, ſo neither the kindneſſes and compaſſion of this. Nothing can make recompence for the life of a man, but the life of a better, or the lives of many, or a great good of the whole community. But when any of theſe is at ſtake, it is fit the innocent be ſecur'd by the condemnation of the Criminal. And this was excellently diſputed by Cicero in his argument againſt Calenus upon this very queſtion. Hoc intereſt inter meam ſententiam & tuam: ego nolo quenquam civem committere ut morte multandus ſit; tu etiamſi commiſerit, etiam conſervandum putas. In corpore ſi quid ejuſmodi eſt quod reliquo corpori noceat, uri ſecarique patiamur, ut membrorum aliquod potius quam totum corpus intereat. Sic in Reip. corpore ut totum ſalvum ſit, quicquid eſt peſtiferum amputetur. Dura vox; multo illa durior: ſalvi ſint improbi, deleantur innocentes, honeſti, boni, tota Reſpublica. Cicero would have no Citizen deſerve to die; but Calenus would have none die though he did deſerve it. But Cicero thought it reaſon that as in the body natural we cut off an arm to ſave the whole, ſo in the body politick we doe the ſame, that nothing remain alive that will make the other die. It is a hard ſentence: it is true, but this is a harder. Let the wicked be ſafe; and let the innocent, the good, the juſt men, the whole common-wealth be deſtroyed.

Philippic. 8.

18. This we ſee is natural reaſon, but it is more then ſo; it is alſo a natural law, expreſs'd and eſtabliſhed by God himſelf. He that ſheddeth mans blood, in man, or by man, ſhall his blood be ſhed: which words are further explicated by the Chaldee Paraphraſt, Qui effuderit ſanguinem hominis cum teſtibus, juxta ſententiam Judicum ſanguis ejus fundetur, He that ſheds the blood of man with witneſſes, his blood ſhall be ſhed by the ſentence of the Judge. For the Majeſty of the ſupreme Prince or Judge ſaid Guntherus with greater truth then elegance: he hath the force of a juſt terror in all places, at all times, and upon all perſons. And in purſuance of

of this law all communities of men have comported themſelves, as knowing themſelves but Miniſters of the Divine ſentence; and that which is the voice of all the world is the voice of nature, and the voice of God. The ſumme of theſe things I give in the words of S. Auſtin. Non ipſe occidit qui miniſterium debet jubenti, ſicut adminiculum gladius eſt utenti. Ideo nequaquam contra hoc præceptum fecerunt, quo dictum eſt, Non occides, qui Deo authore bella geſſerunt, aut perſonam gerentes publicæ poteſtatis, ſecundum ejus leges, hoc eſt, juſtiſſimæ rationis imperium, ſceleratos morte puniverunt. They who make juſt warrs, and thoſe publick perſons who according to the laws put malefactors to death, doe not break the Commandement which ſaies, Thou ſhalt not kill. For as the ſword is not guilty of murder which is the inſtrument of juſt executions, ſo neither is the man that is the Miniſter of the Judge, nor the Judge who is the Miniſter of God; Θεοῦ διάκονος, ἔκδικος εἰς ὀργὴν, Gods Miniſter of revenge and anger: and by fear to reſtrain the malice of evil men, and to prevent miſchief to the good, is the purpoſe of authority and the end of laws. So Iſidore, Facta ſunt leges ut earum metu humana coerceatur audacia, tutaque eſſet inter improbos innocentia, & in ipſis improbis formidato ſupplicio refrænaretur nocendi facultas. Fear is the beginning of wiſdome, and fear is the extinction and remedy of ſolly; and therefore the laws take care by the greateſt fear, the fear of death, to prevent or ſuppreſs the greateſt wickedneſs.

RULE II.

Penal laws doe ſometimes oblige the guilty perſon to the ſuffering the puniſhment, even before the ſentence and declaration of the Judge.

1. THat this is true concerning Divine Laws is without peradventure: not onely becauſe the power of God is ſupreme, meer, abſolute, and eternal, and conſequently can oblige to what, and by what meaſure, and in what manner, and to what purpoſes he pleaſe; but alſo becauſe we ſee it actually done in the laws and conſtitutions both Moſaical and Evangelical.

2. He that ſtrake out an eye or tooth from a ſervant was bound to give him his liberty: that is, as his ſervant was a loſer, ſo muſt he that cauſed it; the man loſt his tooth, and the Maſter loſt the man; he gains his liberty that loſt an eye. Now that this was to be done by the Maſter himſelf without compulſion from the Judge, is therefore more then probable, becauſe God who intended remedy to the injur'd ſervant had not provided it, if he left the matter to the Judge, to whom the ſervant could have no recourſe without his Maſter pleaſe; and if he give him leave to goe, it is all one as doing of it himſelf, for he that gives leave that himſelf be compell'd, firſt chuſes the thing, and calls in aid from abroad to ſecure the thing at home. But therefore God bound the conſcience of the man, tying him under pain of his own diſpleaſure that the remedy be given, and the penalty ſuffered and pai'd under the proper ſentence of the obliged criminal. Exod. 21. 25, 26.

3. To the ſame purpoſe was that law made for him that lies with a woman in the days of her ſeparation, he ſhall be unclean until the evening; now

Now that this was not to be inflicted by the Judge, but that the guilty person ſhould himſelf be the executioner of the penalty, is therefore certain, becauſe by another law concerning the ſame legal uncleanneſs it was decreed, that the fact ſhall be capital, that is, if it come before the Judge: of which I have already given account.

Lib. 2. chap. 2. Rule 3. n. 8.

4. Thus alſo God impoſed upon him that eat of the holy things unwittingly, the burden of paying the like, & a fifth part beſides for puniſhment of his negligence and want of caution. This himſelf was to bring, together with the price of redemption or expiation. Now this being done againſt his will, might alſo be done without the obſervation of any other; and yet upon the diſcovery he was thus to act his own amends and penalty.

Levit. 22. 14.

5. And indeed the very expence of Sacrifices, to the bringing of which the criminals were ſentenc'd by the law, is ſufficient demonſtration of this inquiry; for it was no ſmall burden to them, and diminution of their eſtates, to take long journeys, and bring fat beaſts and burn them to the Lord; but to this they themſelves were tied, without injunction from the Prieſt, or ſentence from the Judge. And this appears, becauſe they were tied to a diſtinct puniſhment if the matter fell into the Judges hand: they were in caſe of theft to reſtore four-fold: But if they had ſinn'd in this inſtance or in any other that men commit, they were bound to come and confeſs it, and ſhall recompence the treſpaſs with the principal thereof, and adde a fifth part to him againſt whom they have treſpaſſed. This the Jews call confeſſionem ſuper peccato ſingulari, a ſpecial confeſſion of a ſin; to which becauſe the ſinner was ſentenc'd by the law, and had a lighter amends appointed him if he did it voluntary, but a much heavier if he came before the criminal Judge; it follows plainly that God tied theſe delinquents to a voluntary or ſpontaneous ſuſception of their puniſhment. It was indeed an alleviation of their puniſhment; for the criminal was bound to confeſs (ſay the Jewiſh Doctors) and ſay when the beaſt goes to ſacrifice, thinking as if he were going as the beaſt is, O Domine, ego reus ſum mortis, ego commeruiſſem lapidari propter hoc peccatum, vel ſtrangulari propter hanc prævaricationem, vel comburi propter hoc crimen, O Lord, I am guilty of death, I have deſerv'd to be ſton'd, or ſtrangled, or burnt alive for this crime, according as the ſin was: but his being the executioner of the Divine ſentence in the leſſer inſtance did prevent the more ſevere and intolerable condemnation.

Num. 5. 6.

וידוי על עסק מיוחד

6. For indeed ſuch is the mercy and diſpenſation of God: Gods law decrees evil to him that does evil: if we become executioners of the law of God and of his angry ſentence, we prevent the greater anger of God; according to that of S. Paul, judge your ſelves, brethren, that ye be not judged of the Lord. If we humble our ſelves, God will exalt us; if we ſmite, he will ſpare; if we repent, he will repent: but therefore in theſe caſes between God and us it is ſo far from being a grievance, that we become executioners of the ſentence decreed by law againſt us, that though it be an act of juſtice in God to oblige us to it, yet it is alſo a very great mercy. For as in the law of Moſes, the ſpontaneous ſuſception of the puniſhment did prevent the heavier hand of the Judge from falling on him; ſo in the Evangelical law, it prevents the intolerable hand of God. So that in relation relation to the law of God it is an action of repentance; and repentance being a penal or punitive duty, he that was tied to bring in his own oblation, to make his own amends, to confeſs willingly his ſin, was in effect tied to nothing but to a voluntary repentance.

7. And thus it is alſo in ſome proportion in humane laws. For by theſe premiſſes thus much is gain'd, that to oblige the criminal to a ſpontaneous ſuffering of the puniſhment appointed by the laws of a juſt ſuperior is not naturally unjuſt, and it is not alwaies intolerable, and it may be very reaſonable, and it may be a deſign of mercy, or at leaſt a very apt miniſtery of juſtice: and therefore there can be no reaſonable objection againſt it, but that upon juſt account, and in juſt meaſures, and for great reaſon, and by the proportions of equity it may be done in humane laws.

8. For 1. Whatſoever is not againſt the law of Nature, nor the law of God, may be done or enjoyn'd to be done by the laws of Man; for the power of Magiſtrates is the next great thing to God and Nature. Now concerning this, we have ſecurity not onely from the foregoing inſtances, but from the law of Chriſt concerning divorce upon the inſtance of adultery: the offending party looſes his or her right reſpectively over the body of the other, and cannot lawfully demand conjugal rights. The injurious perſon may begge for pardon and reſtitution; but is unjuſt if he require any thing as duty. The woman looſes her rights of ſociety, and the Man of ſuperiority, in caſe they be adulterous; and if they doe not quit their former rights, and ſit down under their own burden, and miniſter the ſentence of God by their own hands, they ſin anew: every ſuch demand or act of dominion is iniquity and injuſtice, it is an act of an incompetent power, and therefore, under pain of a new ſin, they muſt not act under it.

9. 2. A man can inflict puniſhment upon himſelf. Thus Zacheus in expiation of his ſins offer'd half his goods to the poor, and reſtitution fourfold; which was more then he did need; for if his confeſſion and reſtitution were ſpontaneous, he was tied onely to the principal, and the ſuperaddition of a fifth part, as appears above. But he choſe the puniſhment, even ſo much as the Judge himſelf could have inflicted. Thus we read of a Biſhop in the primitive ages of the Church who, quia ſemel tactu fœmineo ſorduerat, becauſe he had once fallen into uncleanneſs, ſhut himſelf up in a voluntary priſon for nine years together: and many we read of who out of the Spirit of penance liv'd lives of great auſterity, uſing rudeneſſes to their bodies; by the pain of their bodies to expiate the ſin of their Souls. Now whatſoever any man hath power to doe to himſelf, that the law hath power to command him; ſuppoſing a reaſon or a neceſſity in the law proportionably great to the injunction, and to be of it ſelf a ſufficient cauſe of the ſuffering. It is true a man may doe it to himſelf to pleaſe his humor, or for vain-glory, or out of melancholy. I doe not ſay he does well in ſo doing; but that he hath power to doe it, without doing injury to any one: and if he does it to himſelf without cauſe, or without ſufficient cauſe, he does no man wrong; he does no more then he hath power to doe, alwaies provided he keeps within the limits of the ſixth Commandement. Now although the law pretends not to this power of doing it without reaſon, becauſe all the power of the law is ἐν τῷ πρὸς τι in relation to others, in commutative and diſtributive juſtice, and publick and private charities; yet the ſame authority which any man hath over himſelf in order to private ends, the law hath over him in order to the publick; becauſe he is a part of the publick, and his own power over himſelf is in the publick, as every particular is in the univerſal. Nay the law hath a greater power then the man; for a man hath not power over his own life, which the law hath; ſo that whatever a man alone can doe, that the law can command him to doe: (except it be in ſuch things which are wholly by God left in a mans power, and are ſubjected to no laws of man, and commanded by no law of God; as in the matter of ſingle life, and other counſels Evangelical) the ſame things (I ſay) though not for the ſame reaſons. If therefore the man can upon himſelf inflict an evil which he hath deſerved, the law can compel him, that is, ſhe hath competent authority to doe it: and then he is bound in Conſcience.

10. 3. In matters favourable, and yet of great intereſt, we find that there are many events by the ſentence of the law without the ſentence of a Judge. Thus the right of Primogeniture is ſufficient ordinarily to enter upon the inheritance without a ſolemn decree of Court; and if we conſider the reaſon of this, it will be of equal force in the preſent inquiry. For when matters are notorious, and the people willing, and it is every mans caſe, and there is a great neceſſity, and publick utility, it is ſufficient when the rule is ſet; every man knowes his part, and his way, and Judges are not neceſſary. But when men are to blame, and there are intrigues in cauſes, and men will ſnatch at what is none of their own, and they will not underſtand their duty, nor judge righteous judgements in things concerning themſelves and their neighbours; it is neceſſary that there be Judges and Advocates and all the inferior Miniſters of laws, that where the law is intricate, and men cannot judge and diſcern aright, or when they are intereſted and will not, the law may be interpreted, and their duty explained, and every man righted that otherwiſe would be wrong'd. The ſentence of the Judge is but accidentally neceſſary: for the law ſaying that the eldeſt Son is heir to an inteſtate Father, the caſe is plain, and who is the eldeſt Son is notorious, and he is willing enough to enter upon the inheritance; and therefore beſides the law in this caſe there needs no ſentence of the Judge. Now the law is as plain in the condemnation of ſome crimes, and the aſſignation of ſome puniſhments. But becauſe men are not willing to enter into puniſhment, and they are not tied publickly to accuſe themſelves, therefore there are Judges to give ſentence, and executioners appointed. And this is well enough in ſome caſes: but becauſe there are ſome caſes in which it is neceſſary that the laws be obeyed in private as well as in publick, and yet without penalties a law is but a dead hand and a broken cord; the law annexes puniſhments, but is forc'd to truſt the ſinning hand to be the ſmiter, becauſe the private action cannot be publickly puniſh'd, becauſe not brought before the Judge.

11. 4. Beſides this, there are ſome actions of ſo evil effect as to the publick, that for deteſtations ſake they are to be condemn'd as ſoon as done, hated as ſoon as nam'd, ſtrangled as ſoon as born; and when by ſuch a ſentence the act is repreſented ſo foul, the man ſtands more ready for repentance, and himſelf is made the inſtrument. It is like a plain caſe in which any man may be allowed to be a Judge: for modeſty's ſake and for humanity every man will condemn ſome ſins; even though themſelves be the guilty guilty persons. However the law takes the wisest course to give an universal sentence, that as the man is αὐτοκατήγορος, so he may be αὐτοκατάκριτος, self-accus'd, and self-condemn'd; and not to expect the contingent discovery, and the long deferred solemnities of law. Some sins goe before unto judgment, saies the Apostle, and some follow after: that is, some are condemn'd ipso jure by the law, and the man does ipso facto incurre the penalty; others stay for the sentence of the Judge.

12. 5. In the Court of Conscience every man is his own accuser, and his own executioner; and every penitent man is a Judge upon himself: God trusts man with the infliction of punishments and hard sentences upon himself for sin; onely if man fails, God will judge him to worse purposes; and so does the law. And as the impenitent people favour themselves to their own harm, for they sin against God even in their very forbearing to punish and to kill the sin: so doe the impenitent disobey the law by not being their own executioners of wrath: but in both cases the Conscience is oblig'd.

The thing therefore is just, and reasonable, and useful.

13. Now for the reducing of this to practice, and stating the cases of Conscience for the subject, as I have already done for the law-giver, I am to shew,

1. In what cases the Conscience of the subjects can be bound to inflict penalties upon themselves without the sentence of the Judge.

2. By what signs we shall know when the law does intend so to bind; that is, when the sentence is given by the law, so that the sinner is ipso facto liable to punishment, and must voluntarily undergoe it.

In what cases the Criminal is to be his own executioner.

14. 1. When to the execution of the punishment appointed by the law there is no action requir'd on the part of the guilty person, the conscience is bound to submit to that sentence, and by a voluntary or willing submission verify the sentence, such as are excommunication, suspension, irregularity and the like. Thus if irregularity be ipso facto incurr'd, the offending person is bound in Conscience not to accept a benefice or execute an office to which by that censure he is made unhabile and unapt. If a law be made that whoever is a common swearer shall be ipso facto infamous, he that is guilty is bound in Conscience not to offer testimony in a cause of law; but to be his own Judge and executioner of that sentence. But this is not true in all cases, but with the provision of the following measures.

15. 2. If the law imposes a penalty to be incurred ipso facto, yet if the penalty be moderate, equal and tolerable, the Conscience is oblig'd to a voluntary susception of it, before the sentence of the Judge, although the sentence be not privative, but executive; that is, though there be something to be acted by the guilty person upon himself. Thus if excommunication be incurred ipso facto, he that is guilty of the fact deserving it, & is fallen into the sentence, is not onely bound to submit to those estrangements and ſeparations, thoſe alienations of ſociety and avoidings which he finds from the duty of others, but if by chance he be in a ſtranger place where they know not of it, and begin Divine ſervice, he is bound in Conſcience to goe away, to reſign an Eccleſiaſtical benefice if he be poſſeſſed of one, and other things of the ſame neceſſity for the verification of the ſentence: and the reaſon is, becauſe every act of Communion or office is in his caſe a rebelling againſt the ſentence of the law, the verification of which depends upon himſelf as much as upon others: for every ſuch perſon is like a man that hath the plague, all men that know it avoid him; but becauſe all men doe not know it, he is bound in Conſcience to avoid them, and in no caſe to run into their company, whether they know him, or know him not. Now becauſe this does not oblige to all ſorts of active executions of the ſentence, the following meaſures are the limit of it.

16. 3. The law does not oblige the guilty perſon to ſuch active executions of the ſentence which are meerly and intirely active; that is, which doe not include a negative, or ſomething contrary to the paſſive obedience. Thus if a Traitor be ſentenc'd to a confiſcation of goods, & this be ipſo jure incurred; the guilty perſon is not tied to carry all his goods to the publick treaſure, but he is tied not to change, not to diminiſh, not to aliene, not to uſe them otherwiſe then the law permits; becauſe if he doe any thing of theſe he does ſomething againſt the ſentence of the law, which in his caſe is rebellion and diſobedience. He may be truly paſſive and perfectly obedient to the ſentence of the law without hiring porters or waggons to carry his goods away; and the cuſtome of the law requires it not: but if he does aliene his goods he hath not ſo much as the paſſive obedience.

17. 4. In puniſhments corporal the laws doe not proceed without the ſentence of the Judge; except it be in the court of Conſcience, which is voluntary and by choice. Thus no man is ipſo jure condemn'd to be hang'd, or to be whipp'd, and no man is by any law bound to inflict ſuch puniſhments on himſelf; becauſe there is a natural abhorrency in ſuch actions, and it is that odious part of the law which is ſo much againſt nature and natural affection that none but the vileſt part of mankind are put to doe it unto others: & therefore becauſe the laws doe enjoyn no ſuch thing, the inquiry is needleſs, whether in ſuch caſes the Conſcience be oblig'd. But this is wholly depending upon the manners of men, and the preſent humors of the world. Amongſt ſome nations it was otherwiſe; and no queſtion but it might be ſo, if by circumſtances and the accidents of opinion and the converſation of the world the thing were not made intolerable.

Plutarch tels of Teribaſus, that being arreſted by the officers of death he reſiſted with ſuch a bravery as he us'd againſt the Kings enemies; but being told that they were ſent by the King, he preſently reached forth his hands and offer'd them to the Lictors to be bound. But this was no great matter, it was neceſſary; and he that is condemn'd to die by a juſt authority, ows to it at leaſt ſo much that he reſiſt not, that he goe to death when he is called, that he lie down under the axe when he is commanded: So did Stilico at the command of his ſon in law, Honorius the Emperour. It was more which was done by the Lithuanians under Vitoldus their King, who was brother to that Vladiſlaus famous for a memorable battel againſt the Turks; he commanded many to death, and they died without the hang-mans

Hang-man's hand, being the executioners of their King's laws upon themſelves. And Sabellicus tels, that the Ethiopians, when their King ſent a Meſſenger with the Enſigns of Death, they preſently went home and died by their own hands. And this was accounted among them ſo ſacred an obligation, that when a young timorous perſon thought to have fled, his mother took her girdle and ſtrangled him, leſt he ſhould diſhonour his family by diſobeying the law out of fear of death. This was brave; but ſome men cannot be willing to dye, and few can well ſuffer it: but therefore it is hard that any one ſhould be compelled to doe it to himſelf: Therefore the laws of Chriſtendome are wiſe and gentle; and excepting that of the Lithuanian Prince, who is reported to have been a Tyrant, it is not enjoyned by any Prince or any law amongſt us, that I know of. But this is not onely true in active executions, but in the paſſive penalties, which are very violent and extreme. Thus if a man were juſtly condemn'd to be immur'd and ſtarv'd to death, he is tied to ſubmit to it, as not to rebel, and by violence quit himſelf: but he is not tied ſo much as to the privative execution; that is, he is not bound to abſtain from meat, if it be brought to him. Thus we find in ſtory, of the pious Perſian Lady, who to her Father condemn'd to death by ſtarving gave her breaſts to ſuck, and preſerv'd his life; and he not at all made infamous by not dying; but had his life given as the reward of his Daughters piety. Lib. 2. Enead. 1.

18. 5. Condemn'd perſons are not tied to put themſelves to death, or cut off a member with their own hands, or doe execution, by doing any action, or abſtaining from doing any thing, when ſuch doing or abſtaining is the ſufficient, or the principal, or the immediate killing or diſmembring. But to the under-miniſteries they are ti'de, which cannot be done without them; that is, they are tied ſo far to act, as without which they cannot ſuffer: and this is to be extended even to the principal and immediate act of killing, if they onely ordinarily can doe it. Thus a condemn'd Criminal is bound to go to execution, or ſuffer himſelf quietly to be carried; to lie down under the Hangman's Axe, to aſcend the Ladder: and it is a great undecency of dying, and directly criminal, which is frequent enough in France, and is reported of Marſhal Biron, to fight with the Executioner, to ſnatch the Weapons from the Souldiers, to force the Officers to kill him, as a wild Bull or Lion is kill'd. * But a condemn'd man is alſo tied to drink his poyſon, if that be appointed him by law; for though this be the immediate act of killing, to which ordinarily condemn'd perſons are not oblig'd, yet becauſe it cannot well be done by an Executioner without his conſent, or extreme violence, the guilty perſon is bound to drink it: the reaſon is, becauſe the law muſt be obeyed, and at leaſt a paſſive obedience is to be given to the ſevereſt of her ſentences; and the paſſiveneſs of a man is to be diſtinguiſh'd from the paſſiveneſs of a beaſt; that which cannot be avoided, muſt be born well: and therefore if a man be baniſhed, he muſt go away, and not be dragg'd; and he that ſo reſiſts the laws, that he forces her Miniſters to hale the Criminal to death like an unwilling Swine, deſerves the burial of an Aſſe or Dog. But this alwayes muſt ſuppoſe the laws to be juſt, and the power competent; for elſe the ſuffering perſon may conſider, whether the quiet ſubmiſſion to it be not a verification of the ſentence, or of the authority, though even in ſuch caſes it is not the Hang-man that is unjuſt, or to be reſiſted, but the Judge or the laws; and therefore they are to be proteſted or de-

19. 6. When the puniſhments are principally or meerly medicinal, the Conſcience is bound to a voluntary execution of the ſentence, if the law requires it. For then the laws are precepts of inſtitution and diſcipline; and they are intended as mercies to the man, as well as to the publick; and of mercy every man may very well be Miniſter. It hath in it no undecency for a man to mingle his own ſevere potion, or let himſelf blood, or lance an Ulcer; and there is no more in the medicinal puniſhments of the law. Thus the laws can command us to faſt, to wear ſackcloth upon the bare skin, to go barefoot, to watch all night upon a ſolemnity of expiation, to inflict diſciplines, and the like; and for theſe we are to expect no other proceſs but the ſentence of the law, no Judge but our Conſciences, no Executioners but our ſelves. This relies upon the former reaſons, and the meer authority of the law, and the nature of the thing free from all objections.

20. 7. All ſentences of law which declare a fact to be void, or a charge and expences to be loſt, or a priviledge to ceaſe, are preſently obligatory to the Conſcience. Irrita prorſus ex nunc, & vacua nunciamus, is uſual in the ſtile of laws: & ſit ipſo jure irritum & inane; & careat omni robore firmitatis, non obtineat vires; let it be of no force, let it not prevail, let it be void, let him want all priviledge, all honour, dominion, action, or profit. For theſe and the like words, ſay the Logicians, have the force of an univerſal ſign, and doe diſtribute the Noun that is governed by the Verb; ſo they ſpeak; that is, it ſignifies and hath force in every particular, and in every period of time; let it want force, that is, let it want all force, that is, be of no uſe at all; careat is as much as omnino, penitus, prorſus careat.

21. 8. But theſe particulars ſuffer one limitation. A man is not bound to ſuffer the penalty of the law before the ſentence of the Judge, though the fact be ſentenc'd and condemn'd ipſo jure, if the fact be made publick, and brought before the Judge: Becauſe he taking it into his cogniſance, revokes the former obligation, by impoſing a new; by changing the method of the law, and leſſening the expectation. Thus by the laws Eccleſiaſtical, which were antiently of force in England, and are not yet repeal'd, Notorius percuſſor Clerici, he that openly or manifeſtly ſtrikes a Biſhop or Prieſt, is ipſo jure excommunicate; and to this ſentence the guilty perſon is bound to ſubmit: but in caſe he be brought before the Criminal Judge, and there be ſolemn proceſs form'd, he may ſuſpend his obedience to the law, becauſe the Judge calls him to attend to the ſentence of a man.

22. 9. But yet this is alſo ſo to be underſtood to be true in all exceptis ſententiis irritantibus, excepting ſentences of the declaring actions to be null, or priviledges void. For in theſe caſes, though the Judge doe take into his cogniſance the particular fault, and give a declarative ſentence of ſuch a nullity and evacuation, yet the action does not begin to be null, or the priviledge to ceaſe from the ſentence of the Judge, but from the doing of the fault, and the ſentence of the law: and therefore if a queſtion ariſes, and the Judge declare in it, the nullity is onely confirm'd by the Judge, but it was ſo by the ſentence of the law. Now the reaſon of the difference in in the case of nullities and evacuations from other cases, is, because that which is not, hath no effect, and can produce no action; and as a Citizen told the people of Athens, who upon the first news of Alexander's death would have rebelled, Stay (sayes he) make no hast; for if he be dead to day, he will be dead to morrow: So if the Judge declare that such an action was null, it was null all the way; if he sayes it be dead now as a punishment of the fault, it was dead as soon as the fault was done; for it died by the hand of the law, not by the hand of the Judge. In other things the limitation is to be observed.

23. 10. And this also holds, in case that it be upon any account necessary that the Judge give a declarative sentence: for sometimes in regard of others, the Judge must declare such a person excommunicate, or depriv'd, or silenc'd, or infamous, that they also may avoid him, or doe their respective duties. But although the guilty person be in conscience regularly oblig'd before that declarative sentence, it being nothing but a publication of what was in being before; yet it being a favourable case, and the law not loving extremities and rigours of animadversion, it is to be presumed that the law gives leave to the guilty person to stay execution till publication. Because no man is bound directly to defame himself; which he will hazard to doe, if he executes the sentence upon himself before the Judge calls others into testimony and observation of the sentence. But though the sentence may upon favourable conditions be retarded, it must at no hand be evacuated. Therefore if the Judge meddle not, the man is left to the sentence of the law. And it is in all these particulars to be remembred, that the law is a mute Judge, and the Judge is a speaking law. It is the saying of Cicero; and from thence is to be concluded, that when the Judge hath spoken, he hath said no new thing, and he hath no new authority; and therefore if the law hath clearly spoken before, she hath as much authority to bind where she intends to bind, as if she speaks by her Judges. Lib. 1. Offic

24. These considerations and this whole question is of great use in order to some parts of repentance, and particularly of restitution. For if a law be made, that if a Clerk within twelve months after the collation of a Parish-Church be not ordain'd a Priest, he shall ipso jure forfeit his Ecclesiastical Benefice; if he does not submit to the sentence, and recede from his Parish, he is tied in Conscience to make restitution of all the after profits which he receives or consumes. So that it hath real effect upon Consciences, and the material occurrences of men.

25. But then for the reducing of it to practice, I am next to account by what signs we shall know when it is sententia lata à jure, when it is lata ab homine; when it is lata, and when ferenda; that is, when the Criminal is to attend the sentence of the Judge, and the solennities of law and execution by the appointed Officer; and when he is to doe it himself, by his own act or positive submission upon the sentence of the law.

Signs by which we may judge when the Criminal is condemn'd ipso facto.

26. The surest measures are these. Those laws contain sententiam latam; and oblige the Criminal to a ſpontaneous ſuſception of the puniſhment, when 1. the law expreſly affirms, that the guilty perſon does ipſo facto incurre the ſentence without further proceſs, or ſentence of the Judge.

26. 2. When the law ſayes, that the Tranſgreſſor ſhall be bound in conſcience to pay the fine, or ſuffer the puniſhment contain'd in the Sanction of the law: which thing becauſe it is not uſual in laws, leſt I ſhould ſeem to ſpeak this to no purpoſe, I give an example out of the Spaniſh laws: for I finde in the laws of the Kingdome of Caſtile divers inſtances to this purpoſe; particularly, after the aſſignation of the Secretaries fee, appointing how much he may receive for the inſtruments of grace which he makes, it is added, Jurent quod obſervabunt ea quæ in præcedenti capitulo ordinata ſunt, & quod non accipient munera, & quod ſolvent pœnas ſi in eas inciderint, ad quas ex nunc eos condemnamus, ità ut ſint obligati in foro conſcientiæ ad ſolvendum eas, abſque hoc quod ſint ad illas condemnati. And the ſame alſo is a little after decreed concerning Judges and publick Notaries, that they take nothing beyond their allowed fees and ſalaries; and if they doe, they are to pay a certain fine. They are alſo to ſwear to obſerve that ordinance; and in caſe they doe not, that they will pay the fines to which the law does then ſentence them, that they be bound in Conſcience to doe it without any further condemnation by the ſentence of any man. Now the reaſon of this is, becauſe the Conſcience being intruſted and charg'd with the penalty, muſt ſuppoſe onely the duty and obligation of the man whoſe Conſcience is charg'd. It were fooliſh to charge the Conſcience, if the Conſcience were not then intended to be bound to ſee to the execution: but that could not be, if the ſentence of the Judge were to be expected; for that is a work of time, and will be done without troubling the Conſcience. Therefore the Conſcience being made the Sheriff or the Witneſs with the charge of execution, ſuppoſes the whole affair to be his own private duty.

Lib. 2. ordinat. Regal. tit. 9. l. 1.

Ibid. tit. 15.

27. 3. In cenſures Eccleſiaſtical it hath ſometimes been the uſage of the Legiſlator to impoſe a penalty, adding, that donec ſatisfecerit, untill ſuch or ſuch a thing be done, the Criminal ſhall not be abſolved: and this alſo is an indication that the ſentence is made by the law, and is ipſo facto incurred by the Delinquent, becauſe it leaves a ſecret tie upon his Conſcience obliging him to doe it; which were needleſs, if the Criminal Judge were to be intruſted with it, for he is otherwiſe ſufficiently intruſted with compulſories to ſecure the executions. Of this nature is that Conſtitution of Innocentius 4. cap. Romana, §. procurationes, de cenſibus, lib. 6. deſcribing the order for an Archbiſhop's viſitation of his own, and the Dioceſes of his Suffragan Biſhops; forbidding ſeverely him or any of his followers to receive a fee, bribe, reward, or preſent, qualitercunque offeratur, under what pretence ſoever it be offer'd, leſt he be found to ſeek that which is his own, not that which is of Jeſus Chriſt; adding, Quod ſi fuerit contrà præſumptum, recipiens maledictionem incurrat, à qua nunquam niſi duplum reſtituat liberetur, He that ſhall preſume to doe otherwiſe, and receive any thing, ſhall incurre a curſe, from which he ſhall never be abſolved till he have reſtored it two-fold. This relies upon the former reaſon.

4. Panormitan

28. 4. Panormitan gives this rule, That when a ſentence is ſet down in the law in words of the preſent or preter tenſe, it concludes the ſentence to be ipſo facto incurred; for whatſoever is ipſo jure decreed, is ipſo facto incurred: and of this decree, the preſent and paſt tenſes (ſaies the Abbat) are ſufficient indication. That is, if the words be damnatory; [as excommunicamus, anathemate innodamus, we doe deprive him of all rights and offices, &c.] for if the Judge uſing the like words paſſes a ſentence by virtue of thoſe words, ſo does the law, there being the ſame reaſon, the ſame authority, the ſame purpoſe ſignified by the ſame form of words. But if the words be of the preſent or paſt time, and yet not immediately damnatory, they doe imply the ſentence to be made afterwards; as decernimus, definivimus, declaramus, and the like. But if theſe words ſignify onely miniſterially, and not principally, that is, if they be joyned with other words in the preſent or paſt tenſe, then they declare the ſentence paſt and ipſo facto to be incurred; as declaramus eum privatum dominio bonorum; then the caſe is evident. Cap. Cæterum, &cap. Nonnulli de reſcriptis. cap. Novit. in fine de his quæ fiunt à prælato.

29. 5. Of the ſame conſideration it is when the ſentence of the law is ſet down with the verb ſubſtantive Sum, of what tenſe ſoever, unleſs by a future participle his nature be altered. Thus if a law ſaies, he that is abſent from his pariſh, without juſt cauſe to be approved by his Biſhop, above ſix moneths, eſt, or erit infamis, is or ſhall be infamous; the ſentence is ipſo jure lata, inferr'd by law, and ipſo facto incurr'd; becauſe the verb annexes the puniſhment to the fact without further proceſs. But if the verb be annexed to a future participle the caſe is altered; the ſentence is not to be undergone till the Judge have declared it. Now this relies upon the force of the words and the proper grammatical way of ſpeaking, which is the beſt way of declaring the mind of a man, or the mind of the law; unleſs where it is confeſſed that the law-giver did not intend, or uſe to ſpeak properly or by grammar, but by rude cuſtome. This note I have in A. Gellius, Verbum eſſe & erit, quando per ſe ponuntur, habent atque retinent tempus ſuum; cum vero præterito junguntur, vim temporis ſui amittunt, & in præteritum contendunt. If theſe words be not altered, they ſignify juſt by themſelves; eſt or erit excommunicatus, or infamis, ſignifies the puniſhment to begin as ſoon as the fact is done: but eſt excommunicandus, that is a future that relates to another time, and ſtaies for the ſentence of the Judge. But there muſt be ſomething more to clear this. For if erit be the future tenſe, why ſhall it not as well ſignify ſententiam ferendam, as eſt excommunicandus; ſince the verb is to be left to his own time, as well as the preſent tenſe brought thither by a future participle? Therefore to this I adde, that when the verb or participle does ſignify the action or miniſtery of ſome other perſon beſides the law and the Criminal, then it ſhews that the declaration of the Judge is to be expected; as in [eſt excommunicandus] that is, he is to be excommunicated, viz. by the ſentence of his ordinary judge: but erit infamis, or erit excommunicatus, implies no mans action at all, but ſuppoſes the thing finiſh'd without any more to doe; and then comes in the rule of Nigidius in A. Gellius before ſpoken of. Infamis ſignifies preſently, that is, he ſhall be ſo from the doing of the crime; and excommunicatus ſignifies preſent or paſt, and therefore by it the future tenſe ſhall be altered, and therefore the ſentence preſently incurred. But concerning this particular, who pleaſes to be Critical and curious in minutes may delight himſelf by ſeeing ſeventy five fallencies, and alterations of caſes by Lib. 17. cap. 7 Noct. Attic.

by the variety of tenſes expreſſed in words of law, in Tiraquel in his excellent and large commentaries in L. Si unquam, C. De revocandis donationibus, in the interpretation of the word Revertatur. For my own part, I am content to aſſign ſuch meaſures as are ſure, plain, eaſy and intelligible. Nobis non licet eſſe tam diſertis.

30. 6. The ſentence of the law does preſently oblige the Conſcience if it be expreſſed in adverbs of haſty or preſent time; ſuch as are confeſtim, illico, extunc, extemplo, preſently, forthwith, from thence forward, and the like: for thoſe who appoint the puniſhment to be incurred without any interval of time, in effect ſay that we are not to expect the dull and long protracted methods of Courts, and Judges, and commiſſions, and citations, and witneſſes, and adjournments. Protinus, i. e. non expectato judiciorum ordine, ſay the Lawyers.

Virgil. lib. 4. Æneid. & lib. 4. Geor.

Protinus ad regem curſum detorquet Hiarbas.

Forthwith, that is, without the longer methods of the Court.

Nec mora, continuò matris præcepta faceſſit.

Theſe words and their like have a preſent effect; and therefore doe ſignify a preſent obligation of Conſcience. Concerning the ſignification of which and the like words it is hard to ſay whether we are to be guided by the Lawyers or by the Grammarians. The Lawyers are the beſt witneſſes of ſentences, and precedents, and the uſages and cuſtomes of laws; and therefore can beſt tell how the laws are ſaid to bind, and what ſentences they are ſaid to contain: and becauſe by them we are to be judg'd in publick if queſtions doe ariſe, from them alſo we may take our rule in private. This ſeems reaſonable: but on the other ſide, I find that Lawyers themſelves ſay otherwiſe; and I have ſeen Tiraquel much blamed for quoting Bartholus, Baldus, and Salicetus for the ſignification of the word [Mox, by and by] which is of uſe in this preſent rule: becauſe though they were great Lawyers, yet they were no good Grammarians; and therefore that in theſe caſes, Eraſmus and Calepine, Valla and Linacre, Cicero and Terence, Priſcian and Donatus, were the moſt competent Judges. There is ſomething on both ſides which is to weigh down each other according as ſome other conſideration ſhall determine. But therefore as to the caſe of Conſcience, I ſhall give a better and ſurer rule then either one or other, or both: and that is,

Alph. à Caſtro lib. 2. de leg. pœn. cap. 7.

31. 7. This being in matters of load and burden, by the conſent of all men, the Conſcience and the guilty perſon is to be favour'd as much as there can be cauſe for. Therefore whenever there is a diſpute whether the ſentence of the law muſt be incurr'd preſently, or that the ſentence of the Judge is to be expected; the preſumption is alwaies to be for eaſe, and for liberty, and favourable ſenſes. Burdens are not to be impos'd upon Conſciences without great evidence, and great neceſſity. If the Lawyers differ in their opinions concerning the ſentence, whether it be already made, or is to be made by the Judge, let them firſt agree, and then let the Conſcience doe as ſhe ſees reaſon. Thus if the word [Mox, by and by] be us'd in a ſentence of law, becauſe we find that in ſome very good Authors it ſignifies with ſome interval of time, (as in Cicero, Diſcedo parumper à ſomniis, ad quæ mox revertor; &, præteriit villam meam Curio, juſſitque mihi nunciari ſe mox venturum;) therefore we may make uſe of it to our advantage, and ſuppoſe the Conſcience of a delinquent at liberty from a ſpontaneous execution execution of a ſentence of law, if for that ſentence he have no other ſign, but that the word Mox is uſed in the law. In pœnis benignior eſt interpretatio facienda, In matters of puniſhment we are to take the eaſier part; and that is, to ſtay from being puniſh'd as long as we can: and in proportion to this Panormitan gives this rule, When the words of the law ſignifie the time paſt, or the time to come, we are to underſtand it in the more favourable ſenſe; and that it includes the ſentence of the Judge, before which the Criminal is not oblig'd. And to this very purpoſe the words of infinite and indefinite ſignification are to be expounded: and this anſwers many caſes of Conſcience, and brings peace in more; and the thing being reaſonable, peaceful, and conſonant to the common opinion of the Lawyers, ought to paſs for a juſt concluſion and determination of Conſcience.

Cap. in pœnis de reg. jur. lib. 6.

32. 8. After all, as there is eaſe to the Criminal, ſo there muſt be care of the law; and therefore when a law impoſes a puniſhment which would prove invalid, to no purpoſe and of no effect, unleſs it be of preſent force upon the committing of the fact, it is to be concluded, the law intends it for a ſententia lata à jure, that it preſently obliges the Conſcience of the guilty perſon. The reaſon is, becauſe it cannot be ſuppoſed that the law ſhould doe a thing to no purpoſe, and therefore muſt intend ſo to oblige as that the ſin be puniſhed. If therefore to expect the ſentence of the Judge would wholly evacuate the penalty, or make it inſufficient to doe the purpoſe and intention of the law; the ſentence of the law muſt be ſuffered by the guilty perſon without the Judge. And this is true, however the words of law be uſed, whether in the paſt, preſent, or future time, whether ſimply or by reduplication, whether imperatively or infinitely: ſuch are the penalties of infamy, irregularity, nullity of actions or contracts, eſpecially if they be of ſuch contracts which if they once prove valid, are ſo for ever, as in the contract of marriage. And therefore if a law be made that a man ſhall not marry her whom in her husbands life-time he had polluted; this muſt be ſuppos'd to be meant of nullifying the contract before it is conſummate; that is, it is a ſentence which the criminal muſt execute upon himſelf: for if he does not, but de facto marries the adultereſs, and conſummates the marriage, it will be too late to complain to the Judge; for he cannot annul the contract afterwards.

RULE III.

Penalties impos'd by the Judge muſt be ſuffered and ſubmitted to, but may not after ſuch ſentence be inflicted by the hands of the condemned.

1. THE firſt part of this Rule hath in it but little difficulty: for there is onely in it this variety; In all puniſhments that are tolerable, that is, all but death, diſmembring, or intolerable and extremely diſgraceful ſcourgings, and grievous and ſickly impriſonments, we owe not onely obedience to the laws, but reverence and honour; becauſe whatſoever is leſs then theſe, may without ſin, and without indecency, and without great violations of our Natural love and rights be inflicted and ſuffered.

But

2. But the other evils are ſuch as are intolerable in civil and natural account; and every Creature declines death, and the addreſſes and preparations to it with ſo much earneſtneſs, that it would be very unnatural and inhumane not to allow to condemn'd perſons a civil and moral power of hating and declining death, and avoiding it in all means of natural capacity and opportunity. A man may, if he can, redeem his life with money, but he muſt not corrupt juſtice; a man may run from Priſon if he can, but to doe it he muſt not kill the Gaoler; he may eſcape death, but he muſt not fight with the Miniſters of juſtice; he may run away, but he muſt not break his word; that is, he may doe what is in his natural capacity to avoid theſe violences and extremities of nature, but nothing that is againſt a moral duty. Non peccat quiſquam cum evitat ſupplicium, ſed cum facit aliquid dignum ſupplicio; He that avoids his puniſhment ſins not, provided that in ſo doing he act nothing elſe worthy of puniſhment. So S. Auſtin.

Lib. de mendac. c. 13.

3. This relies alſo upon a tacit or implicit permiſſion of law; for in ſentences given by Judges, and to be executed by the Miniſters of law, the condemn'd perſon is not commanded, nor yet truſted with the execution, and it is wholly committed to Miniſters of purpoſe: and therefore the law ſuppoſes the condemn'd perſon infinitely unwilling, and layes bars, reſtraints, guards and obſervators upon him; from all which if he can eſcape, he hath done no more then what the law-giver ſuppos'd he was willing to doe, and from which he did not reſtrain him by laws, but by force. But if to fly from priſon, or to decline any other ſentence be expreſly forbidden in the law, or if it be againſt his promiſe, or if a diſtinct penalty be annexed to ſuch eſcapings, then it is plain that the law intends to oblige the Conſcience, for the law cannot puniſh what is no ſin; it is in this caſe a tranſgreſſion of the law, and therefore not lawfull. But becauſe greater then death the law hath no puniſhment, it cannot but be lawfull for a condemn'd man to eſcape from priſon if he can, becauſe the law hath no puniſhment to eſtabliſh a law againſt flying from priſon after the ſentence of death. And if it be ſaid, that if a priſoner who flyes be taken, he hath more irons and more guards upon him, and worſe uſage in the priſon, that is matter of caution, not puniſhment, at leaſt not of law: for as for the Gaoler's ſpite and anger, his cruelty and revenge, himſelf alone is to give accounts.

4. But now for the other part of the Rule there is ſome more difficulty; which is cauſed by the great example of ſome great and little perſons, who to prevent a death by the hand of their Enemies, with the additions of ſhame and torment, have laid violent hands upon themſelves. So did Zeno and Chryſippus, Cleanthes and Empedocles, Euphrates the Philoſopher and Demoſthenes, Cato Uticenſis and Porcius Latro, Ariſtarchus and Anaxagoras, Cornelius Rufus and Silius Italicus. The Indians eſteem'd it the moſt glorious way of dying, as we find in * Strabo, [a] Olympiodorus, and [b] Porphyry: and Euſebius tels, that moſt of the Germans did uſe to hang themſelves. And amongſt the Romans they that, out of ſhame of being in debt, or impatience of grief, kill'd themſelves, might make their Wils, and after death they ſtood; manebant teſtamenta, pretium feſtinandi, ſaith [c] Tacitus, that was the price of their making haſt. Plato diſcourſing of this queſtion, ſaid, ὦ μῶν τοι ἴσως βιάσεταί τις αὐτόν· ὦ γὰρ φασι θεμιτὸν εἶναι, Peradventure a man muſt not doe violence to himſelf, for they ſay it is not lawfull.

lawfull. Upon this, Olympiodorus diſcourſing on theſe words, reckons five caſes in which the Stoicks held it lawfull to kill themſelves. 1. For publick good. 2. For private neceſſity, to avoid a Tyrant's ſnare. 3. In caſes of natural madneſs. 4. When the body is intolerably afflicted. 5. and laſtly, In extreme poverty. And the Greeks commended a Pythagorean woman, who being ask'd why ſhe and her Sect did not eat beans, ſhe ſaid, ſhe would rather eat them then tell: but being commanded by a Tyrant to eat them, ſhe ſaid, ſhe would rather tell then eat them: but in fine ſhe cut out her tongue, becauſe ſhe would neither taſt nor tell. Thus Seneca tels of a Priſoner, that being to be expos'd to Beaſts in the Theatre, he broke his neck in the ſpondels of the wheel upon which he was drawn to the ſpectacles; and of another that dyed by a pertinacious holding of his breath. But that of Sampſon, and Saul, and Razis, are alſo brought into example; and are alledged to prove, that a man may a few hours or dayes haſten his death, if by ſo doing he takes the lighter part. S. Chryſoſtome tels of S. Pelagia; Pelagia virgo quindecim annos nata ſponte ſibi necem maturavit. Parata quidem erat ad cruciatus tormentáque & omne ſuppliciorum genus perferendum: ſed metuebat tamen ne virginitatis coronam perderet: Being a Virgin of fifteen years of age, of her own accord ſhe haſtned death unto her ſelf: ſhe was indeed ready to have ſuffered all ſorts of moſt exquiſit torments, but ſhe was not willing to loſe the Crown of her Virginity. Upon which fact of hers he thus diſcourſes, Hence you may perceive, that the luſt of the wicked Hang-men ſtruck fear into Pelagia, and therefore from their injurious luſt the Maiden remov'd and ſnatch'd her ſelf: for if ſhe might have kept the Crown of her Virginity, and receive the Crown of Martyrdome beſides, ſhe would not have refus'd the Judgement-ſeat; but becauſe it was altogether neceſſary to loſe the one of them, ſhe had a juſt cauſe by her own voluntary death to prevent ſo great an injury. And S. Ambroſe writing to his Siſter Marcellina, expreſly commends thoſe Virgin-Martyrs, who, to prevent their raviſhments, did haſten their death by voluntary precipices, or drowning; and particularly allows the fact of Pelagia. To which I adde alſo S. Hierome, who though he gives expreſs teſtimony to the Rule, yet he excepts the caſe of Chaſtity; Non eſt noſtrum mortem arripere, ſed illatam ab aliis libenter excipere: unde & in perſecutionibus non licet propriâ perire manu, abſque eo ubi caſtitas periclitatur, ſed percutienti colla ſubmittere, We muſt not ſnatch death with our own hands, but willingly receive it when it is impos'd by others: and therefore in perſecutions we muſt not dye by our own hands, unleſs it be when our Chaſtity is in danger, in other caſes we muſt lay down our necks under him that ſtrikes. And this ſeems reaſonable, becauſe as the Emperour ſaid, Viris bonis metum iſtum [pudicitiæ amittendæ] majorem eſſe debere quam ipſius mortis, He that fears to loſe his Chaſtity, fears more juſtly then he that fears to loſe his Life.

——heu quanto melius vel cæde peractâ

5. To this I anſwer, that the caſe is indeed very hard; and every one in this is apt not onely to excuſe, but to magnifie the great and glorious minds of thoſe who to preſerve their honour deſpis'd their life. And therefore when the Moſcovites broke into Livonia, and in their ſacking of the City Wenden us'd all manner of cruelties and barbarous immanities to men and women, filling all the ſtreets and houſes with blood and luſt; a great many of the Citizens running to the Caſtle, blew up themſelves with their Wives and Children, to prevent thoſe horrours and ſhames of luſt which they abhorred more then death. Now Laurentius Muller, who tels the ſtory, ſayes, that although the Preachers of Riga did in their Pulpits condemn this act of the Women and Maidens: yet the other Livonians and the Moſcovites themſelves did not onely account it ſad and pitiable, but excellent and admirable. And ſo the Author of the Books of Maccabees commends the fact of Razias as glorious and great: but yet this does not conclude it lawfull; for it is upon no account lawfull for a man of his own accord to kill himſelf.

Hiſtor. Septentr.

6. S. Auſtin denies to him the praiſe of magnanimity; Magis enim mens infirma deprehenditur, quæ ferre non poteſt duram corporis ſui ſanitatem, vel ſtultam vulgi opinionem, It is not greatneſs, but littleneſs of ſpirit, it is either impatience or pride, that makes a man kill himſelf to avoid trouble to his body, or diſhonour to his name amongſt fools. I ſuppoſe he had it from Joſephus, who excellently and earneſtly proves it to be cowardiſe to lay violent hands upon our ſelves; and both of them might have it from Ariſtotle, who will not allow it ſo much as to be brave and magnanimous for a man to kill himſelf for the avoiding of any evil, τὸ δ' ἀποθνήσκειν, φεύγοντι πενίαν ἢ ἔρωτα ἢ τι λυπηρὸν, οὐκ ἀνδρεῖου, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον δειλοῦ, To dye that we may avoid poverty, the torments of love, or any evil affliction whatſoever, is not the part of a valiant man, but of a coward.

Hic rogo, non furor eſt, ne moriare mori?

Fannius being purſued by the Enemy, kill'd himſelf for fear. It may be cowardiſe to dye in ſome caſes; and to dye to preſerve our Chaſtity, is to ſin to avoid a ſin, like Fannius his caſe of fear,

——mortiſque timorem
Morte fugant, ultróque vocant venientia fata:

Metamorph l. 7. fab. 25.

or as S. Chryſoſtome's expreſſion is, τοῦ τὸ ναυάγιον ναυαγίῳ προβάλλειν σαυτὸν, καὶ περὶ δέξασθαι πλησιὸν ἀποθνήσκειν τῷ δεῖν, To dye before the wound is given, and to leap into the ſea for fear of ſhipwreck: It is to doe violence to our body to preſerve it chaſt, to burn a Temple to prevent its being prophan'd. And therefore it is no juſt excuſe to ſay the Virgin-Martyrs did it leſt they ſhould loſe their Crown of Virginity: for though I ſhall not urge the example of Abraham, who rather ventur'd his Wives Chaſtity then his own life; yet this I ſay, that ſhe that loſes it by violence is never the leſs a Virgin before God, but much more a Martyr. But then if any one can ſuppoſe it fit to be objected, that if they loſt their Material Virginity, there was danger, leſt while they were abus'd, they ſhould alſo be tempted, and conſent: I ſuppoſe it will be ſufficient to anſwer, that a certain ſin is not to be done to avoid an uncertain; and yet further, that this could not be conſiderable in the caſe of the Martyrs: for beſides that it is ſuppos'd that they were infinitely fortified by the grace of God, their auſtere lives, and holy Habits, the rare diſcourſes of their ſpiritual Guides, their expectations of particular Crowns, the great reputation and honour of Virgins, and the ſpirit of Chaſtity, which then very much prevail'd; beſides all this, I ſay, they had then (particularly S. Pelagia, and the Virgins which S. Ambroſe ſpeaks of, had then) the ſentence of death not onely within them, but upon them; and the immediate torments which they expected after raviſhments, were a very competent mortification for any

ſuch fears. And therefore as we ſhould call it cowardiſe or impatience for a man to kill himſelf that he may dye an eaſy death, and prevent the Hangman's more cruel hands; ſo it is a fooliſh and unreaſonable caution, and a diſtruſt of the ſufficiency of the Divine grace, to ruſh violently to death, leſt we ſhould be diſhonour'd or tempted in another inſtance: and it is not bravery, but want of courage; μαλακία γὰρ τὸ φεύγειν τὰ ὀδύνηρα, It is ſoftneſſe and effeminacy by death to flie the labours of a ſadder accident, ſaies Ariſtotle. But be it this or not this, it is certain it is ſomething as bad. Ubi ſuprà.

7. 1. It is directly againſt the Commandement: and it is not for nothing that in all the Canonical books we find no precept, no permiſsion from God, ſaith S. Auſtin, ut vel adipiſcendæ ipſius immortalitatis, vel ullius carendi, cavendique mali causâ nobismet ipſis necem inferamus. Nam & prohibitos nos eſſe intelligendum eſt, ubi Lex ait, Non occides: That either for the gaining of immortality it ſelf, or for the avoiding of any evil we ſhould kill our ſelves. It is ſomething like this which Ariſtotle ſaies, τὰ μὲν γὰρ ὅτι τῷ δικαίων, τὰ κατὰ πᾶσαν ἀρετὴν ἐστὶ τῷ νόμῳ πεταγμένα· οἷον ὁ κελεύει ἑαυτὸν ἀποκτείνειν ὁ νόμος· ἃ δ' μὴ κελεύει ἀπαγορεύει. Thoſe things which the decrees have appointed agreeable to vertue thoſe are to goe for laws; as for example, The Law does not command any man to kill himſelf, and becauſe the law does not command, therefore it does forbid: that is, becauſe the law commands no man (though he be condemn'd) to kill himſelf, therefore the law forbids him to doe it to himſelf; the law will not make a man executioner even of her ſentence, therefore ſhe permits him not to execute his own. But S. Auſtin addes beyond this, For then we were forbidden to doe it, when God ſaid, Thou ſhalt doe no Murder. And therefore it is obſervable that although God ſaid, Thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſſe againſt thy Neighbour; yet he did not in this Commandement adde that clauſe of [contra proximum] nor in that of adultery; intimating that we muſt neither pollute nor deſtroy our own bodies any more then the body of our neighbour. Lib. 1. cap. 20. de Civit. Dei. Eth. Nic. li. 5. cap. 11.

8. 2. To prevent the hand of juſtice or of Tyranny in ſtriking, is ſometimes to prevent the hand of God in ſaving, and is an act of deſperation againſt the hopes of a good man, and the goodneſs of God: for helpe may come in the interval. Caius the Emperor commanded ſome to be put to death, whom he preſently after infinitely wiſh'd to have been alive; the haſt of the Executioners deſtroyed the men, more then the rage of the Prince: and it is all one if the man himſelf be haſty. And Pontanus tells that when Angelus Ronconius was accus'd to Pope Nicolas the fifth that he had given way to Averſus whom the Popes forces had encloſed, and gave leave to him to paſs over Tiber, the Pope commanded him to be proceeded againſt according to law; but when he roſe in the morning, and told his Miniſters he would more maturely conſider the cauſe of Ronconius, they told him he was that very night put to death, which caus'd extreme grief to the Pope. Concerning a mans life all delay is little enough: and therefore for himſelf to haſten it is againſt prudence, and hope, and charity.

9. 3. The argument of Lactantius is very good; Si homicida nefarius eſt qui hominis extinctor eſt, eidem ſceleri obſtrictus eſt qui ſe necat, If he that kills another is a wicked homicide, ſo alſo is he that kills himſelf. Nay he is worſe, ſaid S. Chryſoſtom. And this beſides that it relies upon the Lib. 3. Inſtit. cap. 18. In Epiſt. ad Gal. cap. 1.

unlimited, indefinite Commandement, which muſt be underſtood univerſally but where God hath expreſly ſet it limits; and though he hath given leave to publick Magiſtrates to doe it, who therefore are not under that Commandement, yet becauſe he hath not given leave to our ſelves to doe it to our ſelves, therefore we are under the Commandement: beſides this, I ſay, it relies alſo upon this reaſon, that our love to our ſelves is the meaſure of charity to our neighbours; and if we muſt not kill our neighbour becauſe we muſt love him as our ſelf, therefore neither muſt we kill our ſelves, for then we might alſo kill our neighbour, the reaſon and the meaſure, the ſtandard and the proportion being taken away.

10. 4. To put our ſelves to death without the Command of God or his lieutenant is impiety and rebellion againſt God; it is a deſertion of our military ſtation, and a violation of the proprieties and peculiar rights of God, who only hath power over our lives, and gives it to whom he pleaſes: and Lib. de Senect. to this purpoſe Cicero commends that ſaying of Pythagoras, nequis injuſſu Imperatoris, id eſt, Dei, de præſidio & ſtatione vitæ diſcedat; God is our General, and he hath commanded to us our abode and ſtation, which till he call us off muſt not be deſerted: and the ſame doctrine he recites out of Somn. Scip. Vide Platonem in Phædone. Plato, Piis omnibus retinendum eſſe animum in cuſtodia corporis, nec injuſſu ejus à quo ille eſt datus ex hominum vita migrandum eſſe, ne munus humanum aſſignatum à Deo defugiſſe videamur. The reaſon is very good: God gave us our ſoul and fixt it in the priſon of the body, tying it there to a certain portion of work, and therefore we muſt not without his leave goe forth, leſt we run from our work that God hath commanded us. Joſephus ſaies it is like a ſervants running away from his Maſters ſervice: Et ſervos quidem fugientes ulciſci juſtum creditur, quamvis nequam Dominos fugerint; ipſi verò fugimus Deum & optimum Deum, impiè facere non videbimur? If ſervants flie from their cruel Maſters they are juſtly puniſhed; ſhall it not be accounted impiety to flie from our good God, our moſt gracious Maſter? And therefore Brutus condemn'd the fact of Cato his Father-in-law, οὐκ ἐχ ὅσιον οὐδ' ἀνδρὸς ἔργον ὑποχωρεῖν τῷ δαίμονι, καὶ μὴ δέχεσθαι τὸ συμπῖπτον ἀνδρεῶς, ἀλλ' ὑπεκδιδρᾶναι, It was neither manly nor pious to ſink under his fortune, and to flie away from thoſe evils which he ought to have born nobly. And therefore the Hebrews called dying, ἀπολύεσθαι, a diſmiſſion: Lord, now letteſt thou thy ſervant depart in peace, ſaid old Simeon; Nunc dimittis. When God gives us our paſs, then we muſt goe, but we muſt not offer it an hour before: he that does otherwiſe is, 1. ungrateful to God, by deſtroying the nobleſt of his works below; 2. impious, by running from his Lib. 1. Tuſcul. ſervice; and 3. diſtruſtful of his providence. Niſi Deus is, cujus hoc Templum eſt omne quod conſpicis, iſtis te corporis cuſtodiis liberaverit, in cælum aditus tibi patere non poteſt, ſaid Cicero, Unleſſe God open the gate for you, you can never paſs from the priſon of the body, and enter into Heaven. Ad Carm. aur. Pyth. And the ſame is affirm'd by Hierocles, which I tell for the ſtrangeneſs of it; for he was a Stoick, yet againſt the opinion of his Sect, he ſpake on the behalf of reaſon and religion: And this is the Chriſtian ſenſe,

Iamb. 18. Δεῖ δ' δεδέσθαι μίχρις ἂν λύσῃ θεὸς,

Said S. Gregory Nyſſen, We muſt ſtand bound, till God untie us.

11. 5. For a man to kill himſelf is againſt the law, and the voice, and the very prime inclination of Nature. Every thing will preſerve it ſelf: No man hateth his own fleſh, but nouriſheth and cheriſheth it, ſaith the Apoſtle:

and

and therefore generally all Nations, as taught by the voice of Nature, by the very first accents which she utters to all men, did abhor the laying violent hands upon our selves. When some of the old Romans hanged themselves to avoid the slavery that Tarquinius Superbus impos'd upon them of making publick draught-houses, he commanded the dead bodies to be crucified, saies Servius. So did Ptolemy to the body of Cleomenes who had killed himself; and Aristotle saies it was every where receiv'd, that the dead bodies of self-murderers should be disgrac'd some way or other; ἀταφίαν ὑπερίζειν θάπτειν, by denying them burial: that was the usual way. So did the Milesians to their maidens who hang'd themselves, they expos'd their bodies to a publick spectacle: and Strabo tells that the Indian Priests and wise men blam'd the fact of Calanus, and that they hated those hasty deaths of impatient or proud persons. Alieno scelere quam meo mori malo, said King Darius, I had rather die by the wickedness of another, then by my own.

In 12. Æneid.

12. 6. Aristotle saies that they who kill themselves [hastening their own death before God or the publick commands them] are injurious to the Commonwealth; from whose service and profit they subtract themselves if they be innocent, and if they be criminal, they withdraw themselves from her justice: ἀδικεῖ ἄρα· ἀλλὰ τίνα; ἢ τὴν πόλιν. καὶ τις ἀτιμία πρόσεισι τῷ ἑαυτὸν διαφθείραντι, ὡς τὴν πόλιν ἀδικοῦντι, He that kills himself does wrong to the city; and is after death disgrac'd as an unjust person to the publick.

Lib. 5. c. 11. Eth.

13. Now then to the examples and great precedents above mentioned I shall give this answer. 1. That Sampson is by all means to be excus'd, because S. Paul accounts him in the Catalogue of Saints who died in faith; and therefore S. Austin saies he did it by a peculiar instinct and inspiration of the Spirit of God. But no man can tell whether he did or no: and therefore I like that better which Peter Martyr saies in this inquiry; He did primarily and directly intend onely to kill the enemies of God, which was properly his work to which he was in his whole calling design'd by the Spirit of God; but that he died himself in the ruine was his suffering, but not his design; but like a Souldier fighting against his enemies at the command of his General undertakes the service though he knows he shall die for it. Thus doe the Mariners blow up themselves in a sea-fight when they can no otherwise destroy the enemy; they doe it as Ministers of justice, and by command; else they are not to be excused: and he that gives it must take care it be just and reasonable. Thus did the brave Eleazar Habaran the brother of Judas Maccabæus: he supposing their grand enemy Antiochus to be upon a tower'd Elephant goes under the beast and kills him, who with his fall crush'd the brave Prince to death; he intended not to kill himself, but to kill Antiochus he would venture himself or suffer death.

Lib. 1. de civit. Dei, cap. 16, & 21.

1 Macc. 6. 43.

14. 2. The fact of Saul is no just precedent, it looks like despaire: but the Hebrews say that it is not lawful for any man to die by his own hands, unless the prolongation of his life be a dishonour to God, and to a cause of religion; and upon this account they excuse both Saul and Sampson, for they knew that if they should fall or abide respectively in the hands of scorners, the dishonour of their persons would disparage the religion, and reach to God. So they. But this is not right: for we onely are to take care of the laws of God, and of his glory in the waies of his own appointment; for extraordinaries and rare contingencies, let him alone, he will ſecure his own glory.

15. 3. For Razias, Lipſius ſaies it is a queſtion whether it was well or ill done; and who pleaſe to ſee it diſputed may read Lucas Brugenſis on one ſide and Nicolaus de Lyra upon the other. For my own part I at no hand believe it fit to be imitated; but concerning what brave and glorious perſons doe, and by what Spirit they acted, I am not willing to give haſty ſentence: for there are many ſecrets which we know not; but we are to follow our Rule, and not to truſt any Spirit of which we are not ſure it is from God.

16. 4. But of that which is moſt difficult I have already ſpoken ſomething; but ſhall adde more: for it is a pitiable caſe that vertuous women, highly ſenſible of their honour, zealous for chaſtity, deſpiſers of life, ſhould not as well receive the reward of their ſuffering to preſerve the intereſt of chaſtity, as of any other grace; eſpecially ſince they chuſe death rather then ſhame, and would not willingly chuſe either, but being forc'd, run to death for ſanctuary. It is true, it is much to be pitied; but that's all: ac per hoc & quæ ſe occiderunt, ne quicquam hujuſmodi paterentur, quis humanus affectus eis nollet ignoſci? Every man (ſaies S. Auſtin) will pity, and be ready to excuſe, or to wiſh pardon to ſuch women who kill'd themſelves to preſerve their honour. Cicero tells of certain noble Virgins that threw themſelves into pits to avoid the ſhame of their enemies luſt: and S. Hierom tels of ſeven Mileſian Virgins, who, to prevent the rudeneſs of the Gaules that deſtroyed all Aſia, laid violent hands upon themſelves. The Greek Epigram mentions them with honour, but tells but of three:

Orat. de Provinciis conſularibus.

Adv. Jovinian.

Lib. 3. ἀνθολογ. ἐις γύνες ἢ γάμους

Παρθενικαὶ ἠϊθεαι πολιήτιδες, ἃς ὁ βιαιὸς
Κελτῶν εἰς ταυτὸν μῖξαν ἔπεφνεν ἄρης.
Οὐ γὰρ ἐμείναμεν αἷμα τὸ δυσσεβὲς, ἠδ' ὑμεναίους
Νυμφίον, ἀλλ' ἀΐδην ἠδεμόνα ἐυράμεθα.

They choſe a ſad death before a mixture with the luſtful blood of the Galatians. And the Jews tell of a captive woman of their nation, who being in a ſhip and deſign'd to raviſhment, ask'd her Husband if the bodies of them that were drown'd in the ſea ſhould riſe again: and when he had ſaid they ſhould, ſhe leap'd into the Sea. And among the Chriſtians that did ſo, there were many examples. Divers women of Antioch under Diocletian; more under Choſroes the Perſian; Sophronia under Maxentius; S. Pelagia before mention'd; and divers others. Theſe perſons had great Advocates; but I ſuppoſe it was upon the ſtock of pity and compaſſion that ſo much bravery ſhould be thrown away upon a miſtake: and therefore I find that S. Chryſoſtome, who commended this manner of death upon the account of chaſtity, yet is not conſtant to it, but blames it in his commentaries upon the Galatians: and the third Council of Orleans commanded that the oblations of them that died by the hands of juſtice ſhould be received, Si tamen non ipſi ſibi mortem probentur propriis manibus intuliſſe, alwaies provided that they did not prevent the hand of juſtice, that they did not lay violent hands upon themſelves. I end this with the ſaying of Procopius, which is a juſt determination of the caſe in it ſelf. Βίαιον καταγνῶναι χρὴ ἄνοια περιπλῆναι, τὸ δὲ ἐς θάνατον δράσαν ἀνόητον τῶν δραστηρίων πρόχημα

Gal. 1. 4.

πρόχημα ἐκ εὐπρεπὲς τοῖς γε σώφροσιν εἶ δοκεῖ, A violent death, or a death haſtned by our own hands, is a thing unprofitable, and full of fooliſh violence; and ſince it wants prudent counſel, it is by wiſe men judged to be but the image and hypocriſie of valour and magnanimity. To which he addes, καὶ τοι καὶ τοῦτο ἐκλογίζεσθαι χρὴ, μή τι δόξητε εἰς τὸ θεῖον ἀγνωμονεῖν, This alſo ought to be conſidered, that no man ought to be impious or ungratefull towards God. This is the definition of the caſe. But then as to the perſons of them that did ſo, I have nothing to ſay but this, that they ought not to be drawn into example: but for the whole, it was modeſt and charitable which was decreed by the French Capitulars, Concerning him who hath kill'd himſelf, Lib. 6. c. 70. it is conſider'd, that if any one out of pity or compaſſion will give alms for their ſouls (ſo was the cuſtome of thoſe times) let him give, and ſay prayers and pſalms, but not celebrate the ſolemn ſacrifice for them; quia incomprehenſibilia ſunt judicia Dei, & profunditatem conſilii ejus nemo poteſt inveſtigare, Becauſe the judgements of God are incomprehenſible, and the depth of his counſels no man can fathom. This was more gentle then that of Virgil,

He appointed a ſad place in Hell for them that ſo cheaply out of impatience, or to avoid a great trouble, threw away their ſouls. Fain would they now return to light, and joyfully would change their preſent ſtate with all the labours and ſhames which they with haſty death ſo earneſtly declin'd. But he knew nothing of it, neither doe I, onely that it is not lawfull. But how they ſhall fare in the other World who upon ſuch great accounts are tempted, is one of God's ſecrets, which the Great Day will manifeſt. If any man will be pleaſed to ſee more againſt it, he may find it in [a] S. Auſtin, [b] Hegeſippus, [c] Nicephorus Blennidæs, [d] Heliodorus, and divers others, well collected by Fabrot in his 5th Exercitation.

RULE IV.

He that hath ſuffered the puniſhment is not diſcharg'd in Conſcience, unleſs he alſo repent of the diſobedience.

1. THis Rule is in effect the ſame with the firſt Rule of the firſt Chapter of this Book: but becauſe it is uſually diſcours'd of alſo under the head of Penal Laws, and there are many perſons who, when they have broken the law, and have ſuffered puniſhment, think themſelves diſcharg'd, and becauſe it miniſters ſome particularities of its own, I have therefore choſen diſtinctly to conſider it.

2. In this inquiry penal laws uſually are diſtinguiſh'd into laws purely penal, and mix'd. 1. Laws purely penal are ſuch which neither directly command, nor forbid, but impoſe a penalty upon him that does or omits an action reſpectively. So Moſes to the Children of Iſrael, If a man Exod. 22. 1. ſhall ſteal an oxe or a ſheep, and kill it or ſell it, he ſhall reſtore five oxen for one oxe, and four ſheep for one. 2. A mix'd penal law is when with the precept or prohibition the penalty is adjoyn'd: ſo ſaid God, Ye ſhall not hurt the widow or the fatherleſs; if ye hurt them, they ſhall cry unto me, and I will hear their cry, and my fury ſhall be kindled, and I will ſtrike you with the ſword, and your wives ſhall be widows, and your children fatherleſs. And of the ſame nature is that Canon of the Council of Agatho, We doe by a ſpecial order command all ſecular perſons to hear the whole Divine Service upon the Lord's Day, ſo that the people preſume not to go forth before the bleſſing of the Prieſt: but if any man ſhall preſume to doe ſo, let him be publickly puniſh'd by the Biſhop.

Ibid.

Can. Miſſ. de conſecrat. diſt. 1.

3. Other laws are purely moral, that is, preceptive without any penalty. This diſtinction Silveſter derides as childiſh, and of no uſe; but others deride him: but whatever uſe it can be of to other purpoſes, it is of little in this. For whether the penalty be annexed or no, it obliges to penalty *; and therefore whether it be preceptive or no, it alſo obliges to duty: and we ſee it in ocular demonſtration in divers of the Levitical and moral laws of God, which ſometimes are ſet down in the ſtile of laws purely penal, and the ſame laws in other places are penal and prohibitive.

* Tacitè permiſſum eſt quod ſine ultione prohibetur. Tertull. 1. adv. Marc.

3. 1. But why are puniſhments decreed in laws? are they for the obedient, or for the diſobedient? for good men, or for bad? Certainly, for them that doe not obey. Now they that obey not, doe well or ill, or it is indifferent whether they doe or no: if they doe well, they are to be rewarded, and not puniſhed; if the thing after the ſanction be ſtill indifferent, why ſhall he ſuffer evil that does none? But the caſe is plain, that in all juſt Governments the puniſhment is decreed in the laws, that the law may be obeyed; and unleſs it be equally good to the Prince that his Subjects obey or be puniſh'd, that is, unleſs it be all one to him whether they be happy and advantaged, or miſerable and puniſhed, and that he cares not whether the ſubject receives the good or the evil of the law, it cannot be ſuppos'd that when the ſubject is puniſhed, the law is ſatisfied in its firſt intention.

4. 2. Adde to this, If ſuffering the puniſhment does ſatisfie the law, then the Subject is not tied to obey for Conſcience ſake, but onely for wrath, expreſly againſt the Apoſtle; and then laws would quickly grow contemptible: for the great Flyes that break through the Cobweb-lawns of penal laws, would be both innocent and unconcerned; innocent, as not being tied in Conſcience, and unconcerned, as having many defenſatives againſt the fine.

5. 3. The ſaying therefore of S. Auſtin hath juſtly prevail'd, Omnis pœna ſi juſta eſt, peccati pœna eſt, & ſupplicium nominatur, Every penalty is relative to an offence, and is called puniſhment. And there can be no reaſon given why in laws there are differing puniſhments aſſign'd, but that they be proportionable to the greatneſs of the fault. It follows therefore, that whoever is oblig'd to ſuffer the puniſhment of the law, doe ask God's pardon and the King's, for having done a ſin by which onely he could be oblig'd to puniſhment. Reatus or guilt, both in Divine laws and in humane, is an obligation to puniſhment: for reatus pœnæ and reatus culpæ differ but as the right and left hand of a pillar; it is the ſame thing in ſeveral aſpects and ſituations. And Lucius Neratius was a fool, and a vile perſon; and having an abſurd humour of giving every man he met a box on the ear, he cauſed a ſervant to follow him with a bag of money, and cauſed him to pay him him whom he had ſmitten xxv Aſſes, a certain ſumme which was by the law of the XII Tables impos'd upon him that did an injury: but conſider'd not that all that while he was a baſe and a trifling fool for doing injury to the Citizens.

Lib. 1. Retract. c. 9.

A. Gellius, lib. 20. cap. 1.

6. This Rule holds in all without exception: it ſeems indeed to fail in two caſes, but it does not; onely the account of them will explicate and confirm the Rule.

7. 1. In actions which are not ſins, but undecencies, or unaptneſſes to a ſtate or office and action, the evils that are appendant to them are alſo but quaſi pœnæ, half puniſhments: ſuch as is the irregularity that is incurred by a Judge that gives ſentence in a cauſe of Blood; he is incapable of entring into Holy Orders by the antient laws of the Church. A Butcher is made incapable of being of the Inqueſt of Life and Death: which incapacity is not directly a puniſhment, any more then it is a ſin to be a Butcher; but certain perſons are without their fault declar'd unfit for certain ſtates or imployments. Now this confirms the Rule, for ſtill the proportion is kept; and if it be but like a fault, the conſequent of it is but like a puniſhment. And if at any time theſe appendages are called puniſhments, it is by a Catachreſis or an abuſe of the word, and becauſe of the ſimilitude in the matter of it. So we ſay, the righteous are puniſhed, that is, they ſuffer evil, for their own trial, or for the glory of God: and ſo it is in the Law, Sine culpa, niſi ſubſit cauſa, non eſt aliquis puniendus, No man is tobe puniſhed without his fault, unleſs there be cauſe for it: that is, no man is to ſuffer that evil, which in other caſes is really a puniſhment, and in all caſes looks like one. And from hence comes that known Rule, and by the ſame meaſure is to be underſtood, Etſi ſine cauſa non poteſt infligi pœna, poteſt tamen ſine culpa. The word pœna is taken improperly for any evil conſequent or adjunct.

8. 2. This ſeems to fail in laws that are conditional or conventional; ſuch as are when the Prince hath no intention to forbid or command any thing, but gives leave to doe it, but not unleſs you pay a fine. Thus if a Prince commands that none ſhall wear Spaniſh cloth, or ride upon a Mule, or go with a Coach & ſix Horſes, under the forfeiture of a certain ſum; this ſum is a puniſhment, and the action is a fault: but if the ſubjects ſhall ask leave to doe it, paying the ſum, then it is a conditional or conventional law, and obliges not to obedience, but to pay the fine. For theſe laws are not prohibitive, but conceſſory; and there is no ſign to diſtinguiſh them from others, but the words of the law, the interpretation of the Judges, and the allowed practice of the ſubjects.

9. Of the ſame conſideration are all promiſes and vows and contracts which are made with a penalty annexed to the breakers. The intereſted perſon is firſt tied to keep his word: if he does not, he ſins. But if he does ſin he muſt therefore pay the penalty; and if he does not, he ſins twice. Haud ſcio (ſaies Cicero) an ſatis ſit eum qui laceſſerit, injuriæ ſuæ pœnitere. Lib. 1. Offic. It is not enough for him to repent of the injuſtice, but he muſt alſo pay his fine; and yet that does not acquit him from the firſt fault, but prevents a ſecond. He that ſo contracts is twice obliged, and the later fault is paid by the penalty, and the firſt fault by repentance and that together.

Rule V.

It is not lawfull for a guilty perſon to defend himſelf by calumny, or a lie, from the penalty of the law, though it be the ſentence of death.

1. ALL the wiſdome of Mankind hath ever been buſy in finding out and adorning Truth, as being that in which we are to endeavour to be like God, who is Truth eſſentially: and therefore Pythagoras in Ælian did ſay, that the two greateſt and moſt excellent works that God gave to Mankind to doe, are the purſuits of Truth and Charity; for theſe are excellencies for which God himſelf is glorious before Men and Angels. The Perſian Magi ſay, that Oromagdes (ſo they called the greateſt of their Gods) was in his body like light, and his ſoul was like truth; and that therefore by truth we are like to God, but by a lye we are made mortal (ſayes Plato.) Veritas, quomodo Sol illuminans colores, & album & nigrum oſtendit, qualis ſit unuſquiſque eorum, ſic ipſa quoque refellit omnem ſermonis probabilitatem; merito à Græcis quoque acclamatum eſt, Principium magnæ virtutis eſt Regina veritas, As the Sun gives light to us, and diſtinction to black and white, ſo does truth to ſpeech; and therefore the Greeks did rightly affirm, that Truth is the beginning of the great Vertue, that is, of perfection, or vertue Heroical, ſaid S. Clement.

Lib. 6. de Rep.

Clem. Alex. lib. 6. cap. 4.

2. This is true in all regards: but the queſtion is, whether Truth can be practis'd at all times. For God ſpeaks Truth becauſe it is his nature, and he fears no man, and hath power directly to bring all his purpoſes to paſs: but the affairs of men are full of intrigues, and their perſons of infirmity, and their underſtandings of deception, and they have ends to ſerve which are juſt, and good, and neceſſary; and yet they cannot be ſerved by truth, but ſometimes by errour and deception. And therefore the Antients deſcribed Pan, who was the ſon of Mercury, their God of ſpeech, with the upper part like a man, and the lower part like a beaſt, rough, hairy and deformed; not onely to ſignifie truth and falſhood, and that truth is ſmooth, even and beauteous, and a lye is rough, ugly, deformed, and cloven-footed, (quia mendacii multiplex divortium, ſayes one) but to repreſent, that in our ſuperiour faculties, and our intercourſe with the power above us, we muſt ſpeak truth, but that in our converſation with men below it is neceſſary ſometimes by a lye to advantage charity, by loſing of a truth to ſave a life. Here then is the inquiry,

1. Whether it can in any caſe be lawfull to tell a lye.

2. Whether it be lawfull to uſe reſtrictions and mental reſervations, ſo that what we ſpeak, of it ſelf is falſe, but joyned to ſomething within is truth.

3. Whether and in what caſes it is lawfull to equivocate, or uſe words of doubtfull ſignification with a purpoſe to deceive, or knowing that they will deceive.

4. Whether it be lawfull by actions and pretences of actions to deceive others for any end; and in what caſes it is ſo.

Queſtion

Question I.

Whether it can in any case be lawful to tell a lie.

3. To this I answer, that the Holy Scriptures of the Old & New Testament doe indefinitely and severely forbid lying. A righteous man hateth lying, saith Solomon; and Agur's prayer was, Remove from me vanity and lies. For the Lord will destroy them that speak lies. And our Blessed Saviour condemns it infinitely by declaring every lie to be of the Devil. When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own, for he is a lier and the Father of it. Lie not therefore one to another, saith S. Paul: For all liers shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone. Beyond these things nothing can be said for the condemnation of lying. Prov. 13. 5. 30. 8. Psal. 5. 7. Col. 3. 9. Revel. 21. 8, 27.

4. But then lying is to be understood to be something said or written to the hurt of our neighbour, which cannot be understood otherwise then to differ from the mind of him that speaks. Mendacium esse petulanter, aut cupiditate nocendi aliud loqui, seu gestu significare, & aliud sentire: so Melanchthon: To lie is to deceive our neighbour to his hurt. For in this sense a lie is naturally and intrinsecally evil; that is, to speak a lie to our neighbour is naturally evil. Not because it is different from an eternal truth, for every thing that differs from the Eternal truth is not therefore criminal for being spoken, that is, is not an evil lie: and a man may be a lier though he speaks that which does not differ from the Eternal truth; for sometimes a man may speak that which is truth, and yet be a lier at the same time in the same thing. For he does not speak truly because the thing is true; but he is a lier because he speaks it when he thinks it is false. That therefore is not the essence or formality of a lie. Vehementer errant qui tradunt orationis esse proprium significare verum necessarium, said Scaliger: A man may be a true man though he doe not alwaies speak truth. If he intends to profit and to instruct, to speak probably and usefully, to speak with a purpose to doe good & to doe no evil, though the words have not in them any necessary truth, yet they may be good words. Simonides and Plato say it is injustice and therefore evil: so does Cicero, and indeed so does the Holy Scripture, by including our neighbours right in our speaking truth; it is contra proximum, it is against our neighbour; for to himself no man can lie, and to God no man can lie, unless he be also an Atheistical person, and believes that God knows nothing that is hidden, and so is impious when he faies a lie. But a lie is an injury to our neighbour; who because he knows not the secret, is to be told that in which he is concerned, and he that deceives him abuses him.

5. For there is in mankind an universal contract implied in all their entercourses, and words being instituted to declare the mind, and for no other end, he that hears me speak hath a right in justice to be done him, that as far as I can what I speak be true; for else he by words does not know your mind, and then as good and better not speak at all. Humanæ aures verba nostra talia judicant, qualia sonant. Divina vero judicia talia esse audiunt, qualia ex intimis proferuntur. Though God judges of our words by the heart, yet Man judges of the heart by the words; and therefore in justice we are bound to speak so as that our neighbour doe not loose his right S. Gregor. lib. 26. Moral. cap. 7.

which by our ſpeaking we give him to the truth that is in our heart. And of a lie thus defin'd, which is injurious to our neighbour ſo long as his right to truth remains, it is that S. Auſtin affirms it to be ſimply unlawful, and that it can in no caſe be permitted, Niſi forte regulas quaſdam daturus es quibus noverimus ubi oporteat mentiri, ubi non oporteat; by way of confidence and irony: he condemns it all, unleſs peradventure (ſayes he) you are able to give us rules when a man may lie, and when he may not. Quod non eſt bonum, nunquam erit bonum, that which is not innocent in it ſelf, can never be made ſo. But vitia non ſunt quibus rectè uti licet; if it can in any caſe become good, it is not of its own nature evil: ſo that if a lye be unjuſt, it can never become lawfull; but if it can be ſeparate from injuſtice, then it may be innocent. Here then I conſider, Epiſt 8. ad Hieron.

Eurip. in Phœniſs. Laſtant. 6. inſtit. 16.

6. This right though it be regularly and commonly belonging to all men, yet it may be taken away by a Superior right ſupervening; or it may be loſt, or it may be hindred, or it may ceaſe upon a greater reaſon.

7. 1. Therefore upon this account it was lawful for the Children of Iſrael to borrow Jewels of the Egyptians, which ſuppoſes a promiſe of reſtitution, though they intended not to pay them back again: God gave them commandement ſo to ſpoil them, and the Egyptians were deveſted of their rights, and were to be us'd like enemies.

8. 2. It is lawful to tell a lie to children or to mad-men, becauſe they having no powers of judging, have no right to truth: but then the lie muſt be charitable and uſeful; becauſe they are defended by the laws from injury, and therefore muſt not have a lie told them that can doe them miſchief. So that if a lie be told it muſt be ſuch as is for their good; for though they have no right to truth, yet they have right to defence and immunity: and an injurious lie told to a child or mad-man is a ſin, not becauſe it deceives him, but becauſe it deceives him to his prejudice. Quintilian the great Maſter of children ſaies, Utilitatis eorum gratiâ multa fingimus, We feign many things to affright or allure Children to good, and from evil reſpectively. And ſo doe Phyſitians to their Patients, abuſing the fancies of hypochondriacal and diſordered perſons into a will of being cured. Some will doe nothing without a warrant; others are impatient of your converſe unleſs you ſeem to believe them: and Phyſicians can never apply their remedies, unleſs they pretend warrants, or compliances, and uſe little arts of wit and coſenage. This and the like were ſo uſual, ſo permitted to Phyſitians, that it grew to a Proverb, Mentiris ut medicus; which yet was alwaies to be underſtood in the way of charity, and with honour to the profeſſion. But this any Phyſitian may not doe, that is, not to every Patient: for if the man be wiſe and can chuſe and can conſider, he may not be coſen'd into his cure by the telling of a lie, becauſe he is capable of reaſon, & therefore may chuſe what he hath a mind to, and therefore to coſen him is to injure him; & no man muſt commit a ſin to doe a good turn to a man againſt his will. * And thus alſo in the caſe of Children: their Tutors or Parents may not tell them every lie; they may not teach them lies and make them confident in vanities; but for their good, govern them as they can be governed. Ut puerorum ætas improvida ludificetur, all the world conſents, when it is for their improvement. And to this is reduc'd the permiſſion of inventing a wittie fable, or telling a falſe ſtory, to gain ground upon upon him that believes a falſe opinion, and cannot any other way ſo eaſily be confuted. Thus when two Eutychian Biſhops, who believing that the two natures of Chriſt made but one, did conſequently believe that the Divinity did die as well as the Humanity in the death of Chriſt, came to the Court of a Saracen Prince, he pretended great ſorrow and conſternation of mind at the receipt of ſome letters; into the contents whereof when they with ſome curioſity inquired, the Prince with a ſeeming great ſorrow told them he had receiv'd certain intelligence that the Archangel Gabriel was dead. They to comfort him told him certainly it could not be true; and for their parts they did believe it to be impoſſible. O Fathers, ſaid the Prince, you doe not believe it to be impoſſible that an Archangel ſhould, when you affirm that the Divinity did die. Such a fiction as this no wiſe man reproves; it is but like the ſuppoſing a falſe Propoſition in diſputation, that upon that falſe ſuppoſition a true Concluſion may be erected. Niceph. 18. c. 35.

9. 3. It is lawful to tell a lie to our neighbour by conſent, provided the end be innocent or pious. Thus S. Chryſoſtom and S. Hierom ſay that S. Peter ſuffer'd himſelf to be reprov'd by S. Paul before the Gentiles for too much compliance with the Jews: not that he did it ſeriouſly, but κατ' οἰκονομίαν, he acted a part by conſent to eſtabliſh Chriſtian liberty amongſt the Gentiles. I doe not conſent to the inſtance, becauſe S. Paul tels it to the Galatians as a ſolemn ſtory and a direct narrative, adding withall dogmatically, that S. Peter was to be blam'd: but the inſtance will ſerve rightly to illuſtrate this limitation of the Rule. But thus the parties in a warre may write exactly contrary to the truth; when they are underſtood to what purpoſe, and when it is by conſent. Becauſe he who hath the right to truth hath quitted it, and his communication does ſerve the ends of ſociety well enough, and his words, though they are not agreeable to his ordinary mind, yet they are made to be ſo by particular inſtitution and deſigne. Thus in beſieged places they write letters of confidence and great oſtentation of the ſtrengths which they have not; when their parties have conſented that they ſhould doe ſo for their juſt advantages.

10. 4. To tell a lie for charity, to ſave a mans life, the life of a friend, of a husband, of a Prince, of an uſeful and a publick perſon, hath not onely been done in all times, but commended by great and wiſe and good men. Οὐ νέμεσις ψεῦδος ὑπὲρ ψυχῆς ἀγορεύειν, To tell a lie to ſave a life is no harm, ſaid old Piſander. Thus the Egyptian midwives are commended becauſe by their lie they ſav'd the Iſraelitiſh infants. O magnum humanitatis ingenium! O pium pro ſalute mendacium! ſaies S. Auſtin of them: it was an excellent invention of kindneſs, and a pious lie for the ſafety of the innocents: and S. Ambroſe and S. Jerome commend them ſo, that they ſuppos'd them to receive eternal rewards. The ſame was the caſe of Rahab; to whom it ſhould ſeem that Phinehas, who was one of the ſpies, had given inſtruction and made in her fair diſpoſitions to tell a lie for their concealment. For when ſhe had hidden Caleb, Phinehas ſaid to her, Ego ſum Sacerdos. Sacerdotes verò, quippe Angelorum ſimiles, ſi volunt, aſpectabiles ſunt; ſi nolunt, non cernuntur. But ſhe made no uſe of that, but ſaid directly they were gone away. Concerning which lie of hers S. Chryſoſtom cries out, Ὦ καλοῦ ψεύδους, ὦ καλοῦ δόλου, ὃ προδιδόντος τὰ θεῖα, ἀλλὰ φυλάττοντος τὴν εὐσέβειαν, O excellent lie! O worthy deceit of her that did not betray the Divine perſons, but did retain piety! Thus we find Homil. 5. de pœnitent.

S. Felix telling a lie to ſave his life from the Heathen Inquiſitors.

They ask'd where Felix was; himſelf anſwer'd, that he knew not Felix whom they look'd for: and yet no man finds fault with this eſcape. Deceptio & mendacium ſemper aliàs mala res, tunc tantum ſunt uſui quando pro remedio ſunt amicis curandis, aut ad vitandum apud hoſtes periculum; they are the words of Celſus in Origen. A lie is otherwiſe evil, onely it is then uſeful when it is for remedy to cure the evils of our friends, or to avoid the evils from our enemies. The ſame almoſt with the expreſſion of Clemens Alexandrinus, who allows ψεύδεσθαι ἐν θεραπείας μέρει, to lie when it is a remedy. So Lucian amongſt the Heathens, Qui cum uſus poſtulat mentiuntur, veniâ nimirum hi, imò laude plerique eorum digni ſunt; quicunque vel hoſtes fefellerunt, vel ad ſalutem tali quopiam pharmaco uſi ſunt in neceſſitatibus: They are not onely to be excus'd or pardon'd, but to be commended, that lie, when they uſe it as a remedy or a medicine in the danger or neceſſities of our friends; where alſo the Scholiaſt does allow an officious lie. So we muſt uſe a lie, ſaies Caſſian, quaſi natura ei inſit hellebori, as a man uſes hellebore: and he commends Archebius for deceiving ſome perſons with a charitable lie. It is therefore no wonder if Pliny commends Arria the wife of Cæcinna Patus for ſo often lying to her ſick husband in the concealment of the death of their beloved boy; which ſhe therefore hid leſt the grief ſhould extinguiſh her Husband. In ſhort, S. Auſtin ſaies that all the Philoſophers, as Plato, Xenophon, Lucian, the Lawyers, the Phyſicians, the Rhetoricians and Theologues did affirm that it was ſometimes lawful to tell a lie; that is, when it did good and no evil: Τὸ γὰρ ἀγαθὸν κρεῖττόν ἐστι τῆς ἀληθείας, ſaid Proclus, For Charity is better then truth, and to ſave a mans life is better then a true ſtory. The Archbiſhop of Tyre (as I remember) tells a ſtory, that a malicious Saracen had ſecretly defiled one of the Moſques or places of worſhip which the Turks have in Jeruſalem. The fact was imputed to the Chriſtians, who generally denying it, but having no credit with their enemies, were all preſently drag'd to the place of execution. Amongſt them there was a young man pious and noble, who ſeeing all his brethren in a ſad condition and himſelf equally involved, by an officious and a charitable lie took the fact upon himſelf, and confeſs'd himſelf alone to be the doer of it, and that the reſt knew nothing of it. Himſelf indeed was put to death with exquiſite torments, but he ſav'd the lives of all the reſt; who, I doubt not, believ'd that young man to have in heaven a great reward for his piety, and no reproof for his innocent and pious lie: for in memory of this noble act the Chriſtians in Jeruſalem once a year marched with palms in their hands into the City to perpetuate the memory of that deliverance.

11. 5. Now this may be better admitted in caſe the charitable lye be told to him to whom the good accrues; for then there is a leave juſtly preſumed, and he that receives the good is willing to receive it with the loſs of

of an uſeleſs or hurtfull truth, and therefore there is no injuſtice done: as he that takes his neighbour's goods, for which he hath reaſon to believe his neighbour willing, is no thief, nor the other a deceiver. Ἀπατᾷ μέν, ἀπατεὼν δ' οὐκ ἔστιν· ὁ γὰρ πλησίον ἔχει τὴν ἀπάτην τοῦ νοσοῦντος, ἀλλὰ τὴν σωτηρίαν, ſayes Andronicus Rhodius, He does indeed deceive, but he is no deceiver; becauſe not the coſening but the curing of his friend is the purpoſe of his falſe affirmative. And to this we ſuppoſe that every man is willing enough, and therefore not at all injur'd. And this reaſon was good in ſuch charitable deceptions which are by implicit conſent or leave juſtly preſumed: ſo Darius Hyſtaſpes in Herodotus, Ubi expedit mendacium dicere, dicatur: nam idem optamus, & qui mendacium dicimus, & qui veritatem. Every man is willing enough to be deceived into his own advantage; and therefore when it is ſo, in ſuch things where the man is willing to receive advantage, there is no harm done, if he be deceiv'd that he may not be undone. He that is in danger of drowning is willing enough to be pull'd out of the water, though by the ears, or the hair of his head; and we have reaſon to believe ſo in the preſent affair. Mendacium nemini noxium, ſed alicui commodum, honeſtum eſſe, ſaid Biſhop Heliodorus in his Fair Ethiopian. He was indeed then writing a Romance, by which he intended to doe good and no harm, and therefore believ'd himſelf innocent. Upon this account the Apologues or Fables of Æſop, the Parables of wiſe men, and their dark ſayings, the caſes which Lawyers put, and the fictions of law, have their juſtification, Et prodeſſe ſolent, & delectare——They hurt no man, and doe good to every man; they doe him profit, and they doe him pleaſure.

Exit in immenſum fœcunda licentia vatum,
Obligat hiſtoricâ nec ſua verba fide. Ovid. 3. Eleg.

Poets doe intend to teach, not to deceive, in their fictions, and therefore are allowed.

12. 6. But if the lye be told to another for the preſervation not of himſelf, but of a third perſon, then the caſe is more difficult, for here is no preſumptive leave, but it is againſt the mind of the inquirer. Now concerning this, though it be allowed by very many of the antient Doctours of the Church, and by the wiſeſt amongſt the Heathens, and hath in it a very great charity; yet I cannot ſee ſufficient cauſe to allow it.

Ὅταν δὲ ὄλεθρον δεινὸν ἡ ἀλήθεια ἄγει,
Συγγνωστὸν εἰπεῖν ἔστι, κοὐ τὸ μὴ καλόν.

It is at no hand good to tell a lye: but when a truth brings an intolerable evil, it is pardonable, but not commendable; ſo the Greek Tragedy: becauſe it is of it ſelf evil to lye to our neighbour. Not that every falſe propoſition ſpoken knowingly is a ſin; but if it be ſpoken to deceive, and not to profit, it is ſpoken to the injury of him that hears, and is a ſin becauſe it is unjuſt, and therefore not to be done for any good; and it is in this very inſtance in which S. Paul was angry at them who intimated that he told a lye for a good end: it may not be done, when to doe it is unjuſt or injurious. I approve therefore the opinion of S. Auſtin, I am ſure it was one of his opinions, for in this queſtion he had more then one; Duo Cauſ. 22. qu. 2. c. Nequis. ſunt genera mendaciorum in quibus non eſt magna culpa, ſed tamen non ſunt ſine culpa, There are two ſorts of lyes which have in them no great fault, but yet they are not innocent: the one is to lye in jeſt; which is therefore not pernicious, becauſe it does not deceive, for it is taken but for a jeſt: the other is to lye for the good of our neighbour; which therefore is the leſs, becauſe it hath ſome-

Lib. de pudicit. thing in it of good will. And Tertullian is of the ſame opinion, who reckons this of neceſſitate mentiri, to lye in the time of need, amongſt the ſins of daily incurſion, or of an unavoidable infirmity. And S. Auſtin diſcourſes it
De mendacio, ad Conſentium. very well; When it is ask'd whether a good man may lye or no, we ask not after him that belongs to Egypt, to Jericho, or to Babylon, or to the earthly Jeruſalem which is in bondage with her children: but what is his office that belongs to the Mother of us all, that City that is from above? and then we anſwer, that no lye is of the truth: but concerning the Citizens of this City it is written, that a lye was not found in their mouths. So that upon this account all thoſe examples recorded in Scripture of great perſons telling a lye in the time of the danger of themſelves or others is no warrant, no argument of the lawfulneſs of it; for they were under a looſer law, but we under a more perfect and more excellent: and yet they did not doe well, and if we imitate them we doe worſe.

13. And therefore we find great examples of Chriſtians and of Heathens, whoſe Charity was not cold, but their love of truth and righteouſneſs was
Lib. de mendac. cap. 13. much warmer then in the former examples. S. Auſtin tels of Firmus Biſhop of Tagaſta, that when one who by evil chance had kill'd a man fled to him to be conceal'd from the avengers of blood; to the inquirers he anſwer'd, Nec mentiri ſe poſſe, nec hominem prodere, He could neither lye, nor yet betray the man. For which anſwer and refuſal the Biſhop being brought before the Emperour, as a reward both of his charity and his truth, he obtain'd pardon for the man. And it was a great thing which Probus tels of Epaminondas, and Plutarch of Ariſtides, that they were ſo great and ſevere lovers of truth, that they would not lye ſo much as in jeſt. Indeed that was very well: and it is of greater obligation to Chriſtians, to whom not onely purity and ſimplicity, ingenuity and ſincerity is commanded, but all vain talking is forbidden. But the caſe is not ſo clear in the matter of difference, when it happens between a great charity and an unconcerning truth. For who would not ſave his Father's life, or the life of his King, or of a good Biſhop and a Guide of Souls, at the charge of a harmleſs lye, from the rage of Perſecutors and Tyrants? God indeed in his providence hath ſo order'd the affairs of the world, that theſe caſes ſeldome happen: but when any man is ſurpris'd or tried, unleſs he be ſure that it is in that caſe a ſin to tell a lye, he may be ſure it is a very great ſin to betray his Prince or Prelate, his Father or his Friend. Every man in that caſe would diſpute hardly, rather then give up a good man to death. And if it be come to a diſpute, and that it be doubtfull on either hand whether the lye in that caſe, or whether the betraying the man to death, be the ſin, it is the ſafer way to determine for the charity then for the veracity; becauſe in caſe it be a ſin to give him up, it is much a greater ſin then to tell ſuch a lye: and then comes in the rule, Caret peccato quod ex duobus minus eſt. The lye is the leſs evil, and therefore it is no ſin when it is choſen to avoid that which for ought we know is the greater. But this is upon ſuppoſition that the caſe is doubtfull. * To which alſo muſt be added, that it muſt alſo ſuppoſe that it is juſt to ſave the man, or that we think it ſo: for to reſcue a Malefactor, a Bandito, a Fugitive of law, hath in it no ſuch obligation. But if it be juſt that the man be ſav'd, that is a higher juſtice then the obligation of telling truth to the Perſecutor; to whom it is as great charity, if from him we take the power of doing evil, as it is juſtice to reſcue the innocent.

innocent. Now this, and the opinion of ſo many great men that allow it, and the favourable nature of the caſe, is enough at leaſt to make this matter probable; and if there be a doubt, it is enough to eſtabliſh it: the queſtion being uncertain, is enough to make the practice certain.

And indeed if we conſider things without the prejudice of eaſy and popular opinions, though it be ſaid, that to tell truth is an act of juſtice; yet this is not true in all propoſitions, but in ſuch truths onely which concern a man for ſome real good to him, or for ſome imaginary good which hath no real evil. But when the telling of a truth will certainly be the cauſe of evil to a man, though he have right to truth, yet it muſt not be given to him to his harm: it is like the giving to a mad-man his own ſword; you had better give him a wooden dagger, though the other be his own. But in an unconcerning truth what intereſt can any man have that is worth preſerving? What wrong is done to me if I be told that Alexander dyed upon the floor, and not upon a feather-bed? or that Pittacus his wife hurt her fingers when ſhe threw down the table of meat before her husband's friends? Truth is juſtice when it does good, when it ſerves the end of wiſedome, or advantage, or real pleaſure, or ſomething that ought or may be deſir'd; and every truth is no more juſtice, then every reſtitution of a ſtraw to the right owner is a duty. Be not over-righteous, ſayes Salomon. In theſe things there is no queſtion but the pretences of little juſtice ought to ſerve the great end of charity; and much rather if the truth will doe no good, and will doe hurt to him that inquires, and more to him who is inquir'd after. The Perſecutor hath a right to truth, but no right to be undone; and therefore he is not wrong'd by that lye that ſaves him harmleſs in ſome meaſure, and his brother in more; and if he be not wrong'd, then no man is: and then the lye that ſo well ſerves Charity, is not againſt Juſtice; and unleſs every lye be intrinſecally evil and malicious, it hath in ſuch caſes no irregularity. And if it be objected, that we muſt not tell a lye for God, therefore much leſs for our Brother; I anſwer, that it does not follow: for God needs not a lye, but our Brother does: and beſides this, there can no ſervice be pretended to be done to God by a lye, but it muſt be in the matter of juſtice or religion, in both which caſes a lye is neither to be told for God nor our Brother; but a real ſervice may be done for our Brother by ſuch a lye as ſins neither againſt juſtice nor religion; in which caſe onely I ſay it may ſeem to be allowable.

14. But then from theſe premiſſes the truth in the inſtance of the Rule is eſtabliſhed; for it is not lawfull for a guilty priſoner to ſay Not guilty, when he is juſtly interrogated. Chriſtianum non mentiri etiamſi moriatur ex tormentis, ſaid Clemens Alexandrinus, A Chriſtian will not lye, though to eſcape death with torments: For the law ſayes, Thou ſhalt not kill; and Num. 16. the law ſayes, Thou ſhalt not lye: but the law it ſelf does ſometimes kill, but the law does never lye. For although it be ſaid, that no man is bound to accuſe himſelf, and indeed the laws of man doe not tie him to doe it: yet this hinders not the concluſion in this caſe, for in the preſent caſe the man is accuſed already, and he is not called to be his own accuſer, but to confeſs the fact if he be juſtly accuſed by the law: for why does the Judge ask, but to be anſwer'd truly? For there being three wayes in law of proceeding to definitive ſentence, 1. the notoreity of the fact, 2. the conviction by witneſſes, and 3. the confeſſion of the party; in the deſtitution of the firſt, to prevent the trouble of the ſecond, the law interrogates concerning the third; and it is as in the case of Joshuah and Achan, My son, give glory unto the Lord, and confess thy fault. It is true, it is a favourable case; and when a mans life is at stake, he hath brought himself into an evil necessity: but there is no excusing of a false denial, but it is certainly Criminal, and nothing can excuse it, unless the law should give leave to such persons to say what they would, which cannot be suppos'd in any good Government; for then trials of Criminal causes between the Judge and the Thief would be like a match at fencing, and it is infinitely confuted by those laws which use to examine by scourgings or torture; which whether it be lawfull or unlawfull, I doe not here determine, but I affirm to be a great testimony, that laws doe not love to be played withall, but when they ask soberly, intend to be answered truly.

This is also to be extended to the case of Advocates, who in a good cause must not use evil arts. For we must not tell a lie for God, and therefore not for the interest of any moral vertue, nor for the defence of righteousness; for a cavil or an injurious lie is out of the way to justice, and she must not be directly wronged that she may be indirectly righted. In the civil law it is permitted, that to avoid abuses and the injurious craft of the opposite party, the advocate of the right may use all arts that are not lies and falsity; Nec videtur dolo feciſſe qui fraudem excluſerit, saies the law, l. Compater, § Titio, ff. de legat. ſecundo. He may be overthrown by art, so he be not by that which is false: ſic ars deluditur arte. But in the case which the lawyers out of Baldus put, the question is evident. Agricola borrows of Sempronius five hundred pounds, and pays him at the day, but without witness: Sempronius sues him for the money: Agricola owes him none, but cannot prove the payment; but yet may not when he is particularly interrogated, to save himself from injury, deny that ever he received any. He must confess the truth, though he pay the money again. Covarruvias affirms that he may in this case lawfully deny that ever he received any; because he is not indebted, he received none that remains in his hand: and to other purposes the Judge cannot question him; and if he does he is unjust, and therefore Agricola is not tied to answer rightly. But this is not well said nor well considered. For the Judge being competent may require him to answer; and the intention of the question is not to know whether Agricola have paid the money yea or no; but whether he borrowed it. For if he did, the Judge is afterward to inquire concerning the payment: and as Sempronius was tied to prove that, so is Agricola tied to prove this; and a lie is not to be confuted by a lie, nor the error of Agricola in not taking witnesses or an acquittance to be supplied by a direct denial of a truth. * But if Sempronius have lent Agricola 500 li. whereof he hath received 200 li. if the Judge aske whether he ows him that sum which Sempronius demands, he may indefinitely and without more punctuality deny the debt, that is, of 500 li. saying that he owes it not: and if the law be such that the confession of one part intitles him to the whole, he may deny the whole to be due, in case he have paid a part. But with these two Cautions, 1. That if he be ask'd concerning a part, he answer to that as justly as he answers to the whole: 2. That he do not make use of this subterfuge to defraud Sempronius of what is due debt, but only to defend himself from the undue demand. These cautions being observed, he hath liberty so to defend his cause, because majori ſummæ negative prolatæ minorem nec naturaliter nec civiliter ineſſe, say the lawyers. A man by denying the whole does not deny the part, though he that affirms the whole whole affirms the part; and therefore this defence is juſt becauſe it is true. * But now if in a juſt cauſe the Advocate or party may not tell a lie; I conclude that much leſs may he doe it in an unjuſt cauſe, and for the defence of wrong. But [much leſs] ſignifies nothing, for it may not at all be done in either; and in pure, perfect negatives there can be no degrees. But in artifices and crafty entercourſes there is ſome difference; theſe may be uſed to defend a juſt cauſe that can no other way be defended; but they may not be uſed to promote an evil cauſe; becauſe they of themſelves though they be indifferent, yet not ſerving a good end but an evil, do therefore become evil. And therefore the Greek that denyed the depoſitum of his friend, and offered to ſwear at the Altar that he had reſtor'd it already, did not preſerve his conſcience and his oath by deſiring his friend to hold the ſtaffe in which he had ſecretly conveyed the money. It is true, he delivered it into his hand, deſiring that he would hold it till he had ſworn; but that artifice was a plain coſenage, and it was prettily diſcovered: For the injur'd perſon in indignation at the perjury ſmote the ſtaff upon the ground, and broke it, and eſpied the money. But that made all right indeed, though againſt the intention of the perjurer. Such like arts as theſe muſt not be us'd to doe a miſchief: if they doe charity and juſtice, if they have not ſomething to legitimate them, they have very much to excuſe them.

15. 7. It is lawfull to doe otherwiſe then we have ſaid, when the doing is better then the ſaying: if the ſaying were ill, there is no ſcruple of it; for it ought not to be done, but the ſaying is to be repented of: not that the ſaying was a lie, for there is no way of making it good but by cauſing it to paſs into a lie, that is, into vanity and nothing. But then, if the ſaying be leſs good, and the deed be contrary, and yet much better, the truth is not ſo much as the bounty; and there is no injuſtice in the lie, becauſe there is charity in the action, and a ſufficient leave preſum'd to be given by him that is concerned. Thus the Emperor that ſaid he would cut off every one that piſſed againſt the wall, being afterwards appeaſed and perſwaded to mercy towards them that had done amiſs, he expounded his words concerning dogs, and cauſed all the dogs in the Town to be kill'd. No man here was injur'd; and it had been an importune adhering to a truth, and a cruel verification of his word, to have prefer'd his word before the lives of ſo many Citizens.

16. 8. It is not lawfull to tell a lie to ſave our fame; but we muſt rather accuſe our ſelves then tell a lie, or commit any other ſin. Nemo tenetur infamare ſe, is a rule univerſally admitted amongſt the Caſuiſts, No man is bound to diſcover his own ſhame. And upon this account they give leave to men to hide their ſin, to leave their repentance imperfect, to tell a lie, to hazard the not doing of a known duty, to injure innocent perſons. Thus when a man hath ſtolen goods, he is bound to reſtore, but not if it cannot be done without diſcovering his perſon, becauſe no man is bound to diſgrace himſelf. If an adultereſs hath ſome children by her husband, others ſecretly by a ſtranger, ſhe is bound not to ſuffer the legitimate to be injur'd by proviſions for the other: this is true: but if ſhe cannot prevent the injury to the legitimate without diſcovering her ſelf to her husband, Non tenetur, She is not bound to defame ſelf. If her husband examine her concerning it, ſhe may hold her peace: but if that increaſes the ſuſpicion, ſhe hath no way to eſcape but by denying it; for ſhe is not oblig'd to betray or accuſe her ſelf. This is the doctrine of the Canoniſts and Maſters of Conſcience in the Church of Rome, which (as yet) are almoſt all that have written upon Caſes. Navarre is the man whom I chuſe for all the reſt. Nemo tenetur reſtituere cum periculo famæ conſequentis virtutem moralem vel theologicam; non famæ partæ in aliis rebus præclaris, ut ingenio, divitiis, No man is bound to make reſtitution with the hazard of his fame conſequent to a moral or theological vertue; that is, if it will make him ſuſpected not to be a good man: but if it will only hinder or hazard his reputation of wiſdome or wealth or any thing of theſe natures, it hinders not. And again in the caſe of an adultereſs, Peccavit, ſed poteſt abſolvi, licet taceat, & noceat patri putativo & hæredibus, quando timetur mors, vel amiſſio famæ, &c. She hath ſinn'd, but ſhe may be abſolved, though ſhe hold her peace, and be injurious to the ſuppoſed Father, and wrong the heires; that is, if ſhe be in peril of her life, or fears the loſs of her fame. To ſave a mans credit, an honeſt man, to whom it would be a great ſhame to begg, videtur poſſe clancu-lum neceſſaria ſurripere, may privately ſteale neceſſaries. So Diana. And if ſo, I do not doubt but he may alſo lie, and deny it to ſave his credit, if he be asked uncivilly concerning it. But this alſo the Doctors expreſly affirm, that if Titius have diſgrac'd Caius by puniſhing his ſecret ſhame to defame him, he is bound to make reſtitution of his good name, by denying what he ſaid, that is, by telling of a lie, or by mental reſervation; and that's all one, as I ſhall prove in the ſequel. So Emonerius. Againſt theſe prodigies of doctrine I intend this paragraph. We muſt not commit a ſin to ſave our life, much leſſe to ſave our fame; and indeed nothing does more deſerve infamy then to tell a lie, nothing diſgraces a man more: and if a lie be an injuſtice, then no end can ſave it harmeleſs.

17. But then concerning our fame, we muſt rather let it goe, then let our duty goe. For though our fame is a tender part, and very valuable, yet our duty is more: although our fame is neceſſary for others, yet a good conſcience is neceſſary to our ſelves: and he is cruel that neglects his own fame; but he is more cruel that neglects his own ſoul: and therefore we may expoſe our good name to goe as God ſhall pleaſe, 1. When we ask counſel and remedy for our ſoul. 2. To avoid the ſin of pride, and puniſh the vanities of our ſpirit. 3. To exerciſe and increaſe the grace of humility. 4. In humiliation and penance for our ſins, when our fame is not neceſſary to others, that is, when we are not eminent and publick perſons. 5. When we are tied to any expreſs duty which is indiſpenſably neceſſary, as reſtitution of fame or goods, and yet cannot be done without the publication of our perſon and our ſhame. 6. When for our own greater good or for the publick intereſt we are commanded by a juſt and competent authority. 7. And laſtly, When we muſt either confeſs our ſin or tell a lie, which is the thing now in queſtion; for we muſt rather ſuffer ſhame then doe things worthy of ſhame, rather be aſhamed before men then be aſhamed before God, that is, rather be diſgrac'd then damn'd: for nothing needs a lie but a ſin to hide it, and by a lie a ſin is made two.

18. 9. It is not lawfull to tell a lie in humility, or the confeſſion of ſins and accuſation of our ſelves. Cum humilitatis causâ mentiris, ſi non eras peccator antequam mentireris, mentiendo efficeris quod evitâras, ſaid S. Auſtin. He that lies in humility, and calls himſelf a ſinner in that wherein he was innocent, innocent, hath made himself a sinner by his lying. And this was it which Abbat Zozimus wittily and piously replied; For when he said he was the greatest sinner, and the vilest of men, to him that reprov'd him for saying so, and telling him that it was not truly said of him, because every one knew he serv'd God with great diligence and great sincerity, and therefore he ought to speak more truly of himself and more thankfully of God; Zozimus replied, You say very well, I ought to speak truth of my self & thankfully of God; but I am false and unthankful, but therefore I did say true, and not unthankfully. But we have truth enough to say of our selves to make us humble without saying what is false. Ὁ δὲ ἐνόν ἀνύπαλιν, ἀρνεῖσθαι τὰ ὑπάρχοντα, ἢ ἐλάττω ποιεῖν, saies Aristotle; to deny the good things that are in us, or to make them less, is dissembling. All pride is a lie; but humility is truth: and therefore it is but a dissembling humility that lives upon the bread of deceit. Synesius Bp. of Ptolemais was a wise man and a great Philosopher. But when he was chosen Bishop he refus'd it passionately, & that his refusal might be accepted, declaim'd most bitterly against himself; that he was a man given to gaming, from which a Bishop should be free as God himself; that he did not believe that the world would ever perish; that he did not assent to the article of the resurrection of the dead; that being a Philosopher of the Stoical Sect, he was something given to lying; that he was not popular in his opinions, but humorous and morose, secret and resolute; that if he was forc'd to be a Bishop, he would then preach all his opinions. For all this Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria consecrated him Bishop, as knowing all this to be but stratagem and the arts of an odde phantastick humility. But it was ill done; and Synesius had this punishment for his lying modesty, that he was believ'd by posterity to be so heathenish and unworthy, that that Church chose him Bishop onely upon hopes he would mend. So Evagrius and Nicephorus report.

19. 10. In a just warre it is lawful to deceive the unjust enemy, but not to lie; that is, by stratagems and semblances of motions, by amusements and intrigues of action, by ambushes and wit, by simulation or dissimulation, by force or craft, openly or secretly, any way that you can, unless you promise the contrary: for it is in open warre, if the warre be just, lawful to doe justice upon the enemy all the waies we can; craft is but the facilitation of the force; and when it is a state of warre, there is nothing else to be look'd for. But if there be a treaty, or a contract, a promise or an agreement in any thing, that is a state of peace so farre, and introduces a law; and then to tell a lie or to falsify does destroy peace and justice, and by breaking the law reduces things to the state of warre again.

Ἤ δόλῳ, ἢ βίᾳ, ἢ ἀμφαδὸν, ἢ κρυφηδὸν,

Κρὴ δ' πάντ' ἐρέοντ' ἀμαυρῶσαι τὸ ἐχθρόν,

Pindar.

It is lawful to doe any thing to destroy your enemy; that is, so long as you profess hostility: and therefore if you tell a false tale to him to deceive him, when you are fighting against him, he is a fool if he believes you, for then you intend to destroy him; but you are not unjust, you are in a state of warre with him, and have no obligation upon you towards him. Thus Elisha told a lie to the Syrian army which came to apprehend him, This is not the City, and this is not the way: & this is approv'd and allowed by Plato and Xenophon, Homer and Pindar, Polybius and Thucydides, Plutarch and Lucian amongst the Greeks, Philo amongst the Jews; and S. Chrysostom amongst the Christians ans ſaies, If you examine all the braveſt Generals, you ſhall find their braveſt trophies to be the production of fraud and craft, ἢ μᾶλλον τύτυς ἐπαινομένυς ἢ τυς φανερῶς κρατυῦντας, and that they were more commended then ſuch who did their work by fine force. Thus the cauſing falſe rumors to be ſpread amongſt the enemies is an allowed ſtratagem in warre, neither ignoble nor unjuſt. Flaccus told that Æmilius had taken the enemies town, to diſhearten the party he fought againſt: and Quinctius the Conſul caus'd it to be ſpread abroad that the enemies on the right wing were fled. By ſuch arts it is very uſual to bring conſternation to the hoſtile party: and he whom you may lawfully kill, you may as well deceive him into it, as force him into it; you being no more oblig'd to tell him truth then to ſpare his life: for certainly of it ſelf killing is as bad as lying; but when you have no obligation or law to the contrary, and have not bound your ſelf to the contrary, you may doe either. But this is at no hand to be done in matters of treaty or promiſe, either explicite or implicite, as in parties, and truces; and therefore it was a foul ſtain upon Hannibal, that he profeſſing open warre againſt the Romans did alſo profeſs it againſt faith and juſtice, keeping no word or promiſe if it was for his advantage to break it; and the Trojans were troubled in conſcience at their fallacious conducting of their warrs, not by ſtratagem, but by breaking their oaths and Covenants,

We fight with lying and breaking promiſes, which is unlawful to doe. For concerning this thing, that even in warre we are bound to keep faith & promiſe made to our enemies, it is certain & affirmed by almoſt all wiſe & good men of the world: Liquet etiam in bello fidem & juſtitiam ſervari oportere, nec ullum decorum oportere ſervari, ſi violetur fides, ſaid S. Ambroſe; and he proves it by the example of Joſhuah, who kept his promiſe which the Gibeonites got fraudulently from him. And the ſame is the ſentence of S. Auſtin; Fides quando promittitur, etiam hoſti ſervanda eſt, contra quem bellum geritur: and therefore when Nebuchadnezzar had conquered Zedechiah, and taken him into protection and peace upon his word and promiſe of fidelity, becauſe he afterwards did privately ſollicite the King of Egypt to fight againſt the King, he was put to death with greateſt cruelty. And this is not onely true between thoſe who are publick enemies, forreiners and ſtrangers, and ſupreme in their reſpective dominions, which the law properly ſignifies under the word Hoſtes, l. quos nos, ff. de verborum ſignif. for this is without queſtion; and therefore all men condemn thoſe that violate Embaſſadors, or that break the laws of truce; and every one blames Titus Labienus for wounding Commius of Arras under the colour of parlee: but Attilius Regulus is commended for refuſing to give his voice in the Senate ſo long as he was not diſcharged of his oath made to the Carthaginians. But this is alſo true, and our word and faith is ſacred, when it is paſs'd to all ſorts of enemies, to Rebels, to Thieves, to civil Adverſaries, to condemned perſons, to Fugitive ſervants, ſuch as Spartacus, Eunus and Athenio; and the reaſon of all is the ſame. Inter quos juris alicujus communio eſt, inter eos obligationem contrahi, They that are under the ſame law are equally bound; and whoever promiſe or treat, doe it at leaſt by the law of Nature or Nations, which alike bind them who are free from any civil obligation. This is that which Triphoninus ſaid, That if a thief intruſts any goods to the right owner, not knowing that they are his own, he is not oblig'd to reſtitution; but every man elſe is, if he have promis'd, becauſe they are none of his, and therefore he can be oblig'd to repay them: and for thieves and fugitives the people of Rome did treat with them, and ſend Embaſſadors; and all that was bound upon them by that entercourſe they kept religiouſly. And the ſame they did to condemned perſons; as appears in that famous caſe of Caius Rabirius, who was queſtion'd for killing L. Apuleius Saturninus againſt the publick faith given him by the people, when he and his companions fled to the Capitol for immunity and a guard againſt the ſentence of death which he had deſerv'd. Vide Orat. Cicer pro C. Rabirio. Appian. bel. Civil. 1.

But all this is to be underſtood ſo, that the faith and word be given by him who hath power to verify it: but when A. Albinus made a peace with King Jugurtha, for which he had no commiſſion, the Senate was not oblig'd to verify it; and Camillus the Dictator broke the peace which the Romans had fooliſhly made with the Gaules; and Scipio diſſolv'd the contract which Maſiniſſa and Sophonisba made without his leave, who had the power. In this there is onely caution to be had that there be no combination to deceive or reſcind what is found to be diſadvantageous, nor advantages taken by the change of hands. For if the Romans finding relief come, made Camillus Dictator that they might by pretence of his command break the peace, they did diſhonourably and falſe; but if he was Dictator before the peace, he had power, and he had reaſon. To this can be referr'd the caſe of two Italian Gentlemen. Guarino had injur'd Antonio de Imola; but confeſs'd his fault, ask'd pardon, made amends: and then Antonio ſwore his peace and his forgiveneſs, and that his hand ſhould never be upon him; but in his heart bore him a ſecret grudge, and therefore ſmote him ſecretly, ſaying that Guarino was a Bandito, and therefore condemn'd by the laws. This is to make our promiſe the cover of a lie, and the laws to miniſter to crafty miſchiefs. After a promiſe a man muſt not change his mind, and then make excuſes. Renunciatio ſui juris per pœnitentiam revocari non poteſt, ſaith the law, l. pactum, ff. de pact.

But deceiving the enemy by the ſtratagem of actions or words is not properly lying; for this ſuppoſes a converſation of law or peace, truſt or promiſe explicite or implicite. A lie is the deceiving of a truſt or confidence, but in fighting there is none of that; it is like wraſtling and fencing, a deſign to make that part unarm'd where he may ſtrike the ſurer: and of this S. Clemens of Alexandria affirms expreſsly concerning ſtratagems in warre, Hæc omnia licebit efficere, vel perſuadendo, vel cogendo, vel injuriam faciendo in iis ulciſcendis quibus expedit, vel faciendo id quod juſtum eſt, vel mentiendo, vel vera dicendo, vel etiam ſimul utendo aliquibus eorum in eodem tempore. All theſe things it is lawful to bring to paſs by perſwaſion, or by force, by doing injury or harm there where we are to doe revenge, by doing that which is juſt, or by telling that which is true, or by lying, or by doing any one or more of theſe together. Hæc autem omnia, & quomodo oporteat uti unoquoque eorum, cum Græci accepiſſent à Moyſe, non parvam accepere utilitatem; When the Greeks receiv'd all theſe things from Moyſes, and how they were to uſe any one and every one of theſe, they received no ſmall advantage. Stromat. l. 1. c. 13.

20. In this caſe, all the prejudice which the Queſtion is like to have, is in the meaning and evill ſound of the word lying; which becauſe it is ſo hateful to God and man, caſts a cloud upon any thing that it comes near: but lying (which S. Baſil calls extremam malitiæ lineam, the extremity of malice, which S. Ephrem calls the Ruſt of converſation) is indeed an enemy; but in in warre ſo it ſhould be; onely in peace and contracts, and civil converſation, it is intolerable. In warre it is no lie, but an engine of warre, againſt which the enemy is to ſtand upon his guard: and if a man may falſify a blow, much more may he falſify a word; and no juſtice, no promiſe, no charity, no law reſtrains the ſtratagems in a juſt warre; they which may be deſtroy'd, may be deceiv'd, and they may be deceiv'd by falſe actions, may by falſe words, if there be no collateral obligation or law to the contrary. A juſt man, ſaith S. Auſtin, is to take care of nothing but that his warre be juſt; that is, by a juſt authority, and for a juſt reaſon. Cum autem juſtum bellum ſuſceperit, utrùm apertâ pugnâ, utrùm inſidiis vincat, nihil ad juſtitiam intereſt, But if it be a juſt warre, it matters not as to the queſtion of juſtice, whether he overcome by force or by deceit. Dolus & perfidia are extremely different. ——dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirat? and, bonum eſſe dolum ſi quis adverſus hoſtem latronemve machinetur, ſaid Ulpian, Craft againſt a thief or enemy is good; but not perfidiouſneſs. Nullo diſcrimine virtutis ac doli proſperos omnes laudari debere bellorum eventus, ſaid Ammianus Marcellinus. To bring warre to a happy end, you may uſe force or wit; but at no hand break a promiſe, or be treacherous.

11. But this is not to be extended to a licence of telling a lie of the enemy in behalf of our own country, for fame and reputation, for noiſes and triumph; and I remember that Poggius upon this account loſt the reputation of a good hiſtorian.

22. 12. Princes may not lie for the intereſts and advantages of Government. Not in contracts, treaties, bargains, embaſſies and all the entercourſes of peace and civil negotiation. For beſides it is an argument of fear and infirmity to take ſanctuary in the little ſubterfuges of craft when they are beaten from their own proper ſtrengths, it is alſo a perfect deſtruction of government and the great bands of ſociety and civil entercourſe; and if they be us'd to fail, no man can be confident of that affirmative which ought to be venerable and ſacred up to the height of religion; and therefore the Egyptian law preſs'd this affair well, Let all that break their word and oaths die for it; becauſe they are loaden with a double iniquity, & pietatem in Deos violant, & fidem inter homines tollunt, maximum vinculum ſocietatis, They deſtroy piety and reverence towards God, and faith amongſt men, which is the great ligature of ſociety. And if Princes doe falſify their word and lie, their neighbours can have no entercourſe with them but by violence and warre, and their ſubjects none but fear and chance. For Princes to lie is the greateſt undecency in the world: and therefore Diodorus Siculus tells that the Egyptian Princes us'd to wear a golden chain mix'd and diſtinguiſh'd with curious ſtones, and they call'd it Truth; meaning that nothing was a greater ornament to a Prince, nothing ought to be more ſacred, or more remembred.

Lib. 2. Antiquit.

Bodinus

23. Bodinus ſaies otherwiſe, and that Princes and Judges have leave, becauſe ſometimes they have neceſſity to lie; and of the ſame opinion was Plato, provided it was done for the good of the people. But that which they mean is onely in affirmations and narratives, in adding confidences or producing fears, in making laws and eſtabliſhing religions; ſuch as was that of Numa, who when he had a mind to endear to the people thoſe good laws which he had made, ſaid that he receiv'd them from the Goddeſs Ægeria. This may be done againſt an enemy; and if it be for the good of the people, it hath in it charity and ſome ſhew of prudence, but not to the bravery and magnanimity of a Prince: but however it be in this, it can never be permitted to violate a promiſe or a treaty, nor yet to tell falſe in a treaty, for that is againſt peace and againſt juſtice. When there is in it no harm, but all good, as in order to perſwade the people to a duty, or to their benefit, they in matters of publick life being like children in the affairs of their private, that is, when their need and incapacity of being otherwiſe governed requires it, they may be us'd as they can, according to that of the Perſians, Sapientes dicunt quod mendacium beneficium faciens melius eſt vero exitium parturiente, When a lie does charity, it is better then an uncharitable and pernicious truth: alwaies ſuppoſing, that the lie which ſerves charity be not againſt juſtice; but when it is in treaties, there a lie does not onely diſgrace the ſincerity of the prince that treates, but is of it ſelf apt to hurt the other; and therefore at no hand to be admitted. Lib. 3. de rep.

24. The next inquiry is concerning perſons Criminal, and ſo for others in proportion.

Queſtion II.

Whether it be lawful to uſe reſtrictions and mental reſervations, ſo that what we utter is falſe, but joyned to ſomething within does integrate a truth, and make up a true anſwer.

25. To this I anſwer, That this hath no diſtinct conſideration of it's own; but whether a mental reſervation makes that to be true which would otherwiſe be a lie. For if it be ſtill a lie, a criminal perſon may no more ſpeak half truths then whole lies; for that which is but the half of a true propoſition, either ſignifies nothing, or is directly a lie. And upon this ſuppoſition, this queſtion is juſt to be governed by the meaſures of the firſt; and in the ſame caſes in which it is lawful to tell a lie, in the ſame caſes it is lawfull to uſe a mental reſervation: for that which is lawful without it, is alſo lawful with it; and the mental reſervation does not ſave it harmleſs, if it be ſtill a lie. That therefore is the queſtion, Whether he that ſpeaks a lie, and thinks the other part which makes it a true propoſition, ſpeaks truth yea or no.

26. The caſe is this. When Campian was taken in England, he gave out that his name was Butler: the Magiſtrate inquires, and is ſo anſwered: he gives him his oath, and he ſwears that his name is ſo; ſo much he ſaid: but he added withall to himſelf, ſecretly, [It is my name that I have borrowed, or my name for this time] But that was not the queſtion; for he was ask'd that he might be known, and he anſwer'd that he might not be known. And he might as well have ſaid, that is my name, and have added in his thought, not at all, or, Hoc eſt nomen meum, and in mind have added, falſum; and then the caſe would have been too plain, and too contemptibly ridiculous: like the Sycophant in Plautus, Advenio ex Selencia, Macedonia, Aſia atque Arabia: this was a lye; but he turn'd aſide and ſpake ſoftly, quas ego neque oculis neque pedibus unquam uſurpavi meis, and ſo he made up the matter; but he was a lyar ſtill: for let the whole be true, yet he ſpeaks but half, and by that half deceives. All that he ſayes is a lye, for the contradictory of it is true; and it is concerning his anſwer, and the ſaying, that the queſtion is. It is not inquired whether the man think a lye, but whether he ſpeaks one; and not what it is to himſelf, for no man can lye to himſelf, but what this is to him that asks, for to him he lyes. And ſuppoſe a man ſhould write a propoſition, and think the reſt, to make it true, would not all the world ſay he wrote a lye? What it is in writing, it is in ſpeaking; that which he ſpeaks in the preſent caſe is a lye, and for that he is condemn'd. For if the words are a lye without a mental reſervation, then they are ſo with it; for this does not alter the words, nor the meaning of the words, nor the purpoſe of him that ſpeaks them.

27. And indeed this whole affair is infinitely unreaſonable; and the thinking one thing, and ſpeaking it otherwiſe, is ſo far from making it to be true, that therefore it is a lye, becauſe the words are not according to what is in our mind; and it is a perverting the very end and inſtitution of words, and evacuates the purpoſe of laws, and the end of oaths, making them not to be the end of queſtions, and the benefit of ſociety, and all humane intercourſe, and makes that none but fools can lye, none can lye but they which cannot diſſemble, that is, they which cannot think one thing and ſpeak another, they which cannot ſo much as think what is true, or what words would make it true. Certain it is, the Devil need not ever tell a lye, and yet ſerve all his ends. And beſides all this, ſuch a perſon gives the ſcandal of a lye, and produces the effect of a lye, and does intend the end of a lye, and it is the material part of a lye; onely what the man ows to juſtice, he payes with thinking.

28. But then I conſider further, If the words ſpoken be of themſelves a lye, and therefore he thinks it neceſſary by a ſecret ſupply of thought to new-mould it into truth; to what purpoſe is that done? that it may be no lye to himſelf? or that it may be no lye before him to whom he ſpeaks it? As for himſelf, he is not concerned in it, but onely that he ſpeak truth; but the other is: and if it be a lye without that ſupplement, (for therefore he ſupplyes it ſecretly) then till it be ſupplyed and made up to him before whom he ſpeaks it, it is a lye to him, to whom it ought to be a truth. If the man be bound to ſpeak truth to the Magiſtrate, let him doe it; but if he be not obliged, let him tell a direct lye, for this ſupplement is but a confeſſing in conſcience that it is a lye; and therefore there is no need of ſuch a diſſembling artifice; there is more ingenuity in ſaying that they are not tied to tell truth: but he that tels a lye, and by his mental reſervation ſayes he tels a truth, tels two lyes, one practical, and the other in theory; one to the Magiſtrate, and the other to himſelf.

29. I doe not ſay that in all caſes it is unlawfull to uſe mentall reſervations, even in craftineſs and eſcape. 1. S. Gregory hath a caſe in which he affirms affirms it lawfull, Tyrannorum verſutiam atque ſævitiam quandoque eſſe piâ fraude deludendam, & objicienda eis quæ credant, ut nocendi aditum non inveniant, To prevent and elude the craft and cruelty of Tyrants, they muſt ſometimes be deluded by a pious coſenage; and ſomething muſt be impos'd upon their credulity, that their wayes of miſchief may be obſtructed. And then he addes, this is to be done ſo, ut caveatur culpa mendacii; quod tunc bene perficitur, cum illud fit quod aſſeritur, ſed quod ſit ſic dicitur, ut celetur; quia ex parte dicitur, & ex parte reticetur: when there is nothing told that is falſe, but yet the matter is hid, becauſe it is not all ſpoken. Indeed this is one kind of innocent doing it; but this is lawfull to be done without great neceſſity, even for a probable reaſon: it is nothing but a concealing of ſome part of the truth, and a diſcovery of another part, even of ſo much as will ſerve our turn. But Lib. 6. in 1 Reg. c. 3.

30. 2. Reſtrictions conditional are lawfull to be us'd in our entercourſes: that is, the affirmation or negation, the threatning or promiſing of a thing may be cum tacita conditione, with a condition concealed; when that concealment is not intended for a ſnare, but is κατ' οἰκονομίαν, unuſual diſpenſation, and is competently preſumed, ſuppoſed or underſtood. Thus God commanded Jonah to preach againſt Nineveh, Yet fourty dayes and Nineveh ſhall be deſtroyed; meaning, unleſs they did repent. Thus we may ſay, I will to morrow diſtribute my alms, and will give you a part, meaning, if you will come for it. So for affirmations; The Phyſician ſayes to his Patient, [you are but a dead man;] that is, unleſs ſome extraordinary bleſſing happen: [you are in no danger;] meaning, if you will uſe the remedies preſcribed. But in all theſe caſes the condition muſt not be inſolent, undiſcerned, contrary to reaſonable expectations, impoſſible, or next to impoſſible: for if it be ſuch which cannot be underſtood, the reſervation is a ſnare, and the whole entercourſe is a deception and a lye.

31. 3. If the reſervation be not purely mental, but is underſtood by accidents and circumſtances, it is lawfull. The Shepherd of Cremona that was ask'd concerning the Flock he kept, whether thoſe were his Sheep or no, anſwered confidently, that they were; meaning ſecretly, not his own poſſeſſion, but his own charge, and not his Neighbour Morone's Flock. He ſaid true, though his thought made up the integrity of his true propoſition, becauſe it was not doubted, and he was not ask'd concerning the poſſeſſion, as not being a likely man to be ſo wealthy. So the guide whom you ask upon the road, tels, you cannot goe out of your way, meaning, if you follow your plain directions, and be not wilfull, or careleſs, or aſleep; and yet he ſayes truth, though he ſpeaks but half, becauſe he deceives none, and is underſtood by all. Thus the Prophet Iſaiah ſaid to Hezekiah when he was ſick, Thou ſhalt dye and not live; meaning, Iſa. 38. that the force of the diſeaſe is ſuch as to be mortal, and ſo it ſtands in the order of Nature: and when afterwards he brought a more comfortable meſſage, he was not thought a lyar in the firſt, becauſe they underſtood his meaning, and the caſe came to be alter'd upon a higher account.

32. 4. When things are true in ſeveral ſenſes, the not explicating in what ſenſe I mean the words is not a criminal reſervation. Thus our Bleſſed Saviour affirmed, that himſelf did not know the preciſe day when himſelf ſhould come to judge the World; that is, as S. Auſtin, and generally the Chriſtian Doctors ſay, as Man he did not know it, though being God he did know all things. But 1. this liberty is not to be us'd by inferiours, but by ſuperiours onely; 2. not by thoſe that are interrogated, but by them which ſpeak voluntarily; 3. not by thoſe which ſpeak of duty, but which ſpeak of grace and kindneſs: Becauſe ſuperiours, and the voluntary ſpeakers, and they which out of kindneſs ſpeak, are tied to no laws in this particular, but the meaſures of their own good will; and the degrees of their kindneſs, of their inſtruction, of their communication, are wholly arbitrary: but the inferiours, the examined, the ſpeakers out of duty and obligation, are tied to anſwer by other mens meaſures, by their exigencies, demands, underſtandings, and purpoſes; and therefore muſt not doe any thing whereby that truth which they have right and intereſt to enquire after, may be hindred. The concluſion is this, in the words of S. Gregory, Sapientia juſtorum eſt, nil per oſtenſionem fingere, ſenſum verbis aperire, The wiſedome of juſt men is to make no pretences for deception, but by words to open the ſecret of their heart.

Moral. lib. 10. c. 27.

Queſtion III.

33. Whether it be lawfull to equivocate, or uſe words of doubtfull ſignification with a purpoſe to deceive, or knowing that they will deceive; and in what caſes it is ſo.

34. To this I anſwer as to the former, Where it is lawfull to lye, it is lawfull to equivocate, which may be ſomething leſs then a plain lye: but where it is not permitted to tell a lye, there the equivocation muſt be innocent, that is, not deceiving, nor intended that it ſhould. And this is that which the Hebrews call, corde & corde loqui, to ſpeak diſſemblingly, labiis doloſis, with lips of deceit. For it is remarkable, that corde & corde ſignifies diligence and ſincerity, when it means work or labour; but it ſignifies falſhood and craft, when it means ſpeaking: for Nature hath given us two hands, and but one tongue; and therefore a duplicate in labour is a double diligence, but in talking it is but a double fraud. Tacitus obſerves of Tiberius, Verba ejus obſcura, ſuſpenſa, perplexa, eluctantia, in ſpeciem compoſita, His words were obſcure, broken, interrupted, perplex and intricate, ſtriving and forc'd, and made for ſhew and pretences. Now if by artifices you deceive him that truſts you, and whom you ought not to deceive, it is but a lye dreſs'd in another way, and it is all one: For nec artificioſo ingenio, nec ſimplici verbo oportet decipere quenquam, quia quolibet artis modo mentiatur. So that in ſolution of this queſtion we are onely to conſider what equivocal ſpeeches may be us'd, that is, which of them are no lyes: for the reſt, they are lawfull or unlawfull by the meaſures of the firſt queſtion; for ſometimes equivocation is a lye, and equally deſtructive of civil entercourſe. Duplex reſponſio habet effectum ſimplicis ſilentii. You had as good not ſpeak at all, as ſpeak equivocally; for a double ſpeech is as inſignificant as a ſingle ſilence.

S. Aug. de conflictu virt. & vitiorum.

35. 1. It is lawfull upon a juſt cauſe of great charity or neceſſity to uſe in our anſwers and entercourſes words of divers ſignification, though it does deceive him that asks. Thus Titius the Father of Caius hid his Father in a Tub, and to the Cut-throats that inquired for him to bloody purpoſes he anſwered Patrem in doliolo latere: now that did not only ſignifie

a little Tub, but a Hill near Rome, where the villains did ſuſpect him to be, and were ſo diverted. Thus we read of a Greek that in the like caſe hid his Brother under a wood-pile; and to the inquiſitors anſwered that he did lie hid ἐν τῇ ὕλῃ, ſomewhere in the wood. Now in theſe caſes where there is no obligation to tell the truth, any man may uſe the covers of truth; eſpecially when in this caſe it is not a lie: for an equivocation is like a dark-lanthorn; if I have juſt reaſon to hold the dark ſide to you, you are to look to it, not I. If Chriſtian ſimplicity be not concerned in it, nor any other grace indirectly, certain it is that truth is not concerned: For, In ambiguo ſermone non utrumque dicimus, ſed duntaxat quod volumus, ſaid Paulus the Lawyer, l. 3. ff. de rebus dubiis. Now that part of the ambiguity which I intend it in, is true, I would never elſe uſe that way to ſave my conſcience and to eſcape a lie; ſo that if nothing elſe be concerned, truth is ſafe. But then care alſo muſt be taken that he who hath right to be anſwered, be not defeated without his own fault. For,

36. 2. If I intend to deceive him, it muſt be ſuch a perſon whom I have power to deceive; ſome one that is a child, or a mad-man, or an incompetent perſon to judge for his own good, and one that no other way will be brought to doe himſelf good, one that is willing, or juſtly ſo preſumed. For unleſs I have power or right to deceive him, I muſt not intend to deceive him by any act of mine directly.

37. 3. If it be fit that he be deceived, though I have no right to doe it, let him deceive himſelf; it muſt be by his own act; to which I may indeed miniſter occaſion by any fair and innocent means. It is fit that he who by violence and injury intends to doe miſchief to innocent perſons, be hindred from it; and there is much good done if an innocent be reſcued, and no harm done to the Tyrant if he be diverted, and no wrong or injuſtice if he doe deceive himſelf. Thus if he runs into error by a juſt and prudent concealment of ſome truth; if he is apt to miſtake my words out of a known and by me obſerved weakneſs; if his malice is apt to make him turn all ambiguous words into his own ſenſe that will deceive him; if I know he will liſten to my whiſpers to another perſon, and watch my ſecret talk to others; I am not bound to ſay what will inform him, but what will become my entercourſe with the other: In all theſe and the like caſes, if I uſe my own liberty, I doe no man injury. I am not bound to ſpeak words of ſingle ſignification: if it be ſufficient to expreſs my meaning, if it be in the nature and uſe of the words apt to ſignifie my mind, and to ſpeak that which is true, let him that ſtands by look to it; I doe all that I am oblig'd to doe by the intereſt of juſtice and truth. For in theſe caſes, he that ſpeaks does but miniſter occaſion to him that is miſtaken; like him that repreſents artificial ſights before the eye, or as the rain-bow in the clouds is occaſion of a popular error that it is full of colours.

38. 4. But then this muſt be ſo us'd, that the amphibology or equivocation be not inſolent and ſtrange, but ſuch as is uſual in forms of witty ſpeech. For then he who uſes them does no more deceive his hearer, then he that ſpeaks obſcurely or profoundly is the cauſe of error in the ignorant people. Thus if Caius promiſe to pay to Regulus an hundred Attick drachmes; he is tied to doe it if he does owe it, elſe not: for if he owes none, he muſt pay none, and he did not promiſe to give him any thing. For if a meaning be clearly contained in the word ſpoken, it may be made uſe of to any juſt and reaſonable advantage; eſpecially if that word ought or was likely to have been underſtood by the concerned hearer. But this may not be done in fraud and to the diminution of any mans rights. Aſper buyes corn and linnen of Camillus who is newly come from Egypt: they agree together that Camillus ſhall receive ten talents; but that he ſhall give him as a free gift halfe of it back again; and call the ten talents the juſt price, and the telling it a juſt ſolution. If Aſper ſells his linnen by the proportion of the great price told over, he is a Coſener; and uſes the words of price, and payment, and gift, fraudulently: the amphibologie might have been us'd to ends of juſtice and reaſon, but not of knavery and oppreſſion.

39. 5. And this muſt alſo be upon juſt cauſe. For if a Magiſtrate ſends to inquire for Titius, and the officers ask an Titius ſit domi, if he be at home: to him we may not anſwer, Titius non eſt domi, he does not eat at home; meaning the word eſt in a ſenſe leſs uſual, to deceive him in the more common, who ought not to be deceived at all: but to ſave a mans life from violence and injury it may be done. This way hath been ſometimes uſed to vile purpoſes. Thus Cleomenes having made truce with his Enemies for thirty daies, us'd to plunder his Country in the night; and Labeo having agreed to give up half his Navy to Antiochus, cut his ſhips in pieces and made them good for nothing. The like ſtories are told of Alexander, of the Locrians, of Otho Moguntinus. But it was a barbarous thing of Pericles, who promiſed ſafety to the Enemy if he would lay aſide his iron, that is, their arms, as all the world underſtood it, and as the nature of the thing did ſignifie: when he had done ſo he fell upon the whole body of them and cut them in pieces, ſhewing for his excuſe, the iron buttons that they had upon their Coats. Such frauds as theſe are intolerable in their event, and evil in their cauſe, and deteſted by all good and juſt men. To this purpoſe I remember a worthy ſtory told by John Chokier, of a Spaniſh Governour of a Town in Millain who kept a Noble perſon priſoner with hard uſage, and when his Lady came to petition for his liberty, promiſed to deliver her Husband to her if ſhe would let him lie with her. The poor woman being wearied with his temptation and the evil uſage of her Husband, conſents and ſuffers it. When the Governour had obtained his luſt, he would alſo ſatisfie his anger too; and kills her Huſband, and to verifie his promiſe, gives her Husband to the Lady, but newly murdered. The Lady complains of this, and tells her ſad ſtory to Gonzaga the Spaniſh General: he finds it to be truth, and made the Lady this amends. He commands the Governour to marry the Lady, that by his eſtate ſhe might be recompenced for the diſhonour: and then, the ſame day cauſes the Governour to looſe his head to pay for his diſhonourable falſhood and bloody lie. It was a juſtice worthy of a great Prince; and the reward was juſtly paied to ſuch a cruel equivocation. This was ſubdolus congreſſus, a craftie treatie, quo nil turpius, ſaid Antoninus the Emperor, nothing is baſer and more diſhonourable then it. Thus did Darius to the Noble Oebaſus the Father of three brave Sons, and Xerxes to Pythius the Father of five; they kill'd what they promiſed to leave with the Father, adding to their cruelty the reproach and ſcorn of coſenage. A man hath right to uſe what words he will according to the received uſe; but he muſt not uſe them to evil purpoſes: and a man may goe a little from the more common uſe uſe to that which is rare, ſo it be within the ſignification of the word, provided there be juſt cauſe; that which hath good in it to ſome, and no injury to any.

40. 6. There is between lying and equivocation this only difference, that this may upon leſs neceſſity and upon more cauſes be permitted then lying. For provided that theſe meaſures now deſcribed, which are the negative meaſures of lying, be obſerved; if a man ſpeaks doubtfull words and intends them in a true ſenſe, he may uſe his liberty; alwayes provided that he uſe it with care, and to the reputation of Chriſtian ſimplicity. In arts and ſciences, in jeſt and entercourſes of wit, in trial of underſtandings and myſtical teachings, in prudent concealments and arts of ſecrecy, equivocal words may be us'd with more freedome. Solvite Templum hoc, ſaies Chriſt, Diſſolve this Temple, viz. of my body, and I will raiſe it up in three daies. So did that excellent Confeſſor in Euſebius, to Firmilianus asking of what Country he was, he anſwered, that Jeruſalem was his Country; Seorſim apud animum ſuum ita Divinitus philoſophatus, privately in his mind ſpeaking Divine myſteries, ſaies the Hiſtorian. This was well and innocent, becauſe an equivocal ſpeech hath a light ſide as well as a dark: it is true as well as falſe, and therefore it is in its own nature innocent; and is only changed into a fault, when it is againſt juſtice and charity, under which ſimplicity is to be plac'd. 8. l. Hiſt. c. 21.

41. Under theſe meaſures are to be reduced thoſe little equivocations which are us'd ſometimes in craft, but moſt commonly in wit; ſuch as are to anſwer by anagrams, ſo as to tell a true name but diſguis'd by tranſpoſition of letters and ſyllables, or to give the ſignification of a name in other words. Thus if a man whoſe name is Dorotheus calls himſelf Theodorus, for Nicolaus, Laonicus, for Demonicus, Nicodemus; it is an equivocation or an art of deception, but ſuch as may be legitimated by the cauſe: but if the inquiry be in a ſerious matter, the anſwer muſt be ſerious and material, true, and ſignificative to the purpoſes of law, and juſtice, and ſociety. And therefore if Nicodemus had been interrogated by Pilate in a ſerious cauſe, he might not have ſaid his name was Demonicus; and the reaſon is, becauſe he might not have concealed it. But when it is lawfull to conceal it if we can, this is a juſt way of doing it; for it is no lie in it ſelf, and can be made to doe or to miniſter to that good which is intended. Thus in the book of Tobit we find that the Angel Raphael called himſelf Azarias the ſon of Ananias, which indeed is the name of his office, or the Rebus, the meaning of his preſent imployment, that is, Auxilium Domini, Filius nubis Domini, The aid of the Lord, Son of the Lords cloud; meaning that he was ſent from the Lord in a cloud or diſguiſe to be an aid and a bleſſing to that religious family. And he that call'd Arſinoe Ἡραὶον Juno's violet, kept all the letters of the name right, and complemented the Lady ingeniouſly. But theſe are better effects of wit then miniſteries of juſtice; and therefore are not to be uſed but upon great reaſons, and by the former meaſures, when the matter is of concernment.

Queſtion IV.

42. Whether it be lawful by falſe ſignes, by actions and pretences of actions, to deceive others for any good end: and in what caſes it is ſo.

43. To this queſtion I anſwer in the words of Aquinas, becauſe they are reaſonable and pious, Ad virtutem veritatis pertinet, ut quis talem ſe exhibeat exterius per ſigna exteriora qualis eſt; ea autem non ſolum ſunt verba, ſed etiam facta: and a little after, Non refert autem utrum aliquis mentiatur verbo, vel quocunque alio facto, It is all one if a man lies, whether it be by word or by deed. A man may look a lie, and nod a lie, and ſmile a lie.

2. 2ae. q. 3. art. 1.

44. But in this there is ſome variety: For 1. all diſſembling from an evil principle and to evil purpoſes is criminal. For thus Tertullian declaims bitterly againſt thoſe Ladies who (ſaies he) being taught by the Apoſtate Angels oculos circumducto nigrore fucare, & genas mendacio ruboris inficere, & mutare adulterinis coloribus crinem, & expugnare omnem oris & capitis veritatem, beſmear their eye-brows with a black ſemicircle, and ſtain their cheeks with a lying red, and change the colour of their hair into an adulterous pretence, and drive away all the ingenuity and truth of their faces. And Clemens Alexandrinus is as ſevere againſt old men that with black-lead combes put a lie upon their heads; and ſo diſgrace their old age, which ought to be relied upon, believ'd and reverenc'd for truth. And it was well ſaid of Archidamus to a man of Chios who did ſtain his white hairs with black and the imagery of youth, the man was hardly to be believ'd, when he had a lie in his heart, and bore a lie upon his head. Theſe things proceeding from pride and vanity, and miniſtring to luſt, or carried on with ſcandal, are not onely againſt humility and ſobriety and chaſtity and charity, but againſt truth too; becauſe they are done with a purpoſe to deceive, and by deceit to ſerve thoſe evil ends. To the ſame purpoſe was the fact of them of whom Dio Chryſoſtomus ſpeaks, who knowing that men were in love with old Manuſcripts, would put new ones into heaps of corn and make them look like old: ſuch alſo are they who in Holland lately would exactly counterfeit old Meddals, to get a treble price beyond the value of the metal and the imagery. Theſe things and all of the like nature are certainly unlawful, becauſe they are againſt juſtice and charity.

Lib. de diſcipl. & habitu virg.

45. 2. But there are other kinds of counterfeits, ſuch as are gildings of wood and braſs, falſe ſtones, counterfeit diamonds, glaſs depicted like emeralds and rubies, a cruſt of marble drawn over a building of courſe ſtone; theſe are onely for beauty and ornament, and of themſelves miniſter to no evil, but are pleaſant and uſeful: now though to ſell theſe images of beauty for real be a great cheat; yet to expoſe them to be ſeen as ſuch, and every man be left to his liberty of thinking as he pleaſe, and being pleas'd as he can, is very innocent.

Vide Senecam epiſt. 115.

46. 3. There is a third ſort of lying or deceiving by ſigns not vocal: that is, the diſſembling of a paſſion, ſuch as that of which Seneca complains in the matter of Grief, which is the ſimpleſt of all paſſions; but pretended by ſome without truth to purpoſes not good. Sibi triſtes non ſunt, & clariùs cum audiuntur gemunt, & taciti quietique dum ſecretum eſt, cum aliquos aliquos viderint in fletus novos excitantur. So did Gellia in the Epigram.

Amissum non flet cum sola est Gellia Patrem:
Si quis adest, jussæ prosiliunt lachrymæ.

They are full of tears in company, but in their retirements pleas'd well enough. Now things of this nature are indifferent; but are good or bad according to the cause or the design. Mourn for the dead, saith Ben-Sirach, and that a day or two, lest thou be evil spoken of. That end is honest; and therefore to mourn in solemnity is good, if we cannot mourn in passion: and the laws enjoyn to a man and woman respectively annum luctus, a year of solemn mourning; all which time it is not suppos'd the passion should be troublesome and afflictive. Thus we find David pretending madness before Achish the King of Gath; it was for his life: and we doe not find any of the ancient Doctors blaming the dissimulation.

47. 4. But that which is here the principal inquiry is, whether signs not vocal, which have in them ambiguity, and may signify several things, may be us'd with a purpose to deceive. And to this the answer is the same with the former in the case of equivocation, with this onely difference; That as there is some more liberty in the use of equivocal words, then of a simple lie; so there is some more liberty yet in equivocal actions then in words, because there may be more reasons for such dubious actions then for dubious words, and they are not so near, so usual, * so intended significations of our mind, nor ministeries of entercourse and society. But where they are taken so, they are to be governed by the same rules; save onely that a less necessity may be a sufficient legitimation of such dubious signs: concerning which, besides the analogy and proportion to the former rules, there is no other measure but the severities of a good and a prudent man taking into him the accounts of Christian simplicity and ingenuity.

* Vide Aquinat. in 3. l. dist. 38. art. 3. ad 5.

48. I have onely one thing to adde in order to practice. There is a liberty in the forecited cases there where there is a necessity, and where there is a great charity. For in these cases it is true what S. Chrysostom saies, Fraudis quidem magna vis modò ne fraudulento animo fiat: quam ipsam tum ne fraudem quidem nominandam putaverim, verum Oeconomiam quandam potius ac sapientiam artemque, quâ possis è mediis iisque impervîis desperatarum rerum angustiis difficultatibusque correctis & emendatis animi vitiis evadere. There is a great use of artifices in our words and actions when we are hard put to it in desperate cases and extremest difficulties, and then these arts are not indeed deceptions, but just escapes. But yet this I say, that it is not safe to use all our liberty; because when it is practis'd freely, we oftentimes find our selves ill Judges of the necessity. And however it be, yet it is much more noble to suffer bravely then to escape from it by a doubtful way; 1. for the love and honour of simplicity, 2. for the endeavours of perfection, 3. for the danger of sin, 4. for the peril of scandal. And it was bravely done of Augustus Cæsar, who when he had promised ten thousand Sesterces to him that should bring Corocotta, a famous Spanish thief, alive into his presence; Corocotta himself came and demanded the money, and had it, and he was spar'd besides: he escaped for his wit and confidence; but had the money pro fide Cæsaris, according to the faith and nobleness of Cæsars justice: for he might have made use of the ambiguity of his words to have kept the money, and hang'd the thief;

Lib.4. Eth.c.7. Ariſtotle, The brave and magnanimous man does not ſneak, but ſpeaks truth and is confident.

49. It cannot be denied what S. Clemens Alexandrinus ſaid, ὅτι καὶ πλησίον ὠφελείας μόνης ποιήσῃ τινα ἃ οὐκ ἂν ἑαυτῷ προηγουμένως αὐτῷ προσχθείη, a good man will for the good of his neighbour doe ſomething more then he would doe willingly and of his own accord; yet when it is his own caſe, it is better to let goe his liberty then to run a hazard. Sarah did lie, and ſhe was reproved by the Angel; Abraham did ſo too, ſaies Tertullian, Saram ſororem ſuam mentitus eſt, but he was reproved by Abimelech: Jacob did lie to his Father, but he is not commended for it; and Rachel did diſſemble, but ſhe died in childbirth, and it was occaſioned by that, ſay the Jewiſh Doctors: Simeon and Levi deſtroyed the Sichemites by a ſtratagem, but they troubled the houſe of Iſrael by it: Thamar deceived Judah, but ſhe plai'd the harlot in deed as well as in words. And concerning thoſe worthy perſons mentioned in Scripture who did lie or diſſemble, the Chriſtian Doctors have been put to it to make apologies, and excuſes, and juſtifications for them, and are not yet agreed how to doe it. S. Baſil and S. Chryſoſtome are two examples of ſeveral proceedings. S. Baſil alwaies bore his heart upon his hand, and ſhewed it to every one that was concerned. Saint Chryſoſtome uſed craft againſt the ſimple, and fraud againſt him that ſpoke
Vide in fine li. 1. de Sacerd. all things in ſimplicity. Chryſoſtome was forced with laborious arts to excuſe and juſtifie it, and did it hardly: But S. Baſil had no ſcruple concerning his innocence; what he had concerning his prudence and ſafety does not Serm. of Chriſtian ſimplicity. belong to the preſent queſtion. But of this laſt particular I have given larger accounts in a Diſcourſe on purpoſe.

50. The concluſion is this, If a man ſpeaks a direct down-right lie, he can very hardly be innocent: but if by intrigues of words and actions, per involucra verborum (as Cicero calls it) per orationem intortam (as the Comedy) by covers of words, and by crooked ſpeeches, a man have entercourſe, he had need be very witty to be innocent according to the Hebrew proverb, If a man have wit enough to give croſs and involved anſwers, let him uſe it well; if he knows not how to doe it well, let him hold his peace. It was but a ſneaking evaſion of S. Francis, when the purſuers after a murderer asked if the man came that way; No, ſaith the Frier, thruſting his hand into his ſleeve, he came not here. If a mans wit be not very ready and very clear, while he thinks himſelf wiſe, he may become a vain perſon. The Devil no queſtion hath a great wit, and a ready anſwer; yet when he was put to it at his Oracles, and durſt not tell a down-right lie, and yet knew not what was truth many times, he was put to moſt pitifull ſhifts, and trifling equivocations, and arts of knavery; which when they were diſcovered by events contrary to the meaning which was obvious for the inquirers to underſtand, it made him much more contemptible and ridiculous then if he had ſaid nothing, or confeſs'd his ignorance. But he that does ſpeak, and is bound to ſpeak, muſt ſpeak according to the mind of him with whom he does converſe, that is, ſo to converſe, that by our fault he be not deceived againſt his right, againſt juſtice or againſt charity, and therefore he had better in all things ſpeak plainly: for truth is the eaſieſt to be told; but no wit is ſufficient for a crafty converſation.

Rule

RULE VI.

It is not lawfull for private Christians without publick authority to punish Malefactors, but they may require it of the Magistrate in some cases.

1. IN the law of Nature it was permitted: but as the world grew older, and better experienc'd, and better instructed, it became unlawfull and forbidden; in some places sooner, in some places later. The Ephori among the Lacedæmonians might kill Criminals extrajudicially; and Nicolaus of Damascus relates, that amongst the Umbrians every man was the revenger of his own injuries: for till by laws men were defended, they by revenges and retaliation might drive away the injury as far as was necessary. But because when a man is in pain and grief he strikes unjustly and unequally, and judges incompetently, laws were made to restrain the first licence, and to put it into the hands of Princes onely, because they being common Fathers to their people, were most likely to doe justice equally and wisely. Iccirco enim judiciorum vigor jurisque publici tutela videtur in medio constituta, ne quisquam sibiipsi permittere valeat ultionem, said Honorius and Theodosius, That no man might avenge himself, Laws and Judges and Tribunals were appointed for publick justice.

2. But for this, provisions at first could not be made so generally, but that some cases would happen, and some gaps be left open, which every man must stop, and provide for as well as he could. Thus we find that Phinehas, when he saw God was angry with the Sons of Israel about the matter of Moab, himself, to divert the anger that was already gone forth, smote Zimri, a Prince among the Simeonites, and his fair Mistris in his arms, and kill'd them in their Crimes. From his example many Zelots amongst the Jews took liberty to kill a man that sinn'd apparently. So Mattathias kill'd a Jew that offer'd sacrifice according to the manner of the Greeks; and the People kill'd three hundred of their Countrymen upon the like account. But this quickly grew into excess and irregularity; and therefore when our Blessed Lord was zealous for the honour of the Temple, he went no further but to use a little Whip to affright them from their prophaneness.

3. And yet in some cases God permitted private persons to be Executioners; as in case a Jew tempted his Child, or Brother, or Neighbour to Idolatry, the tempted person might kill him without delating him to the Judge: and in a cause of Blood, the next of kin might kill the Man-slayer if he overtook him before he took Sanctuary. But here the cases were such that the private person was not Judge, but by leave from God was Executioner upon the notoreity of the fact: for although for a dead person his neareſt relation might with his own hand take vengeance; yet if himself was wounded, he might not, but by the sentence of the Judge, say Deut. 13. 9.

the Doctors of the Jews; becauſe he ought not to be Judge where he could hardly be moderate.

4. In the Sea, and in deſart places, where there can be no appeals to Judges, every man is Executioner of the ſentence of the law of Nations. Thus we find that Julius Cæſar purſued the Pirats in the Mediterranean and Adriatick Seas; and becauſe the Proconſul would not, he gather'd a ſudden Navy and overtook them, and hang'd them upon the main-yards of their own Veſſels. Thus the wild Arabs and Circaſſian Thieves, that live in vaſt places, and under no Government, being publick Enemies of Mankind, and under no laws, nor treaties or communications of peace, may be kill'd by every one that is injur'd and ſpoil'd by them, when he can doe it. To this agrees that of Tertullian, In publicos hoſtes omnis homo miles eſt; and that of Democritus, κελεύω καὶ λῃστὴν πάντα κτείνων τις ἀδίκως. ἂν εἴη ἐξ αὐτοχειρίας, καὶ κελεύων, καὶ ψήφῳ, He that kils a thief and a robber with his own hand, or by command, or by conſent, is innocent, εἶτε πάσοι τὰ κ' ἔρηξε δίκη ἰθεῖα γέροιλο.

But this is to be underſtood of the permiſſion in the law of Nature.

5. For in Chriſtianity men are not eaſily permitted to touch blood; not haſtily to intermeddle in the cauſes of blood; not to give ſentence for the effuſion of it: theſe things are to be done with caution, and a ſlow motion, and after a loud call, and upon a great neceſſity, becauſe there are two great impediments: the one is the duty of Mercy, which is greatly requir'd and ſeverely exacted of every Diſciple of Chriſt; and the other is, that there is a Soul at ſtake when blood is to be ſhed, and then they are told, that as they judge they ſhall be judged, as they meaſure it ſhall be meaſured to them again. And therefore Criminal Judges have a tender imployment, and very unſafe, unleſs they have the guards of a juſt Authority, and a great mercy, and an unavoidable neceſſity, and publick utility, and the fear of God alwayes before their eyes, and a great wiſedome to conduct their greateſt dangers.

6. That which remains and is permitted in Chriſtianity is, 1. The puniſhment of reprehenſion, of which every wiſe and good man may be judge and miniſter: for as S. Cyprian ſaid that every Biſhop is a Biſhop of the Catholick Church, that is, whereever he chance to be, he muſt not ſuffer a Soul to periſh if he can help it, but hath right every where to miniſter to the neceſſities of Souls, who are otherwiſe deſtitute, and every where to pray in private, to bleſs, to abſolve dying perſons, to ſupply the defects of a widow and deſolate Church; ſo every good man hath power to puniſh a baſe and vicious perſon by ſevere and wiſe animadverſions of reproof. For a wiſe man is never a private man (ſaid Cicero;) and Naſica, and Cato, and Fabius, and Lollius were in authority like perpetual Conſuls, alwayes in power over a vicious man.

7. 2. It is not againſt the laws of Chriſtianity, that Parents, and Tutors, and Maſters, and Governors ſhould puniſh Criminals, that is, ſuch as are ſubject to them, and by ſuch puniſhments as are permitted by law, and by ſuch meaſures as are agreeable to the juſt and charitable ends * of their reſpective ſpective governments, and by the analogy and proportions of Chriſtian mercy and clemency: in the execution of which puniſhments there need no other laws be given but what are dictated by the mind of a charitable, diſpaſſionate and a good man. But then in theſe Governments there is more liberty then in any other but the ſupreme: for a perſonal injury done to a Father or a Tutor may be puniſh'd by the Father or Tutor reſpectively, and ſo alſo it may by the Supreme power, Cum dignitas authoritaſque ejus in quem eſt peccatum tuenda eſt, ne prætermiſſa animadverſio contemptum ejus pariat, & honorem levet, ſaid Taurus the Philoſopher in A. Gellius. An injury done to a Superiour is a contempt of his authority as well as injurious to his perſon; and if it be not puniſh'd, will ſoon diſorder the ſuperiority. But then this muſt be wholly for emendation; and though anger may be the inſtrument, yet charity muſt be both the meaſure and the end.

8. 3. When the law hath paſs'd a ſentence, and given leave to any ſubject to be executioner, he that is injur'd may doe it. But this is to be underſtood in one caſe onely that concerns the Subject, and one that concerns the Prince. 1. For if the Prince commands that whoever finds ſuch a perſon ſhall ſmite him to death if he can, every man is bound to it, if the law be juſt: as in the caſe of Treaſon, or deſerting their military ſtation, it hath ſometimes been decreed. In reos Majeſtatis, againſt Traitors every man is a Souldier, ſayes Tertullian, who affirms it alſo concerning all publick Enemies. 2. The other caſe, which relates to the advantage of the Subject, is, when the execution of the publick ſentence is neceſſary to be done ſpeedily for the prevention of future miſchiefs. Thus Juſtinian gave leave to every man to kill the Souldiers that came to plunder; for in that caſe there was no ſtaying for ſolemnities of law, and the proceedings and method of Courts; Melius enim eſt occurrere in tempore quam poſt exitũ vindicare. Veſtram igitur vobis permittimus ultionem, & quod ſerum eſt punire judicio, ſubjugamus edicto, ut nullus parcat militi, cui obviare telo oporteat ut latroni. This which the law cals a revenge is but a meer defence, it is a taking the miſchief before it be intolerable; and therefore this will be the more out of queſtion: for certainly if ſome puniſhments are lawfull, all neceſſary defences are much more; this onely excepted, that the degree of this is exceſſive and uncharitable, and therefore ought not to be done, but in thoſe caſes where the evil likely to be ſuffer'd by the innocent is intolerable, as if the plunder be the undoing of a man and his family, and will cauſe them to periſh, or to be extremely miſerable; and therefore Ulpian ſaid well, Furem nocturnum ſi quis occiderit, ità demum impunè feret, ſi parcere ei ſine periculo ſuo non poterit, Though the law permits a man to kill a Night-thief, yet he may not doe it if he can ſecure himſelf without it: but when to ſpare the Thief will be his own undoing, then he may. For it is true which was ſaid of old,

Cod. rubr. quando liceat ſe ſine judice vindicare.

Res omnes conditæ famulantur vitæ humanæ;

And again,

Nobiliſſimum eſt quod orbis habet humana vita.

Nothing is fit to be put in ballance to the life of man; and therefore when a man's life and a man's goods are compar'd abſtractly, theſe are extremely out-weighed by that: and therefore for little and tolerable loſſes it were well if the laws would appoint leſſer puniſhments then Death. But when it is conſider'd, that a great loſs makes a man and all his family live a miſerable life, and men willingly venture their lives to ſave ſuch great portions, the laws that put ſuch thieves to death are very juſtifiable. And it is obſervable that when God in Moſes law appointed a mulct of money upon thieves, it was ſuppoſed to be in ſuch robberies where the thief was able to reſtore four-fold. Adde to this, that if our laws did provide that ſtollen goods ſhould be reſtored, they would leſs need to give leave to the true man to kill the thief. But now that he is the more likely to be undone, becauſe no reſtitution is to be made him, he may in the caſe of ſuch great ſpoilings be better allowed to be the executioner of the ſentence of the law to prevent his ruine, and to defend his right. But it were much better if he would not at all uſe this liberty.

9. 4. But when the evil is paſt if the law permits the execution of her ſentence to the injur'd perſon; it is to be ſuppoſed that there is onely an indulgence to the grief of him that is wrong'd, and therefore if he kills the injurious man, he is indemnified in law, but not quitted in Conſcience. Thus when the Civil law of old, L. Gracchus C. ad legem Juliam, de Adulteriis, and at this day the Spaniſh laws permit the wronged Huſband to kill the adulterer, it is lawful; that is, it is not againſt juſtice, and therefore the law cannot puniſh it: but becauſe it is extremely againſt charity, his Confeſſor ought not to abſolve him without repentance and amends; for the Goſpel does not approve it. The reaſon is, becauſe if the injury be done, the execution is meerly revenge, without the mixture of any good thing to legitimate it. Now if the law does it by her miniſters, it is παράδειγμα, an example, ἵνα ἄλλοι φρόνιμον ποιῶνται καὶ φοβῶνται (as Demoſthenes his expreſſion is) that others may be afraid, & not be tempted by impunity. But if the man does it by his private hand, there is in it leſs of obſervation and exemplarity; or if there were not, yet there were leſs intended; and therefore the private executing hand is not ſo innocent: Rom. 12. 19. μὴ ἑαυτοὺς ἐκδικοῦντες, ſaith the Apoſtle, we muſt not avenge our ſelves: this can hardly be reconcil'd with ſuch executions. There is onely this allay in it, that if the wronged husband can no other way prevent his diſhonour and his wives ſin or continuance in it, if the law permits it to him, it may be ſuppos'd to be done for prevention, not for revenge; and if it be ſo, as it is ſuppos'd, it hath many degrees of excuſe, and ſome of lawful, but nothing commendable; for nothing can reconcile it to charity, becauſe (as I obſerved before) there is a ſoul in the way which ought ſtrangely much to be regarded. Nay there are two Souls: for it was rarely ſaid by Pythagoras, as Iamblichus relates, πολλῷ μᾶλλον ἀδικεῖσθαι δεῖν, ἢ κλέπτειν ἄνδρα· ἐν ᾅδου γὰρ κεῖσθαι πλὴν κρίσιν, it is better to ſuffer the injury then to kill the man: For after death there ſhall be a judgment; he that did the wrong ſhall be puniſh'd, and he that ſpar'd him ſhall be rewarded.

10. 5. But if the Criminal be of ſo deſperate an impiety that he ſeems incorrigible, and of a long time hath ſeem'd ſo (for that is the beſt way to prove him ſo) then it is lawful for a private hand to be executioner of the publick ſentence; but he that is injur'd ought not to doe it. Not that it is murder, or directly unlawful in the preciſe action: but that it can hardly be quitted from revenge; and it will be hard for any man to be ſo good as not to have juſt cauſe to ſuſpect himſelf, if he be ſo bad, upon the meer permiſſions of law to thruſt his hand into his brothers heart. Other perſons may doe it out of zeal or love of their countries good. The Civil law gave leave exercendæ publicæ ultionis adverſus latrones, deſertoreſque militiæ militiæ, of executing the anger of the law againſt fugitive ſouldiers, and common robbers: he that had not been robbed by them might better doe it then he that had: for it being permitted pro quiete communi, for the publick peace, he is a good patriot that honeſtly and juſtly miniſters to that end alone; but he that hath ſuffer'd by them, had need be an Angel, if he does not ſpoil that good end by the mixture of revenge; and if he be an Angel he will find a better imployment then to kill a man where it is not commanded, and where it is not neceſſary.

11. 6. Some affirm that Princes are never to be reckoned to be private perſons, when they proceed according to the ſentence and meaning of the law, though they doe proceed brevi manu, as the ſtyle of the law is; and doe not proceed by the methods and ſolemnities of law by reaſon of diſability to doe it. Thus if a man grow too hard for the laws, the Prince muſt ſend Souldiers to him, not Serjeants, if the caſe be notorious and it be a publick ſentence: and the Lord Mayor of London did ſtrike Wat Tyler, though he was not convicted in law, nor ſentenc'd by the Judges. Upon this account the King of France offered to defend the killing of the duke of Guiſe: concerning which I cannot give accounts, becauſe there might be in it many ſecrets which I know not. But if there wanted nothing but ſolemnities of law, and there wanted power to ſuppreſs him by open force, and that it was juſt and neceſſary that he ſhould die, and by law he was guilty of it, if there was any thing wanting which ſhould have been done, he that died was the cauſe of it, and therefore to him it was to be imputed. But ſuppoſing what theſe men affirm to be true; (concerning which I ſhall affirm nothing) yet this is very rarely to be practis'd, becauſe it is ſeldome lawful, if ever it be, and not without the concurrence of very many particulars, and is very eaſily abuſed to extreme evil purpoſes; as in that intolerable and inhumane maſſacre of Paris, which all generations of the world ſhall ſpeak of with horror and the greateſt deteſtation. But concerning the thing it ſelf that which the lawyers ſay is this, Generale edictum accedente facti evidentiâ habet vim latæ ſententiæ, when a law is clear, and the fact is evident, the ſentence is already paſt: and therefore ſome of them are apt to ſay, To doe the ſame thing in a chamber is not murder, if it be juſtice when it is done upon a ſcaffold; for the ſame demerit in the criminal and the ſame power in the Supreme is an equal cauſe and warranty of the execution. And ſince it is cheaper to imploy a Phyſitian then an army, and there is leſs prejudice done to the publick by ſuch a courſe; ſince the State of Venice kills upon ſuſpicion, and there are ſome things known which cannot be proved, and cannot be ſuffer'd, and ſince we ſee that ſolemnities of law, like thin aprons, diſcover more ſhame ſometimes then they hide, and give more ſcandal then they remove; theſe men are more confident then I am: for they dare warrant this courſe which I dare not. But he that will adventure upon this, muſt take care that it be done 1. by a competent authority, 2. upon a juſt cauſe, 3. for a great neceſſity, 4. according to the intent and meaning of the law; 5. it muſt be in ſummo & mero Imperio, by one that is abſolute and ſupreme; 6. it muſt be upon notoreity of fact, 7. when there is no ſcruple of law, 8. and if after all this there be no ſcruple in conſcience, 9. nor yet any other means of ſecuring the publick, 10. and the thing have in it as great charity to the publick, as there is in it juſtice to the particular, 11. and that the warre be not juſtum bellum, that is, between ſupreme powers, 12. nor yet any treaty, or promiſe, faith or covenant to the contrary between the ſupreme and the inferior offending; 13. nor yet there be a ſcandal of greater miſchief then can be procured by the unſolemn proceeding; 14. nor is done refragante judicio procerum, & ſententiis jurisprudentum, againſt the earneſt advice of prudent and grave perſons, which if it happen will arreſt the reſolution, and give check and conſideration to the Conſcience: then it is ſuppoſed by many that there may be reaſon enough to forbear what cannot be us'd, that is, the ſolemnities of law, which are the methods of peace, not to be expected in a ſtate or time of warre. And by this time it will be ſo hard to doe it juſtly, that it will be better to let it alone. For after all theſe cautions and proviſo's, it is not permitted to aſſaſinate or privately to murder the Criminal; but to proceed by open force or by avowed manners of juſtice, though they be not ſolemn, and the common waies of peace; that is, they muſt be owned in publick, and aſſerted by law, either antecedently or ex poſt-facto. An example of the firſt way is frequently ſeen in in France; where the fugitives of law are proceeded againſt in their abſence, and executed in effigie; and in the ſtates of Italy againſt the Banniti: and of the ſecond way examples have been ſeen in the Manifeſto's of ſome Princes when they have been put to ſuch extrajudicial and private waies of animadverſion. But theſe things happen not but in ſuch places where Princes are more abſolute, and leſs Chriſtian, or that the Subject tranſgreſſes by power.

12. 7. Upon the like account it hath in ſome ages of Chriſtianity it ſelf, but in many ages of Gentiliſme, been permitted that by ſingle duel men prove their innocence, and oppreſs the ſuppoſed Criminal:

——— puróque pióque duello
Quærendas res cenſeo———

ſaid one of the Roman Senators to Ancus Martius. Now concerning this I ſhall not need to ſay much; becauſe now long ſince all Chriſtian Princes and States, & all Churches and Eccleſiaſtical perſons have condemned it as a grievous crime, upon theſe two accounts: 1. Becauſe it is a tempting God by waies which he hath never allowed, it is a lottery that he never gave warrant to: and upon this account it was that Pope Nicolas the firſt forbad the Emperor Lotharius to try his wives ſuſpected chaſtity by the combat of two champions, cùm hoc & hujuſmodi ſectantes, Deum ſolummodo tentare videantur; and to the ſame purpoſe Pope Celeſtine and ſome others did forbid it 2. Becauſe the innocent perſon is expos'd to equal danger with the Criminal, and hath been oftentimes oppreſs'd; as it happened in the caſe of William Cadur an armourer in Fleetſtreet, who being by his ſervant John David falſely accuſed of treaſon, was yet ſlain in Smithfield by his perjur'd adverſary: and then the people have accepted the event as a divine teſtimony, which in this caſe being to a lie and to the falſe part, muſt needs be infinitely diſhonourable to God. But if it were not for theſe and ſome other evil appendages, and if the innocent perſon were ſure to prevail, and the law made the private hand the miniſter of Juſtice, who onely can tell the ſecret, and therefore is the ſureſt Judge, there is no peradventure it might as well be done by that hand as by any other. But this cannot be reduc'd to practice at all; but in the whole conjunction of affairs is highly criminal and intolerable. In Spain we find that a duel was permitted between two eminent perſons [los infantes de lara, the Spaniards call them] onely upon the accuſation of an injury done to ſome Ladies, the daughters of Rodrigo de Bibar, Cauſ. 2. qu. 5. c. 22. monomachiam. Decret. tit. de vulgari purgat. 6 Stows Annals. 25. of Henry Bibar; and the victory was gain'd by him that was innocent: and another by the men of Zamora in the case of the death of King Sanctus; and quickly they found advocates and defenders. And Vasquius affirms it may as well be permitted by law, as that an injur'd Husband should kill the adulterer. But besides the reasons formerly alledged against such private executions of an uncertain sentence; because they have no foundation in justice or charity, neither in publick or private good, they are deservedly banished from all Christian Countries.

13. But this is to be understood onely of Judiciall Duels, whether Criminal or Civil; for as for Duell extrajudiciall and private, it is so Unjust, so Uncharitable, and so Unreasonable, so much against all Laws of God and Man, so infinitely against the piety of him that survives it, so infinitely against the hopes of him that dies in it, that nothing can excuse it: but even Duels which are permitted by laws, ought not to be so, and are not permitted by religion; excepting onely when the Duel is a compendium of war, and is designed to doe justice, and to prevent the greater issues of blood.

14. Thus the Romans and Albans determin'd their wars by the fight of three Champions of each side; and the Curiatii being subdued by Horatius Cocles, the City Alba came into subjection to Rome. David and Goliah fought for their respective Countries; but the Duel did not determine it directly, but onely discourag'd the conquer'd party. Upon the same account Clodoveus the first Christian King of France offer'd to fight with Alaricus Prince of the West Goths; nobilissimo pari fortunam utriusque gentis decretum in, said Paulus Æmilius: and Guicciardine tells that Lib. 5. hist. Ital. when the French and Italian armies were ready to joyn battel, the fortune of the day was committed to thirteen Champions on either part. Cambden in Dobunis reports that when the Saxons and Danes grew weary of the so great effusion of blood caused by their daily wars, misso in compendium bello, utriusque gentis fata Edmundo Anglorum & Canuto Danorum Regibus commissa fuerunt, qui singulari certamine de summa Imperii in hac insula depugnarunt. Edmund and Canutus fought in a little Island by Glouceſter, and drew the war into a compendium, and sav'd the lives of their Subjects by hazarding their own. William Duke of Normandy offer'd this to Harold before the battail in Sussex: And King John of England to Lewis of France, by deputed Champions. And Richard the second of England challenged Charles the sixth of France concerning the title of the French Crown. And Pope Martin allowed the Duel between Charles of Anjou and Peter of Aragon to determine the question concerning the Kingdome of Sicily. These indeed are great Examples, and are then onely just when the war is just, and on that side onely on which it is just. Hæc est necessitas quæ bellum Bald. 5. consil. justificat (saith Baldus) cum ad bellum extremo loco confugitur, When the 493. war is necessary and the case is extreme, the necessity makes it just, when the contrary evil is intolerable: and when things are come to this pass, then it is true what Bodinus saies, Non interest quo numero adversus hostes decernatur, It matters not by how few the war be ended. Such a Duel is a just war, as all war antiently was called a Duel, Whether it be lawfull for a Chriſtian to require of the Magiſtrate that his offending Brother may be puniſhed.

15. If the injur'd perſon be deſign'd onely to puniſhment οὐκ ζέσεως ἕνεκα θερμοῦ αἵματος, and διὰ ὄρεξιν ἀντιλυπήσεως, out of anger and a deſire to be reveng'd, there is no queſtion but it is infinitely Unlawfull. Render not evil for evil, and divers other prohibitive words of our Bleſſed Lord, cannot mean leſſe then the forbidding of revenge, though obtain'd and deſir'd from the hand of juſtice; for although the Magiſtrate is bound to doe it, if requir'd, yet he that requires for vengeance ſake is of an Unchriſtian ſpirit: and this was obſerved by Dion in Plutarch, Τὸ ἀντιτιμωρεῖσθαι τῷ πρᾶξαι δίκην νόμῳ δικαιότερον ὠφελῆσαι φύσει γινόμενον ἀπὸ μιᾶς ἀσθενείας, To receive & require amends from the law is more juſt then that injury againſt which juſtice is required; but it proceeds from the ſame weak principle; and therefore it is fit for none but fools and weak perſons:

Juvenal.

——quippe minuti
Semper & infirmi eſt animi exiguique voluptas
Ultio: continuò ſic collige, quod vindictâ
Nemo magis gaudet quam femina——

or rather it becomes not ſuch perſons; for nothing can become them but to leave their folly and to grow wiſer; for it is cæcus & irrationalis furor, as Lactantius calls it, inhumanum verbum eſt, ſaith Seneca, it is unreaſonable, and inhumane, and brutiſh: οὐκ ἐφηδόμεθα, ὦ δέσποτα, τιμωρίας ἐχθρῶν, δεδιδαγμένοι παρὰ τοῦ ἱεροῦ νόμου ἀνθρωποπαθεῖν, ſaid the Jews of Alexandria, We are not delighted in taking revenge againſt our Enemies, becauſe by the laws of God we are taught to have compaſſion on men. And therefore is this much more to be obſerved in Chriſtianity, where we are all members one of another, united to Chriſt our head; and therefore we ſhould comport our ſelves as members of the ſame body: concerning which Caſſiodore ſaies prettily, Quod ſi manus una caſu aliquo fortè lædat alteram, illa quæ læſa eſt non repercutit, nec ſe erigit in vindictam, If one hand ſtrikes the other, it is not ſtricken again, neither doth the other think to be reveng'd; as knowing it was too much that one was ſmitten.

De amicitia.

16. 2. It is lawfull for a Chriſtian to require of the Magiſtrate to puniſh him that is injurious, if he juſtly fears a future and intolerable evil; for then it is but a calling to the law for a juſt defence, without which the Magiſtrate ſhould bear the ſword in vain. Clemens Alexandrinus defines τιμωρίαν or puniſhment (meaning that which is juſt, and in ſome caſes reaſonable to be requir'd) to be κακοῦ ἐπιπόθησιν ἐκ τοῦ τὸν τιμωρούμενον συμφέρον ἀναφέρεσθαι, μῶλω, a return of evil (not for the vexing of the injurious, but) for the relief or commodity of the complainer. But if it be that which Aristotle defin'd it, τῦ πιοιῶτ Θ. ἕνεκα, ἵνα ἀναπληρωθῇ, for the satisfaction of him that punishes, that is, that he may have the pleasure of revenge, then it is intolerable. And therefore it must be alwaies provided that this appeal respect the future onely, and not that which is past; for that is revenge, and this is caution and defence.

17. 3. In all repetitions of our rights which are permitted to Christians before Christian Judges, it is not lawfull for Christians to take any thing for amends beyond the reall losse or diminution of good: for that is a retribution of evil, which at no hand is permitted to a Christian. The Jews might receive four-fold, Christians must be content with simple restitution of their los and reall dammages.

18. 4. Christians must not go to law but upon very great cause; and therefore some of the Heathens, Musonius, Maximus Tyrius, and others, would not allow ὕβρεως δίκλω, any amends at law for reproachfull or disgracefull words. And the Christians, who neither were nor ought to be behind them, desir'd not their Calumniators to be punished. So Justin Martyr, We will not those to be punished who doe calumniate us. Their own perverseneß and ignorance of good things is enough already of calamity. Μηδὲ μικρὸν ἀμεῖβεσθαι μηδένα βουλόμενοι, ὡς ὁ καινὸς νομοθέτης ἐκέλευσε, A Christian is commanded by Christ our new Law-giver not to be revenged, no not a little. Abstinere à litibus etiam pluſquam licet, said Cicero, We must abstain from suits of law, even far beyond our convenience: and in the Primitive Church they took all honest things for Commandements, and therefore did not think it lawfull at all to go to law; ὐ δικάζονται τοῖς ἁρπάζουσι, saith Justin Martyr of them, They doe not go to law with them that rob them. But that it is lawful, the publick necessities are a sufficient argument; and yet men for want of charity make more necessities then needs: for if charity be preserv'd according to its worthiest measures, there would be no suits of law, but what are not to be avoided; that is, there would be none for revenge, but some for remedy and relief. And this was that which * Musonius said, ἀτελὲς ἔσται καὶ πάνυ φιλόδικον κακηγορίας δικάζεσθαι, It is not ingenuous to be running to law upon every provocation though by reall injury: μήτε ἄρχειν λοιδορίας, μήτε ἀμύνεσθαι τὸς λοιδορῦντας, said Pythagoras, A wise man will neither revile his neighbour, nor sue him that does. For Good men (said Metellus Numidicus) will sooner take an injury then return one: and if we read the Sermon of Maximus Tyrius περὶ τῦ εἰ ἡ ἀδικεῖσθαι ἀντιδικητέον; whether it may be permitted to a good man to return evil to the injurious? it will soon put us either to shame, or at least to consider whether there be no command in our religion, of suffering injuries, of patience, of longanimity, of forgiveness, of doing good for evil; and whether there be not rewards great enough to make amends for all our losses, and to reward all our charity; and whether the things of this world cannot possibly be despised by a Christian; and whether peace and forgiveneſſe doe not make us more like to God and to the Holy Jesus. Certainly if a Christian be reproach'd, rail'd at, spoil'd, beaten, mutilated, or in danger of death, if he bears it patiently and charitably, he may better say it then Achilles did in Homer,

——— Φρονέω ὄ τιμῆσθαι Διὸς αἴσῃ,

I hope for this charity to be rewarded by God himſelf. If a man have relations, and neceſſities, and obligations by other collateral duties, he muſt in ſome caſes, and in many more he may defend his goods by the protection of laws, and his life and limbs; but in no caſe may he go to law to vex his Neighbour: and becauſe all law-ſuits are vexatious, he may not go to law, unleſs to drive away an injury that is intolerable, and that is much greater then that which is brought upon the other.

19. 5. When a Chriſtian does appeal to Chriſtian Judges for caution, or for repetition of his right, he muſt doe it without arts of vexation, but with the leaſt trouble he can; being unwilling his Neighbour ſhould ſuffer any evil for what he hath done. Omnia priùs tentanda quam bello experiundum. He muſt trie all waies before he go to this; and when he is in this, he muſt doe it with as little collateral trouble to his adverſary at law as he can. To this belongs that of Ulpian, Non improbat prætor factum ejus qui tanti habuit re carere, ne propter eam ſæpiùs litigaret. Hæc enim verecunda cogitatio ejus qui lites exſecratur non eſt vituperanda. A man muſt be modeſt and charitable in his neceſſary ſuits at law; not too ready, not too greedy, not paſſionate, not revengeful: ſeeking to repair himſelf when he muſt needs, but not delighting in the breaches made upon his Neighbour.

20. In order to this, it would prevent many evils, and determine many Caſes of Conſcience, or make them eaſie and few, if evil and rapacious Advocates that make a trade, not to miniſter to juſtice, but to heap up riches for themſelves, were not permitted in Common-wealths to plead in behalf of vitious perſons and manifeſt oppreſſors, and in cauſes notoriouſly unjuſt. Galeatius Sforza Duke of Millain being told of a witty Lawyer that was of evil imployment, a patron of any thing for money, imploying his wit to very evil purpoſes, ſent for him, and told him that he owed his Painter a hundred Crowns, and was not willing to pay him; and therefore asked him if he would defend his cauſe in caſe the Painter ſhould require his money at law. The Advocate promiſed him largely, and would warrant his cauſe; which when the Duke heard from his own mouth, he cauſed him to be hang'd. The action was ſevere, but ſtrangely exemplary. I have nothing to doe with it, becauſe I am not writing Politics, but Caſes and Rules of Conſcience: but I have mention'd it as a great reproof of all that which makes Cauſes & Suits of Law to be numerous; which is a great ſign of corruption of manners, if not of laws, in any place; but amongſt Chriſtians it is a very great ſtate of evil. And therefore Charles the ninth of France made an edict that whoſoever began a ſuit at law ſhould pay into the Finances two Crowns; which if his cauſe were juſt he ſhould loſe, if it were unjuſt the law would ſufficiently puniſh him beſides: but even upon a juſt cauſe to go to law, is not the commendation of Chriſtian juſtice, much leſſe of charity, τότε ἂν εἴη πόλει τῇ φίλοι, ὅπου πολλαὶ μὲ δίκαι ὦν ἀλλήλοις εἶεν, ἀλλ' ὅπου ἀς ὅτι σμικρόταται καὶ ὀλίγιστοι, Then charity is beſt preſerved amongſt Citizens, not when there are moſt deciſions of cauſes, but when the ſuits are feweſt.

Rule

RULE VII.

It is not lawfull to puniſh one for the offence of another; meerly, and wholly.

1. Quod tute intriſti, tibi comedendum eſt, ſaid the Comedy, As you knead, ſo you muſt eat; and he that eats ſowre grapes, his teeth only ſhall be ſet on edge. This is the voice of Nature, of God, of right reaſon, and all the laws, and all the ſentences of all the wiſe men in the world; and needs no farther argument to prove it. But there are in it ſome caſes which need explication. 1. Concerning perſons conjunct by Contract; 2. In perſons conjunct by Nature; 3. In them which are conjunct by the ſociety of Crime. For in all theſe one is puniſhed for the fault of another; but how far this can be juſt and lawfull, are uſefull inquiries in order to the conduct of Conſcience.

2. 1. The firſt inquiry is concerning perſons conjunct in Contract; ſuch as are Pledges in War, Sureties for Debt, Undertakers for appearance, and the like. Concerning Pledges in War, it hath been ſometimes practiſed in warlike Nations, to put them to death when their parties have broke their promiſe. The Theſſalians kill'd 250, the Romans 300 of the Volſci; and this they might doe by the law of Nations: that is, without infamy and reproach, or any ſuppoſed injuſtice: they did practiſe it on either ſide. But the thing it ſelf is not lawfull by the law of God and Nature, unleſs the Pledges be equally guilty of the Crime. When Regulus was ſent to Rome to get an exchange of priſoners, and himſelf upon his promiſe was engaged to releaſe them, or to return himſelf; when he perſwaded the Romans not to releaſe the African priſoners, the Carthaginians had reaſon to account him guilty as his Country. But when the Pledges are not, it is againſt the law of Nature to put to death the innocent. For either the Pledges are violently ſent in caution againſt their wills, or with them. If againſt, then the wrong is apparent, and the injuſtice notorious. If with their will, it is to be conſidered, it is beyond their power; for, nemo membrorum ſuorum Dominus videtur, ſaith the law, l. liber ff. ad legem Aquiliam: and therefore it is that in Criminal cauſes, where Corporal puniſhment is inflicted, no man is permitted to be Surety for another, but in Civil cauſes he may; becauſe no Surety may lawfully be put to death for the Principal, as is noted by the Gloſs in cap. Cum homo 23. q. 5. The reaſon is plain; He that is Surety for another can engage nothing of which he is not the Lord, and over which he hath no power; and therefore he cannot lay his body, his life, or limb, at ſtake. No man hath power to engage his ſoul for the ſoul of another, that is, ſo as to pay his ſoul in caſe of forfeiture to acquit another; for it is not his, it is anothers; it is his who hath purchaſed it and is Lord over it, that is Chriſt: and ſo is our body redeemed by the blood of Chriſt, For ye are bought with a price, therefore glorifie God in your body and in your ſpirit, which are God's, ſaith the Apoſtle. Now this is ſo to be underſtood, not that one man may not feel the calamity which the ſin of another can bring upon him; but that the law cannot inflict Corporal puniſhment upon any relative, ſo as the Criminal 1 Cor. 6. 20.

Criminal ſhall eſcape, and the law be ſatisfied, as if the offending perſon had ſuffered. If a Father be a Traytor, the law may juſtly put him to death though the wife will die with ſorrow. But the law cannot put the wife to death, or the ſon, and let the husband goe free. One relative may accidentally come into the ſociety of anothers puniſhment, not only if they be partners of the Crime, but though one be innocent; but one cannot pay it for the other and acquit him. This I ſay is to be underſtood in Corporal puniſhments.

3. But in Pecuniary puniſhments the Caſe is otherwiſe. For a man is Lord of his money, and may give it away, and therefore may oblige it; and he that is Surety for anothers debt, gives or lends it to him that is principally obliged; and therefore it is juſt to take it, and the Surety hath power to doe it. But by the way it is obſervable, that the Surety can only oblige his money, or himſelf to the payment of his money: but when the Creditors had power to torment the inſolvent Debtors, no man could give himſelf a Surety directly for that torment; but by making himſelf a Debtor, he did by conſequence make himſelf Criminal if he did not pay, and ſo might with as much juſtice be tormented as the principal Debtor.

4. But the whole buſineſs is unreaſonable as to this inſtance, and therefore the inquiry is ſoon at an end, and the caſe of conſcience wholly different; for in this particular it is not only unlawfull to puniſh the Surety with Corporal puniſhment, but even the Principal that is inſolvent is to be let alone. If he fell into poverty by his prodigality, the law may puniſh that as ſhe pleaſe; or if he intends to defraud the Creditor, he may be puniſhed, or conſtrained to pay: but if he fall into poverty ἐκ τῦ συμβεβηκότος & ἀ ῥᾳθυμίᾳ, as Juſtinian's expreſſion is, by unavoidable accident, not by impious courſes, it is againſt juſtice and charity to put him to trouble.

5. Concerning which, though it be not pertinent to this rule, but here only very well occaſioned, I ſhall give this ſhort account, that at once I may be wholy quit of this particular. * In the laws of the XII Tables it was permitted to Creditors to impriſon, to torment, to put their inſolvent Debtors to death; and if they were many of them they might cut the body in pieces, and every man goe away with his ſhare. Nihil profecto immitius, nihil immanius, ſaies A. Gellius, niſi, ut reipsâ apparet, eo conſilio tanta immanitas pœnæ denuntiata eſt, ne ad eam unquam perveniretur. It was an intolerable and cruel juſtice, and only therefore publiſhed in ſo great a terror, that it might never be put in execution: and indeed, as he obſerves, it was never practiſed.

Lib. 20. cap. 1.

6. But addici nunc & vinciri multos videmus, ſaith he; that was the next Cruelty: The Debtors were ſold and all their goods; even Kings, ſubject to the Roman Empire, were with their Crowns and Purple, their Scepter and Royal Enſignes, publiſhed by the Crier, and made ſlaves to pay their debts. The King of Cyprus was ſo uſed, as Cicero in his oration pro Sextio ſadly complains. The dividing the body of the Debtor was chang'd into the dividing of his goods; but this alſo was hatefull and complained of by wiſe and good men. Si funus id habendum ſit quò non amici conveniant ad exequias cohoneſtandas, ſed bonorum emptores ut Carnifices ad reliquias vitæ lacerandas ac distrahendas, said Cicero: and Manlius most worthily, seeing a Roman led to prison like a slave for debt, cried out, Tum verò ego nequicquam hâc dextrâ Capitolium arcémque servaverim, si civem commilitonémque meum tanquam Gallis victoribus captum in servitutem ac vincula duci videam. To what purpose did I save the Capitol, if a citizen and my fellow-souldier shall for debt be made a slave as if he were taken prisoner by the Gaules? and therefore he paid the debt and dismiss'd the prisoner. Oratione pro Quintio, apud Livium, l. 6.

7. But because this was cruel and inhumane, when Pætilius and Papirius were Consuls, a law was made that all the goods and possessions of the Debtors should be obnoxious to the Creditors, but not his body; but yet so that the Debtors did work for their Creditors, but not in chains: and this lasted till the lex Julia decreed (in Augustus his time) that the insolvent Debtors might quit all their goods, but neither suffer chains, nor slavery, nor doe labour for their Creditors: but the benefit of this law extended not to prodigal and vain persons, but to those only qui vi majore aliquâ fortunis evertebantur, (that was their word) who were undone by any great violence, by shipwrack, or fire, or any accident unavoidable. For as for others, they were delivered to the Capital Triumvirat and punished ad Columnam Meniam, that is, whipped extremely; and this continued until the time of Gratian the Emperor, who decreed that such Debtors who were not eversi per vim majorem, should not receive any benefit by quitting all their goods; but if they were less then their debt, ad redditionem debitæ quantitatis congruâ atque dignissimâ suppliciorum acerbitate cogantur, they should be compelled by torment to pay a due proportion: and in this there might be severity; but it had in it very much of Justice. But for the other part of it, of the intire cession of goods, and that the insolvent miserable Debtor should be exposed to starving, this had neither charity in it nor justice; and therefore after much complaining, and attempts of ease, it was wholly taken away by the Emperors, Constantine, Gratian, and Justinian, Novel. 135. Πᾶ γὰρ δίκαιον ἅπαξ ἐκ τῦ συμβεβηκότος ἐν ῥᾳδυμίᾳ ἀβιοδιδόμην ἐκτὸς τῶν αὐτῦ γεγονότα, αὖθις ἀχήμονα καὶ βίον ἑαυτῷ ἀβασπάστον ἔχειν, καὶ τῆς ἡμέρου τροφῆς, ὡς εἰκὸς, τῆς τε τῦ σώματος σκέπης ἔξω δικαίως καλαφλῶσι. It is infinitely unjust that he who is fallen into poverty without his fault should be constrained to live a shamefull life, without his daily bread, and the necessary provisions for his back: and then it was ordered that if the Debtor did ejurare bonam copiam, that is, swear that he had not goods sufficient to pay the debt, he should be free. Vide Ravardum ad Ll. 12. Tabul. c. 8. Lib. 1. Cod. Theod. qui bon. ex leg. Jul. ced. & l. si victum. ff. de re judic. l. 2. C. de exact. tribut. l. 10.

8. This was made into a law long before the time of Gratian; when Sylla was Dictator, Popilius demanded it, and it was decreed. But Tyrants usually make good laws, and after they are dead are so hated, that even their good laws are sometimes the less regarded: and so it happened in this particular; in so much that Cicero spake against L. Flaccus for desiring to have Sylla's laws confirmed. But it soon expired through the power of the rich usurers, as we finde by the complaint of C. Manlius in Salust; and even so long as the lex Popilia did prevail, yet they had arts to elude it: for though they could not bind the Debtors in publick prisons, yet they would detain them in their own houses; and though it was a great and an illegal violence, yet the poore mans case is last of all heard, and commonly the Advocates and Judges have something else to doe. In Rullum. In Catilin.

This

9. This is a perfect narrative of this affair; in all which it is apparent that wise and good men did infinitely condemn the cruel and unjust usage of insolvent Debtors who were per vim majorem eversi, not poor by vice, but misfortune and the Divine providence. The violence and the injury is against natural justice and humanity, or that natural pity which God hath plac'd in the bowels of mankinde; as appears by the endeavours of the wiser Romans to correct the cruelty of Creditors. But the Debtors, though by degrees eased, yet were not righted till Christianity made the laws, and saw justice and mercy done. S. Ambrose complain'd most bitterly of the Creditors in his time; Vidi ego pauperem duci dum cogeretur solvere quod non habebat; trahi ad carcerem quia vinum deesset ad mensam potentis; deducere in auctionem filios suos ut ad tempus pœnam differre possit: inventum fortè aliquem qui in illa necessitate subveniret, &c. I have seen a poor man compell'd to pay what he had not to pay; and drag'd to prison because his creditor had not wine enough to drink; and to deferre his punishment a while, forc'd to sell his sons at an outcry. Grandis culpa est, (saith he) si te sciente fidelis egeat, si scias eum sine sumptu esse, fame laborare, & non adjuves; si sit in carcere, & pœnis & suppliciis propter debitum aliquod justus excrucietur. It is a great fault, if when you know it, you suffer a faithfull man to want meat and provisions; if a just or good man be in prison, and in chains or torments for debt. Now if persons not interested in the debt might not suffer such a thing to be and abide, much less might any Christian doe such a thing. If every man that could, was bound to take off the evil; it is certain it was infinitely unlawfull to inflict or to lay it on: and therefore the remains of this barbarity and inhumanity amongst us does so little argue Christianity to be amongst us, that it plainly proves that our Religion hath not prevailed so far upon us as to take off our inhumanity.

Lib. de Nabuthe, cap. 5.

10. Of the same nature is that barbarous custome of arresting dead bodies, and denying them the natural rights of burial till a debt be paid. Ascelinus Fitz-Arthur arrested the body of William Duke of Normandy, Conqueror of England, upon something a like account. But S. Ambrose blames such unnatural cruelty, and derides the folly of it; Quoties vidi à fœneratoribus teneri defunctos pro pignore, & negari tumulum dum fœnus exposcitur? Quibus ego acquiescens dixi, Tenete reum vestrum, & ne possit elabi, domum ducite; claudite in cubiculo isto carnificibus duriores: quoniam quem vos tenetis, carcer non suscipit, exactor absolvit; To them who seiz'd on dead bodies for their debt, I call'd out, Hold fast your Debtor, carry him home lest he run away, O ye that are more cruel then Hang-men. But of this sufficient: for whatsoever is against the law of Nature, to have nam'd it is to have reprov'd it. Onely there is one case in which if dead bodies be arrested for debt, I cannot so much complain of it; and that is in the Customes of France, where they never imprison any alive for a Debt, unless he be expresly condemn'd to it by the sentence of the Judge, or contracted upon those terms with the Creditor: but when the man is dead they lay their claim, because they cannot hurt the man. This I finde in Gaspar Beatius, who cites these Verses for it out of Johannes Girardus, no ill Poet, but a good Lawyer.

Lib. de Tobia cap. 10.

Heus principes, duodecim
Tabulæ inopem crudeliter
Quæ debitorem dissecant,

Aut

Aut jura, mores publici,
Quæ carceribus illum miserè
Et opprimunt & enecant,
Nimis mihi, nimis displicent:
Qui Gallum habuit mos bonus
Idem & verus probabitur
Nimis mihi cuique & bono,
Quo Creditores debita

But I suppose he might speak this in jest, to represent the lenity of Frenchmen in not casting their Debtors into prison. But if a Debtor should, as Argiropilus, jesting at his death, make his rich friends the heirs of all his debts, it would spoil the jest.

Now I return to the other inquiries of the Rule.

11. The second inquiry is concerning persons conjunct by nature; whether (for example sake) Sons or Nephews can be punish'd for the faults and offences of their Fathers and Grand-fathers. Concerning this, I find Paulus the Lawyer and Baldus speaking exact Antinomies. For Baldus in l. id quod pauperibus, qu. 9. C. de Episcopis & Clericis, affirms, Hæredem teneri ad pœnam ad quam defunctus fuerat condemnatus, The heir of his father inherits his father's punishment: but Paulus in l. si pœna, ff. de pœnis, sayes expresly, *Hæredem non teneri ad pœnam defuncti, The heir is not bound to suffer the punishment of the dead. But they are both in the right: for the Heir is not tied to suffer the corporal punishment to which his Father was condemn'd, because his Father had no dominion over his Son's body or his own; but over his goods he hath, and therefore can transmit these with their proper burthen: and therefore the Heir is liable to pay the Fine to which his Father was sentenc'd, and to pay his Father's debts, and is liable to the same compulsion, with this onely caution, that if the Father be under torment or imprisonment for insolvency, the Son be no way oblig'd to that; because whether the insolvency of the Father be by his fault or his misfortune, still the Son is not oblig'd: for as he is not bound by his Father's personal fault to suffer personal punishment, so neither for his misfortune can he be oblig'd beyond the suffering of a descending poverty. If his Father was insolvent by his Crime, the punishment was to go no further then the fault, and therefore no torment was intail'd: but if he were insolvent by misfortune, neither the Father nor the Son for that could deserve any further evil; and if the Father transmitted no goods, no advantage to the Son, there is no reason he should transmit a burthen: Nemo fiat deterior per quem melior factus non est, sayes the Law. And therefore S. Ambrose complain'd of a sad sight he saw; Vidi ego miserabile spectaculum, Liberos pro Paterno debito in auctionem deduci, & teneri calamitatis hæredes, qui non essent participes successionis, & hoc tam immane flagitium non erubescere Creditorem, I have seen Sons sold Slaves for their Fathers debt, from whom they were never like to receive an Inheritance; and which is yet more strange, the Creditors were not asham'd of the impious Cruelty. But this is a rul'd case both in Divinity and Law. Nunquam unus pro alio potest pœna corporis puniri, said Alexander of Hales, and Thomas Aquinas, No man can suffer corporal punishment in the place of another: the same with that in the law, l. Crimen ff. de pœnis. And therefore of all things in the world, conjunction of Nature, which should be a means of endearment, and the most profitable communications, ought not to be an instrument of the communication of evil. Unius factum alteri qui nihil fecit non nocet, l. de pupillo, 5. §. si plurium. ff. Nov. op. nunt. And again, Peccata ſuos teneant autores, nec ulterius progrediatur metus, quam reperiatur delictum, l. Sancimus, 22. C. de pœnis. But it is expreſly inſtanc'd in this matter of ſucceſſion, Unuſquiſque ex ſuo admiſſo pœnæ ſubjiciatur, nec alieni criminis ſucceſſor teneatur, The Son may ſucceed in his Father's burthens and misfortunes, but not in his crimes or corporal puniſhments. l. crimen, ff. eod.

12. And this is the meaſure of the third inquiry. For they who are conjunct in crime, are equally obnoxious to puniſhment; and therefore if one be puniſh'd for the fault of another, it is juſt to him that is puniſh'd, and mercy to them that are ſpar'd. For when all are criminal, all are liable to puniſhment, and ſometimes all doe ſuffer. So did the Campanian Legion that rebell'd at Rhegium, and poſſeſs'd the Town for ten years; they ſuffer'd every man, four thouſand heads paid for it. So did the ninth Legion under Julius, and the tenth Legion under Auguſtus, every man was puniſh'd. For the rule of the law is, Quod à pluribus pro indiviſo commiſſum eſt, ſingulos in ſolidum obligat, l. ſemper, 5. 2. ff. Quod vi aut cl. & l. item Mela, 5. 2. ff. ad legem Aquiliam. When every man conſents to the whole crime, every man is wholly criminal. If ten thieves carry away a load of iron, every man is tied to the puniſhment of the whole. * But ſometimes onely the Principals are puniſh'd. Thus at Capua ſeventy Princes of the Senate were put to death for rebelling againſt the Romans, and three hundred of the Nobility were impriſon'd, and two hundred twenty five of the Sorani. And this way is often taken by Princes, and wiſe Generals, and Republicks, ut unde culpa orta eſſet ibi pœna conſiſteret. And C. Decimus was heard with great applauſe, when in the caſe of the Rhodians he affirm'd, that the fault was not in the People, but in their Principals and Incendiaries; meaning, it was not ſo in the People as in their Leaders. And in Tumults it often happens as it did at Epheſus, when S. Paul had almoſt been torn in pieces with the People: the greater part knew not why they were come together, but all were in the Tumult; and in ſuch caſes it is juſtice that one be puniſh'd for many, a few for all: and therefore S. Ambroſe did highly reprove Theodoſius the Emperour for killing 7000 of the Theſſalonians for a tumultuary reſcuing a Criminal from the hand of the Magiſtrate, and killing the Governour and ſome great Officers in the ſedition. * Sometimes the Criminals were decimated by lot, as appears in [a] Polybius, [b] Tacitus, [c] Plutarch, [d] Appian, [e] Dio, [f] Julius Capitolinus, who alſo mentions a centeſimation. And the reaſon of this equity Cicero well diſcourſes in his Oration pro Cluentio, ut metus, viz. ad omnes, pœna ad paucos perveniret, That ſome may be puniſh'd, and all may be made to fear: for the Souldiers being made to fear the bigger fear of their Generals, would never fear the leſs fear of the Enemy, who does not ſtrike ſo ſurely as the Executioner; and therefore they might afterwards become good Men and good Citizens. But becauſe in publick offences the caſes may be different, they are by this meaſure reduc'd to reaſon.

it is not easily to be reckon'd to a real crime, and the greatest punishment.

14. But if the fault be done by the People without authority or excuse, but just as fire burns a house by chance, or water breaks a dam by its meer weight, then it is to be considered whether the Criminals be many or few: if few, they may all be punished without breach of equity, upon the account of the rule of the law, Quæ pœna delictis imposita est, si plures deliquerint, à singulis in solidum debetur, l. item Mela, ff. ad leg. Aquil. But if many were in the crime, then the rule of equity and the gentleness of the law is to take place, ut pœnæ interpretatione potius molliantur, quam exasperentur, leg. pœn. ff. de pœnis, a few should be punish'd for all the rest, ut supersint quos peccasse pœniteat. For it is of great avail for the publick interest, that as some be cut off, so some should remain alive, that they may repent. And in this sense is that of Lucan, ——quicquid multis peccatur inultum est.

Besides that it is evil to the Commonwealth to lose so many Subjects, it is also sometimes dangerous;

——sed illos
Defendit numerus junctæque umbone phalanges.

The determination of these two particulars I learn from Cicero in his Oration pro Flacco, Vobis autem est considendum, si consiliis Principum vestræ civitates reguntur, non multitudinis temeritate; optimatum consilio bellum ab istis civitatibus cum populo Romano esse susceptum. If the Nobles govern your Cities, then the Nobles made the war, and the People are innocent. Sin ille tum motus est temeritate imperitorum excitatus, patimini me delicta vulgi à publica causa separare, But if the Rabble did the fault, the City is not to be punish'd; it is not a publick offence. Multitudo peccavit, sed non Universitas. For a Rabble does not make a City, a People, or a Republick: for to make this, it must be cœtus qui jure aliquo continetur; l. metum. §. animadvertendum. ff. quod met. caus. a multitude under government, and a legal head.

15. But if both the Magistrates and the People be in the offence, culpa est penes paucos concitores vulgi, said C. Decimus; it is better that the Ring-leaders and the Boutefeus should lye at stake, and feel the severity, while the other are instructed and preserved by the gentleness of laws and Princes.

There are some other questions and cases of Conscience concerning penal laws; but they can with more propriety be handled under other titles, and therefore I shall refer them to their several places. But for the likeness of the matter I have here subjoyned some Rules concerning the measures and obligations of Conscience in the matter and laws of Tribute.

Of Laws of Tribute.

Rule VIII.

The laws of Tribute are moral laws, and not penal, except it be by accident; and therefore doe oblige the Conſcience to an active obedience.

1. HIm to whom we pay tribute, we owe obedience to. It is S. Pauls argument to prove that we ought to obey the powers that are ſet over us, becauſe to them we pay tribute; which tribute is not introduc'd by Tyranny, but is part of that Oeconomy by which God governs the world, by his Deputies and lieutenants, the Kings and Princes of the earth. Nec quies gentium ſine armis, nec arma ſine ſtipendiis, nec ſtipendia ſine tributis haberi poſſunt, ſaid Tacitus. No peace without laws; no laws without a coercitive power; no power without guards and ſouldiers; * no guards without pay: and that the ſouldiery may be paid, and the laws reverenc'd, and the power fear'd, and every mans right be ſecur'd, it is neceſſary that there be tribute. Ut ſit ornamentum pacis, ſubſidium belli & nervus reip. tributum eſt pecunia populo imperata quæ tributim à ſingulis proportione cenſûs exigebatur, ſaid Varro. But beſides this, the very paying tribute is the ſign and publication of our ſubjection. It is a giving him that which is his own: for he that coyns the money, hath the power of the law, and this from the cuſtome of the world for many ages. The Perſians firſt imprinted the figure of their Prince upon their money, after them the Greeks: hence were thoſe names of coin, the Darics, and Philippics; for the money having the impreſs and figure of the Prince, the name & the value from the Prince, is a ſeiſure and ſolemn inveſtiture in the government of that people: and our Bleſſed Lord was pleaſed from hence to argue that therefore they ought to pay tribute to Cæſar; becauſe what way ſoever he came firſt to it, Chriſt does not there diſpute, but he was over them, and he protected them in peace, righted their cauſes, reliev'd their oppreſſions, ſtamped their money, gave value to that, and protection to them, and therefore they were bound to pay their tribute. It was res Cæſaris, as he was pleas'd to call it, the things of Cæſar; it was due to him for the publick miniſtery of juſtice: and this is alſo urged by S. Paul, for they are Gods miniſters, watching for this very thing, that is, for your good; and therefore are to be maintained according to the dignity of that miniſtration.

Rom. 13.

* Ad hoc tributa præſtamus, ut propter neceſſaria militi ſtipendium præbeatur. S. Aug. lib. 22. c. 74. c. Fauſt. Manich. Cicero pro lege Manilia.

2. Now as we owe tribute to whom we owe obedience; ſo we owe obedience to whom we owe tribute: that is, if he have authority to exact tribute, we are bound in Conſcience to pay it. It is a law as much obliging the Conſcience as any other. Numus or Nummus from Numa, ſay the Roman Criticks; becauſe King Numa firſt ſtamp'd money amongſt them. But I ſuppoſe it is from a Greek fountain, Numus and Numiſma from νόμισμα, and that ſaies Ariſtotle is ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου, from the law: for he that ſtamps money, gives the law; and amongſt others, and for the defence of all all laws, this law of paying money to him by way of Tribute is obligatory.

3. And the case does not differ by what name soever it be impos'd; vectigal, tributum, census, τέλος, φόρος, were the words amongst the Greeks and Latines, and did signifie portions of money paid from lands, from merchandise, for heads, excisum quid, something that is cut off from the whole, for the preservation of the rest; that's excise money: but whatever the words be, S. Paul reckons them all to be τὰς ὀφειλὰς, due debt; and therefore ἀπόδοτε saith our Blessed Lord, ἀπόδοτε, saith S. Paul, restore, or pay it; it is a debt due by the ordinance of God. It is all but tribute; even the census or pole-money is tribute: so it is called by Ulpian, l. 3 ff. de Censibus, tributum capitis, the tribute of the head. The same use of the word I have observed out of Ammianus and Tertullian. This I the rather note, that I might represent the obligation to be all one by the law of God, though the imposition be odious and of ill name amongst the people, according to that saying of Tertullian, Si agri tributo onusti viliores, hominum capita stipendio censa ignobiliora, Fields under contribution are cheaper, and men under a tax are more ignoble. Angaria is another sort of tribute; an imposition of work and upon the labours of the Subject. It is indeed the worst and the most vexatious; but it is species tributi, a kind of tribute, and due by the laws of religion, where it is due by the laws of the nation: and therefore those persons are very regardless of their eternal interest, who think it lawful prize whatever they can take from the Custome-house; whereas the paying of tribute is an instance of that obedience which is due to them that are set over us, not onely for wrath, but also for Conscience sake, and S. Paul never uses the word Conscience, but when it is the concern of a soul. It is S. Ambrose his observation, who also uses this argument, Magnum quidem est & spiritale documentum, quo Christiani viri sublimioribus potestatibus docentur esse subjecti, ne quis constitutionem terreni Regis putet esse solvendam. Si enim censum Dei filius solvit, quis tu tantus es qui non putes esse solvendum? It is a great and a spiritual doctrine that Christians be subject to the higher powers. For if Christ paid tribute, what art thou, how great, how mighty, that thou thinkest thou art not oblig'd?

RULE IX.

The laws of Tribute have the same conditions, causes, powers, and measures with other laws of Government.

THis Rule requires that * the authority be supreme, that the cause be just, that the end be publick, that the good be general, that the people receive advantage. Which is to be understood of tribute which is not penal, nor compensatory. For sometimes Tributes are impos'd upon a conquer'd people [a] as fetters upon a fugitive, to load him that he run away no more; or to make amends for the charges of a war. If they were in fault, they must bear the punishment; if they did the evil, they must suffer the evil; that at the charge of the conquer'd themselves also shall enjoy peace. So Petilius said to the Gaules, [b] Nos, quanquam toties lacessiti, jure victoriæ id solùm vobis addidimus quo pacem tueremur, You have provok'd us, and we have conquer'd you; and yet have onely impos'd the punishment of so much tribute on you, that at your charge we will keep the peace, So concerning the Greeks [c] Cicero affirms that they ought to pay some part of their fruits that at their own expences they be restrain'd from undoing themselves by Civil wars.

c Lib. 1. ad Quintum fratr. ep. 1.

2. But then this is at the mercy and good will of the Conquerour; for the tribute he imposes upon them as punishment, he is so the Lord of it, that however he dispose of it, it must be truly paid. And the same is the case of a tribute impos'd by way of fine upon a City or Society: the Supreme power is not bound to dispense that in publick uses; and if he does not, yet the Subject is not at liberty in his Conscience whether he will pay it or no. For in this case it is not a law of manners but of Empire; and is a private perquisite of the Prince, as the Prince himself can be a private person: which because it cannot be in any full sense or acceptation of a law, but in nature onely, so neither can the tribute be of so private emolument, but it will at least indirectly doe advantage to the Publick.

3. In other tributes, such which are legall, publick, and universall, the tribute must be proportion'd to the necessity and cause of it; it must be imployed in that end to which it was impos'd and paid, (for that is a part of commutative justice) it must be equally laid; that is, as far as it can be prudently done, supposing the unavoidable errors in publick affairs in which so many particulars are to be considered (for this is a part of distributive justice:) and where there is a defailance in these, I mean a constant and notorious, there the Conscience is disoblig'd (as far as the excess and injustice reaches) just as it is from the obedience to other laws that are unjust; of which I have given account, * in the third Rule of the first Chapter of this Book. But this I say is true in such tributes as are of publick and common use. For those which are for the expences and personall use of the Prince, if he spends them well or ill, the Subject is not concerned; but onely that he pay it according to the law and custome. In these the Supreme power is a Supreme Lord, in the other he is but a supreme Steward and Dispenser.

4. As the laws of tribute have their originall and their obligation, so they have their dissolution as other laws have, with this onely difference, that the laws of tribute, when the reason ceases, if they be continued by custome, are still obliging to the Subject, [d] it being reason enough that the Supreme power hath an advantage by it, which cannot be so personall but that it will, like the brightness of the Sun, reflect light and heat upon the Subject.

d Præterea cum pedagia, guidagia, salinaria tibi legatus interdixerit, authoritate Apostolicâ duximus declarandum, illa esse pedagia, salinaria, guidagia interdicta, quæ non apparent Imperatorum, vel Regum, vel Lateranensis Concilii largitione concessa, vel ex antiqua consuetudine à tempore cujus non extat memoria introducta. Innocent. 3. de verb. signif. c. super quibusdam, §. 1.

Lastly,

5. Laſtly, in the levying and impoſing tribute, by the voice of moſt men, thoſe things uſually are excepted which are ſpent in our perſonall neceſſities. Whatſoever is for negotiation may pay, but not what is to be eaten and drank. This tribute nevertheleſs is paid in Spain, for it is that which they call, Alcavala; and in Portugal, where it is called Siſa. I ſuppoſe it is the ſame with the Exciſe in England and the Low Countries; and yet is much ſpoken againſt for theſe reaſons, 1. Becauſe it is too great an indication or likeneſs to ſlavery, and an uningenuous ſubjection to pay tribute for our meat and drink and the neceſſaries of life; it is every day a compounding for our life, as if we were condemn'd perſons, and were to live at a price, or die with hunger, unleſs by our money we buy our reprieve. 2. The other reaſon of the complaint made againſt this, is becauſe by this means the poor and he that hath the greateſt charge of children, and he that is the moſt hoſpitable to ſtrangers and to the poor, ſhall pay the moſt, who yet of all men ought moſt to be eaſed. And upon theſe or the like reaſons the Civil Law impos'd Gabels onely upon Merchandiſes for trade and gain and pleaſure. And of this opinion are generally all the Canoniſts and moſt of the Civilians, and very many Divines: but when Scholars come to diſpute the intereſt of Princes and the meaſures of their gain or neceſſities, they ſpeak ſome things prettily, but to no great purpoſe. In theſe and all other Caſes of this nature, Kings and Princes will doe what they pleaſe; and it is fit they ſhould, let us talk what we will, alwaies provided, that they remember they are to anſwer to God for their whole Government, and how they ſhould be enabled to make this anſwer with joy, they are to conſult with the laws of God, and of the land, and with their Subjects learned in them both: and that, above all men, Princes conſider not alwaies what they may doe, but what is good; and very often, what is beſt. * This onely. Tribute upon meat and drink is not of it ſelf unjuſt; but it is commonly made ſo: for whether the tribute be paid onely by the Merchant, as in Caſtile and England, or by the Merchant and him that ſpends them for his need, and not for his gain, as in Portugal; yet ſtill the poor man is the moſt burden'd in ſuch caſes: for the Merchant will ſell the dearer, and then the evil falls upon the poor houſekeeper, contrary to the intention of all good Princes; which if they will take care to prevent, I know nothing to hinder them, but that by the ſame rules which they obſerve in making other laws they may take their liberty in this.

L. Univerſi. C. de vectig. & l. omnium. C. eod.

RULE X.

Tribute, and Cuſtomes which are due, are to be paid whether they be demanded or no.

1. THis is but the reſult of the former diſcourſes. For if a tribute be juſt, it is due debt, and to be paid as any other: and humane laws doe not onely make the paying tribute to be neceſſary in the vertue of obedience, for then unleſs the law expreſſed that it ought to be paid, though it be not particularly demanded, the ſubject not demanded were free; but the laws place this obedience in the form and matter of its proper kind of vertue, it is juſtice to pay it, and that muſt not be omitted at all; for our duty is not to depend upon the diligence of other men; and if the Miniſters of the Prince be negligent, yet we muſt not be unjuſt. This is true in Subjects and Natives; but ſtrangers are free, unleſs they be requir'd to pay: alwaies ſuppoſing, that they go in publick waies and with open addreſs. For it is preſumed that they are ignorant inculpably in the laws of the Countrey, and they are leſs oblig'd; but therefore theſe defects are to be ſupplied by the care of them that are intereſted. But if they know it already, they are oblig'd as the Natives according to the laws, and muſt not pretend ignorance, in fraud and coſenage.

2. But this alſo is to be underſtood of cuſtomes and tributes which are juſt. In which number thoſe which are of an immemorial time and long uſe ever are to be preſumed. Thoſe which are newly impos'd, may better be conſidered whether they be or no, becauſe they want that approbation which is given to the old. But whatſoever are unjuſt, doe not oblige to payment; and the Merchant may uſe all juſt waies of eſcape, and concealment. He may not lie, nor forſwear, nor deny them to be there when they are there, and he is ask'd; but he may hide them, or go into ſecret waies: and if he be diſcover'd, he muſt ſuffer as they pleaſe, but his conſcience is free.

3. He that paies not tribute upon pretence that it is unjuſt, that is, it is impos'd by an incompetent authority, or in an undue manner, or unjuſt meaſure, muſt be ſure that it is unjuſt, and not onely think ſo. For if he be deceiv'd, he does not erre with a good Conſcience, unleſs he uſe all the diligence and ingenuous inquiries that he can. His ignorance muſt not, and cannot innocently prejudice the Princes rights. If therefore he inquire well and wiſely, unleſs the injuſtice be very clear and certain, he will at moſt but doubt concerning it; and if he does, the ſurer way is to pay it: but if he does not doubt, but is fully perſuaded of the injuſtice, if he thinks true, he is innocent; but if he thinks amiſs, he is not onely guilty of a culpable ignorance, but of a criminall injuſtice.

4. If the Subject does doubt, the preſumption is for the advantage of the Prince, becauſe he is the better perſon, and publick, and he is rather to be ſecur'd then the private and the inferiour. And therefore I wonder at thoſe Lawyers and Divines that ſay otherwiſe, upon pretence that in dubiis melior eſt conditio poſſidentis, The poſſeſſor is to be preferr'd in doubtfull caſes. For ſuppoſing this, yet the Prince is in the poſſeſſion of law, and the Subject in poſſeſſion of fact: the Prince is in poſſeſſion of an actual right and law of demanding it, and therefore his condition is to be preferr'd. For in the practice of paying tribute, it is not ſufficient cauſe of omitting to pay it, that the Subject doubts whether it be, or is not ſure that it is juſt. For unleſs he be ſure it is unjuſt it is ſure that he is bound to pay. And therefore in this caſe, let no Merchant truſt his own judgment, but the ſentence of a wiſe ſpiritual Guide, or of Councel learned in the laws.

5. One thing onely I advertiſe in order to practice: let no man think that becauſe ſome ſubjects farm the Cuſtoms, and that the portion which is conceal'd does not leſſen the incomes of the Prince, therefore it may be lawfull to hide from them all which they can hide. For the Farmer hath what he gets in the right of the Prince, and in his own right he hath nothing from the Subject, but from his Supreme; who therefore is bound to defend defend that right, and to complain of that wrong: and the husbandmen in the Goſpel who denied to pay to the Stewards of the King the fruits of the vineyard which in their Kings right were demanded of them, were thrown into outer darkneſs.

6. But then, as S. John Baptiſt gave counſel, the Tribute-men and Farmers muſt exact no more then is appointed them; nor yet in cruell and vexatious manners, nor with the exacteſt and utmoſt meaſures, but with ſuch moderation as may be far from rapine. Tributorum & Fiſci nunquam mala cauſa niſi ſub bono principe, was an old ſaying, Whatſoever was demanded by the Tribute-Gatherers, it was all juſtice, whether it were right or wrong, unleſs the Prince were gentle and good. But the Vulture-like greedineſs and unconſcionable, unchriſtian and avaritious proceedings which are too frequent amongſt ſuch men, have made the name of Exactors and * Publicans ſo infinitely, ſo intolerably hatefull.

* Quid eſt publicanus? Nónne caput rapinæ, & lex violentiæ? Quid eſt publicanus? Prædo ſine pudore, medius exterminii. Nónne immanior furibus publicanus? Fur namque vel metuens furatur, hic autem delinquit confidenter. Fur laqueos tegit, timet, hic autem quicquid fecerit legem putat. Lex furem deterret ab illicitis, hic ad iniquum malitiæ ſuæ compendium legem trahit. Quis eo iniquior qui verbis juſtitiæ juſtitiam damnat, & armis innocentiæ ſpoliat, vulnerat, occidit Innocentes? lege utique legem pervertit, & dum urget ad legem, exlex eſt. Laurent. Epiſc. CHAP. III.

Of Kings, Princes, and all Supreme civil powers; and their Laws in ſpecial.

RULE I.

The Supreme power in every Republick is univerſal, abſolute, and unlimited.

1. THAT in every Common-wealth there is a Supreme power is without all queſtion: There is no government without ſuperiority; and where there is a Superior, there is a Supreme; for he is ſo that hath none above him. It matters not whether this Supreme power be ſubjected in one or many, whether it be parted or united: the conſideration of theſe is material as to the goodneſs or badneſs of a Government, but nothing to the power and abſoluteneſs of it, nothing to the preſent Rule. And therefore it is but a weak and uſeleſs diſtinction when we ſpeak of Kings and Princes, (by them meaning the Supreme Power) to ſay that ſome are abſolute, ſome are limited in their power. For it is true that ſome Princes are ſo; but then they are not the Supreme power. It is a contradiction to ſay that the Supreme power is limited, or reſtrain'd; for that which reſtrains it is Superior to it, and therefore the other is not Supreme. And therefore Albericus Gentilis ſaid well, That he doubted concerning the Kings of France and Spaine, whether they were Supreme Princes, becauſe in the affairs of Religion they are ſubject to the Pope. He that hath the Supreme power is onely under God; and to inquire concerning a King, whether he be tied to laws or conditions, is not properly an inquiry after his power, but after the exerciſe and diſpenſation of it. For though he may not alwaies uſe it, yet the Supreme power alwaies is abſolute and unlimited, and can doe what he pleaſe. The difference of a Tyrant and a King or a gentle Prince being onely this, that a Tyrant uſes his abſolute power unreaſonably and unjuſtly and ordinarily; but a King uſes it not but in caſes extraordinary, for juſt and good ends: and if the Prince does not, ſome elſe muſt, who in that caſe is the Supreme. Sometimes the Conſuls, ſometimes the Dictators, ſometimes the Senate did doe extraordinary acts of power; but ſtill they who did it had the Supreme power: and that is neceſſary, and inſeparable from Government, that, I mean, which is Supreme: ἄκρον ἐξουσίαν, κυρίαν ἀρχὴν, κύριον πολίτευμα, the Greeks call it; Majeſtatem, the Latins: and be it in whom, or in how many it happens, that power can doe every thing of Government, and diſpoſes of all things in order to it, and is accountable to no man. For ſuppoſe a King that hath power of the Militia, and his Senate of making laws, and his people by their Committees of raiſing money; this power of making war, and laws, and and levies is the Supreme power, and is that which can doe all things: and although one be accountable for moneys, & the other ſubject to laws, and two of them under the power of the ſword, yet this is but the Majeſty or Supremacy parted, and whether well or ill, I diſpute not, yet when it is parted and when it is united, it is ſupreme, and it is all. That Government which Ariſtotle calls Λακωνικὴ, δοκεῖ εἶδ) βασιλεία τῆς κατ' νόμον, σὐκ ἔστ ὃ κυρία πάντων, ſeems (ſaies he) to be a Kingdome but yet ſubject to laws, but is not the Miſtreſs of all; and this is true in many European Governments: but there is another government where the Governour is πάντων Κύριος εἷς ὢν, Lord of all, and but one perſon; that's the perfect Monarchy: which although it be incomparably the beſt, and like to that by which God governs the world, the firſt in the whole kind of Government, and therefore the meaſure of the reſt, yet that is no greater power then is in every kind of Government; for be it where it will, ſomewhere or other in all Government there muſt be a Supreme power, and that power is abſolute and unlimited. Now this being thus ſtated, the Rule is clear, and the Jews expreſt it by an odde device of theirs: for when their King died they tied his thumb ſo in the palm of his hand, that the wrinkles of the fiſt ſhould, in a manner that might be fancied, repreſent שדי which ſignifies Almighty; to denote that he was God's Vicegerent, and under him had the whole power of Government. He had had in his hand a power like to the power of God, but the other hand was open and had let it go.

2. Now that this is true is apparent by all the ſame reaſons by which the neceſſity of Government is proved. It is neceſſary that it ſhould be ſo; for there are ſome ſtates of things for which nothing can provide but this abſoluta poteſtas, Supreme and unlimited power; as at Rome when the Gauls had almoſt poſſeſſed themſelves of all, and in many caſes of their appointing Dictators, and in ſudden invaſions, and in the inundation of tumults, and in all caſes where laws are diſabled to ſpeak or act. Ne reſpublica aliquid detrimenti patiatur, That the publick ſhould by all means be preſerved, in the greateſt neceſſity they can have, and that is the great end of power; and either the Common-wealth is like a helpleſs Orphan expoſed to chance and violence, and left without guards, or elſe ſhe hath ſo much power as to uſe all means for her ſafety. If ſhe have not a right to doe all that ſhe naturally can, and is naturally neceſſary, ſhe is deficient in the great end of Government; and therefore it muſt be certain ſhe hath abſolute power: now whereever this is ſubjected, there it is habitually, there it is alwaies. I do not ſay it is alwaies there where it is ſometimes actually adminiſtred; but there it is habitually from whence it is concredited actually, and put into delegation and miniſtery: and this is the power that can doe all things of government; and becauſe it is ſupreme, and it is ſo alwaies, it cannot be at any time leſs in judgment, becauſe it is greater in power; that is, it is accountable to no man whatſoever it does.

Qui Rex eſt, Regem, Maxime, non habeat.

3. This Supreme power is commonly expreſſed by Poteſtas Regia, or Kingly Power, or power Imperial; though when the Emperour was Lord of the world, to be a King in moſt places went much leſs: but becauſe moſt Kings have been and are Supreme in their own Dominions, (and they alwaies are ſo, and are ſo acknowledged, to whom their ſubjects are bound bound by the oaths of allegeance, and ſupremacy) by this word we commonly mean the Supremacy or the Majeſty. So Suetonius ſpeaking of Caligula, ſaies he was very near ſpeciem Principatus in Regnum convertere, to change the Government into a Kingdome, that is, to make it abſolute and ſupreme: and this diſtinction Piſo us'd concerning Germanicus, Principis Romanorum, non Parthorum Regis eſſe filium, meaning that the Parthian Kings were abſolute, but the Roman Princes ruled with the Senate: and Cæſar tells that Vercingetorix was put to death becauſe he being but the Prince of the Gaules affected the Kingdome. Βασιλεὺς] αὐτοτελὴς ὄντως καὶ αὐτοκράτωρ, καὶ ἑαυτῷ καὶ τοῖς νόμων, πάντα τε εἶα βέλτιστα ποιῇ, καὶ πάντ' ὅσα ἂν μὴ βέλτιστα μὴ πράττῃ. So Dion deſcribed the power of a King, for that which they underſtood to be the Supreme power. Lib. 53.

Σύ τοι πόλις, σὺ δ' τὸ δήμιον,
Πρύτανις ἀκριβῶν ὤν,
Κραιπνὸς θωμὸν ἑσίαν χθονὸς
Μονοψήφοισι νώμασι σίδευ.

So the people in Æſchylus ſpake to their King, Thou art our City, our Commonwealth, above all Judicatories, thy Throne is ſacred and immur'd as an Altar, and by thy ſuffrage, by thy own Will thou governeſt all things. This is the Jus Regium, this the Supreme power can doe, it can be no leſs then this in its own nature and appointment. So the power is deſcribed by Theophilus, Πᾶς βασιλεὺς δέδωκε καὶ τῷ δήμῳ ἐξουσίαν, He hath given to the King all power over the people. So it is deſcribed by Livy, Reges non liberi ſolum impedimentis omnibus, ſed Domini rerum temporúmque, trahunt conſiliis cuncta, non ſequuntur, Kings are not only free from all lets and incumbrances, but are Lords of times and things, they by their counſels draw all things after them, but follow not. The Greeks call this Supremacy, δύναται ἀνυπεύθυνον ὄντα, a power to rule without danger of being call'd to account by men; S. Ambroſe calls it, Non ullis ad pœnam vocari legibus, tutos imperii poteſtate, a power that is ſafe in its own circles, and can by no laws be call'd to puniſhment: πρὼ πρώτην ἀρχὴν, that's Galens word, It is the chief or prime principality. In Arg. trag. ſupplic. Decad. 1. l. 9.

——Toto liber in orbe
Solus Cæſar erit——

The King alone is free; all others are under Compulſories and Judges. But S. Peters phraſe is better then all of them, ὑποτάσσεσθε τῷ βασιλεῖ ὡς ὑπερέχοντι. The King is the moſt eminent, the Defender of all, and above all; ὑπερέχει, ὑπερμαχεῖ, ὑπερασπίζει, ſaith Suidas. The King or the Supreme hath the power of defence, the power of the Sword, and that commands all the reſt: for ὑπερέχων ὑπερνικῶν, it ſignifies to be more then Conqueror. So the Grammarians.

4. But in order to Conſcience, Kings and Princes, I mean all Supreme powers, muſt diſtinguiſh poteſtatem Imperii ab officio Imperantis; that is to be conſidered by Subjects, and this by Princes. Supreme Princes alwaies have an abſolute power, but they may not alwaies uſe it. He that hath a Sword by him is not alwaies tied to uſe it, and he muſt cut his meat with a Knife. Κατὰ τάξιν τινὰ βασιλεία, ἡ δ' ἀόριστος τυραννίς, ſaies Ariſtotle; It is a Kingdome when it is by rule and meaſure, but if it be unlimited it is a Tyranny: that is, when affaires are capable of a law and order, the Supreme power muſt ſo conduct them, He muſt goe in that path where they ſtand; but if they grow wild and irregular irregular, he muſt goe out of his way to fetch them in again.

5. But then it is alſo to be conſidered that the abſolute power of the Prince is but an abſolute power of government, not of poſſeſſion; it is a power of doing right, but not a power of doing wrong: and at the worſt, is but a power of doing private violences for the ſecurity of the publick. This power is excellently expreſs'd in the Tables of the Royal law written to Veſpaſian; Uti quæcunque ex uſu reipublicæ Majeſtate Divinarum, Humanarum, publicarum, privatarúmque rerum eſſe cenſebit, ei agere, facere, jus poteſtáſque ſit, uti Auguſto fuit. Auguſtus Cæſar was the moſt abſolute Prince that ever rul'd the Roman people; to him was granted, ſaith Alciat, to be free from laws, and all the neceſſity of laws, to be obnoxious to no law written, and to have all the power of Kings: and yet all that power was but to doe every thing which he ſhould eſteem to be uſefull to the publick, and according to the Majeſty of religion and all humane rights publick and private. And therefore he is Princeps Regni, but not Dominus, a Prince, not a Lord; and the diſtinction is very material. For to be Lord, ſignifies more then the Supreme power of Government. Qui primi fuerunt Romæ Principes, etſi poterant videri reverâ Domini, vitabant tamen valdè Domini Nomen, veluti contumeliam ac maledictum: non vitaturi ſi eſſet Nomen ſolius honoris, aut moderatæ poteſtatis, ſaith Suetonius. The firſt Princes of Rome eſteemed it a diſgrace to be called Lords, becauſe it was not a name of meer honour, or of a moderate power; for if it had, they would not have declined it: but it means an abſolute power to diſpoſe of all lives and all poſſeſſions; which is beyond the power of the King or Prince. He that is a King rules over a free people, but a Lord rules over ſlaves. Tacitus, according to the popular humor of the Romans, ſuppoſed the power of a King to be too great a violation of liberty; but Domination or Lording it was intolerable. Principatus & libertas res ſunt diſſociabiles; magis tamen ſunt diſſociabiles libertas & dominatio; for to be the abſolute Lord cannot conſiſt either with freedome or propriety: and therefore Ovid prefers Auguſtus before Romulus in this very inſtance, for ſpeaking to Romulus of Auguſtus, he ſaies,

De Magiſtrat.

Auguſt. 53.

Tacit. in Agric.

Tu Domini nomen, Principis ille tenet.

Auguſtus is a Prince, a gentle Governour; Romulus was a Lord, that is, ſomething that no man loves, but every man ſerves and fears. This power is well expreſſed by S. Peters word of καλακωρεύειν, a power not miniſtring to good, nor conducted by moderation.

Maximum hoc regni bonum rati,
Quod facta Domini cogitur populus ſui
Tam ferre quam laudare———

When the people muſt ſuffer the will of their Imperious Lord and muſt commend it, that is, be a ſlave in their perſons and their labours, their poſſeſſions and their underſtandings: that is more then a Prince or a gentle Lord will doe; for then the word is good, when the Man is gentle, and the Power is moderate. But that which I intend to ſay is this, that the Supreme power of Government is at no hand a Supreme power, or an Arbitrary diſpoſer of life and fortunes; but according to law, or according to extreme neceſſity which is the greateſt law of all. In the ſenſe of Honour and of Moderate power the King is a Lord, but not in this ſenſe of law. Qui pleno jure Dominus eſt, alienandi, diſſipandi, diſperdendi jus habet, ſaith the law, l. 7. C. de relig. l. ſed etſi, lege 25. §. conſuluit, ff. de hæred. petit.

By a Lord is meant he that hath power to diſpoſe of the goods of the Vaſſals: and this a King or Prince hath not. This is not the Supreme power of Government. A King is not the Lord of his Kingdome, of the territories of his Subjects, quia dominium in ſolidum non poßit eſſe duorum, ſaith Cujacius, There cannot be two abſolute Lords of the ſame land; The right owner is the Lord, not the right King. Aliter reipublicæ ſunt agri, aliter privatorum. Num quid dubium eſt, quin ſervus cum peculio Domini ſit? dat tamen Domino ſuo munus. Non enim ideo nihil habet ſervus, quia nihil eſt habiturus, ſi Dominus illum habere noluerit, ſaid one; The ſervant is within his Lords peculiar, but yet he can make a preſent to his Lord. If his Lord pleaſe, the ſervant ſhall have nothing; but yet it follows not, that therefore he is poſſeſs'd of nothing. Now if this be true in Slaves, much more infinitely more is it in free Subjects; for otherwiſe are my lands my own, otherwiſe they are the Princes. Jure civili omnia Regis ſunt, (ſaith Seneca;) & tamen illa quorum ad Regem pertinet univerſa poſſeßio, in ſingulos Dominos deſcripta ſunt, By the law all things are the King's; but even thoſe things are divided into peculiars, and have private Lords. It is all the Princes lands, and he receives the tribute, and he receives the ſervice and the duty of them all; but the Lords receive the rents. The Athenians and the Thebans fight concerning the bounds of their territory; & at the ſame time Polyænus & Thyſias are at law about dividing their ſhepherds walks in the ſame place. Sub optimo Rege, omnia Rex Imperio poßidet, ſinguli dominio, The King governs all, but the Subjects poſſeſs all their own: for ſo Livy might buy his own Books of Dorus; they were Dorus his Books, and Livy's too: and when a Lord receives his rent, the Tenant may call the lands his own. Some things are mine by poſſeſſion, ſome by uſe; ſome by title, ſome by incumbency; one is the Author, and another is the Buyer; one is an Artificer, and another the Merchant of the ſame thing; and the King hath the power, but his Subjects have the propriety. Cæſar omnia habet; fiſcus ejus privata tantum ac ſua: & univerſa in Imperio ejus ſunt, in patrimonio propria. That's the ſum of this inquiry. The King hath all, and yet he hath ſomething of his own in his peculiar, and ſo have the Subjects.

Lib. 7. De benef. cap. 4.

Cap. 6.

6. The effect of this conſideration is this; That the Supreme power muſt defend every mans right, but muſt uſurp no mans. He may uſe every mans peculiar for the publick neceſſity, and in juſt and neceſſary Government, but no otherwiſe; and what is out of any peculiar expended for the publick defence, muſt out of the general right be repaied for the private amends. Verum etſi noſtra tempore neceſſitatis patriæ conferre debemus, tamen jure naturæ congruit ut communis ſalus, communis utilitas, commune periculum, non unius duntaxat aut alterius, ſed communibus impenſis, jacturis, periculiſque comparetur, ſaid Cicero. A King is to govern all things; but to poſſeſs nothing but what is his own. Only concerning the neceſſity, if the queſtion be, who ſhall be Judge; it is certain that it ought to be ſo notorious that every man might judge; but he who is to provide againſt it, is certainly the only competent perſon, and hath the authority. For he that is to ſtand againſt the ſudden need, ought to eſpy it. But if ever there be a diſpute who ſhall judge of the Neceſſity, it is certain, the Neceſſity is not extreme; and if it be not, yet it ought to be provided againſt when it is intolerable. Ahab had no right to take Naboths Vineyard; but if the Syrian army had invaded Iſrael, Ahab might have

4. ad Herennium.

put a Garriſon in it, or deſtroyed the Vines, to have ſav'd or ſerv'd his Army.

7. And to this ſenſe Lyra expounds the Jus Regium, the right of the King, deſcrib'd by Samuel to the People of Iſrael: for (ſaith he) there is a double right; the one in the dayes of neceſſity, and then all things are in his power ſo far as can truly ſerve that publick neceſſity: but when that neceſſity is over, that right is uſeleſs, and is intolerable. And by this means the different opinions of the Jewiſh Doctors may be reconcil'd. Rabbi Joſe ſayes, that whatſoever is here ſet down, it was lawfull for the King to doe. R. Juda ſayes, that this deſcription was only to affright the People from perſiſting in their deſire of a King. Both might ſay true; for that it was not lawfull in ordinary Government to take the peculiar of the Subject, appears clearly in the caſe of Naboth. But that in extraordinary it is juſt, needs no other argument but becauſe it is neceſſary: and it appears alſo in the caſe of David and Nabal, upon whom David would have done violence, becauſe he ſent him not Proviſions for his Army out of his own peculiar. But it is conſiderable, that this Royal power deſcrib'd by Samuel is no more then what is neceſſary to be habitually inherent in all Supreme powers; this is poteſtas imperantis; he may licitè facere in tempore neceſſitatis, legitimè ſemper, In time of need he may uſe it lawfully, but alwayes legitimately, that is, if he does, he onely abuſes his power, but it is his own power which he abuſes: for when Moſes deſcrib'd the uſage and manner of a King, he did it by the meaſures of peace and piety, and the laws of natural juſtice and equity, with the ſuperfetation of ſome poſitive conſtitutions which God commanded for that King, as part of the Judicial Law. But when Samuel deſcrib'd the manner of their King, he deſcrib'd the whole power in ordinary and extraordinary; the power, I ſay, but not the office: Moſes deſcrib'd the office, but not the power.

Deuter. 17.

8. I adde to this another conſideration; That whether all that the Hebrew King did or might doe was warranted by God or no, it matters not to us. For if it be no more then the neceſſary requiſites of Supreme power to be us'd in time onely of neceſſity, we need not fear that this precedent can injure the rights of any People: but if there were in it ſomething more then was good, it was certainly a peculiar of that People, who deſir'd a King to rule over them as the neighbour Nations had; right or wrong they ſtood not upon that; and therefore Samuel deſcrib'd to them what that was which they requir'd. It was no warranty to the King to doe ſo, but to the People to ſuffer it: but if it was ill, it was their own deſire; for ſo the neighbour Kings did govern, uſing too much of their power, and too little of their duty and office. And therefore God was angry with his People, not that they deſir'd a King; for God gave them three things in charge, ſay the Rabbins, which they ſhould doe when they came into the Land of Promiſe, That they ſhould blot out the name of Amalek, that they ſhould chuſe a King, that they ſhould build a Temple. Therefore the chuſing of a King was not it that offended God, but that they ſhould deſire that a King ſhould reign over them in the manner as the Gentiles had: For they thought (ſaith Joſephus) ὐδὲν ἄτοπον εἶ) τὴν πλησιοχώρων βασιλευομένων τ αὐτοῖς ἔχειν αὐτὸς πολιτείαν, that all would be well if they had the ſame form of Government as the Nations had. Now their neighbour Nations were govern'd the moſt tyrannically, and the People ſerv'd the moſt ſlavishly in the whole World.

——— dociles ſervire Sabæos,

The Sabeans (ſayes Claudian) were apt to ſerve: dociles herilem ferre manum Syros & Parthos, & omnes qui aut ad Orientem aut ad Meridiem ſunt barbaros, ſaid Julian, All the Syrians and Parthians, and all the Nations of the East and South, were us'd to ſlavery; contentos ſub Regibus vivere Dominos imitantibus, their Kings were abſolute Lords of poſſeſſions as well as of tribute and government; and the People were pleas'd to have it ſo: and the Iſraelites would follow their example. Ecce in hoc errarunt (ſayes a Jewiſh Doctor) quod Iſraelitarum conditio non eſt, ut judicet eos Rex aliquis pro ſua voluntate, ut Imperatores Gentilium, qui ſanciunt populis ſuis leges, quaſcunque animis concipiunt. Their errour was in deſiring ſuch a King as the Gentiles had; for their condition would not ſuffer it that their King ſhould make laws according to his own will and humour, as did their neighbour Kings, who were proud and barbarous, and counted eaſineſs of acceſs a leſſening of Majeſtie, and would be bound by no meaſures but their own will: and therefore ſaid God to Samuel, They have not rejected thee, but me; that is, they would have a King, not ſuch as I have commanded in my law, but ſuch as they ſee among their Neighbours, who make laws themſelves without me. And therefore although God commanded Samuel to hearken to them, and make them a King; yet by terrours, like thoſe on Mount Sinai, he firſt made them confeſs their fault, and therefore to ſubmit to a King of God's chuſing, who ſhould reign by God's law.

Contr. Chriſtian.

9. So that it is to no purpoſe that this place hath been ſo tortur'd by Interpreters, and pull'd in pieces by diſputation; while they contend on one ſide, that this was a deſcription of the King's power, on the other, that it was a prediction of matter of fact: for it was neither one nor the other alone, but a deſcription of the manner of the Heathen Kings; and a repreſentment of what it was which they ask'd, and what was like to be the effect of that power which they deſir'd God would ſet over them: but the queſtion of the extent and liberties of the Supreme power is no way concerned in it. For it matters not what the Eaſtern and Southern Kings did; for they did that in ordinary, which is not to be done but in caſes extraordinary; they did that for pleaſure, which was not to be done but for neceſſity. But as to the thing it ſelf; Nothing can be more certain, but that 1. In all Republicks, ſomewhere or other, there is a Supreme power. 2. That this power can doe all things of Government; ſo that nothing is ſo great, but if it be neceſſary, it is juſt, and can be done: for if there were any time, and any caſe in which evil may happen, and no proviſions may be made for it, in that caſe, and at that time it is an Anarchy, there is no Government at all. 3. That this Supreme power, being a power of Government, muſt alſo be a Conſervator and great Miniſter of Juſtice; and therefore muſt ſuppoſe every man's right to be diſtinct, and ſeparate, and firm: and by conſequence, that he hath nothing to doe with mens propriety, but to defend them in peace, and uſe them in war ſo as is neceſſary, that is, ſo as is unavoidable; according to that ſaying of Maimonides, Poteſtatem habet Rex ordinandi mundum juxta id quod præſens hora poſtulat. There are ſome ſudden accidents againſt which there are no regular proviſions in laws; but to provide for them at the inſtant by extraregular means, means, is within the power of the ſupreme. But in all this whole queſtion the ſaying of Baldus is the beſt meaſure of the conſciences of Princes: Clauſula de plenitudine poteſtatis ſemper intelligitur de poteſtate bona & laudabili, The plenitude of power of all things in the world ought the leaſt to be fear'd, becauſe it never is to be us'd but for the greateſt good. 1 Conſil. 245.

Upon the occaſion of this diſcourſe the Lawyers ſometimes diſpute,

10. Whether it be lawful, and in the power of the Supreme Prince or Magiſtrate, to aliene or leſſen his princely rights, or to give away any parts of his Kingdome.

11. But to this the anſwer is eaſy. For 1. whatſoever is their right by juſt conqueſt, or is ὲν μέρει κλήσεως ἰδίας, in their private poſſeſſion, they may aliene as any private perſon may his lands. Thus Solomon gave the חבל twenty cities (which his Father in law the King of Egypt had conquer'd and given him with his wife in dowry, and which himſelf had won) to Hiram. Alexander gave all his Kingdomes to his Princes that ſerv'd him in his warrs. Attalus gave Aſia to the people of Rome; Nicomedes gave Bithynia: the Father of Mithridates had Paphlagonia by gift: & in England it was ſaid that Edward the Confeſſor gave England by Will to the baſtard of Normandie: and divers of our Kings did in their Wills at leaſt recommend a ſucceſſor; Edward the ſixth did, but it came to nothing. But when the Donor or the Donee reſpectively can make it good, then it holds in law, and not otherwiſe; for queſtions of this nature us'd to be determin'd by the ſword, and not by diſcourſes.

12. 2. But yet this is certain, that where the Princes are truſtees of the people, and elective, or where the right of ſucceſſion is in a family by law or immemorial time, no Prince can prejudice his Heir, or the people that truſted him. Nothing is here to be done without conſent, not onely becauſe the alienation cannot be verified againſt conſent [in which caſe Charles the ſixth of France deſir'd his will might be confirm'd by the Nobles; and the King of Macedonia went up and down to all the cities to recommend to them Antigonus whom he deſir'd to make a king:] but becauſe in theſe caſes, though Kings have the ſupreme power, yet they have it not pleno jure, by a fulneſs of dominion. It may be as Ariſtotle calls it παμβασιλεία, παγκελὴς, αὐτοκράτης καὶ ἀνυπόδυτος βασιλεία, a full, ſupreme, abſolute and intire principality; yet by not being in full and intire private poſſeſſion it is by all rights to be adminiſtred, but without wrong cannot be alien'd. Hottoman will by no means admit that in any caſe a Kingdome can be alien'd: becauſe it is the caſe of perſons as well as of things; and they cannot be diſpos'd of like ſlaves or beaſts. But he conſider'd not that ſubjection to Princes can beſt ſtand with perſonal liberty; and this cannot well be ſecur'd without that: for where there is no civil government, every man that is ſtronger can make me a ſlave; but by the power of a Prince I am defended in my liberty: and Hottomans objection muſt needs be invalid, unleſs there be no liberty but where there is no government. Illuſt. Quæſt. 1.

Rule II.

The Supreme power is ſuperior to the Civil laws, but not wholly free from them.

1. THis Rule hath been thruſt into great difficulty by the intereſts and miſtakes of Princes and Subjects reſpectively. For it hath been diſputed whether Princes be free or no from the laws of their kingdome; and things of this nature when they once are queſtion'd, are held more pertinaciouſly, and deſir'd more greedily, and poſſeſs'd ſuſpiciouſly, and conducted with jealouſy, and look'd upon with envy or indignation. For the Prince, if it be but diſputable, will yet conclude for his own intereſt; and it is argument enough for him that it is ſo, becauſe it is not certain that it is not ſo. And the ſubjects will upon the ſame account ſuppoſe the Prince bound to his laws, becauſe they know nothing to the contrary; and therefore they preſume for the authority of the laws, as the Prince does for the immunity of his perſon. But then becauſe it is queſtion'd, the Prince, leſt he looſe it quite, will hold the faſter; and the people will ſnatch at it more impotently, leſt they be ſlaves for ever. And therefore diſputations in this caſe are not prudent or ſafe; but precepts, and ſermons, and great examples, and the ſayings of wiſe men, and poſitive affirmations in thoſe particulars that be manifeſt.

2. Princeps legibus ſolutus eſt, ſaid Juſtinian, The Prince is not tied to laws: for it ſeems impoſſible that he that hath power over the law, he that gave it being, and can give it a grave, ſhould be leſs then that which hath no greatneſs but what it borrows from him. Indeed if the Prince had deveſted himſelf of his power when he made the law, he had been ſubject to it; but then he could have no power to abrogate it: which becauſe it is inſeparable from the legiſlative power, it follows that the life of the law is in continual dependance from, and therefore in minority and under him; and therefore the lawyers have a proverbial verſe,

For a law without a compulſory power is nothing but good counſel at the beſt; and the ſupreme power cannot be compell'd: for he will not compel himſelf, he cannot; he may be willing, but he can never force himſelf; and to the ſupreme no man is ſuperior, and therefore none elſe can compel him: therefore the Divines uſe to ſay, and ſo doe the Lawyers too, that Kings are ſubject to the directive power of the laws. The diſtinction I acknowledge, but believe it here to be to no purpoſe: for laws have no ſuch power, and a directive power is no power; for if it can onely direct, it is not a law, for a law obliges, and does not onely direct: and as for the meer matter of counſel, the Prince need not be at the charge of a law for that, his Counſellors, his Biſhops, his Lawyers, his friends can doe that without a law. The ſame thing is uſually ſaid concerning juſt men. Juſtis lex non eſt poſita, ſaith the Apoſtle, The law is not made for the righteous, but for the wicked: that is, the compulſory of laws is not at all deſigned for them that obey without compulſion. Not but that the juſt are under the power of laws, and the laws were made to command them the particulars and the inſtances of obedience; and if they prevaricate, they ſhall feel feel it. But they are ſo willing to obey, and ſo love government and the vertues commanded by the laws, that the laws are of no uſe to good and juſt men, but to direct them to what is requir'd of them; and ſo they are under that which is improperly call'd the Directive power of laws; but Princes are not ſo. The Supreme power may if he will obey; ſo may the juſt man: but this man muſt obey or he ſhall be puniſhed, but not ſo the Prince. The laws of themſelves may direct the Prince; but it is becauſe he will have it ſo: but they direct the juſt, becauſe they have authority to command, and to puniſh, onely that the juſt will not let it come ſo far. It is but a ſhadow of liberty to ſay I am not under the compulſion, but the direction of laws: for ſuch perſons if they will not be directed ſhall be compell'd, and it is better to be willing then unwilling; for call it what you will, you are commanded to doe it, and you muſt obey. Now this being the caſe of the juſt ſubject, and not the caſe of the Supreme power, whether juſt or unjuſt, it is clear that the Prince or ſupreme power is not ſubject to any power of the laws; the law is no Commandement to the Prince, and whatſoever is nothing but counſel, is no law.

3. And yet on the other ſide we find good Princes ſaying otherwiſe; and they who are apt enough to advance their own power, yet confeſſing their power to be leſs then the law, that is, that themſelves are bound to keep it: ſo ſaid the Emperour, C. de legib. & conſtit. l. 4. Digna vox eſt Majeſtatis regnantis, legibus alligatum ſe Principem profiteri, It is a voice worthy of the Majeſty of a Prince, to profeſs himſelf tied to his laws. Patere legem quam tu ipſe tuleris, ſaid the wiſe man; Suffer the law which thou thy ſelf haſt made: the ſame with that of Pittacus, Pareto legi quiſquis legem ſanxeris.

And the equity of this, beſides that it is apparent, is alſo given in the law, l. 1. ff. de pactis. Nihil tam humanæ fidei conſentaneum eſt, quam ea quæ placuerunt ſervari. If they have pleas'd the Prince in the ſanction, let them alſo pleaſe him in the obſervation, for that's agreeable to the faith and ingenuity of worthy perſons.

4. Theſe things are but ſeemingly oppos'd, for both parts are true, and are to be reconcil'd by the following meaſures.

5. 1. The Supreme power is not under the fear of the laws, but is to love the vertue and order that is there commanded. For there is a neceſſity introduc'd by publick honeſty as well as by fear. And therefore the Greek Lawyers in their Commentaries upon that of the Inſtitutions, that the Prince is free from laws, expound it to be meant of penal laws; that is, they cannot be puniſh'd for prevaricating, or for not keeping them: and Decianus ſaid the ſame thing, Non quia iniqua liceant, ſed quod non timore pœnæ, ſed amore juſtitiæ: It is no more lawful for Princes to doe unjuſt things, then for their ſubjects; but they are invited to doe worthy things, not becauſe they are to fear the puniſhment of laws, but becauſe they muſt love juſtice; and there is that neceſſity for them to doe ſo, that there is of being great and honour'd. The laws of honeſty, of fame and reputation, which amongſt all good men are the guards of vertue, muſt endear it alſo to Kings: ſo Claudian to Theodoſius,

Tu licet extremos late dominere per Indos,
Te Medus, te mollis Arabs, te Ceres adorent;

Si metuis, ſi prava cupis, ſi duceris irâ,
Servitii patière jugum, tolerabis iniquas
Interius leges: tunc omnia jure tenebis
Cum poteris Rex eſſe tui: proclivior uſus
In pejora datur, ſuadetque licentia luxum,
Illecebriſque effræna favet: tunc vivere caſtè
Aſperius, cum prompta Venus; tunc durius iræ
Conſulimus, cum pœna patet: ſed comprime mentem,
Nec tibi quod liceat, ſed quod feciſſe decebit,
Occurrat, mentemque domet reſpectus honeſti.

A King is not to conſider the greatneſs of his power, but of his duty; and not reckon upon his impunity, but his reputation *; and becauſe he does not fear the publick rods and axes, let him reſpect publick honeſty: ſo Accurſius affirms, Principem, etſi legibus ſolutus ſit, honeſtatis tamen neceſſitate omnino teneri oportere: and this is the ſentence of Decius and moſt Lawyers. But Honeſtas non videtur inferre neceſſitatem, ſay the Lawyers. This does not make it ſimply neceſſary; but it perſwades vehemently, and upon Princes whoſe honour is both conſcience and intereſt too, it differs but little from it. For it makes that they ought to doe what is fit. But in Kings it is true what Muſcornus Cyprius ſaies, Verbum illud [debet] non coactionem, ſed rationalem quandam perſuaſionem denotare videtur. It is their duty, and they ought to doe it; and that ſignifies every thing but compulſion. However a Prince is onely free from one compulſory which is upon his ſubjects: but is under many which touch not them. God enjoyns him a greater duty, and exacts it with greater ſeverity, and will puniſh their delinquencies more ſharply: potentes potenter, ſaith the Wiſdome of Solomon, mighty men ſhall be mightily tormented; and Tophet is prepared for the King. * Kings have a greater need in their affairs then the ſmall fortunes of their ſubjects; and therefore have need of a greater piety to ſecure ſo great a providence. They have more to looſe, and therefore need a bigger caution to ſecure it; they have more at ſtake to endear obedience: and ſince a King is but one perſon, and is ſtrong onely by the obedience of his ſubjects, and that obedience is ſecur'd onely by love, and that love can no way be obtain'd but by beneficence and juſtice; if he breaks theſe ſecurities, he may have cauſe to conſider that of Tacitus, Princeps unus eſt civium & ſenatus conſenſui impar, that one man againſt a multitude is nothing; and that the Senate and the people are ſtronger, and need not fear him alone, but he alone may have cauſe to fear all them together *; and that the ſins of a Prince are often puniſhed by the ſins of the people. He can conſider that he is to govern a multitude whom nothing can unite but an Almighty power; that they are as contingent in their love and hatred, as chance it ſelf; that no fortune in a King is moderate; that when it declines it oftentimes runs to extremity; that he ſeldome hears truth, never meets with a bold and a wiſe reprover; that he hath many flatterers, and but few friends; that he hath great powers of doing evil, and temptations and opportunities alwaies ready; that his very being ſuperiour to laws leaves his Spirit infinitely unguarded and ſpoil'd of one of the greateſt ſecurities of vertue; that impunity is a ſtate of danger; that when vertue is left onely under a Counſel and cold recommendation, and is not made neceſſary by laws, he had need have a great and a mighty vertue to make it neceſſary by love and choice; and that ſuch perfect vertues are but rarely obtain'd, and after a long practice; that fear is the beginning of wiſdome;

and therefore Princes are very much to ſeek in this particular, becauſe they have nothing to begin with; and to chuſe vertue for love is not uſual with beginners, but is the conſummation of the moſt perfect: ſo that we may well pray, God help poor Kings, who if they doe vertuouſly muſt needs be infinitely dear to God, becauſe it is ſo extremely difficult to be ſo, and nothing can make them ſo but two conjugations of miracles; the excellencies of the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of a King. So that it is no priviledge to Kings that they are above the power of their laws; it is their objection, and the evil of their ſtate. Only it is neceſſary to others that theſe ſhould dwell in danger: and as for their obedience to laws, it is not bound upon them by the ſame cord that ties the Subject, but by another; it is not neceſſary for the ſame reaſons, but it is by a greater neceſſity.

6. 2. But then theſe ſupreme Compulſories being wholly conducted by the hand and providence of God, doe plainly tell us that the ſupreme Power is obliged to all the laws of God, to the laws of Nature and Chriſtianity. A King hath no power to govern but according to Gods laws. For if he does, though he have no Compulſorie below, yet above there are enough, and to Gods laws the greateſt Power on Earth is intirely ſubordinate. Ὁ νόμος πάντων βασιλεὺς θνητῶν τε καὶ ἀθανάτων, ὡς φησι Πίνδαρος, The Law is the ſupreme King of all, ſaid Pindar. The ſame is alſo ſaid by Chryſippus, by Ariſtotle, and divers others: and Plato affirms that deſtruction is imminent upon that City where the Magiſtrate governs the law, and not the law the Magiſtrate: and again, Ἄνομος μοναρχία χαλεπὴ καὶ βαρύτατη ξυνοικῆσαι, The Prince that rules not by laws is nothing but a grievance to his Subjects. But that theſe great Perſons mean the laws of God and Nature is explicitly plain in Plutarch, who having affirmed that the law muſt rule the Prince, adds by way of explanation, that it be that law, οὐκ ἐν βιβλίοις ἔξω γεγραμμένος, ἐπὶ δέ πασι ξύλοις, ἀλλὰ ἔμψυχος ὢν ἑαυτῷ λογος, αἰεὶ συνοικῶν καὶ συμφυλάττων, καὶ μηδέποτε τὴν ψυχὴν ἐῶν ἔρημον κηδεμονίας, not which is written in books or tables, but the law of reaſon that alwaies dwells within; that law that alwaies is his guard, and never ſuffers the ſoul to be without a guide, that is the law that is ſuperior to Princes. Some little inſtances of particulars of this law were decreed by Servius Tullus King of the Romans; of which Tacitus ſaies, præcipuus Servius Tullus ſanctor legum fuit, queis etiam Reges obtemperarent; he made laws of that Nature that even Kings themſelves ſhould obey them. For as

Regum timendorum in proprios greges,

So it is as true,

Reges in ipſos imperium eſt Jovis;

As the people are Subjects of the Prince, ſo is the Prince of God; they muſt obey their King, and their King muſt obey God: Concerning whoſe Law it was ſaid to Domitian by Apollonius Tyanæus, Hæc mihi dicta ſint de legibus, quas ſi tibi imperare non putaveris, ipſe non imperabis, If thou doeſt not think theſe laws ought to rule over thee, thou ſhalt not rule at all.

Lib. 4. de leg.

Apud Philoſtratum.

7. Upon this account a Prince may not command his Subjects to fight in an unjuſt cauſe, according to that ſaying of S. Hierom, Cum Dominus carnis à Domino Spiritûs adverſum imperat, non eſt obediendum; We muſt not obey the Rulers of this world, the Lords of our fleſh, when they command any thing contrary to the laws of the God and Lord of all Spirits.

In Eph. 6.

The

The commands of Princes muſt be, as Tertullian ſaies, intra limites diſciplinæ, within the bounds of our religion; and therefore the Athenians laugh'd at Stratocles for deſiring them to make a law that whatſoever pleas'd King Demetrius ſhould be the meaſure of piety to the Gods, and of juſtice amongſt Men. Gods law is the meaſure of the Princes power; not his will the meaſure of that: and therefore the Jews that were Souldiers under Alexander could by no tortures be compell'd to aſſiſt in the building of the temple of Belus in Babylon; and the Thebæan legion under Julian the Apoſtate refuſed not to fight for their Prince againſt the Barbarians, and they refuſed not to die, but they refuſed to be executioners of the Martyrs that died in the cauſe of Chriſtianity.

8. But this is to be practiſed that the Princes juſt laws be not neglected upon the arreſt of every fancy or fooliſh opinion. If it be certain that it is againſt the law of God, then we are ſafe in our diſobedience. Idcirco Romanas leges contemnimus, ut juſſa Divina ſervemus, ſaid Sylvanus the Martyr, Becauſe we are ſure theſe Roman laws are againſt the Commandements of God, we eaſily deſpiſe them. But if we be not ſure, but are in doubt whether the laws be juſt or no, we are to preſume for the laws, and againſt our own fears. For nothing is at all of advantage due to the laws, if we preferre before them any opinion of our own which we confeſs uncertain; and although we are not to doe any thing of which we doubt, yet in a doubt we are to obey laws, becauſe there is a doubt on both ſides: and as we fear the thing is unjuſt, ſo we have reaſon to fear the evil of diſobedience, for we are ſure that is evil; and therefore we are to change the ſpeculative doubt into an active judgment, and a practical reſolution, and of two doubts take the ſurer part, and that is to obey; becauſe in ſuch caſes the evil, if there be any, is to be imputed to him that commands, not to him that obeys, who is not the Judge of his Prince, but his Servant. Servus herilis imperii non Cenſor eſt, ſed Miniſter, ſaid Seneca. They that are under authority are to obey, not to diſpute. But of this I have given an account already in the firſt Book, Chap. 5. Rule 6.

In Martyrol. Rom.

9. 3. But then concerning the civil laws of his Country we are to diſtinguiſh; for ſome concern the People only, and ſome concern the Prince only, and ſome are common to both. Thoſe that concern the People are ſuch as require tribute, and labours, and manners of trade, their habits and dwelling. In theſe and all ſuch the people are obliged and not the Prince: for the duties are either relative and concern their part only of the relation; or elſe by the nature of the things themſelves doe point out their duty, & in theſe things there is no queſtion. For not the King but the people are to pay tribute, & the Kings lands are free, if they be in his own poſſeſſion.

10. 4. But there are ſome laws which concern the Prince alone, as all acts of grace, and eaſe to the people; all that he hath been pleaſed to promiſe, the forms and laws of Government, and to whatſoever himſelf hath conſented, by all thoſe laws he is bound; becauſe in ſuch caſes as theſe it is true what Pliny ſaid to Trajan in his Panegyric, In noſtris, ſimili religione, ipſe te legibus ſubjeciſti, Cæſar, quas nemo Principi ſcripſit; ſed tu nihil amplius vis tibi licere quam nobis. The Prince had not a law impoſed upon him, but he became a law unto himſelf; and when he hath bound himſelf there is the ſame neceſſity upon him as upon his Subjects.

5. Other

11. 5. Other laws yet doe concern both Prince and people; ſuch as are all contracts and bargains. Licet ſerviant ædes meæ, ei tamen cum quo agitur non ſerviunt, quantum enim ad eum pertinet, liberas ædes habeo. l. 4. Si ſerv. vind. Although my houſe is bound to ſerve the publick neceſsity, yet in reſpect of him that contracts with me, my houſe is free. So alſo it is in the acquiſition of new rights, the repetition of the old, and generally in all thoſe things that are eſtabliſhed by the law of Nature, or doe concern him perſonally, and not in the capacity of a King. Thus ſaith the law, In imperfecto teſtamento nec Imperatorem hæreditatem vendicare poſſe ſæpe conſtitutum eſt, The Prince cannot be heir if the teſtament of the dead man be illegal. Sometimes and in ſome places, it may be, fewer witneſſes will ſerve in the Princes caſe then in another mans, but then it is becauſe fewer in his caſe are required by law; but ſtill the law is his meaſure as well as of his Subjects.

l. 3. C. de teſta. l. 6. C. qui teſt. fac. po.

12. 6. The great laws of the Kingdome doe oblige all Princes, though they be ſupreme. Such were thoſe which were called the laws of the Medes and Perſians; whoſe Princes, although they were the moſt abſolute and ſupreme, yet they were inferiour to thoſe laws, as appears in the Book of Daniel. Theſe are by way of eminence call'd Leges Regni, the Kingdomes laws. Such are the Golden Bull of the Empire; the law Salic and the Pragmatical Sanction in France; the Magna Charta and the Petition of Right in England; and in other Countryes the like, as who pleaſe may particularly for Spain ſee in Mariana. This is confeſs'd by all, and it relies upon natural juſtice, the Prince having conſented to it; it is either ſponſio Principis, or conditio regnandi; he was admitted either upon that condition, or with it.

13. 7. Whatſoever the Prince hath ſworn to, to all that he is oblig'd not onely as a ſingle Perſon, but as King: for though he be above the laws, yet he is not above himſelf, nor above his oath, becauſe he is under God; and he cannot diſpenſe with his oath or promiſe in thoſe circumſtances and caſes in which he is bound. And therefore although the Prince is above the laws, that is, in caſes extraordinary and priviledg'd caſes, and the matter of penalties; yet he is ſo under all the laws of the Kingdome to which he hath ſworn, that although he cannot be puniſh'd by them, yet he ſins if he breaks them. Not that the law does binde him, for it cannot binde without a compulſory; and againſt him the law hath no ſuch power: but yet he is bound to the law, though not by it; the obligation comes not from the law, but from other cauſes, from his promiſe, his oath, his contract, his religion, his reputation, his fear, his hopes, his intereſt, and eſpecially from God himſelf. For it is carefully to be obſerved in this particular, that though a promiſe gives a man right to the thing which is promiſed, it does not alwayes give him a right over the perſon. A King is like him that promiſes a thing under a curſe; if he fails, the injur'd perſon is not to curſe him, or to inflict the curſe upon him, but that is to be permitted to God alone. And therefore if a King ſwears to his People to make no law without their conſent, he is bound to perform his word; but if he does not, God, and not they are to puniſh the perjury. The King's promiſe, or ceſſion, or acts of grace doe never leſſen or part his power, but they tie his perſon. An Act of Parliament in England, if it be made with a clauſe of perpetuity, that if an act ſhould be made to reſcind it it ſhould be void, that firſt Act of it ſelf is invalid. Clauſula deroganti ſi derogetur, valet valet ut poſterius teſtamentum, ita poſterior conſtitutio, ſay the Lawyers. Concerning which Cicero hath written an excellent epiſtle to Atticus, lib. 3. epiſt. ad Attic. epiſt. 24. It is as if a man ſhould make a Will to annull all future Wils of his own; it ſhews indeed that he had then a mind to have that to be his ſtanding will: but how if his mind change? Conſtantine made a law, that Widows and Orphans ſhould not be cited to the Emperour's Court for judgement, or compelled to come, though he himſelf ſhould command them: but yet if he did command them, that firſt reſcript ſtood for nothing. Antiochus the third commanded the Magiſtrates not to obey him if he commanded any thing againſt the laws: but if he ſhould command any ſuch thing, it were not ſafe for them to urge himſelf againſt himſelf. The Roman Emperour bade his Officer uſe his Sword againſt him if he broke the laws: but this gave him no power over his Prince in caſe he had gone againſt the laws; it is nothing but a confident promiſe, and an obligation of his honour and his conſcience, of which God alone is the Superiour and the Guardian.

14. The cuſtome of ſupreme Princes ſwearing to govern by laws was very antient: we finde an example of it amongſt the Gothiſh Kings in Caſſiodore; amongſt the late Greek Emperours in Zonaras and Cedrenus. Anaſtaſius the Emperour ſware to obſerve the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon; Adrian the Emperour ſware that he would never puniſh a Senator but by the ſentence of the Senate; and Trajan having promiſed to rule with juſtice and clemency, conſecrated his head and right hand to the anger of the Gods if he broke his word: and Plutarch tels, that the Kings of the Coſſari ſware to the Epirots, that they would govern according to the laws. And indeed abſtracting from the oath and promiſe, Kings are bound by natural juſtice and equity to doe ſo: for they are not Kings unleſs they govern; and they cannot expect obedience, unleſs they tell the meaſures by which they will be obeyed; and theſe meaſures cannot be any thing but laws, which are at firſt the will of the Prince; and when they are publiſh'd to the People, then they are laws, but not till they be eſtabliſhed by rewards and puniſhments, which are the portion of the People good and bad. Now this is the natural way of all good Government, there is no other; and to govern otherwiſe is as unnatural as to give Children meat at their ears, and hold looking-glaſſes at their elbows that they may ſee their face. If Kings be not bound to govern their People by their laws, why are they made? by what elſe can they be governed? by the will of the Prince? The laws are ſo; onely he hath declar'd his will, and made it certain and regular, and ſuch as wiſe men can walk by, that the Prince may not govern as Fools govern, or as a Lion does, by chance, and violence, and unreaſonable paſſions. Ea quæ placuerunt, ſervanda, ſaith the law, l. 1. ff. de pactis. If this had not been the will of the Prince, it had been no law; but being his will, let it be ſtood to: when the reaſon alters, let his will doe ſo too, and the law be chang'd, that the meaſures of right and wrong, of obedience and diſobedience may be known.

Caſſiod. var. l. 10. 16, 17.

15. We have ſeen how Kings are bound; the next inquiry is, how they are freed, and how they are ſuperiour to laws. Antonius Auguſtinus ſayes, that by the Lex Regia, or the Jus Regium, Kings, that is, the Supreme power, are onely freed from ſome laws: and this he gathers from the words of the Royal law written to Veſpaſian, Uti quibus legibus ne Auguſtus

ſtus teneretur, iis Veſpaſianus ſolutus eſſet : quæque ex quaque lege Auguſtum facere oportuit, ea omnia Veſpaſiano facere liceat, Where Auguſtus Cæſar was free, Veſpaſian ſhould be free : but thoſe things which Auguſtus ought to doe, all thoſe Veſpaſian might. The word liceat in his caſe was modeſtly put in; not but that oportuit had been the better word to expreſs his obligation, as well as the duty of Auguſtus : but it was therefore choſen to repreſent that to be expected from him, but could not be exacted; it was his duty, but no compulſion lay near him: but certain it was, that the power of the People being devolv'd upon him (for it had been a popular Government) as the People were bound to the laws which themſelves have made, ſo was the Prince. The People were, for there was none elſe to keep them: but therefore ſo was the Prince, for he had but the ſame power which the People formerly had when they were Supreme. But then that they were tied but to ſome laws, and not to others, is very true: but ſo, that he was tied to all thoſe laws which were intended to oblige him directly, and indirectly to all the reſt, that is, to govern the People by their meaſures onely.

16. But now if we inquire from what laws they were freed, and what is the right of a King or the Supreme power more then of the People: I anſwer,

1. It conſiſts in that which we in England call The King's Prerogative; in the Civil Law the Lex Regia, or Veſpaſian's Tables; by the Jews חק, the δικαίωμα βασιλέως, the ſtatute or proper appointment of the King : the particulars of which are either deſcribed in the reſpective laws of every People, or are in their cuſtomes, or elſe is a power of doing every thing that he pleaſe that is not againſt the laws and cuſtomes of his People, without giving a reaſon. Cum lege antiquâ, quæ Regia nuncupatur, omne jus omniſque poteſtas populi Romani in Imperatoriam tranſlata ſunt poteſtatem, ſaith the law. Amongſt the Romans that was the Jus Regium, that the Prince could doe all that ever the People could: now what that was, we find in Dionyſius, by the conceſſion of Romulus, Populus Magiſtratus creanto, leges ſciſcunto, bella decernunto, The People might create Magiſtrates, make laws, and decree peace and war. That is the Right of Kings, or the Supreme power. * Guntherus hath ſumm'd them up from the laws and cuſtomes of the Empire, and ſome antient Italian Governments.

17. 2. It conſiſts in the King's immunity from obligation to ſome ſolemnities of law to which his Subjects are oblig'd. Ratum eſſe actum, etiamſi actio non habeat plenam rectitudinem, dum jus non deſit, ſay the Lawyers. Of which nature is that for which Æneas Sylvius, afterwards Pope Pius the ſecond, laugh'd at Henry the ſixth of England, that his Publick Inſtruments had no Teſt but his own, and he wrote Teſte meipſo, Witneſs our ſelf: in which the King doth imitate the King of Kings, of whom S. Auſtin ſayes, Teſtem ſe dicit futurum, quia in judicio ſuo non indiget teſtibus. He ſwears by himſelf, becauſe he hath none greater; and is his own witneſs, becauſe he needs no other: and it is enough that a King ſayes it, becauſe his word ought to be great and venerable, as his Power and his Majeſtie. And it was not onely in the matter of coercion, but of ſolemnities, true which Juſtinian ſaid, Omnibus à nobis dictis Imperatoris excipiatur fortuna, cui & ipſas Deus leges ſubjecit, The fortune of the Emperour is to be excepted from the edge and from the forms of laws, becauſe God himſelf hath made the laws ſubject to the Emperour.

18. 3. The King is therefore ſalutus legibus, or free from laws, becauſe he can give pardon to a Criminal condemn'd: for the Supreme power is not bound to his own laws ſo, but that upon juſt cauſe he can interpoſe between the ſentence and the execution. This the Stoicks allowed not to any wiſe man, as ſuppoſing it to be againſt juſtice; and to remit due puniſhment, is to doe what he ought not: for what is due is juſt, and what is againſt that is unjuſt. All which is very true, but nothing to the purpoſe. For it is true, that it is but juſt that Offenders ſhould be puniſh'd; it is due, that is, they are oblig'd to ſuffer it; pœna debita ex parte reorum, it is their debt, not the Kings; they are oblig'd, not he: and yet it is juſt in him to take it, that is, he may: but he is not oblig'd in all caſes to doe it. And in this alſo he is an Imitator of the Oeconomy of God, who, according to that of Lactantius, legem cum poneret non utique ſibi ademit omnem poteſtatem, ſed habet ignoſcendi licentiam, God and the Vicegerent of God when they make laws have not exauctorated themſelves: but as that law is an efflux of their authority, ſo it ſtill remains within the ſame authority that they can pardon Offenders. Thus David pardon'd Shimei and Joab, and would fain have pardon'd Abſalom, if the hand of Joab had not been too quick for him. And this cannot be denied to the Supreme power, becauſe the exerciſe of this is one of the greateſt vertues of a Prince: which was well obſerv'd by Pericles on his death-bed, when his weeping Friends about him praiſed, ſome of them his Eloquence, ſome his Courage, ſome his Victories, lifting up his head a little, Et quid hoc eſt? (ſaith he) aut parva aut fortuita laudatis: at illud maximum omittitis, quod mea opera nemo pullam veſtem ſumpſerit. That he had no publick executions, that no man was put to wear Blacks for his Friend, was a clemency greater then all the praiſes of Eloquence, or a proſperous fortune.

Senec. De clement.

But all the World commends Clemency, the gentle hand of a Prince, his unwillingneſs to kill, his readineſs to ſave: for, Principi non minus turpia multa

ſup-

ſupplicia, quam Medico funera, Many executions are as great a diſhonour in a Princes reign, as many funerals in a Phyſitians practice: and therefore Caſſiodore ſaies that a good and a gentle Prince will ſometimes paſs the limits of equity that he may ſerve the ends of clemency; quando ſola eſt miſericordia cui omnes virtutes cedere honorabiliter non recuſant, for to mercy all other vertues count it honour to give place. And this Charls the 5th and Maximilian the ſecond ſignified by their deviſe of an Eagle pearching upon a thunderbolt, with an Olive in her beak: and Nerva and Antoninus Pius impreſs'd upon their money a thunderbolt upon a pillow; to ſignify that vindicative juſtice ought to ſleep ſometimes. * Now certainly this being ſo great an excellency in a Prince, is not greater then his power. Imperatori licet revocare ſententiam, & reum mortis abſolvere, & ipſi ignoſcere; quia non eſt ſubjectus legibus qui habet in poteſtate leges terræ, ſaith S. Auſtin. The Emperor, who can make laws, is not ſubject to laws, or ſo tied to them but that he may revoke his ſentence and pardon a Criminal. Variar. 11.

19. This I ſay is part of his Royalty; but is onely then to be practis'd when it can conſiſt with the ends of government, that is, when the publick intereſt can be preſerv'd, and the private injury ſome other way recompenc'd. Theſe indeed are the general meaſures not of the Princes power, but of his exerciſing this power juſtly.

20. 1. When the Criminal is a worthy perſon and can be beneficial to the Republick. Thus in the Low Countries a pardon in ordinary caſes of felony is granted of courſe to him that can prove he hath invented ſome new art: and one lately ſav'd his life by finding out a way exactly to counterfeit old medals.

21. 2. If the perſon hath already deſerv'd well of the publick. Thus Horatius Cocles was ſpar'd though he kill'd his ſiſter, becauſe he got honour and liberty and ſafety and dominion to Rome by killing the three brothers, the Curatii: and Solomon ſpar'd the life of Abiathar the High Prieſt, becauſe he bore the Ark before David, and was afflicted in all his troubles. * 1 Kings 2. 26.

22. 3. When the Criminal can be amended, & the caſe is hugely pitiable, and the fact not of greateſt malignity. Thus oftentimes we ſee young men pardon'd, and the firſt fault lightly puniſh'd; and becauſe young Cæſar was in the flower of his youth and a Princely boy, Sylla was more eaſily prevail'd with for his pardon.

23. 4. If the fault be private, and not brought to publick courts, it is eaſily pardon'd, though delated by a private information. Conquiri ad judicium neceſſe non fuit: ſome things when they are made publick cannot be diſmiſs'd, but are not to be inquir'd after. It was the advice of Cicero to his Brother Quintus concerning a certain Criminal.

24. But all this is upon ſuppoſition that the crime be not of greateſt miſchief, or fouleſt ſcandal and reproach; for if it be, nothing can be taken in exchange for it; a great vertue cannot make compenſation for a very great crime: and this is particularly true of Treaſon, of which thoſe words of Bartolus are to be underſtood, De offenſionibus erga dominum non eſt compenſatio ad ſervitia eidem impenſa, The ſervices done to a Lord cannot make ſatisfaction for a conſpiracy againſt him. And therefore the Romans caus'd Manlius Capitolinus to be thrown headlong from that rock from whence he had thrown the Gauls when he ſav'd the city. He produc'd the ſpoils of thirty enemies, forty donatives from Generals, two civic crowns, eight murals; yet all would not ſave his life and get his pardon. But yet in theſe things the ſupreme power is ſo free from laws that it does theſe things irregularly; Clementiam liberum habere arbitrium, ſaid Seneca, Clemency hath a great liberty, and a free choice: but they are oblig'd onely to ſee that the publick be not prejudic'd, and that every private intereſt be ſecur'd by cauſing amends to be made to the injur'd perſon where it can; and then it is true of every ſupreme Prince which Seneca advis'd Nero often to remember, Occidere contra legem nemo poteſt; ſervare nemo prater me, No man at all can put a man to death againſt the law; and none can ſave except the Prince.

25. 4. The ſupreme power is above the laws, * becauſe he can diſpenſe, * he can interpret them, * and he can abrogate them, * he can in time of neceſſity govern by the laws of reaſon without any written law, * and he is the Judge of the neceſſity. Thus the Kings of Iſrael had power over the judicial laws, though of the Divine ſanction. For God forbad that the corps of a Malefactor ſhould hang after ſun-ſet upon the accurſed tree; but yet Maimonides ſaies that the King ſuſpendit & relinquit ſuſpenſos diebus multis, he hangs them and leaves them hanging for many daies; when it is neceſſary by ſuch terror to affright the growing impiety of wicked men; that is, when the caſe was ſuch that the laws were capable of equity or interpretation. For this was not meerly an effect of his power, but of his reaſon too. It was a cuſtome among the Jews to condemn but one perſon in one day, unleſs they were in the ſame crime, as the adulterer and the adultereſs; but the King might condemn many at once when it was for the intereſt of juſtice and the republick. Thus their King could by the prerogative of his Majeſty proceed ſummarily, ſit in judgment alone without aſſeſſors, condemn upon the teſtimony of one, and by the confeſſion of the party; which the Sanhedrim might not doe, but were tied to acquit him that confeſs'd the fact. Add to theſe, * the Supreme can in ſome caſes be Judge and witneſs; that is, can himſelf condemn a criminal for what himſelf onely ſaw him doe. He can alſo be Judge in his own caſe; as if he be injur'd, rail'd upon, defrauded, or the like: all which are powers above the law, and here were to be nam'd for the underſtanding of the preſent Rule; but how they are to be conducted is of diſtinct and ſpecial conſideration, and to be reſerved to their proper places. I end this whole inquiry with that of Statius,

There is nothing in the earth but is under a law and tied to obedience: all the earth are under Kings, and the Kings are under the Romans, and the Romans under their Princes, and their Princes under God; who rules them by his own laws, and binds them to rule by their Countries laws, and ties them to doe juſtice, and is pleaſed when they ſhew mercy. But as they are to doe juſtice by the ſentence of the laws, ſo they muſt not ſhew mercy againſt law; for even the prerogative of Kings is by law, and Kings are ſo far above their laws, as the laws themſelves have given leave. For even the ὕφεσις ἀκριβείας ἐν δίκῃ, the remiſsion of the rigor of the law, the very Chancery and eaſe of laws is by law eſtabliſhed.

RULE III.

It is not lawfull for Subjects to rebel, or to take up arms againſt the ſupreme Power of the Nation, upon any pretence whatſoever.

1. WHen Nehemiah was deputed by Artaxerxes to be Governour of Judæa, and had commiſſion to rebuild Jeruſalem and the Temple, the neighbour Kings that oppoſed him were enemies to Artaxerxes, becauſe Nehemiah was lieutenant to the King. He that deſpiſeth me, deſpiſeth him that ſent me, ſaith our Bleſſed Saviour. Senatus faciem ſecum attulerat, auctoritatem reipublicæ, ſaid Cicero of one that was deputed and ſent from the Senate. He had the gravity of the Senate and the authority of the Commonwealth. Now this being true of the ſupreme Power in every Government, that it is poteſtas Dei vicaria, it is the Miniſter of God, appointed by him, ſet in his place, inveſted with a ray of his Majeſty, intruſted with no Power but his, repreſenting none but him, having received the Sword from his hand, the Power of life and death from his warranty; it muſt needs follow that he who lifts up his hand againſt that ſupreme Perſon or Authority that God hath appointed over him is impious againſt God and fights againſt him. This the Apoſtle expreſly affirms, and there needs no more words to prove the Rule, *He that reſiſts, reſiſts the ordinance of God. He does not ſay, he that does not obey is diſobedient to God, for that is not true. Sometimes it is neceſſary not to obey, as it hapned to the captive Jews under Nabuchodonoſor, and to the Apoſtles under their Princes; they could not obey God and them too: and then the caſe of Conſcience was ſoon reſolved. But they that could not obey, could die; they could goe into the fire, ſuffer ſcourgings and impriſonments, that was their ἓν μέγα, their great Sanctuary; which in behalf of the Chriſtians Gregory Nazianzen thus expreſſes, ἓν ἔχω πρὸς πάντα φάρμακον, μίαν ὁδὸν εἰς νίκλω (ἐν Χριστῷ καυχήσομαι) καὶ ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ θάνατον, I have but one remedy againſt all my evils, one way to victory, thanks be to Chriſt, I can die for him: that's ὑπολαγεῖν ἢ μὴ ἀνυπολαγεῖν, to obey where they can, and where they cannot to be ſure to lie down under the burden which they cannot carry. For though in ſome caſes it is lawfull not to obey, yet in all caſes it is neceſſary not to reſiſt.

2. I do not know any propoſition in the world clearer and more certain in Chriſtianity then this Rule, and therefore cannot recount any greater inſtance of humane infirmity then that ſome wiſe men ſhould be abus'd into a contrary perſwaſion. But I ſee that intereſt and paſſion are alwaies the greateſt arguments, where they are admitted. But I have an ill task to write Caſes of Conſcience, if ſuch things as theſe ſhall be hard to be perſwaded: for there are very few things in which any man is to hope for half ſo much conviction as in this article lies before him in every topick; and if I ſhould determine no caſes but upon ſuch mighty terms as can be afforded in this queſtion, and are given, and yet we prevail not, I muſt never hope to doe any ſervice to any intereſt of wiſedome or peace, of juſtice or religion. And therefore I am clearly of opinion that no man who can think it lawful to fight againſt the ſupreme power of his Nation, can be fit to read Caſes of Conſcience; for nothing can ever ſatisfie him whoſe Conſcience is armour of proof againſt the plain and eaſy demonſtrations of this queſtion. But this queſtion is of the ſame nature as all clear and neceſſary truths, never obſcure but when it is diſputed; certain to all men and evident if they will uſe their own eyes; but if they call for glaſſes of them that make a trade of it, it may chance not to prove ſo. But I will ſpeak of it with all eaſineſs and ſimplicity.

3. 1. The Scripture is plain, Curſe not the King, no not in thy thought: and, I counſel thee to keep the Kings Commandement, and that in regard of the oath of God— for he doth whatſoever pleaſeth him. Where the word of a King is, there is power, and who may ſay unto him, What doeſt thou? Againſt him there is no riſing up. There are many more excellent words in the Old Teſtament to this purpoſe; but nothing can be plainer then theſe dogmatically to eſtabliſh the doctrine of the Rule. No man can queſtion him; no man may riſe up againſt him; he hath power, he hath all power; we are by the law or the oath of God bound to keep his Commandement; and after all, we muſt not reproach him in our ſecret thoughts. No man needs this laſt precept but he that thinks the King is an evil man, or hath done wrong: but ſuppoſe he have, or that he is ſuppos'd to have, yet Curſe him not, Doe not ſlight him, ſo it is in the Hebrew; Regi ne detrahas, ſo it is in the Vulgar Latine, Diſparage not the King: but the Chaldee paraphraſe addes, Even in thy Conſcience, in the ſecrets of thy heart ſpeak not evil of the King, and in the cloſets of the chambers of thy houſe ſpeak not evil of the wiſe man; for the Angel Raziel does every day from heaven cry out upon the mount of Horeb, and his voice paſſes into all the world: and Eliahu, the great Prieſt, flies in the aire of heaven like a winged Eagle, and tells the words which are ſpoken in corners by all the inhabitants of the earth. By the way I onely obſerve this, that we are forbidden to ſpeak evil of the rich or the mighty man, the wiſe man, ſo the Chaldee calls him, that is, the Princely men of the world, the Magiſtrates and Nobles, whom S. Peter calls τὸς ἡγεμόνας δι' βασιλέως πεμπομένους, Captains or rulers ſent by the King: of theſe we muſt ſay no evil in our private houſes, leſt a bird of the aire, leſt that which hath wings, that is, leſt the Angel that attends us orders it ſo as to paſs into publication; for the government of the other world reaches ſtrangely even to us, and we ſpeak not a word in vain, but by the Divine providence it is diſpos'd to purpoſes that we underſtand not. But when he ſpeaks of the King or the ſupreme, whom S. Peter calls τὸ ὑπερέχοντα, then it is μὴ καταράσῃ τῷ βασιλέα ἐν τῇ συνειδήσει, μηδὲ ἐν κρυπτῷ τῆς καρδίας, call him not accurſed in thy heart, not ſo much as in thy thought; which becauſe it is only perceiv'd by God who is the ſearcher of the heart, it ſhews plainly that as Angels take care of the rich and the wiſe, the mighty and the Nobles, ſo Kings are the peculiar care of God, who is the King of Kings and the Lord of Lords. But then (to leave all curioſities) if we may not ſpeak or think reproachfully of the King, we may not doe that which is more and that which is worſe: and I think there needs no more to be ſaid. But it is as clear all the way.

Eccl. 10. 20. Eccleſ. 8. 2, 3. Prov. 30. 31.

4. In the New Teſtament, ſufficient are the excellent words of our Bleſſed Saviour, μὴ ἀντιστῆναι τῷ πονηρῷ not to reſiſt evil, that is, not to ſtand againſt it, not to oppoſe evil to evil; which obliges all Chriſtians that at leaſt without the magiſtrate they cauſe no return of evil to the offending perſon; that no man be his own avenger, for vengeance belongs to God, and he hath delegated that to none but to the ſupreme Magiſtrate, who is θεοῦ διάκονος ἔκδικος εἰς ὀργὴν, Gods miniſter to be a revenger of wrath under him. Now if no man muſt pay evil to his brother that hath injur'd him but by the hand of the ſupreme power, how can it be poſſible that it can be lawful to render evil for evil to the ſupreme power it ſelf? by whoſe hands ſhall that be done? by none but by his Superior, who is God alone, who will take care to puniſh evil Kings ſufficiently: onely we muſt not doe it; we muſt not pray him to doe it; for that is expreſsly againſt the words of Solomon, that's curſing the King in our thought, and not at all to be done. But beſides this there are many more things ſpoken by our Bleſſed Lord to determine us in this affair. Render to Ceſar the things that are Ceſars; and to Pilate Chriſt ſaid, Thou ſhouldeſt have no power over me unleſs it were given thee from above; meaning that Ceſars power, whoſe Deputy Pilate was, was deriv'd from God, and conſequently that, except God, none is greater upon Earth then Ceſar: and again, If my Kingdome were of this world, my ſervants would fight for me; which plainly enough confirms the power of the Militia in the ſupreme Magiſtrate, Chriſt leaving it where he found it.

5. But that there may be no diſpute concerning theſe things, the Apoſtles, who are expounders of the words of Chriſt and the meaning of his Spirit, tell us plainly, μὴ ἀνυποτάσσεσθαι, to be ſubject ἐξουσίαις ὑπερεχούσαις to ſupreme powers; the ſame with S. Peter's βασιλεῖ ὡς ὑπερέχοντι, to the King as to the Supreme, that is to the King, if he be a King indeed, if he be the ſupreme; to be ſubject to theſe powers, and not to reſiſt, for theſe reaſons. 1. Becauſe this ſupreme power is ordain'd of God: 2. Becauſe he that reſiſts, reſiſts God whoſe miniſter the Prince is: 3. Becauſe God hath arm'd the powers which he ordain'd with a ſword of power and revenge: 4. Becauſe it is for our good that we ſubmit to him; for he is Gods miniſter for good, that is, for the publick good, under which thine is comprehended: 5. Becauſe it is neceſſary; the neceſſity being apparent in the nature of the thing and in the Commandement of God: 6. Becauſe God hath bound our Conſcience to it: 7. He hath tied this band upon us with fear alſo: and 8. laſtly, becauſe whoever does not obey where he may lawfully, and whoſoever does in any caſe reſiſt, ſhall receive damnation to himſelf both here and hereafter; here upon the ſtock of fear, hereafter upon the account of conſcience; for both for fear and for Conſcience we muſt obey in good things and lawful, & we muſt not reſiſt in any. For indefinitely we are commanded not to reſiſt, without any diſtinction or reſervation of caſe; and Ubi lex non diſtinguit, nemo diſtinguere debet. He that will goe about to be wiſer then the law, in equity will not be better then a fool. This therefore is the ſumme of S. Pauls diſcourſe, Rom. 13. per totum.

6. S. Paul was the Doctor of the Gentiles, S. Peter of the Jews; and therefore this doctrine is ſufficiently conſign'd to all the world: for S. Peter hath preach'd this doctrine as largely as S. Paul, Submit your ſelves to every ordinance of man, for the Lord, that is, for his ſake, upon his Commandement and for his honour; theſe ordinances being Gods ordinances, ὑπὸ θεοῦ πεταγμέναι, they are ordain'd by God, all of them, the King principally, his captains & officers which he hath ſent, in the next place. But him and his Miniſters we muſt receive & honour and obey, & ſubmit to them; for it is Gods caſe & his Miniſters; God & his Miniſters & Lieutenants, the King & his. He that deſpiſes him whom the King ſends, deſpiſes the King; and he that deſpiſes him whom God ſends or makes his deputy, deſpiſes God. Submit therefore, for it is the will of God; Submit, for this is well-doing; Submit, for ſo we ſhall put to ſilence the ignorance of fooliſh men: Meaning that ſince the enemies of Chriſt are apt to ſpeak evil things of you, glad would they be if they had cauſe to accuſe you for not being obedient to government; and ſome are ignorant and fooliſhly pretend the liberty and priviledges of Saints againſt the intereſts of obedience; the mouths of theſe men muſt be ſtopp'd, and you muſt ſubmit to Kings, that you may pleaſe God and confute the adverſaries. Now the ſpecification of this great duty and the particular caſe of Conſcience follows; Fear God, Honour the King: Servants be obedient to your Maſters; not onely to the good and gentle, but alſo to the froward. Τοῦτο γὰρ χάρις, for this is thank-worthy: and this is full to the queſtion in hand. For the general precept which S. Peter gave is, ὑποτάγητε πάσῃ ἀνθρωπίνῃ κτίσει, ſubmit to every ordinance, to the King, to his Magiſtrates or deputies & captains, and laſtly ſubmit to the loweſt of all dominions, even ſervants to their maſters; not onely to the good and gentle, but to the moroſe and harſh. Now if ſo to inferiour maſters, whoſe dominion is no greater then their intereſt, & their intereſt is no greater then their price, and is ſtill under the power of Kings; much more to Kings or to the ſupreme power. * And indeed even ſubjection to Kings is the gentleſt and moſt eligible kind of ſervice. Then would my ſervants fight, ſaid Chriſt, meaning it of the ſubjects of his Kingdome: and Livy cals populum Romanum ſervientem cum ſub Regibus eſſet, they did ſerve their Kings. * And indeed as the Governments of the world then were, Kings were moſt abſolute, and the people intirely ſubject, and far from liberty: and therefore this of ſervants might very well be a ſpecification and a particular of their duty to Kings & Captains; and whether it were or no, it is for the former argument [from the leſs to the greater affirmatively] infinitely certain that the ſame duty is due to Kings though harſh and cruel: for indeed there were then none elſe; Nero was the ſupreme, and he was none of the beſt that ever wore purple.

7. It were very eaſy to draw forth more arguments from Scripture to this purpoſe; but I forbear to name more then this abundance which is contain'd in theſe now cited: but I ſhall not omit to obſerve that the Apoſtles did make uſe of that argument which I urg'd out of Solomon, that we are not to ſpeak evil of the King; from whence the unlawfulneſs of reſiſting is

Jude 8. unanſwerably concluded: for S. Jude giving the character of the worſt of men and the baſeſt of hereticks, reckons up in the bill of their particulars, that they deſpiſe dominion and ſpeak evil of dignities; which as it is an infallible mark of an evil perſon, ſo it is a uſing of a Prince worſe then S. Michael the Archangel durſt uſe the Devil, againſt whom, becauſe he was a Spirit of an higher order, though foully changed, he durſt not bring a railing accuſation, κρίσιν βλασφημίας a judgment or accuſation with blaſphemy in it: for all evil language of our Superior is no better then blaſphemy;

He

He did blaſpheme God and the King, was the crime pretended againſt Naboth.

8. If from the plain words of Scripture we deſcend to the doctrine and practices of the Church of God, we ſhall find that all Chriſtians when they were moſt of all tempted, when they were perſecuted and oppreſs'd, kill'd and tormented, ſpoil'd of their goods, and cruelly and deſpitefully us'd, not onely did not rebel when they had power and numbers, but profeſs'd it to be unlawful. But this I ſhall draw into a compendium; becauſe it being but matter of fact, and the matter in Scripture being ſo plain that it needs no interpretation, the practice and doctrine of the Church, which is uſually the beſt commentary, is now but of little uſe in a caſe ſo plain. But this alſo is as plain it ſelf, and without any variety, diſſent or interruption, univerſally agreed upon, univerſally practis'd and taught, that let the powers ſet over us be what they will, we muſt ſuffer it, and never right our ſelves. Tertullian boaſts with confidence, that when Peſcennius Niger in Syria, and Clodius Albinus in France and Britanny rebell'd againſt Septimius Severus a bloody and cruel Emperour, and pretended piety and publick good, yet none of the Chriſtians joyn'd with either. The Theban legion in the 18th year of Diocletian ſuffer'd themſelves to be cut in pieces every man, ſix thouſand ſix hundred ſixty and ſix in number, by Maximianus the Emperour; no man in that great advantage of number and order and provocation lifting up their hands, except it were in prayer: of theſe Venantius Fortunatus hath left this Memorial, Biblioth. PP. Tom. 8. edit. Binian.

Queis poſitis gladiis ſunt arma è dogmate Pauli,
Nomine pro Chriſti dulcius eſſe mori.
Pectore belligero poterant qui vincere ferro
Invitant jugulis vulnera chara ſuis.

They laid down their weapons and lift up their arms; they prayed and died in order: and this they did according to the doctrine of S. Paul. But when Julian was Emperour, an apoſtate from his religion, a great perſecutor of the Chriſtians, and who by his cruelty (as Nazianzen obſerves) brought the commonwealth it ſelf in danger, though his army did moſt conſiſt of Chriſtians, yet they had arms for him, but none againſt him, ſave onely that by prayers and tears they diverted many of his damnable counſels and deſigns. But the particulars are too many to recite what might be very pertinent to this queſtion from Antiquity. I ſhall therefore ſerve the intereſt of it as to this topick by pointing out the writings of the ancient Doctors where they have given teſtimony to this great article of our religion, which who pleaſe may find in *S. After

9. After him ſucceeded (Sabinianus being interpos'd for one year onely) Boniface the third, who obtain'd of Phocas to be called univerſal Biſhop: ſince when periit virtus Imperatorum, periit pietas Pontificum, ſaies one, the Kings loſt their ſtrength and the Biſhops loſt their piety; yet in the deſcending ages God wanted not many worthy perſons to give teſtimonies to this great truth and duty. Such were Stephen the ſixth apud Baronium tom. 10. A. D. 885. n. 11. Gregorius Turonenſis hiſt. lib. 5. cap. 1. *Concil. 10. Now it is very obſervable that in the ſucceſſion of about ſix Ages, in which the Holy Doctors of the Church gave ſuch clear teſtimony of the neceſſity of obeying even the worſt Princes, and many thouſands of holy Chriſtians ſealed it with their blood, there was no oppoſition to it; and none of any reputation, no man of learning did any thing againſt the intereſt or the honour of Princes, excepting onely (ſo far as I have obſerved) Lucifer Calaritanus, who indeed ſpake rude and unbeſeeming words of Conſtantius the Arrian Emperor; but that he may leſſen nothing of the univerſal conſent to this doctrine, S. Ambroſe does leſſen very much of his reputation, ſaying that though he was with the true believers baniſhed for religion, yet he ſeparated himſelf from their Communion. But in the next period, I mean after Gregory the Great, it was not unuſual for the Biſhops of Rome to ſtirre up ſubjects to rebel againſt their Princes, and from them came the firſt great declenſion and debauchery of the glory of Chriſtian loyalty and ſubjection to their Princes; witneſs thoſe ſad ſtories of P. Gregory the ſeventh, P. Urban and Paſchal, who ſtirred up the Emperors Son againſt the Father. I ſpeak it to this purpoſe, becauſe it produc'd an excellent epiſtle from the Church-men of Liege in behalf of the Emperor and of their Biſhop, who with his Chapter was excommunicated for adhering to his loyalty, and Robert Earl of Flanders commanded by the Pope to deſtroy him and all his Prieſts. But in behalf of Princes & the duty of ſubjection to them many excellent things were ſpoken, divers judgments of God fearfully falling upon rebellious people are recited, not onely in that Epiſtle of the Clergy of Liege, but in the life of Henry the 4th, Emperor, in faſciculo rerum ſciend. publiſhed at Colen. From all theſe Fathers and Ancient Authors now cited, magnum mundo documentum datum eſt (that I may uſe the words of the Author of the book laſt cited) a great inſtruction and caution is given to the whole world that no man riſe up againſt his Prince. For all theſe Authors give clear and abundant teſtimony to theſe truths, That the power of the ſupreme Magiſtrate is immediately from God, *That it is ſubject to God alone, *That by him alone it is to be judged, * That he is the governor of all things and perſons within his dominions, * That whoſoever ſpeaks reproachfully of him cannot be innocent, * That he that lifts up his hand againſt him ſtrikes at the face of God, * That God hath confounded ſuch perſons that againſt the laws of God, and their own oaths, and the natural bonds of fidelity, have attempted to ſpoil their ſupreme Lords, That Herman and Egbert that did ſo were confounded for ſo doing, as though they had never been, That Rudolphus had his hand cut off and felt divers other of the divine judgments for this impiety. And this being the conſtant univerſal doctrine of the Church of God for 1200. years, and this derived from the plain, the expreſs,

preſs, the frequent ſayings and Commandements of God in the Old and New Teſtament, declared by his Prophets and Apoſtles, and by his moſt holy Son himſelf, nothing can with greater certainty determine and conduct our Conſcience then this Rule. For the confirmation of which I remember S. Bernard tells a pretty little ſtory, in a Sermon upon theſe words of Chriſt, I am the Vine: Bene quidam Rex cùm percuſſus humanâ ſagittâ, &c. It was well ſaid of a King who being wounded with a barbed arrow, they that were about him deſired he would ſuffer himſelf to be bound till the head were cut out, becauſe the leaſt motion irregular would endanger his life; he anſwer'd, Regem ligari nullo modo decet, A King muſt at no hand be bound; let the King be ever ſafe, but let his power be at liberty. I end this topick with the words of S. Auſtin and of the ſixth Councel of Toledo, Non tribuamus dandi regni atque imperii poteſtatem niſi vero Deo, Let us attribute the power of giving the right of empire to none but to the true God alone. Ille unus verus Deus qui nec judicio nec adjutorio deſerit genus humanum, quando velit & quantum voluit Romanis regnum dedit: qui dedit Aſſyriis, vel etiam Perſis; qui Mario, ipſe Caio Cæſari; qui Auguſto, ipſe & Neroni; qui Veſpaſiano, vel Patri vel Filio, ſuaviſſimis Imperatoribus, ipſe & Domitiano crudeliſſimo; & ne per ſingulos ire neceſſe ſit, qui Conſtantino Chriſtiano, ipſe Apoſtatæ Juliano. Hoc planè Deus Unus verus regit, & gubernat ut placet. The one true God, who never leavs mankind deſtitute of right and help, hath given a kingdome to the Romans, as long as he pleaſe and as much as he pleaſe. He that gave the ſupreme power to the Aſſyrians, he alſo gave it to the Perſians. He that gave it to Marius a common Plebeian, gave it to Caius Cæſar who was a Princely perſon. The ſame authority he gave to Nero that he gave to Auguſtus; he gave as much power and Authority to the moſt cruel Domitian as he gave to Veſpaſian and to Titus the gentleſt and the ſweeteſt Princes; and to be ſhort, he gave the Authority to Conſtantine the Chriſtian, and the ſame afterwards to Julian the Apoſtate: for this great affaire he rules and governs as he pleaſe. lib. 5. de Civit. Dei. c. 21.

11. But all this is no more then what natural and neceſſary reaſon does teach all the world: Hanc Deus & melior litem natura diremit. For this which I have alleaged from the Fathers is properly a religious reaſon. It is Gods power which is in the ſupreme Magiſtrate, whether he be good or bad: therefore whoever rebels againſt him, rebels againſt the power and diſpenſation of God; and to this there is nothing reaſonable to be oppos'd. But then that which I am now to ſay is deriv'd to us by the reaſon that every man carries about him, by the very law of Nature.

Inviolabiter. ———

By the law of Nature I mean the prime law of God which he unalterably impos'd upon all men in their firſt Creation, that by reaſon and wiſe diſcourſes they ſhould govern themſelves in order to that end which is perfective of humane nature and ſociety. The law of nature is the law of God which is reaſonable and neceſſary to nature: now by this law or neceſſary reaſon we find it very fit that we ſhould deveſt our ſelves of the practice and exerciſe of ſome rights and liberties which naturally we have. So Ariſtotle obſerves, Homines adductos ratione multa præter mores & naturam agere, ſi aliter agi melius eſſe ſibi perſuaſerint, Men doe ſomethings againſt their Polit. 7. c. 13.

their natural inclination, if by natural reaſon they find it beſt to doe ſo. Now Nature having permitted every man to defend himſelf as well as he can againſt violence, did by an early experience quickly perceive that few men had power enough to doe it againſt every violent man; and therefore they drew into ſocieties, gather'd their ſtrength, and it was put into the hands of them who by a joyn'd ſtrength could, and by promiſe and intereſt and duty would doe it: and by this means the ſocieties had peace, and might live quietly. Now the natural conſequent is this, that if all our power is united and intruſted to one head, we muſt not keep it in our hands. If the ſupreme power be the avenger, we muſt not meddle; if he be Judge, we muſt ſubmit, for elſe we are never the nearer to peace. For when we were ſo many ſingle perſons we were alwaies in warre, but by unity and government we come to peace: therefore whatever we could doe alone, we having put into the common ſtock, our natural right of defence is in the publick hand, and there it muſt remain for ever; and we are to be defended by the laws, and they onely are now the miniſteries of peace. This is S. Pauls argument, I exhort that prayers and ſupplications be made 1 Tim. 2. 2. for all men; for Kings and all that are in authority, that we may lead a quiet and a peaceable life in all godlineſs and honeſty: plainly implying that the ſecurity and peace of ſocieties depends upon the power and authority of Kings and perſons in eminency and truſt: for none muſt make warre but he that does it for all mens intereſt; and therefore it is peace with all that are under government: but then that which is deſigned to keep peace muſt feel no warre from them whom it is deſigned to keep in peace, that they may not feel the evils of warre. If government be neceſſary, it is neceſſary that we ſhould obey it; if we muſt obey it, we muſt not judge it; if we muſt not judge it, we may not endeavour to puniſh it: and there is nothing in the world a greater deſtruction to it's own ends, then the reſiſting or rebelling againſt government; becauſe if we be above it, how are we ſubjects? if ſubjects, how are we it's Judges? if no Judges, how can we be avengers? if no avengers, why are we not quiet and patient? If we be not above, we are below; and therefore there let us abide: but if we be above, then we are the ſupreme power; and then it is all one. That which is ſaid all this while concerns the ſubjects, and not the Supreme, to whom by our natural neceſſities, by a general contract of mankind, by the law of nations, by the command of God, and by the civil laws of all republicks the ſubject is bound, and does owe obedience and maintenance, and honour and peace. Generale pactum eſt ſocietatis humanæ obedire Regibus ſuis, ſaid S. Auſtin, lib. 3. Confeſſ. cap. 8. it is a covenant that all mankind have agreed in, to be obedient to their Kings.

12. But all this is true: but ſince Kings are for defence and Juſtice, for good and not for evil, for edification and not for deſtruction, good Kings muſt be obeyed; but what if they be evil and unjuſt, cruel and unreaſonable enemies of their people, and enemies of mankind?

13. This is that I have been ſaying all this while, that let him be what he will, if he be the ſupreme, he is ſuperior to me, and I have nothing to doe, but ſomething to ſuffer; let God take care, if he pleaſe, I ſhall be quickly remedied, till then I muſt doe as well as I can. For if there be any caſe in which the ſubjects may reſiſt, who ſhall be Judge of that caſe? can this caſe be evident and notorious? and does it alwaies conſiſt in indiviſibili? If it does not, then many things are like it, and who can ſecure that the ſubjects ſhall judge right? For if they were infallible, yet who will engage that they

they will not doe amiſs? what warranty have we againſt the ambition and the paſſion and the intereſt of the reformers of ſupreme powers? And is it not better to ſuffer inconvenience from one then from every one that pleaſe? But if you allow one caſe, you muſt allow as many as can be reduc'd to it; and who is not witty enough againſt Governours, to find excuſes enough to bring them down?

14. 2. What remedy is there in caſe the ſupreme power be ill adminiſtred? will not any remedy bring greater evils then the particular injuſtices which are complain'd of? It was well ſaid of Xenophon, ὅστις ἐν πολέμῳ ὢν φασιάζει πρὸς τὸν ἄρχοντα, πρὸς τοῦτο ἑαυτῷ σωτηρίαν φασιάζει, He that oppoſes his General and Prince, oppoſes his own ſafety. For conſider, what order can be in a family, if the boys rule their Fathers and rebel againſt their command? How ſhall the ſick be cur'd, if they reſiſt the advice and preſcriptions of the Phyſicians? And they that ſail are like to ſuffer ſhipwrack, if the Boatſwain and the Swabbers and the boys ſhall contradict the Maſter. So it is impoſſible that there can be ſafety in a common-wealth, if they who are appointed to obey ſhall offer to rule. Φύσει γὰρ ἀναγκαῖά τινα καὶ σωτήρια τῷ μὲν ἄρχειν ἐν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, τῷ δ' ἄρχεσθαι πίστιν λαβεῖν, For by nature it is neceſſary and profitable and order'd accordingly, that one ſhould rule and the reſt ſhould be obedient. Dion. Caſſius.

15. And therefore theſe wild caſes are not to be pretended againſt that which natural reaſon and natural neceſſity have eſtabliſhed. We cannot ſuppoſe a King that ſhould endeavour to deſtroy his Kingdome. We may as well ſuppoſe a Father to kill his children, and that therefore in ſome caſes it may be lawful for children to rebel againſt their Fathers, turn them out of doors, &, as they ſee occaſion, cut their throats that the inheritance may be theirs. Whom can we ſuppoſe worſe then Julian, then Domitian, then Nero? and yet theſe Princes were obeyed, and did never proceed to the extremity of ſuch deſperate hoſtilities: Nay Nero, as bad as he was, yet when he was kill'd, was quickly miſs'd; for in a few moneths three Princes ſucceeded him, and there was more blood of the Citizens ſpilt in thoſe few moneths then in Nero's fourteen year. And who pleaſe both for their pleaſure and their inſtruction to read the Encomium of Nero written by the incomparable Cardan, ſhall find that the worſt of Princes doe much more good then they doe harm. But, ſemper Corpori grave eſt Caput, the head alwaies akes, and is a burden to the ſhoulders, and we complain much of every little diſorder. Put caſe a Prince by injuſtice doe violence to ſome of his ſubjects, what then? Qui unum, qui plures occidit, non tamen reip. læſæ rem eſt, ſed cædis, ſaid Seneca, It is not the killing of ſome Citizens that deſtroyes the Commonwealth: and there are not many Princes that proceed ſo far as to doe open and profeſs'd wrong to the lives of their ſubjects; but many ſubjects have done violence, open and apparent, to the lives of their Princes, and yet the ſubjects are apteſt to complain. Quis Princeps apud nos regnavit è Vicecomitum aut Sfortiadum familiâ quem non aliquis Civis noſter etiam ſine cauſa, ſed ſolâ ambitione, ferro aggreſſus ſit? pauci certè, Which of our Princes of ſuch and ſuch a family hath not been ſet upon to be murder'd by ſome of their Subjects, without cauſe, but meerly out of ambition? very few. And he that reads Hector Boethius his hiſtory of Scotland may ſay as much as Cardan, and for a longer time. Every man complains of Kings and Governours; we love them not, and then every little thing makes him a Tyrant: but it is in this caſe as in the caſe of women (faires Albericus Gentilis) we cannot be without them, and yet we are not pleas'd when we are tied to them. * If any ſuch thing could happen that a King had a mind to deſtroy his people, by whom ſhould he doe it? He alone can hardly doe it; and he could hardly arm his people againſt themſelves. But what ſhould he get by it? he cannot be ſo unreaſonable: but ſuppoſe it, what then? Oppreſſion will make a wiſe man mad (ſaith Solomon) and there are ſome temptations bigger then a mans ſtrength; and this would be one of them, and the people would be vext into the ſin of rebellion; and then it may be, God would cut him off, and puniſh the people; and here would be calamity enough in this whole entercourſe, but nothing lawful. For we have nothing dearer to us then our lives and our religion; but in both theſe caſes we find whole armies of Chriſtians dying quietly, and ſuffering perſecution without murmur. * But it cannot be done, it cannot eaſily be ſuppos'd that an evil Prince ſhould be otherwiſe then one that is cruel and unjuſt, and this to fall upon ſome perſons: for let him be luſtfull, he ſhall not raviſh the Common-wealth; and if he be bloody, his ſword cannot cut off very great numbers; and if he be covetous, he will not take away all mens eſtates: but if a warre be made againſt him, theſe evils will be very much more univerſal; for the worſt of Princes that ever was hath obliged a great many, and ſome will follow him out of duty, ſome for fear, ſome for honour, and ſome for hopes; and then as there is no ſubject that complains of wrong but he hath under the government receiv'd more right then wrong, ſo there is none that goes to doe himſelf right, (if that be all he intends, and not covetous and ambitious deſigns) but in the forcing it he will find more wrong then right.

16. 3. But I demand, Are there no perſons from whom if we receive wrong we muſt not be avenged of them? To a Chriſtian it had been a more reaſonable inquiry, whether there be any perſons of whom we may be avenged. Certainly there are none of whom we may be avenged without the aid or leave of the publick power. But what if our Father doe us wrong? may we ſtrike him? ὀργὴν πατρὸς φέρειν, to bear our Fathers unjuſt wrath was one of the precepts the young man of Eretria had learnt of Xeno: and what then if we be injur'd by the publick Father? Magno animo Regis, velut parentis contumeliam tulit; it was ſaid of Lyſimachus: & ut parentum ſævitiam ſic Patriæ patiendo ac ferendo leniendam eſſe, ſaid Livy. If we muſt bear with our Fathers, ſo alſo with our Princes. Vi regere Patriam aut Parentes, quanquam & poſſis, & delictis corrigas, importunum eſt, ſaid Salluſt, Though it were in your power, though you might reform ſome evils, yet to rule your Parents or your Prince by force is not reaſonable. And it was an excellent ſaying which Cicero had from Plato, Tantum contendere in rep. oportet quantum probare tuis civibus poſſis, vim neque parenti neque patriæ afferri oportere. Id enim Plato jubet, quem ego vehementer ſequor: & qui hanc cauſam ſibi fuiſſe ait reipublicæ non attingendæ, quod cum offendiſſet populum Athenienſem propè jam deſipientem ſenectute, cumque eum nec perſuadendo nec cogendo regi poſſe vidiſſet, cum perſuaderi poſſe diffideret, cogi fas eſſe non arbitraretur, To contend and fight in a Common-wealth can never be approved by the Citizens: ſtrive ſo much as you can juſtify: but you muſt offer force neither to your parents nor to your country, that is the ſupreme government of your Country. And when Plato ſaw the people of Athens almoſt doating with age, he deſpair'd of prevailing upon them by perſwaſion; but yet to compel them by force he concluded to be impious. But can any man looſe by

by patience? hath it no reward? or is there no degrees of Counſel in it? that is, Is not ſome patience acceptable though it be not neceſſary? ſhall it have no reward, if it be more then we are bound to? If it ſhall be rewarded, though it be greater then is ſimply neceſſary, then it is certain, that whatever we ſuffer under evil Princes, to be quiet and peaceable is infinitely better then to reſiſt: For that ſhall have a good reward; this ſeldome miſſes an ill one. But if there be no counſel, no degree of uncommanded patience, then all patience is neceſſary; for it is certain none is ſinne: for Chriſt was glorified by ſuffering the greateſt injuries, and his Martyrs have trodden the ſame way of the Croſs; and ſo muſt we if God calls us to it, if we will be his Diſciples.

17. 4. But again I conſider, Does every ſubject that is a wicked man forfeit the right in his eſtate, otherwiſe then law appoints? Is dominion founded in grace? or is it founded in law and labour, in ſucceſſion and purchaſe? And is it not ſo in Princes? with this onely difference, that their rights of government are derived from God immediately; for none but he can give a power of life and death: can therefore any one take away what they did not give? or can a ſupreme Prince looſe it by vice, who did not get it by vertue, but by gift from God? If a law were made to deveſt the Prince of his power in caſe of ill government, then he were not the man I mean, he is not ſupreme but ſubordinate, and did rule precariouſly, that is as long as his ſuperior judges will give him leave. But for the ſupreme he is ſacred and immured, juſt as the utmoſt orbs of heaven are uncircumſcrib'd; not that they are poſitively infinite, but becauſe there is nothing beyond them: ſo is the ſupreme Magiſtrate, nothing is above him but God: and therefore in his caſe we may uſe the words of Livy, ſi quis adverſus eafeciſſet, nihil ultrà quam improbè factum adjecit lex, If he does any thing againſt reaſon and juſtice, there is no more to be ſaid but that it was ill done. * But if he does not doe his duty, that's no warranty for me not to doe mine; and if obedience and patience be a duty, then the one is as neceſſary, and the other is more neceſſary when he does not doe what he ought. * And after all, the ſupreme power in every Chriſtian republick hath no power to kill a ſubject without law, nor to ſpoil him of his goods. Therefore neither can a ſubject kill or exauthorate the ſupreme at all; for there is no law to doe it: and if he be the ſupreme power, he is alſo law-giver, and therefore will make no ſuch law againſt himſelf; and if he did, he were neither wiſe nor juſt.

18. Either then ſtop all pretences, or admit all. If you admit any caſe in which the ſubjects may fight againſt their Prince, you muſt admit every caſe that he will pretend who is the judge of one. But becauſe Government is by God appointed to remedy the intolerable evils of confuſion and the violence and tyranny of every ſtrong villane, we muſt keep our ſelves there; for if we take the ſword, or the power, or the legiſlation, or the Judicature, or the impunity from the Supreme, we return to that ſtate of evil from whence we were brought by government. For certain it is, all the perſonal miſchiefs and injuſtices done by an evil Prince are infinitely more tolerable then the diſorders of a violent remedy againſt him. If there be not a derniere reſort, or a laſt appeal fixt ſomewhere, miſchiefs will be infinite; but the evils that come from that one place will ſoon be numbred, and eaſier ſuffered and cur'd.

19. It were eaſie to adde here the ſentences of the wiſe heathen to this very purpoſe; for though religion ſpeakes loudeſt in this article, yet nature her ſelf is vocal enough: but I have remark'd ſome already occaſionally, to the ſame ſenſe with that of Tacitus, Imperatores bonos voto expetendos, qualeſcunque tolerandos: So the wiſer Romans at laſt had learnt their duty. The ſame alſo was the ſentence of the Greeks;

Eurip. Τὰς τ' κρατούντων ἀμαθίας χρεὼν φέρειν,

We muſt patiently ſuffer the follies of our Rulers. So did the Perſians,

Though the Lords be cruel, yet you muſt obey them as well as the gentle. But I am weary of ſo long telling a plain ſtory. He that is not determined by theſe things, I ſuppoſe will deſire to ſee no more. But if he does, he may pleaſe to ſee many more particulars in Barclay, in Grotius, in Monſieur de la Noüe, in Albericus Gentilis, in Scipio Gentilis, in Biſhop Bilſon, in Petrus Gregorius & Bodinus. I conclude, many ſupreme Princes have laid aſide their kingdomes, and have exchang'd them for honour and religion; and many ſubjects have laid aſide their ſupreme Princes or Magiſtrates, and have exchanged them for liberty and juſtice. But the one got, and the other loſt. They had real advantages; and theſe had words in preſent, and repentance in reverſion.

Rule IV.

The Supreme Civil Power is alſo Supreme Governour over all perſons and in all cauſes Eccleſiaſtical.

1. IF this Rule were not of great neceſſity for the conduct of Conſcience, as being a meaſure of determining all queſtions concerning the Sanction of and obedience to all Eccleſiaſtical lawes, the duty of Biſhops and Prieſts to their Princes, the neceſſity of their paying tribute, and diſcharging the burdens and relieving the neceſſities of the Republick, I ſhould have been unwilling to have medled with it; becauſe it hath ſo fierce oppoſition from the bigots of two parties, the Guelphs and the Gibellines, from Rome and from Scotland, from S. Peter and S. Andrew, the Papiſt and the Preſbyterian: and they have plac'd all their great intereſt and their greateſt paſſions upon this queſtion, and uſe not to be very kind to any man that ſhall at all oppoſe them.

2. From the Church of Rome we have many learned men, ſervants of the Pope, who affirm that all Government Eccleſiaſtical belongs to him; that he onely can make lawes of Religion, that in that he hath a compulſory over Kings, who are his ſubjects, dependant upon him, by him to be commanded in matters of religion; to which all temporalties are ſo ſubordinate, that if not directly, (as ſome of them ſay) yet indirectly, as moſt of them ſay, in ordine ad Spirituale bonum, for the good of the Church and and of religion he can diſpoſe of them. The great defenders of this doctrine are [a] Bellarmine and [b] Baronius, [c] Harding and [d] Eudæmon Johannes, [e] Fevardentius and [f] Mariana, [g] Boucher and [h] Ficklerus, [i] Alexander Carerius and [k] D. Marta, [l] Doleman, and generally the Jeſuits, and all the Canoniſts.

3. On the other ſide, the Presbytery pretends mightily to the ſcepter of Jeſus Chriſt, as the Pope does to the Keyes of S. Peter, and they will have all Kings ſubmit to that; as there is all the reaſon in the world they ſhould: but by this ſcepter of Chriſt they mean their own claſſical meetings, and the Government that themſelves have ſet up the other day; to which the firſt inventer of it was at firſt forc'd pitifully to beg ſuffrages of allowance, and that it might be endur'd; but as ill weeds uſe to doe, it quickly grew up to that height, that like the Bramble it would be King, and all the birds and beaſts muſt come under the ſhadow of it. The great Maſters of this invention after Calvin are [m] Beza, [n] Cartwright, [o] Lambertus Danæus, [p] Gellius Snecanus, [q] Guil. Hottoman, the Author of the Book called Speculum tyrannidis Philippi Regis, [x] and the Dialogues of Philadelphus: and if any one would ſee more of theſe, he may find enough of them in the writings of that Excellent and Prudent Prelate D^r Bancroft Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

4. Concerning the pretences of the Church of Rome, they are as invalid as can be with t. For although there are ſome overtures of Scripture made, as Tibi dabo claves, and Ecce duo gladii, and Paſce oves, which are ſtrange arguments to conſidering perſons to prove the Pope ſuperiour to Kings, (and concerning them I ſhall not need to uſe any argument, but ſet down the words of the Biſhop of Maeſtricht in an excellent oration of his recorded by Aventine. Ambitioſi & ſuperbi ſunt qui illud Domini Deique noſtri elogium, Quodcunque ſolveris ſuper terram, &c. & quodcunque ligaveris erit ligatum, &c. perfrictâ fronte interpretando adulterant, ſuæ libidini ſervire cogunt, & nobis ceu pueris, & omnium rerum imperitis, aſtu illudere ſtudent, They that expound ſuch words of Chriſt to ſerve their pride or luſt of Empire are impudent, and think us to be fools and children, and fit to be coſen'd and fool'd out of our ſenſes:) yet theſe were made no uſe of to any ſuch purpoſe for many Ages after the Apoſtles death; and therefore upon wiſer accounts they cauſe this great article to rely upon ſome prudential motives, and ſome great precedents and examples. The particulars I ſhall conſider in the following numbers: but that which here lies in my way is their great boaſt of the fact of Pope Zachary depoſing Childeric King of France in the year 750, and appointing Pepin the Kings Marſhall to be King in his Room. Upon the warranty of this Example Gregory the 7^th endeavour'd to juſtify his proceedings againſt the Emperour Henry 4^th. Bellarmine will not endure with patience to hear that any one did this feat but the Pope onely; and on all hands they contend mightily that it was he, and not the Nobles and people of France. They indeed were willing but they had no authority, therefore they appeal'd to him as the Ordinary Judge; and he declared for Pepin, and God declared for that Judgement that it was according to his will: for the event was bleſſed, Pepin was proſperous, and his ſon Charles the Great grew a mighty Prince, and France a potent Empire,and Religion and the Church had great increment and more advantages then before or ſince.

5. But when men judge of actions by the events,they onely ſhew themſelves willing to be coſen'd by proſperity,and that they will endure nothing that hath affliction with it; but ſo they become advocates for the greateſt villanies, becauſe they could never come to their greatneſſe if they were unproſperous. And therefore there is no judging of lawful or unlawful by the event, till the laſt event be tried: and at the day of our death and at the day of Judgement, the event of things is the beſt argument and the beſt trial of right and wrong. But beſides this, the folly of theſe men is infinitely ſeen in this very inſtance. For it is no wonder that the Church of Rome was proſperous and did thrive upon that change: Pepin and Pope Zachary helped one another and divided the ſpoil; and Pepin and Charles having no warranty and reputation in that treaſonable ſurprize of the Crown of France, but what they had from the opinion the world then had of the Biſhop of Rome, it concern'd Charles to advance the Papacy, that the Papacy might ſupport him. But by all that is before him in this world, a man knows not whether he be worthy of love or hatred, ſaith Solomon; and a mans fortune is ſeen in his children: and therefore if the Popes ſervants would look a little further then their own advantages, they might have conſider'd what is obſerved by Paulus Æmilius and Beneventus of Imola, that in the days of Charles the Great, who was ſon to Pepin, the Empire was divided; (which was the curſe in which God puniſh'd Solomon in the perſon of Rehoboam)that his ſon Ludovicus Pius was ſerv'd juſt as his Grandfather ſerv'd his Maſter the King, for his ſon Lotharius did moſt unnaturally rebel againſt him, depos'd him and thruſt him into a cloiſter; and that he himſelf felt the judgement of God, for himſelf alſo was depos'd, and ſucceeded to by Lewis the ſecond, who was proſperous in nothing, but in every undertaking the wind blew in his face. His ſon was Ludovicus nihili, ſo they call'd him; a cypher of a King, and ſtood for nothing. He indeed left an heire to the Crown: but he alſo was a man that had no heart, and his ſon had no head; for Charles the Bald was an extreme pitiful coward, and Charles le groſs was a fool. After theſe ſucceeded Arnulph, who was eaten up with lice, the ſad diſeaſe of Herod; and in his ſon Lewis the fourth that race was quite extinguiſh'd. And now if we judge of things by the event, have we not great reaſon even upon this account to ſuſpect the fact of Zachary, (though it was not his authority, but his conſent and his confederacy with the Rebel) to be extremely diſpleaſing to Almighty God, when there was not one of his line but went away with a ſhare of the Divine anger? But ſuch reaſonings as theſe concern none but them who feel them; they may ſuſpect the thing, and better examine their confidences when they feel any extraordinary evils, which moſt commonly are the conſequents of a great ſin and a mighty diſpleaſure. But others are to doe as they ſhould have done at firſt,goe by rule,and not venture upon the thing to ſee what will become of it. * Being now quit of this by which they have made ſo much noiſe; all their other little arguments will ſoon melt away when they come to be handled.

6. But as for the other pretenders (viz. thoſe of the Presbytery,) to a power ſuperior to Kings in Eccleſiaſtical Government; they have not yet proved themſelves to have received from Chriſt any power at all, to govern vern in his Church; and therefore much leſſe by virtue of any ſuch power to rule over Kings. I doe therefore ſuppoſe theſe Gentlemen not much concerned in this queſtion, becauſe they are uncapable of making claime; not onely becauſe Religion is no pretence to Regalities, and that Spiritual power is of a nature wholly different from the power of Kings; but becauſe if the Spiritual were to be above the Temporal, yet even then they are not the better. For they have not onely none of that Spiritual power which can pretend to Government, but it does not yet appear that they have any at all: and this relies upon the infinite demonſtrations of Epiſcopal Government and power; which being one of the words and works of Chriſt, muſt needs be as firme as heaven and earth. But if they be concern'd, they will be concluded.

7. And firſt in general, it is neceſſary that the ſupreme power of Kings or States ſhould be governors in Religion, or elſe they are but half Kings at the beſt, * for the affaires of Religion are one half of the intereſt of mankind: and therefore the laws of the XII Tables made proviſion for religion as well as for the publick intereſt.

* Cum jus conferendi opima ſacerdotia ab Henrico Imp. vi fuerat extortum, ea res (inquit Paulus AEmilius lib. 5.) multum virium Imperatoriæ Majeſtati detraxit in animis popularium, plus enim quam dimidium ſuæ jurisdictionis perdidit.

Jus triplex tabulæ quod ter ſanxêre quaternæ
Sacrum, Privatum, & populi commune quod uſquam eſt. Auſon.

And this is ſo naturally and unalterably entail'd upon the ſupreme power, that when Attalus the King of the Pergamenians made the people of Rome his Heire with theſe words onely, Populus Rom. bonorum meorum hæres eſto, Let the people of Rome be Heire of all my goods; by [His goods] they underſtood, Divina Humanáque, publica & privata, ſaith Eutropius, & Florus, all power in things publick and private, Humane and Divine. For ſince Religion is that great intercourſe between God and us, it is impoſſible to deny to him who ſtands next to God the care of that by which we approach neareſt to him; and this I learn'd from Juſtine. Jure ille à Diis proximus habetur per quem Deorum Majeſtas vindicatur, He is rightly plac'd next under God, by whom the Majeſty of God is aſſerted. And therefore the Chriſtians muſt after their ſtyle, and no more ſay that the Prince is homo à Deo ſecundus, & ſolo Deo minor, (which are the words of Tertullian) next to God, and onely leſſe then him, if between God and the Prince there is all that great diſtance and interval of the Government of Religion. He is the beſt and greateſt perſon that rules the beſt and greateſt intereſt: and it was rightly obſerved of S. Paul concerning controverſies civil, for money or land, Set them to judge who are leaſt eſteemed amongſt you; for that is of the leaſt concerne: but he that is Judge of life and death, that is, the Governour of bodies, and he that governs the greateſt affaires of ſouls, he indeed ought to be of higheſt eſtimation. Biſhops and Prieſts are the great Miniſters of Religion, but Kings are the ἀρχηγοὶ the great Rulers and Governours of it. And this is eaſy to diſtinguiſh. For as the Kings Judges and Councel learned in the Law miniſter law to the people, yet the King is the ſupreme judge in law; and the Kings Captains and ſouldiers fight his battels, and yet he is ſummus Imperator, and the power of the Militia is his: ſo it is in religion, it muſt be miniſtred by perſons ordained to the ſervice, but govern'd by himſelf: He is not ſupreme unleſſe he have all the power of Government.

1 Cor. 6.

8. 2. The care of religion muſt needs belong to the ſupreme Magiſtrate, becauſe religion is the great inſtrument of political happineſſe: ad magnas Reip. utilitates retinetur religio in civitatibus, ſaith Cicero; and unleſſe he have power to manage and conduct it, and to take care it be rightly ordered, the ſupreme power hath not ſufficient to defend his charges. If the Prince cannot conduct his Religion, he is a ſupreme Prince juſt as if he had not the militia; or as if he were Judge of right but not of wrong; or as if he could reward but not puniſh; or as if he had cogniſance but of one half of the cauſes of his people; or as if he could rule at land but not at ſea, or by night but not by day. But how if an enemy comes with a fleet againſt him, will he ſend a Brigade of horſe to take a ſquadron of ſhips? The caſe is juſt the ſame; for if God breaks in upon a Nation for the evil adminiſtration of religion, how ſhall the Prince defend his people or anſwer to God for them? And this is no inconſiderable neceſſity: For beſides that juſtice and charity, and temperance and chaſtity, and doing good and avoiding evil are parts of religion, and yet great material parts of government and the laws, the experience of mankind and natural reaſon teaches us that nothing is ſo great a ſecurity or ruine to a State as the well or ill adminiſtration of Religion.

Novel. 42. The ſenſe of which is well enough rendred by that of Juſtinian, οὗπερ ἐν εἰρήνῃ φυλαττομένου, καὶ τὸ λοιπὸν ἡμῖν εὐθηνήσει πολίτευμα, that he would take care concerning Eccleſiaſtical government or the affaires of religion; for if this be kept in peace, all the whole republick will be proſperouſly adminiſtred, reliqua nobis exuberabit politia. So it is rendred by one of our Saxon Kings. The very trees will bring their fruit in due ſeaſon, and the ſea will give her fiſh, and the earth ſhall give her increaſe, when Kings take care of juſtice and religion. *By religion Princes increaſe their Empire. of

of the Romans, non calliditate ac robore, ſed pietate ac religione omnes gentes nationeſque ſuperaviſſe, They overcame all the Nations not by force or craft, but by piety and religion. To which purpoſe is that of Valerius Maximus, Non dubitaverunt ſacris Imperia ſervire: ita ſe rerum humanarum futura regimen exiſtimantia ſi Divinæ potentiæ bene atque conſtanter eſſent famulata, The Greateſt Empires made no ſcruple of miniſtring to Religion, as believing that then they ſhould moſt proſperouſly prevaile in the Governments of the world, if they well and conſtantly did ſervice to the Divine Almighty power. Now this is not to be underſtood as if it meant that if a King were a good man and perſonally religious it would procure bleſſings for him and his people; though that be true in ſome proportion of events: but it ſignifies that they ſhould be religious Kings, that is, as ſuch take care to defend, to promote, to conduct and to govern it to advantages and for the honour of God. And this obſervation is made by S. Auſtin in his epiſtle to Bonifacius. How doe Kings ſerve the Lord in fear, but by forbidding and by a religious ſeverity puniſhing thoſe things which are done againſt the Lords Commandements? For otherwiſe does he ſerve him as a Man, otherwiſe as a King. As a man he ſerves him by living faithfully: But as a King he ſerves him by eſtabliſhing laws, commanding righteouſneſſe, and forbidding the contrary. So did Hezekiah ſerve God by deſtroying the Groves and the idol Temples, and all thoſe things which were built againſt the Commands of God. In the like manner King Joſiah did ſerve God: and the King of Nineveh ſerv'd him by compelling all the city to ſerve the Lord. Thus King Darius ſerv'd God by delivering the idol to Daniel to be broken, and caſting his enemies into the Lions den: and Nebuchadnezzar ſerv'd him by forbidding by a terrible law all his ſubjects to blaſpheme. For in this, Kings ſerve the Lord as Kings, when they doe thoſe things for his ſervice which they cannot doe but as Kings. Now if religion be the great intereſt, the preſerver, the enlarger of Kingdomes, it ought to be governed by the hands of theſe whoſe office it is to enlarge or to preſerve them. For if the inſtrument be conducted by other hands, the event ſhall depend upon them, and then they, not Kings, ſhall be anſwerable for the felicity or infelicity of their Nations. And it was rarely well ſaid of Plutarch, that a city might be as well built in the aire, without earth to ſtand upon, ἢ πολιτεία, τῆς περὶ θεῶν δόξης ἀναιρεθείσης, παντάπασι συστῆναι λαβεῖν, ἢ λαβοῦσα σῳθῆναι, as a republick can either be conſtituted or preſerved without the ſupport of religion. That ſupreme power therefore that hath no government of religion is defective in a neceſſary part of it's life and conſtitution. contra Colot.

9. 3. The ſupremacy and conduct of religion is neceſſary to the ſupreme power, becauſe without it he cannot in many caſes govern his people. For beſides that religion is the greateſt band of laws, and conſcience is the greateſt endearment of obedience, * and a ſecurity for Princes in cloſets and retirements, and his beſt guard againſt treaſons; it is alſo that by which the common people can be carried to any great or good or evil deſigne. And therefore Livy obſerves of Numa, that to eſtabliſh his Government he firſt ſetled religion, as ſuppoſing that nothing is more powerful to lead the people gently, or to drive them furiouſly, then to imprint in them the fear of God, or to ſcare them with religion. And therefore the Prince cannot rule without it: He is but the ſhadow ſhadow of a King and the ſervant of his Prieſts; and if they rule religion, they may alſo rule him. And that for two great cauſes.

10. 1. Becauſe the propoſitions and opinions of religion have and are directly intended to have great influence upon the whole life and all the actions of mankind. For how if the Miniſters of religion preach the Stoical fate, and that all things that come to paſs are unalterably predetermin'd, who need to care how he ſerves God, or how he ſerves his Prince? Suetonius ſaies of Tiberius, that he was religionis negligentior, quippe perſuaſionis plenus cuncta fato agi, careleſs of religion, becauſe he was fully perſwaded that all things came by deſtiny. To what purpoſe are laws or puniſhments, rewards and dignities, priſons and axes, rods and Lictors, when it is injuſtice to puniſh a criminal for being unavoidably miſerable? and then all government is at an end when there can be no vertue nor vice, no juſtice nor injuſtice: for what is alike neceſſary, is equally juſt. But upon ſome ſuch account as this Plato ſaid that they are not to be ſuffered in a Commonwealth who ſaid that God is the Author of evil. * And what are likely to be the effects of that perſwaſion which is a great ingredient in the religion of ſome men, [That Dominion is founded in grace; that evil Princes may be depoſed; that hereticks may be excommunicated, and their ſubjects abſolved from the oath of their allegiance; that faith is not to be kept with hereticks; that it is lawful to tell a lie before a Magiſtrate, provided we think up the truth; that Kings are but executioners of the decrees of the Presbytery; that all things ought to be in common?] By ſuch propoſitions as theſe it is eaſy to overthrow the ſtate of any Commonwealth; and how ſhall the Prince help himſelf, if he have not power to forbid theſe and the like dangerous doctrines? A Common-wealth fram'd well by laws and a wiſe adminiſtration, can by any one of theſe be fram'd anew and overturn'd. It is therefore neceſſary that the Prince hold one end of this ſtaff, leſt himſelf be ſmitten on the head.

11. 2. The other great cauſe is this, Becauſe religion hath great influence upon perſons as well as actions; and if a falſe religion be ſet on foot, a religion that does not come from God, a religion that onely pretends God, but fears him not, they that conduct it can lead on the people to the moſt deſperate villanies and machinations. We read in the life of Henry the third of England, that when he had promis'd any thing to his Nobility that he had no mind to perform, he would preſently ſend to the Pope for a Bull of diſpenſation, and ſuppos'd himſelf acquitted: and who could ſuffer ſuch a religion that deſtroyed the being of contracts and ſocieties, or bear the evils conſequent to ſuch a religion? And of the ſame nature, but ſomething worſe in the inſtance, is that which Arnaldus Ferronius tels of, that the Roman Lawyers anſwer'd to Ferdinandus Davalus, that at the command of the Pope he might take up arms againſt the Emperour Charls the fifth, his Prince, without any guilt of Treaſon. And it was yet very much worſe which was done and ſaid by the Pope John 22. againſt the Emperor Lewis the 4. Quod ſi nobis obtemperare detrectaverit, Patriarchis, Epiſcopis, cunctis Sacerdotibus, Principibus, Civitatibus imperamus ut eundem deſerant, ac nobis parere cogant, Patriarchs and Princes, Biſhops and Prieſts were not onely allowed, but commanded to forſake their Emperour, & to compel him to obey the Biſhop of Rome. By theſe and much more it appears, the evil Miniſters of a falſe religion have great powers of doing what they pleaſe:

They make the people abſolute ſlaves, and lift them up again with boldneſs to doe miſchief. Ἐτοιμότατον εἰς δεισιδαιμονίαν τὸ βαρβαρικὸν, ſaid Plutarch, The rude people are eaſy and apt to ſuperſtition: and when they are in, they are ready for any violence. Superſtitione qui eſt imbutus quietus eſſe non poteſt, ſaid Cicero: they cannot be quiet when they have got a wild propoſition by the end. And this is too much verified by the hiſtories of almoſt all nations: for there is none but hath ſmarted deeply by the factions and hypocriſies of Religion. The Prieſts of Jupiter in the Iſland of Meroe did often ſend the people to kill their Kings. Eunus a Roman ſlave arm'd 60000 men upon pretence of a religious extaſy and inſpiration, Maricus in France did the like: ſo did an Egyptian in the time of Claudius the Emperor, mention'd by Joſephus, who led after him 30000. men againſt the Romans. The two falſe Chriſts, the one in the time of Veſpaſian, the other under Hadrian, prevailed to the extreme ruine of their miſerable country-men. Leo & the Turkiſh Annals tell us ſtrange events & overthrows of Government brought to paſs by the arts of religion in the hands of Elmahel and Chemin Mennal in Africa: the firſt taking the Kingdome of Morocco from Abraham their King, together with his life; the other forcing the King of Feſſe to yield unto him the Kingdome of Temeſna. In Aſia Shacoculis of the Perſian Sect by his religion arm'd great numbers of men, and in three great battails overthrew the Turkiſh power, and put to hazard all their Empire.

12. They that knew none of theſe ſtories did know others like them, and at leaſt knew the force of religion to effect what changes pleaſed them who had the conduct of it; and therefore all wiſe Princes, ancient and modern, took care to prevent the evil by ſuch remedies and arts of government as were in their hands. Three remedies were found out; two by men, and one by God.

13. 1. The ancient governments of the world kept themſelves and their people to the religion of their nation, that which did comply with their government, that which they were ſure would cauſe no diſturbance, as being that which was a part of the Government, was bred up with it, and was her younger ſiſter; but of forraigne rights and ſtrange and new religions they were infinitely impatient: by the prohibition and excluſion of which by their civil laws, as the ſupreme power ſecur'd the intereſt and peace of the republick, ſo it gave demonſtration that the civil power was ſupreme alſo in the religion. Upon this account we find that Ariſtotle and Anaxagoras were accuſed; Socrates and Protagoras were condemn'd, for holding opinions and teaching contrary to the religion of their country, and it was uſual with the Athenians ſo to proceed: ſo Joſephus writes of them, ὥστε καὶ τὸν ἅπαξ μόνον περὶ τῶν ἐκείνοις νόμιμων φθεγξάμενον περὶ θεῶν ἀπειρημένων κολάζειν, they did ſeverely puniſh any man that ſpeak but a word againſt the religion eſtabliſhed by law. The Scythians alſo put Anacharſis to death for celebrating the feaſt of Bacchus by the Grecian rights——For theſe nations accounted their country gods to be entertain'd and endear'd by their country religion, and that they were diſpleas'd with any new ceremonies. But this thing was moſt remarkable in the ſtate of Rome. For this was one of the charges which they gave to the Ædiles, Ne qui niſi Romani Dii neque alio more quam patrio colerentur. And Marcus Æmilius recited a Decree to Liv. lib. 39. this purpoſe, Ne quis in publico ſacrove loco novo aut externo ritu ſacrificaret. And this they made a ſolemn buſineſs of, ſaith Livy, quoties Patrum Avorumque ætate negotium Magiſtratibus datum eſt ut ſacra externa fieri vetarent, In the daies of our Anceſtors they often made laws forbidding any ſtranger rites; but commanded that onely their own country gods ſhould be worſhipped, and that after their country manner. For this was enjoyned in the laws of the XII. Tables, Nemo ſeparatim Deos cabeſſit. No man muſt have a religion of his own, but that which is appointed by laws. And upon this ſtock Claudius baniſhed the Jews from Rome, and quite extinguiſh'd the ſuperſtition of the Druides, which Auguſtus Cæſar had ſo often prohibited. But moſt full to this purpoſe is the Narrative which Dio makes of the counſel which Mecænas gave to young Octavian, τὸ μὲν θεῖον πάντη πάντως αὐτός τε σέβου καὶ τὰ πάτρια κὴ τὸς ἄλλους ἡμᾶν ἀνάγκαζε· τὸς δ' ξενίζοντάς τι περὶ αὐτὸ μίσει κὴ κόλαζε, ὅτι καινά τινα δαιμόνια οἱ τοιοῦτοι ἀνθισφέροντες πολλὸς ἀναπείθουσιν ἀλλοδαπονομεῖν· κἀκ τούτου κὴ συνωμοσίαι κὴ συνάσεις ἐπιρρεῖαί τι γίγνονται, Worſhip God alwaies and every where according to your Country Cuſtoms, and compel others ſo to doe: but hate and puniſh the bringers in of ſtrange religions; becauſe they who bring in new Deities and formes of worſhip, they perſuade men to receive other laws, and make leagues, Covenants, factions and confederacies.

14. And therefore to prevent innovations in religion, the Romans often inquir'd after thoſe who had books of ſtrange religions, and when they
Liv. 5. dec. 3. & lib. 10. dec. 4. found any they burn'd them; as we find in Livy and Suetonius. They would not ſuffer the rites of religion to be publickly diſputed: and Auguſtus in Auguſto, c. 31. would not have the Cauſes of the Rites of Ceres heard in open Court. And when Ptolemy of Egypt was preſs'd to hear the Controverſy between the Jewes and the Samaritans concerning the Antiquity of their Religion, he would not admit any ſuch diſpute, till the Advocates would undertake their cauſe to be juſt upon the pain of death, ſo that they who were overcome in the cauſe ſhould die for it; and that they ſhould uſe no arguments but thoſe which were taken from the received laws of their Coun-Joſeph. lib. 13. Antiq. Judic. c. 6. try, the law of Moſes: they did ſo, and the advocates of the Samaritan party being overcome were put to death. For they knew that to introduce a new religion with fierceneſſe and zeal would cauſe diſturbances and commotions in the Common-wealth; and none are ſo ſharp, ſo dangerous and inteſtine as thoſe which are ſtirred by religion. Pro aris & focis is the greateſt of all contentions, for their Countrey religion and their Countrey dwellings: for their Altars and their hearths even old women and children will carry clubs and ſcalding water. * This caution therefore was alſo obſerv'd by religions would bring nothing but trouble and unquietneſſe.
* Novel. 103. c. 2. Chriſtian Princes. Juſtinian gave in charge to the Proconſul of Paleſtine to prevent all popular tumults which from many cauſes uſe to diſturb the Province, tum vero maximè ex diverſitate religionum.... quandoquidem ut multos illic tumultus exiſtere cernimus, neque leves horum eventus: but eſpecially thoſe that proceed from diverſities of religion; for this begets many tumults, and theſe uſually ſit very heavy upon the Common-wealth: the changes of religion being moſt commonly the moſt deſperate paroxyſmes that can happen in a ſickly ſtate. Which Leontius Bp. of Antioch expreſs'd prettily by an Emblem; for ſtroaking of his old white head, he ſaid, When this ſnow is diſſolv'd, a great deal of dirty weather would follow: meaning when the old religion ſhould be queſtion'd and diſcountenanc'd, the new religions

15. This courſe of forbidding new religions is certainly very prudent, & infinitely juſt and pious. Not that it is lawful for a Prince to perſecute the religion of any other Nation, or the private opinion of any one within his owne; but that he ſuffer none to be ſuperinduc'd to his owne to the danger of peace and publick tranquillity. The perſuaſions of religion are not to be compell'd: but the diſturbances by religion are to be reſtrained by the laws. And if any change upon juſt reaſon is to be made, let it be made by authority of the ſupreme: ut reſpublica ſalva ſit; that he may take care that peace and bleſſings may not goe away to give place to a new probleme. When it is in the Princes hands he can make it to comply with the publick laws, which he then does beſt of all when he makes it to become a law it ſelf. But againſt the law no man is to be permitted to bring in new religions, excepting him onely who can change the law, and ſecure the peace. Beyond this no compulſion is to be us'd in religion: πεοτρεπλικὴ γὰρ ἡ πᾶσα θεοσέβεια ζωῆς τῆς νῦν καὶ τῆς μελλούσης ὄρεξιν ἐγγεννῶσα τῆ συγγενεῖ λογισμῷ, ſaid S. Clemens Alexandrinus, All religion muſt enter by exhortation; for it is intended to beget a deſire in our mind that is of the ſame cognation, a deſire of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. The ſame with that of Theodoricus King of the Romans, Religionem imperare non poſſumus, quia nemo cogitur ut credat invitus: and Theobaldus writing to the Emperor Juſtinian argued well, Since God himſelf is pleas'd to permit many religions, we dare not by force impoſe any one; for we remember to have read that we muſt ſacrifice to God with a willing mind, not by the command of any one that compels. And therefore the old Romans, the Greeks, the Scythians, although they would admit no new religion amongſt their own people, would permit to every Nation to retain their own; by this practice of theirs declaring that religion is not tobe forc'd abroad, nor chang'd at home, but that it was by the ſupreme power of the Republick to be conducted ſo as to comply with the intereſt of the Commonwealth. This was the firſt remedy againſt the evils of religious pretences; which by being conducted in the hands of the Civil power ſhews that to be ſupreme even in the Queſtions of Religion.

16. 2. The other which was found out by Men, is that they did take the prieſthood into the hands of the ſupreme civil power; and then they were ſure that all was ſafe. The Egyptians choſe their prieſts out of their Schools of learning, and their Kings out of their Colledges of Prieſts. The Kings of Aritia, a place not far from Alba, were alſo prieſts of Diana: The ſame is reported of the prieſts of Bellona, that they were the Kings of Cappodocia, ſaith Hirtius; and the prieſts of Pantheon were ſupreme Judges of all cauſes, and conductors of all their warres. The Kings of Perſia were alwayes conſecrated to be Princes of the ceremonies, ſo was the King of Lacedæmon: and at this day the Kings of Malabar are alſo Bramenes or prieſts; and it was a law amongſt the Romans, Sacrorum omnium poteſtas ſub Regibus eſto, The power of religion and all holy things was to be under their Kings: and Virgil ever brings in his Prince Æneas as preſident of the ſacrifical rites; and of ſomething to the ſame purpoſe Ovid makes mention,

The King with the ſacrifice of a Ram was to appeaſe the Gods. So did Romulus and Numa; Romulus auſpiciis, Numa ſacris conſtitutis fundamenta jecerunt Romanæ civitatis, ſaid Cicero: they built Rome, and religion was the foundation of the city. And the ſame cuſtome deſcended with the ſucceeding Kings, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus reports, Πρῶτον μὲ ἱερῶν καὶ θυσιῶν ἡγεμονίαν εἶχεν, καὶ πάντα δι' ἐκείνου πράττεσθαι τὰ πρὸς θεὸς ὁσίως, They had the government of all ſacrifices and holy rites, and whatſoever was to be done to the Holy Gods, was done by them.

lib. 2. De nat. Deor.

17. When afterwards they ſeparated the prieſthood from the civil power, they appointed a ſacrificing King to take care of the rites, but they kept him from all intermedling with civil affaires; he might beare no office in the Common-wealth, nor have any imployment in the army, nor make an oration to the people, nor meddle with publick affaires: and yet beſides this caution, the ſupreme Magiſtrate was Pontifex Maximus; and although he did not uſually handle the rites, yet when he pleas'd he made laws concerning the Religion, and puniſh'd the Augurs, and the Veſtal virgins, and was ſuperior to the Rex ſacrorum, and the whole College of prieſts.

Feſtus Pompeius, lib. 17. Dionyſ. Halic. lib. 4. A. Gell. lib. 10. cap. 15. Liv. lib. 2.

18. But when the Common-wealth was changed into Monarchy, Auguſtus annexed the great Pontificate to the Imperial dignity, and it deſcended even to the Chriſtian Emperors, who becauſe it was an honourary title, and was nothing but a power of diſpoſing religion, they at firſt refus'd it not: but upon this account it was that Tacitus ſaid of the Roman Emperor, nunc Deûm munere ſummum Pontificem ſummum hominum eſſe, The greateſt prieſt is alſo the greateſt Prince.* Now this device of theirs would indeed doe their buſineſſe, but it was more then was needfull. For though it were certain that religion in the hands of the ſupreme Magiſtrate ſhould never diſturb the publick; yet it might be as ſure if the Miniſtery were in other hands, and the Empire and conduct of it in their own. And that was Gods way.

Annal. lib. 3.

19. 3. For God hath intruſted Kings with the care of the Church, with the cuſtody of both the Tables of his Law, with the defence of all the perſons of his Empire; and their charge is to preſerve their people in all godlineſſe and honeſty, in peace and in tranquillity: and how this can be done without the ſupreme care and Government of religion is not eaſie to be underſtood.

4. But this appears in that Kings, that is, the ſupreme power of every Nation, are vicegerents of Chriſt, who is Head of the Church, and Heire of all things; He ruleth with a rod of iron; He is Prince of the Kings of the earth; The onely potentate, King of Kings and Lord of lords; To him is given all power in Heaven and Earth, and by him Kings reigne. So S. Athanaſius, * λαμβάνων ὐν ὁ Χριστὸς τὸν θρόνον μετέστησεν αὐτὸν καὶ ἔδωκε τοῖς ἁγίοις Χριστιανῶν βασιλεῦσιν ἐπαναστρέψαι τύτους ὅτι τὸν οἶκον Ἰακὼβ, Chriſt taking his throne hath tranſlated it & given it to holy Chriſtian Kings to return them back to the houſe of Jacob. The Fathers of the Council of Ariminum writing to Conſtantius the Arrian Emperor, ſay to him, that by Chriſt he had his Empire given him; δι' ὃ [Χριστοῦ] σοὶ καὶ τὸ βασιλεύειν ὕτως ὑπῆρξεν ὡς καὶ τῆς καθ' ἡμᾶς οἰκυμένης κρατεῖν, By him thou art art appointed to reigne over all the world. And upon this account Libetius gave him this advice, μὴ μάχου πρὸς τὸν δεδωκότα σοι τῷ ἀρχῷ ταύτῃ· μὴ ἀντ' εὐχαριστίας ἀσεβήσῃς εἰς αὐτὸν, Fight not againſt him who hath given thee this Empire; and in ſtead of thanksgivings, pay him not with diſhonour. For the Prince being an Arrian and denying the Divinity of Chriſt, did diſhonour the Prince of the Kings of the earth, who had deſerved better at his hands. The conſequent of this conſideration is this, If Chriſt as the ſupreme King does rule his Church, and in this kingdome hath deputed the kings of the earth, and his vicars they are, then they are immediately under him in the Government of Chriſts Church. For Chriſt in Heaven is both King and Prieſt. As King he reigns over all the world for the glory of his Father and the good of his elect; as Prieſt he intercedes for all mankind, and particularly for them who ſhall be heires of Salvation. Now in both theſe relations he hath on earth deputed certain perſons to adminiſter and to imitate his kingdome and prieſthood reſpectively. For he governs all the world, but he does it by his Angel Miniſters, and by Kings his deputies. He officiates in his prieſthood himſelf, and in this he hath no deputy; for he intercedes for us continually: but he hath appointed an order of holy and conſecrated perſons to imitate the offices of this prieſthood, to miniſter the bleſſings of it to the people, to repreſent the death of the Croſſe, to preach pardon of ſins to the penitent, to reconcile lapſed and returning ſinners, that is, to miniſter to the people all the bleſſings which he by the office of prieſthood procures in Heaven for us. Now it is certain that he hath made deputies of his Kingdome; for all power being given to him as the great King, there can be no Government upon earth but what he appoints. The Government is upon his ſhoulders, and all the earth is his inheritance, and therefore from him all juſt Government is deriv'd. Now it being manifeſt that he is the fountain of all Kingly power, it is alſo as manifeſt that all this power is delegated to the Kings of the earth; for by me Kings reigne, ſaith the wiſdome of God, and it is one of his moſt glorious appellatives, that he is Prince of the Kings of the earth; and it is as certain that none of this kingly power was given to the miniſters of religion, but expreſsly denied to them. The Kings of Nations exerciſe dominion; that's their province: but it ſhall not be ſo amongſt you: But he that is greateſt amongſt you let him be your miniſter. That's your ſtate, you are miniſters of the kingdome to other purpoſes, in other manners; you doe your work by ſerving, by humility, by charity, by labours and compliance, by gentle treatments and the gentleſt exhortations; nothing of a King is to be in you, but the care: ὅτι σωπλεῖν τῷ βασιλείαν τῇ ἱεροσωμῃ συγκλώθειν δεῖ τὰ ἀσύγκλωστα, for to joyne the kingdome and the prieſthood Evangelical is to joyne in one band things of the moſt differing nature: Syneſ. for the name of Kings hath power and conſtraint, Rods and axes; the name of prieſts and Apoſtles hath in it nothing but gentle manners and holy miniſteries. Kings can compel; the miniſters of religion muſt intreat. They can kill; but at the moſt theſe can but rebuke ſharply. Theſe can cut off from ſpiritual communion, and deny to give them myſteries that will hurt the wicked and the indiſpos'd; but they can cut them off from life it ſelf. Kings juſtly ſeek honours, wealth and dignity, and it is allowed them by laws and by neceſſity, and by their reaſon: But prieſts muſt not ſeek their owne, but only the things of Jeſus Chriſt. They muſt indeed be maintain'd; the oxe cannot labour if his mouth be muſled: but though this be his maintenance it muſt be no part of his reward. Our bleſ-

Matth. 20. 25. ſed Saviours word is rendred by S. Matthew by κατακυριεύειν, The Kings of the people doe rule Imperiouſly. This very word is alſo us'd by S. Peter, and forbidden to the elders of the Church, and to it is oppos'd ποιμαίνειν, to feed the flock like ſhepherds. The manner of κυριεύειν us'd by S. Paul, or κατακυριεύειν us'd by S. Matthew and S. Peter, the exerciſing dominion is compulſion, and great riches: this is alſo forbidden to the Clergy, they muſt not doe any thing ἀναγκαστῶς, nor αἰσχροκερδῶς, not for profit to themſelves, not with violence or impoſing neceſſity upon others. The Miniſters of religion are very conſiderable in this Kingdome of Chriſt, to promote and to advance it by holy preachings and holy miniſtrations: but it is true which was ſolemnly declar'd in Babylon to the prince of the Captives, officium ipſi non poteſtatem injungi, et ab eo die incipiendum ipſi ſervire omnibus; their eminency is nothing but an eminency of ſervice, it is the greateſt miniſtery in the kingdome, but hath in it the leaſt of Empire. But of this I ſhall have occaſion to give a fuller account. For the preſent, that which the preſent argument intends to perſwade is, that the Miniſters of religion are onely officers under Chriſts prieſthood, but ſubjects in his kingdome, which is adminiſtred by Angels and Chriſtian princes in all the Imperial, in the defenſive and coactive parts and powers of it. The Chriſtian King or ſupreme magiſtrate can doe every thing πλὴν μόνου τοῦ ἱερουργεῖν, as Comatenus ſaid, onely except the ſacred Miniſteries: which is the ſame which was ſaid by the famous Biſhop of Corduba, Hoſius in Athanaſius; Neque igitur fas eſt nobis in terris Imperium tenere, neque tu ſacrorum et thymiamatum habes poteſtatem, Imperator, hoc eſt jus adolendi. The good Biſhop was ſpeaking of the fact of Oxias, who though he had power over the prieſts, yet had nothing to do to meddle with the rites of prieſthood: It is not lawful for us to meddle with Empire or the rights of Government; nor for thee, O Emperour, with the rites of incenſe. The ſumme is this, If Chriſt by his kingly power governs his Church, and Chriſtian Kings are his Deputies, then they alſo are the Supreme under Chriſt of the whole Government of the Church.

20. 5. So that now I ſhall not need to make uſe of the precedents of the Old Teſtament, nor recite how David order'd the courſes of the Levites, the uſe of the bow in the Quire, the ſolemnities of publick ſervice, nor how Solomon put Abiathar from the High-prieſthood, nor how Jehu, nor Hezekiah, nor Joſiah reform'd religion, pull'd down Idols, burnt the groves, deſtroyed the worſhip of Baal, reduc'd the religion of the God of Iſrael. This indeed is an excellent argument, becauſe it was a time in which God gave his Prieſts more ſecular eminency and external advantages then ever he did ſince, and alſo becauſe Chriſt chang'd nothing in the kingdomes of the earth; he left them as he found them, onely he intended to make them miniſters and portions of his kingdome; and that they ſhould live privately, and govern publickly by his meaſures, that is, by the juſtice and mercy Evangelical. But this argument I was the more willing to touch upon becauſe the Church of England much relies upon it in this queſtion, and excommunicates thoſe who deny the Supreme civil power to have the ſame authority in cauſes Eccleſiaſtical, which the pious Kings of the Hebrews had over the Synagogue: But I find the ancient Doctors of the Church preſſing much upon the former medium, That Chriſt hath ſpecially intruſted his Church to Chriſtian Princes. For, 21. 6. Chriſt ſhall call Chriſtian Kings to account for ſouls. Cognoſcant Principes ſeculi Deo ſe debere rationem reddere propter Eccleſiam quam à Chriſto tuendam ſuſcipiunt. Nam ſive augeatur pax & diſciplina Eccleſiæ per fideles Principes, ſive ſolvatur, ille ab eis rationem exigit qui eorum poteſtati ſuam Eccleſiam credidit, ſaid Iſidore Hiſpalenſis. Let the Princes of the world know that they muſt give an account to God for the Church which they have received from Chriſt into their Protection. For whether the peace and Diſcipline of the Church be encreaſed by faithful Princes, or whether it be diſſolv'd, he who hath intruſted his Church to their power will exact an account from them. And therefore P. Leo to Leo the Emperor gave this advertiſement, Debes incunctanter advertere Regiam poteſtatem tibi non ſolum ad mundi regimen, ſed maximè ad Eccleſiæ præſidium eſſe collatam, You muſt diligently remember that the ſupreme power is given to you not onely for the government of the world, but eſpecially for the ſafety and defence of the Church. Now this defence not being onely the defence of guards, but of lawes, not onely of perſons, but eſpecially of Religion, muſt needs inferre that Kings have ſomething more to doe in the Church then the Court of Guards hath: he defends his ſubjects in the ſervice of God; he defends and promotes this ſervice; he is not to defend them if they diſſerve Chriſt, but to puniſh them, and of this he is Judge and Exactor: and therefore this defence declares his right and Empire. Ex quo Imperatores facti ſunt Chriſtiani res Eccleſiæ ab ipſis dependiſſe: ſo Socrates expreſſes this queſtion. Ever ſince the Emperors became Chriſtian the affaires of the Church have depended upon them. They did ſo before, but they did not look after them: they had the power from Chriſt, but they wanted his grace: they owed duty to him, but they paied it not, becauſe they had no love for him. And therefore Chriſt took what care he pleas'd, and ſupported it in perſecution, and made it grow in deſpite of oppoſition: and when this he had done long enough to prove that the religion came from God, that it loſt nothing by perſecution, but that his ſervants loved him and died for him, then he called the Princes into the houſe of Jacob, and taught them how to adminiſter his power to the purpoſes of his own deſignement. Hence come thoſe expreſſions us'd often by Antiquity concerning Kings, calling them Vicarios Dei, veræ religionis Rectores, εὐσεβείας καὶ πίστεως ἀρχηγούς, the Deputies of God, Governours of true Religion, the Captains and Conductors of faith and Godlineſſe; ad quorum curam, de qua Deo rationem reddituri erant, res illa maximè pertinebat, For to their care Religion and the Church did belong, and concerning that care they were to give an account to God.

6. Chriſt

22. Now if we deſcend to a conſideration of the particular charges and offices of Kings in relation to the Church, it will not onely be a mighty verification of the Rule, but alſo will miniſter to the determination of many caſes of Conſcience concerning Kings and concerning the whole order Eccleſiaſtical. This I ſhall doe in the following Rules, which are but appendices to this.

Rule V.

Kings have a legiſlative power in the affaires of Religion and the Church.

1. THis is expreſſely taught by S. Auſtin. In hoc Reges ſicut eis divinitus præcipitur Deo ſerviunt in quantum Reges ſunt, ſi in ſuo regno bona jubeant, mala prohibeant, non ſolùm quæ pertinent ad humanam ſocietatem, verùm etiam quæ pertinent ad Divinam religionem, In this Kings in that capacity ſerve God according to the Divine Commandement, if in their reſpective kingdomes they command good things and forbid evil, not onely in relation to humane ſociety, but in order to religion.

Contr. Creſcon. l. 3. c. 51.

2. The leaſt part of this power is to permit the free exerciſe of it, and to remove all impediments, and to give it advantages of free aſſemblies, and competent maintenances and juſt rewards and publick encouragements. So Cyrus and Darius gave leave and guards and reſcripts, warranty and proviſions and command to the Jewes of the Captivity to build the Temple. So Conſtantine and Licinius did to the Chriſtians to practiſe their religion. Thus Hezekiah and ſome other pious Kings of the Hebrews took away the offences of the people, the brazen ſerpent, the groves and images, the altar of Bethel, and the idolatrous ſervices. And of theſe things there is little queſtion; for the Chriſtian Princes by their Authority ſhut up the Temples of the Heathen Gods.

3. That which is yet more conſiderable is, that by puniſhments they compel their Subjects to ſerve God and keep his Commandements. That which was obſerved of the Primitive Chriſtians, that they tied themſelves by oaths and Covenants to ſerve God, to doe juſtice, not to commit adultery, to hurt no man by word or deed, to doe good to every man they could, to aſſemble together to worſhip Chriſt, that Chriſtian Princes are to ſecure by laws, that what men will not doe by choice, they may whether they will or no; and this not onely in things relating to publick peace and the intereſt of the Republick, but in the immediate matters of religion: ſuch as are laws againſt ſwearing, againſt Blaſphemy, againſt drunkenneſſe and fornication and the like, in which the intereſt of ſouls is concerned, but not the intereſt of publick peace. Hoc jubent Imperatores quod jubet Chriſtus; and it is a great ſervice to Chriſt that the fear of men be ſuperadded; becauſe to wicked perſons and ſuch for whom the ſeverity of laws was made, it often prevailes more then the fear of God.

4. But that which is more then all this is, that beſides thoſe things in which God hath declar'd his will, the things of the Church, which are directly under no Commandement of God, are under the ſupreme power of Chriſtian Princes. I need no other teſtimony for this but the laws themſelves which they made, and to which Biſhops and Prieſts were obediene and profeſs'd that they ought to be ſo. And this we find in the inſtance of of divers Popes who in their epiſtles gave command to their Clergy to obſerve ſuch laws which themſelves had received from Imperial edicts. For there are divers laws which are by Gratian thruſt into his collection which were the laws of Chriſtian Princes. The Canon Judicantem. 13. q. 5. expreſſing the office of a Judge in the Cognſance of cauſes, attributed by Gratian to Pope Eleutherius, was a law made by the Emperor Conſtantine, l. 1. C. de Judic. C. Theodoſ. and ſo was that which was attributed to P. Fabian againſt accuſers, Can. ſi quis iratus: it is in the Theodoſian Code and was made by the ſame Prince. The Canons which goe under the names of [a] Sixtus and [b] Adrian and Fabian before cited of the ſame title were made by Gratian the ſonne of Valentinian the Elder: who alſo made the reſcripts for reſtitution of Church-goods taken from Biſhops when they were forc'd from their Sees, attributed to Pope Caius and Pope John. Theodoſius the Emperour made the Canon qui ratione * for order in accuſations, which yet is attributed to Pope Damaſus, but is in the Theodoſian Code: for thus the Popes eaſily became law-givers when they adopted into the Canon the laws of their Princes, which by their authority prevail'd beyond the memory of their firſt makers. The Canon Conſanguineos, for ſeparation of marriage within the prohibited degrees, was not the Popes, but made by Theodoſius, as it is thought, at the inſtance of S. Ambroſe: and Valentinian made the Canon Privilegia for confirmation of the privileges of the Church, which goes under the Name of Anacletus. I could reckon divers others, for indeed the volume of the Decrees is full of ſuch conſtitutions which the Chriſtian Emperors made, but they were either aſſumed by the Popes or imputed to them. But that the Popes as Eccleſiaſtics had no authority to make laws of Eccleſiaſtical affaires, but that the Emperors had, was ſufficiently acknowledged by Pope Honorius. Imperator Juſtinianus decrevit ut Canones Patrum vim legum habere oporteat, That the Canons of the Fathers became a law in the Church, was by the conſtitution of the Emperor Juſtinian. For that was all the end both of the labours of warre and the Counſels of peace, ut veram Dei cultum orbis noſtri plebs devota cuſtodiat, ſaid Theodoſius and Honorius in their letters to Marcellinus: that our people may devoutly follow the true worſhip of God.

5. Upon this account we find that Conſtantine, Anaſtaſius and Juſtinian made laws concerning the expence and rites of ſepulture. Gratian, Valentinian and Theodoſius forbad dead corps to be interred within the memorials of Martyrs and Apoſtles. Honorius appointed the Number of Deanes in the Metropolis, and the Immunities of every Church. Leo and Anthemius forbad alienation of Church-lands. But what ſhould I inſtance in particulars? they that know not this are wholly ſtrangers to the Civil law, particularly the firſt book of the Code, the Authentics, the Capitulars of the French Princes, the laws of the Goths and Vandals, and indeed of all the Chriſtian Princes of the world. But the firſt titles of the Code, De ſumma Trinitate & fide Catholica, De ſacroſanctis Eccleſiis, De Epiſcopis & Clericis, De Epiſcopali Audientia, De hæreticis, Manichæis, Samaritis, De Apoſtatis, and divers other are witneſſes beyond exception. * Now in this there is no exception of matter. For whatſoever is under Government is alſo under the laws of Princes: μηδὲν ἄβατον ἐστιν εἰς ζήτησιν τῇ βασιλείᾳ, ſaid Juſtinian. Nothing comes amiſſe to the Prince, every thing is under the Royal cogniſance. Conſtantine made laws concerning feſtivals, and appointed what labours might and what might not be done upon the Lords day; and ſo did Leo the Emperour. Valentinian the Elder made a law that no Clergy-man ſhould receive an inheritance by the will or gift of widdows and orphans, unleſſe they were of the Kindred. S. † Ambroſe complains heavily of the law, and ſo does S. Hierome*, but confeſſes it was juſt, and procur'd by the avarice of ſome Clergy-men who under cover of religion made a prey of the widdows. But this Decree was ſent to Pope Damaſus and publickly read in the Churches of Rome. And Honorius the Emperor made a law concerning the election of the Pope. Which two laſt inſtances I reckon to be very great, becauſe at Rome now-a-daies they are intolerable.

6. But if all theſe laws were made by Emperors onely by force, againſt right & juſtice, & beyond their juſt power, then we are never the nearer for this argument: & that it is ſo, Baronius is bold to affirm, who upon this title blames Juſtinian for medling with the affaires of the Church: for Quid Imperatori cum Eccleſia? what hath the Emperor to doe with the Church? we know who ſaid it. And therefore a Synod at Rome under Symmachus abrogated a law made by Baſilius a Deputy of King Odoacer in an aſſembly of Eccleſiaſtical perſons, in the vacancy of the See Apoſtolick, upon the death of Simplicius. Now the law was a good law, it forbad the alienation of the goods of the Church; yet becauſe it was a law made by a laick, they thought fit to annul it.

tom. 7. A. D. 541.

7. To theſe things I anſwer, that it matters not what Baronius ſays againſt Juſtinian, for Pope Hadrian the 4th, who is much more to be credited, commends him, & propounds him as a great Example imitable by all Princes: and it was not Juſtinian alone, but very many other Princes both before and after Juſtinian: and therefore to ask what hath the Emperour to doe with the Church? might become Donatus (whoſe ſaying it was, and whom S. Auſtin confuted for ſaying ſo) but it becomes not any man that loves truth and order. As for the Roman Synod under Symmachus, the matter was this. He would needs make himſelf head of a Synod without the Biſhop, (for he was lately dead) and made a law with an Anathema for the Sanction, and would have it paſſe not for the law of the Prince, but for a law of the Church; which becauſe the Eccleſiaſtics had no reaſon to accept for ſuch, when it was not ſo, they did annul it: talem legem viribus carere, nec poſſe inter Eccleſiaſtica ullo modo cenſeri, ſaid Eulalius the Bp. of Syracuſe in that Synod. *But that this makes nothing againſt the Prince his power of making laws, appears by the great ſubmiſſion which even the Biſhops of Rome themſelves made to the Imperial laws, even when they lik'd them, and when they lik'd them not. I inſtanc'd before in Damaſus cauſing the law of Valentinian againſt Clergy-men receiving inheritances from widdows to be read in all the Churches of Rome. Pope Boniface conſented to the law which Honorius the Emperor made about the election of the Pope, and was ſo far from repudiating an Eccleſiaſtical law made by the Prince, that he intreated him to make it. But that which is moſt material to this inquiry is, the obedience of S. Gregory the great to Mauritius the Emperor, who made a law that no Souldier ſhould turn Monk without his leave. This S. Gregory eſteem'd to be an impious law, he modeſtly admoniſhed the Emperour of the irreligion of it. But Maurice nevertheleſſe commanded him to publiſh the law. The good Biſhop knew his duty, obeyed the Prince, ſent it up and down the Empire, and gave this account of it: Utrobique qua debui exolvi, qui Imperatori obedientiam prabui, & pro Deo quod ſenſi minimè tacui, I have done both my dutyes, I have declar'd my mind for God, and have paid my duty and obedience to the Emperour. Legibus tuis ipſi quoque parent Religionis Antiſtites, ſaid Pope Gelaſius to Anaſtaſius the Emperor. Epiſt. 10. Even the Biſhops, the Miniſters of Religion, obey thy laws. Now this is not for decency onely, & upon prudent conſiderations, but upon neceſſity and by the Divine authority: cognoſcentes Imperium tibi ſupernâ diſpoſitione collatum, as knowing that the Empire is given to thee by God. And therefore the great Prelates of the Church, when they deſir'd a good law for the Churches advantage ſhould be made, they preſently addreſs'd themſelves to the Emperor, as to him who alone had the legiſlative power. I have already inſtanc'd in pope Boniface intreating Honorius to make a law concerning the election of the Pope. Sergius alſo Patriarch of Conſtantinople petition'd the Emperor Heraclius to publiſh a pragmatic ſanction that no man ſhould be admitted into the Clergy but into a dead place. * Theſe things are ſo plain, that I may juſtly uſe the words of the Fathers of the 6th Council of c. 14. Toledo, ſpeaking of Chintillanus their King, Nefas eſt in dubium deducere ejus poteſtatem cui omnium gubernatio ſuperno conſtat delegata judicio, It is impiety to call in queſtion his power, to whom the Government of all is certainly deputed by the Divine Judgement. I therefore conclude this particular with the excellent words of Cardinal Cuſanus. It becomes not any man to lib. 2. Cath. ſay that the moſt ſacred Emperors, who for the good of the Republick did make Concord. c. 40. many conſtitutions concerning the election of Biſhops, collation of benefices, obſervation of religions, did erre. Nay, we have read that the Pope of Rome hath intreated them that they would publiſh laws concerning Divine worſhip, & for the publick good, and againſt ſinners of the Clergy. And leſt peradventure it be ſaid that the ſtrength of all theſe Conſtitutions did depend upon the approbation of the Authority Apoſtolical or Synodical [viz. of the Pope or Council] I will not inſiſt upon this: although (let me ſay this) I have read and collected fourſcore and ſix chapters of Eccleſiaſtical Rules of the Antient Emperors, which were to no purpoſe to inſert here, and many other of Charles the Great and his ſucceſſors, in which many diſpoſitions or appointments are to be found concerning the Pope of Rome, and all Patriarchs, and the conſervation of Biſhops and others; and yet I never read that ever any Pope was ask'd to approve thoſe laws, or if his approbation did intervene, that upon that account the laws did bind. But it is read that ſome Popes of Rome have confeſs'd that they had thoſe Imperial laws in veneration. And this thing is ſo true and ſo publickly known, that the French Embaſſadors openly told it in the Council of Trent, that the Kings of France, by the Example of Conſtantine, Theodoſius, Valentinian, Juſtinian and other Chriſtian Emperors, made many laws concerning holy things, and that theſe did not onely not diſpleaſe the Roman Biſhops, but they put many of them into their Canons: that the chiefeſt Authors of theſe laws, Charles the Great and Lewis the ninth, they thought worthy to be Canonis'd and declar'd Saints, and that the Biſhops of France and the whole order Eccleſiaſtical have piouſly rul'd and govern'd the Gallican Church by the preſcript of thoſe Eccleſiaſtical laws which their Kings had made.

Rule

Rule VI.

The Supreme Civil Power hath a power of Coercion of every perſon in the whole Order Eccleſiaſtical.

1. He that ſayes all muſt be ſubject, need not inſtance in particulars, and ſay that Titius and Sempronius, and the village Curate, and the Biſhop of the Dioceſe muſt be ſubject. But yet becauſe of the pretences of ſome, the Fathers of the Church have found it neceſſary to ſay, that even Eccleſiaſtics muſt be ſubject; and that they are a part of the all. So S. Chryſoſtome explicating the words of S. Paul, ſaith [But Paul gives us thoſe reaſons which command us of duty to obey the powers; ſhewing that theſe things are commanded to all, not to Seculars only, but to Prieſts and Monks: which he ſhewes in the very beginning, when he ſaith, Let every ſoule be ſubject to the ſupereminent powers; although thou beeſt an Apoſtle, or an Evangeliſt, or a Prophet. For this obedience or ſubjection (be ſure) will not deſtroy thy piety. That S. Chryſoſtom here ſpeaks of ſecular powers is evident in the whole Homily, and it appears alſo in the words here reported; for he ſayes that even an Apoſtle muſt be ſubject, who becauſe he hath no Superior Eccleſiaſtical muſt be ſubject (if at all) to the Secular, or Supreme Civil power. And this place is ſo underſtood by S. Irenæus lib. 1. cap. 24. S. Baſil in Conſtit. monaſt. cap. 22. S. Ambroſe upon this place, and S. Auſtin lib. de Catech. rud. c. 21. and contr. Parmen. l. 1. c. 7. who expreſſely derides thoſe that expound the [higher powers of S. Paul] by Eccleſiaſtical honours.

Homil. 13. in Epiſt. ad Rom.

2. But this thing is evident by notoreity of fact. Theodoret tells of Euſebius Biſhop of Samoſata, that when the Imperial edict of baniſhing him from his See, and ſending him into Thrace, was brought by a meſſenger in the twilight, he charg'd him to ſay nothing, leſt the people ſhould tear the officer in pieces. But the Biſhop according to his cuſtome went to evening prayer; and then with one ſervant, with a book and a pillow went to the water ſide, took a boat and paſs'd over to Zeugma. The people having ſoon miſs'd their Biſhop, followed him, found him out, would fain have brought him back; but he refus'd, and told them is was the precept of the Apoſtle, to be obedient to the higher powers: and upon that he reſted, and they return'd. And the ſame was the ſubmiſſion, and the ſame was the reaſon of S. Athanaſius, as appears in his Apology to Conſtantius the Arrian Emperor; and the ſame ſubjection was profeſſed by Juſtin Martyr to Antoninus the Emperor, Nos ſolum Deum adoramus, et vobis in rebus aliis læti inſervimus, Imperatores ac Principes hominum profitentes, We onely worſhip God, in other things we chearfully ſerve you, as profeſſing you to be Emperors and the Princes of mankind. Ego quidem juſſioni ſubjectus, ſaid S. Gregory to Mauritius, I am ſubject to command: and then it is certain, he was ſubject to puniſhment in caſe he diſobeyed the command. Ad hoc poteſtas ſuper omnes homines Dominorum meorum pietati cœlitus data eſt. He had no more immunity then any man elſe, for from heaven a power is given given to the Prince over all men. The effect of this inſtance and theſe words of Gregory is acknowledged by Eſpencaus, Gregorius Magnus agnoſcebat Imperatoribus conceſſum eſſe dominari Sacerdotibus, Gregory the Great acknowledged that to the Emperors it was granted to rule over the Prieſts. And the ſame was affirmed by Pope Honorius, Sancta Eccleſia legum ſæcularium non reſpuit famulatum quæ æquitatis & juſtitiæ veſtigia imitantur, The Holy Church refuſes not to obey ſecular lawes that are equal and juſt.

But I undertook to evidence the truth of this Rule by matter of fact and authentic precedents. Conſtantine received the Libells which the Biſhops at Nice had prepar'd one againſt another. He told them indeed that it was more fit for them to judge him, then he them, and therefore he burn'd the papers; but this ſignified nothing but that it was a ſhame to them whoſe office was to reprove all ſinners, to accuſe one another of crimes before their Prince. But that this was nothing but a modeſt redargution of them appears, becauſe he did upon their condemnation of Arrius baniſh him, and recalled him without their abſolution of him. He baniſh'd Euſebius and Theognis, whom the Council had depos'd, and took cogniſance of the cauſe between Athanaſius and the Biſhops his accuſers; that it might appear what he had ſaid to the Prelates at Nice was but a modeſt reproof or a civil complement, for it was proteſtatio contra factum. If he ſaid that, he ſaid one thing and did another. * His ſon Conſtantius caus'd Stephen Biſhop of Antioch to be convened in the palace upon the law de vi publica, and the lex Cornelia de ſicariis. His lay-Judges heard him, found him guilty, and commanded the Biſhops to depoſe him from his Biſhoprick and expel him out of the Church. His brother Conſtans heard Narciſſus of Cilicia, Marcus the Syrian, Theodore of Thrace and Maris of Chalcedon againſt Athanaſius and Paul Biſhop of Conſtantiople. Valentinian the Emperor ſet a fine upon the head of Chronopius the Biſhop, and inflicted divers puniſhments upon the Biſhops Urſicinus, Ruffus, Urſus and Gaudentius for making ſchiſmes to the diſturbance of the publick peace. Gratian the Emperor depos'd Inſtantius, Salvianus and Priſcillian from their biſhopris and baniſh'd them, and afterwards recall'd them. Arcadius the Emperour heard S. Chryſoſtom's cauſe and baniſh'd him; and Pope Innocent, who found fault becauſe he gave wrong Judgment, yet blam'd him not for uſurping of a right to judge him. Theodoſius the yonger impriſon'd Biſhop Memnon and S. Cyril of Alexandria. Indeed the Prince was miſinform'd by John of Antioch; but when by the Great Epheſine council, he was rightly inſtructed, he condemn'd John of Antioch, and afterwards releaſed the two Biſhops at the great & paſſionate * petition and importunity of the Council of Epheſus. And when Ibas Biſhop of Edeſſa had excommunicated ſome prieſts of his Dioceſe, they appeal'd to the Emperor and were heard. Theodoric King of Italy receiv'd accuſations againſt Pope Symmachus, and ſent Altinus a Biſhop to be the viſitor of that See, and afterwards remitted the matter to a ſynod. Juſtinus the Emperor gave judgment upon Dorotheus Biſhop of Theſſalonica for ſedition and homicide. Juſtinian baniſh'd Julian the Biſhop of Halicarnaſſus, Severus Biſhop of Antioch, Peter of Apamea and Zoaras a Prieſt: but he alſo judged the cauſe of Pope Sylverius for certain treaſonable letters; and recalled him from baniſhment, but ſo that he ſhould not be reſtor'd to his See, unleſſe he were found innocent of the accuſation.

4. I could reckon very many more inſtances to the ſame purpoſe, but theſe are as good as more; eſpecially being but particulars of that power and juſt conſequence of that authority which I have prov'd by the lawes of God and the confeſſions of the Church to be inherent in the Supreme power. I ſumme up this with the words of Balſamo. Quia ſtatutum eſt nullum per alium injuriâ afficiendum, ipſe Patriarcha ab Imperatore, qui Eccleſiæ habet poteſtatis ſcientiam, judicabitur forte ut ſacrilegus, vel malè de fide ſentiens, vel alicujus criminis reus: Hoc enim judicialiter actum vidimus diverſis temporibus, Becauſe it is commanded that one man ſhould not injure another, the Patriarch himſelf ſhall be judged of the Emperor, who hath cogniſance over the power of the Church peradventure for ſacrilege, or for hereſy, or for the guilt of any other crime; for we have divers times ſeen ſuch judicial proceſſes. And to the ſame purpoſe the ſeventh Canon of the firſt Council of Matiſcon ſubjects the Clergy to the ſecular Judge in the cauſes of theft, witchcraft and murder; and the Council of Toledo which is cited c. filiis 16. q. 7. does the like in the matter of robbery or coſenage. For either Clergy-men are not ſubjects, or they are bound by the lawes of their Prince. If they be not ſubjects, how come they free? If they be ſubjects, where is their privilege? or is the Spiritual calling of a nature ſo diſparate and eſtrang'd from the Commonwealth, that it is no part of it? or is it better then the Secular? The queſtions are worthy inquiring after; but the deciſion of them will take off many prejudices from this great meaſure of Conſcience, concerning the fountain of humane lawes and Judicatories.

ad Can. 12. ſyn. Antioch.

5. But upon a cloſer view of the particulars it will be found that the whole matter is a miſtake; a falſe conſequence drawn from a true eſtimate of religion: For all men grant that religion is the greateſt excellency, that our ſoules are the biggeſt intereſt, that all our wealth is beſt imployed when it is ſpent in Gods ſervice, that all things muſt yield to our duty to God: Theſe are all very true, as every thing elſe is when it is truly underſtood; but what then? Therefore the miniſters of religion are to be preferred before the miniſters of policy? Well, ſuppoſe that, for it is true that every thing is beſt in it's own place and time. But what? therefore the miniſters of religion are ſuperior to Princes, whoſe Government & care, whoſe office and imployment is meerly temporall? That will not follow; nor this, Therefore the miniſters of religion are in all things better; nor this, Therefore they are in nothing inferior; nor this, Therefore they are not ſubject to Civil Government, and civil puniſhments. But theſe things muſt be conſidered apart.

I. Queſtion.

In what ſenſe the ſervice of God is to be preferr'd before every thing elſe.

6. To this I anſwer, 1. That if the ſervice of God be taken in a ſenſe oppos'd to any other thing which is not the ſervice of God, there is no peradventure but it is to be preferred before every thing; for the queſtion is no more then this, whether we ought to ſerve God, or not to ſerve him. For if that which is not Gods ſervice comes in competition with that which is, if the firſt be preferr'd, God is directly deſpis'd.

2. If

7. 2. If by the ſervice of God is meant the vertue of religion expreſs'd in externall action, as ſaying our Prayers, receiving the holy Sacrament, viſiting Churches, ſitting at the memorials of Martyrs, contemplation, faſting, ſilence, ſolitude, and the like, then it is as certain that the ſervice of God in this ſenſe is to be preferred before many things, but not before all things; not before many things of our ordinary life, not before many things of civil ſociety. For to keep a holy-day is a part of the ſervice of God, but not to be preferred before bodily labour in our trade, if that labour be neceſſary for the feeding our family with daily bread. Contemplation is an excellent part of the Divine ſervice; but charitable actions are more uſeful. To heare a good Sermon is good; but to ſnatch even an oxe out of a pit is to be preferr'd before it. This our Bleſſed Saviour taught us in thoſe excellent words, I will have mercy and not ſacrifice. For not onely the preciſe vertue of religion is the Divine ſervice, though by propriety it hath obtain'd the name: but the doing all our duties, the works of our calling, all charitable miniſteries, all uſeful trades, all the graces of the ſpirit expreſſed in actions and obedience, is the ſervice of God, and of one it cannot be ſaid, it is better then another; for they ſhall all be requir'd in their ſeaſon. For,

8. 3. It is one thing to inquire which is in it ſelf more excellent, and another thing to ask which we are to chuſe; one thing to ſay this is to be preferr'd in eſtimation, and another to ſay this is to be preferr'd in practice. Ecſtaſies and raptures and converſing with bleſſed ſpirits are certainly actions and paſſions reſpectively of greater eminency then dreſſing the ſores of poor boyes in Hoſpitals; and yet he that does this, ſerves Chriſt and does good, while he that followes after the others may fall into the deluſions of the Devil. That which is beſt in it ſelf is not beſt for me: it is beſt for the beſt ſtate, but not for the ſtate of men who dwell in imperfection. Strong meat is better then milk, but this is beſt for babes; and therefore he would but ill conſult to the good of his child who, becauſe it is a princely boy, would feed him with bief and veniſon, wild boare and the juice of great fiſhes. Certainly a Jewel is better then a piece of frize; and Gold is a more noble and perfect ſubſtance then barly: and yet frize and barly doe in their ſeaſon more good then gold and Jewels, and are therefore much more eligible. For every thing is to be accounted of in it's own place and ſcene of eminency: the eye loves one beſt, and the tongue and palate, the throat and ſtomack love the other. But the underſtanding which conſiders both gives the value according to the degree of uſefulneſſe, and to the end of it's miniſtery. Now though our underſtanding can conſider things in their own perfections, and proportion honour and value to them; yet that which is better then honour, love and deſire, union and fruition are due to thoſe things moſt, which it may be we honour leaſt. And therefore there are ſome parts of the ſervice of God which are like meat and cloths, and ſome which are like gold and Jewels; we value and admire theſe, but we are to chuſe the other: that is, we preferre one in diſcourſe, and the other in uſe; we give better words to one, and better uſages to the other. And therefore thoſe parts of the Divine ſervice which are moſt neceſſary, and doe moſt good to mankind, are to be choſen before thoſe that look more ſplendidly, and in themſelves import more perfection. The foundation of a houſe is better then the roof, though the roof be gilded; and that part of the ſervice of God which ſerves the needs of mankind moſt, is to be choſen before thoſe which adorn him better: ſo that actions of high and preciſe religion may be the excellencies and perfections of a humane ſoul; but the offices of civil governours, their keeping men in peace and juſtice, their affrighting them from vile impieties, may doe much more good to mankind, and more glory to God in the whole event of things.

9. 4. But then if it be inquir'd whether is better, Prayers or Government, a Pulpit or a Court of Judicature; I am to anſwer that they are both beſt in their time. The Pulpit rules on Sundays, the Court of Judicature all the week after. The Pulpit guides the Court, and the Court gives laws to the Pulpit. The Pulpit gives counſel to this, and this gives commands to that. But there is this difference, if the Pulpit ſays amiſſe we are not bound by it: but if the Court judges ill, we may complain, but we muſt ſubmit. But then to inquire which is better, when they are both the ſervants of God, is to make a faction in the houſe of Unity; and as there can be no good end ſerved in it, ſo there can be no good ground of reaſon or revelation by which it can be determin'd.

10. 5. If the queſtion at laſt be, whether is to be preferr'd, the ſervice of God, that is, an act of religion, or an act of civil life; I anſwer, that ordinarily religion is to be preferr'd, when there can be a queſtion reaſonably ask'd which is to be choſen. That is, if it be indifferent as to the perſon, there is no indifference in the thing: for the religious act does more honour to God and more good to us. But it is becauſe that where our life and time is empty of other duties, then and there is the time and proper ſeaſon of religion. But if it be not indifferent to the man, but an act of life or civil calling be in it's ſeaſon and appointment, then this is to be preferr'd before that.

11. 6. Laſtly, it is to be obſerved, that there are ſeaſons ordinary and extraordinary in our ſervices of God. Every thing in it's ſeaſon is to be preferr'd: and therefore upon Feſtivals we are to goe to Church and to publick offices, upon other days to follow the works of our calling: and ſo prefer both in their time. But ſometimes theſe ordinary ſeaſons are invaded by extraordinary neceſſities, and then that muſt prevail which is moſt neceſſary in it's ſeaſon, and the other muſt give place. Now becauſe this happens often in the needs of our life, and not very often in the needs of Religion, therefore in caſes of Natural or Political neceſſities, the things of the Commonwealth are to be preferr'd before the things of the Church; that is, the ſervice of God in charity before the ſervice of God in the vertue of external religion: and the reaſon is, becauſe this can ſtay, and the other cannot; and this can be ſupplied with the internall, that is, the religion of the heart, but that cannot be ſupplied with the charity of the heart.

Queſtion

Queſtion II.

Which are to be preferr'd, and which are better, things Spiritual or things temporal?

12. To this the Patrons of Eccleſiaſtic Monarchy give a ready anſwer out of S. Gregory Nazianzen, ſpeaking to the Preſidents. Nam vos quoque poteſtati meæ meisque ſubſelliis lex Chriſti ſubjicit. Imperium enim ipſi quoque gerimus, addo etiam præſtantius ac perfectius; niſi verò æquum eſt ſpiritum carni faſces ſubmittere, & cæleſtia terrenis cedere, The law of Chriſt hath ſubjected you alſo that are civil Magiſtrates to my chaire. For we alſo have an Empire, yea a better and more perfect then yours, unleſſe it be reaſonable that the Spirit ſhould ſubmit to the Fleſh, and heavenly things give place to earthly. For temporal things belong to the body, and ſpiritual things to the ſoul: by how much therefore the ſoul is above the body, by ſo much ſpiritual things are above the temporal. For a temporal end is and ought to be ſubordinate to a ſpiritual; becauſe temporal felicity is not the laſt end of man, but ſpiritual and eternal: this therefore being the greateſt, ought to be miniſtred to by the ceſſion of the temporal.

13. To this I anſwer, that temporal things ought to yield to ſpiritual, if by ſpiritual things be meant the glory of God, and the good of ſouls, but not to every thing that is ſpiritual. For though it be a ſpiritual imployment to ſerve God in the communion of Saints, and the life of a man be a temporal thing; yet a man is not bound to loſe his life to goe to publick churches, but for his own ſouls ſalvation, for the promotion of religion and the honour of God he is. A man is very much better then a beaſt; yet the life of a beaſt is better then the ſuperfluous hair of a mans beard. The honour and reverent uſage of Churches is a ſpiritual concern and a matter of religion; and yet when an army is hard put to it, they may defend themſelves by the walls and ſtrength, and preſerve their lives with an uſage of the Church, which was never intended by the patron that built it, or the Biſhop that conſecrated it. When temporal life and eternal are compar'd, when the honour of God or the advantage of a man are ſet in oppoſition, when the ſalvation of a ſoul and the profit of trade are confronted, there is no peradventure but the temporal muſt give way to the ſpiritual. But when a temporal neceſſity and a ſpirituall advantage are compar'd, the advantage in the nature of the thing is overballanc'd by the degree of the neceſſity, and the greatneſſe of the end: and it is better to ſell the chalices of the Church, and miniſter to religion in glaſſe or wood, then to ſuffer a man to ſtarve at the foot of the Altar. The conſequent of this conſideration is this, That although ſpiritual things are better then temporal, yet not every thing of ſpiritual nature or relation is to be preferr'd before all temporals.

14. 2. Another conſideration is this, that there is difference alſo in the degrees and meaſures of ceſſion or yielding. Temporal things muſt yield, that is, we muſt ſo order our affaires that by them we ſerve God; our money muſt goe forth in juſtice and charity, our time muſt yield up portions to religion, our perſons muſt decline no labour for Gods ſervice, and if ever there comes a conteſt between our duty and our profit, or our eaſe, or our advantage, we muſt by the loſſe of theſe ſecure our gaines and our intereſt in that. But this preferment of one before another does not conſiſt in giving to one ſecular advantages before the other, temporal honours, and precedences in proceſſions, in eſcutcheons and atchievements, but in doing the duty of that which is incumbent, and making the other miniſter to that which is more neceſſary. He that preferres religion before the world is not tied to beſtow more money upon his chappel then upon his houſe. If God had choſen him one place of reſidence, and a Temple for his houſe and for the religion of the Nation, as he did among the Jews, there had been a great decency & duty of doing ſo upon many accounts; for then the queſtion had been between religion and irreligion, zeal and contempt, love of God and neglect; and then the determination had been eaſy. But now ſince the whole end of internal Religion can be ſerv'd by giving to places of religion that adornment which may make the miniſteries decent and fitted, and of advantage; beyond this, when we come to a diſpute between that which is in order to a ſpiritual end, and that which ſerves a temporal, more things are to come into conſideration beſides the dignity of the relation.

15. 3. For it is yet further to be obſerved, that when it is ſaid that all temporal things are ſubordinate to our Spiritual ends, the meaning is, that all the actions of our life, all that we are, and all that we have, muſt be directed actually or habitually to the great end of man, the glorification of God and the ſalvation of our ſouls; becauſe God hath ordain'd this whole life in order to that; and therefore in the generality it is true that all temporal things are to miniſter to ſpiritual. But then this is to be added, that temporal things are not ordain'd to miniſter to ſpiritual intermedial things, ſuch, I mean, which are not directly and in circumſtances neceſſary. I muſt ſerve God with my ſubſtance; therefore I muſt by my ſubſtance contribute to the juſt and appointed miniſteries of religion: but it does not follow, that if the Church multiply Prieſts unneceſſarily, and God hath multiplied my children naturally, that therefore I muſt let my children want to feed the numerous company of them that can miniſter ſpiritual things. The whole is ſubordinate to the whole, that is all our temporalities are given us to ſerve God with: but then they are given us alſo to ſerve our own needs that we may ſerve God; but they are not any other ways ſubordinate, but to enable us to ſerve him, not to ſerve the particular ſpiritual end, unleſſe it be by accident, that is, not unleſſe we cannot ſerve God without it.

16. 4. For temporal things and ſpiritual things have both the ſame ſupernatural end, that is, Gods glory and eternal felicity. And ſometimes they ſeverally tend to this end, and then they are to goe their own ways, and not to miniſter and be ſubordinate to each other. But ſometimes they are to combine and to cooperate, and then temporal things muſt ſerve ſpiritual, and ſpiritual muſt ſerve the temporal. For example. The Temporal or Civil power hath for it's end publick tranquillity, that men may ſerve God in all Godlineſſe and honeſty. The Eccleſiaſtical power hath the ſame end: ἱεροσύνη δὲ βασίλεια εἰς ἓν ὁρῶσι τέλος, τῶν ὑπηκόων σωτηρίαν, ſaid Iſidore Peluſiot. I ſhall not now conſider the whole effect of this truth, but in order to the preſent ſay, that ſince both temporal and ſpiritual things miniſter to the ſame end, that is, ſalvation of mankind, they are diſtinct methods thods or inſtruments to that end, and of themſelves are not in ſubordination to one another; but as temporal things muſt ſerve ſpiritual when there is need, ſo muſt ſpiritual ſerve the temporal when they require it: The temporal power muſt defend religion, and religion muſt miniſter to the publick peace. The Prince muſt give advantages to the Miniſters of religion; and the Miniſters of religion muſt pray for the Princes armies, his proſperity, his honour, and by preachings and holy arts muſt give bridles to the ſubjects, keeping them in duty by the means of Conſcience. The Prince by laws and fear makes men juſt and temperate, chaſt and peaceable: The Prieſt does but the ſame thing by the word of his proper miniſtery. He that does it moſt effectually is the moſt happy: but he that will goe about to compare which does it moſt, and therefore is to be preferr'd, ſhall then hope to doe it proſperouſly when he can tell which ſide of the Æquinoctial hath moſt ſtarres, or whether have moſt drops of water, the Northern or the Southern ſeas. The ſumme of this conſideration is this, that although temporal things in their latitude are to ſerve ſpiritual ends, meaning the great end of the perfection of our Spirits: yet ſo muſt the intermedial ſpiritual things ſerve the ſame great end; but the intermedial temporal and the intermedial ſpiritual are not ſubordinate to one another, unleſs it be by accident, and that may and often does happen on either ſide.

17. But I muſt adde one thing more for explication; and that is, that though all things in the world are to miniſter to the great end of ſouls, and conſequently are ſubordinate to that great end; yet it is (that I may uſe S. Pauls expreſſion in another caſe) by reaſon of him that hath put all things under it: for this ſubordination is not natural, or by the nature of the thing, but by the wiſe Oeconomy and diſpoſition of God; who having appointed that all things ſhall be ſanctified by the word of God and prayer, that Natural powers ſhall be heightned by grace, and ſhall paſſe into ſupernatural, and this world into another, hath by his own poſitive order diſpos'd of temporal things and powers beyond their own intention. But otherwiſe, temporal things have an ultimate end of their own, terminating all their natural intention and deſign. Thus the end of the Mariners art is not the ſalvation of the ſouls of them that ſail with him, but the ſafe landing of their perſons and goods at the port: and he that makes ſtatues hath for his end a perfect image. Indeed the man may have another end, to get reputation, to maintain his family, to breed up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and at laſt the ſalvation of his own ſoul, by doing things honeſt and profitable: but though theſe may be the ends of the man, yet they are not the ends of his Art; and therefore his Art hath no natural ſubordination, becauſe it hath no natural order to Eternal ſalvation. And this is the caſe of many Temporal things, eſpecially Arts, offices, entercourſes and Governments. Therefore ſuppoſing all that is ſaid in the objection, that temporal felicity is not the laſt end of man, but ſpiritual and eternal, yet though it be not the end of a man, it may be the end of humane Government; and by not being in a natural order to ſpiritual ends, though ſpiritual be a better thing, yet it follows not that it ought to take place of that, upon the account of its being better in another kind. The body indeed is ſubordinate to the ſoul, becauſe it hath all its motion and operation and life from the ſoul, and in a natural conjunction and eſſential Union is it's appointed inſtrument: but Temporal things and Spiritual are not ſo conjoyned, and doe not naturally, but by accident miniſter to each other; and therefore are made ſubject to each other alternately, when they are called to ſuch accidental or ſupernatural Miniſtrations.

Queſtion III.

Whether are to be preferr'd, Spiritual or Temporal perſons?

18. How Spiritual things are to be preferr'd before Temporal I have already accounted; but it is a conſideration diſtinct from that, whether Spiritual perſons be to be preferr'd before Temporal. For from things to perſons it will not follow: and he that hath a better art is not always the better man; and he that is imployed in the beſt concernments, hath not always the advantage of profeſſion. There was a time in Rome when the Phyſicians were but ſervants, and had not the liberty of Romans; but certainly it is a better trade then fighting: and yet then the ſouldiers were accounted the greater men. Herod the Sophiſter had a ſonne that was a fool and could never learn the Alphabet, but he had two and twenty ſlaves that were wiſe fellows; but the Maſter was the better man. But when the queſtion is concerning the honour and dignity of perſons, we are to remember that honor eſt in honorante: many men deſerve honour that have the leaſt of it, and it is as it is put upon us by others. To be honour'd is to have ſomething put to them, it is nothing of their own. Therefore in this queſtion there are two things to be ask'd: the one is, what Spiritual perſons deſerve; the other is, what is given them. They may deſerve more then they have, or they may have more then they deſerve; but whether either or neither happens, He that honours himſelf, his honour is nothing; but he is honourable whom God or the King honours: and therefore ſpiritual perſons ought to receive much, but to challenge none; and above all things ought not to enter into compariſon with them from whom all temporal honour is deriv'd. But when the queſtion is concerning the prelation of Secular or Eccleſiaſtic perſons, the beſt anſwer is given to it, When they ſtrive to preferre one another in giving honour to each other. But I remember that the legates at Trent were horribly put to it to place the Orators of the Kings of France and Spain, who would both goe firſt: they at laſt found an expedient, and they did both goe firſt, and both were preferr'd in ſeveral poſitions. So is the ſpiritual perſon and the civil, they are both beſt, but the honour of one is temporal, and the honour of the other is ſpiritual; or rather, one is properly called Honour, and the other, Reverence. Honour the King, Reverence his Prieſts. But this Queſtion is not properly a queſtion of right, but of duty: and the ſpiritual man muſt not call for it, but the other muſt pay it. And it is ſomething a ſad conſideration to think that all the Queſtions of the preference and compariſon of ſpiritual and temporal perſons doe end in covetouſneſſe and ambition, to which ſpiritual eminency, let it be never ſo great, was never intended to miniſter. For the honour due to ſpiritual perſons for their ſpiritual relation is a ſpiritual honour, and that though it be never ſo great cannot well be compar'd with temporal; for it is a great honour in another kind: but whatſoever temporal honours are given to them, are then well given when they are done in love to religion; and are then well taken when the advantage paſſes on to the good of ſouls, and does not ſully the Spiritual man with ſpiritual pride, or temporal vanity. Socrates complains that the Biſhops of Alexandria and of Rome were fallen into

Empire,

Empire, or Dominion. That's none of the preference proper to a ſpiritual man. He is then honor'd, when his perſon is had in reverend and venerable eſteem, when his counſel is ask'd, when his example is obſerv'd and followed, when he is defended by laws and Princes, when he is reſcued from beggery and contempt, when he is enabled to doe his duty with advantages, when he can verify his Eccleſiaſtical power, when he can vindicate religion from oppreſſion, and laſtly, when his perſon which is the relative of religion receives thoſe advantages which as a man he needs, and which can adorne him as ſuch a man. But if he diſputes for any other honour, ſo much is his due as is given him by Chriſtian Princes or Commonwealths, and no more; and he will gain the more by making no further queſtion. Chriſt gave his Apoſtles power abundantly, but the greateſt honour he gave them was to ſuffer for his Name; and of this he promiſed they ſhould want nothing: but when Kings became nurſing Fathers of the Church, and ſhe ſuck'd the breaſts of Queens & princely women, then the Spiritual perſons & guides of ſouls had temporal honours heap'd on them, as the offerings were made for the Tabernacle, more then was ſufficient. For it quickly roſe into exceſſe, and then the perſons of the Prelates fell into ſecular affections, and grew hated and envied and oppos'd. Ammianus Marcellinus giving an account of that horrible ſedition raiſed in Rome in the conteſt between Damaſus and Urſicinus about the Papacy, ſays he wonders not that the Prelates did ſo earneſtly contend for the Biſhoprick of Rome, cum id adepti, futuri ſint ita ſecuri, ut ditentur oblationibus Matronarum, procedantque vehiculis inſidentes, circumſpecte veſtiti, epulas curantes profuſas, adeo ut eorum convivia Regales ſuperent menſas, Becauſe when they have obtained it, they are ſafe and warm, full with the oblations of the good women, and are carried in their caroches, and are neatly habited, and ſplendidly feaſted, and themſelves keep Tables beyond the profuſeneſſe of Kings. Now although Biſhops are Men, and Religion it ſelf is ſerv'd by men who have bodies and ſecular apprehenſions, and therefore does need ſecular advantages; yet this belongs to them as Men, not as Spiritual. It is juſt as if you ſhould call the General of an Army Holy Father, and beg his bleſſing, and ſet him in the chiefeſt place of the Quire, and pray him to preach upon the greateſt Feſtivals of the year, and run in multitudes to hear him ſpeak. Theſe are the proper honours of ſpiritual perſons; and the ſplendor of the world is the appendage of ſecular atchievements: whatſoever is neceſſary for their perſons in order to the advantages of religion is very fit to be given by Princes to the Biſhops, who will certainly modeſtly entertain it, & by pious conduct transfer it to the glory of Chriſt and the good of ſouls. But this is none of the Honour that Chriſt inveſted their Holy order with: They have an honour and a bleſſedneſſe which none but themſelves can take from them. The Roſary of Chriſtian graces is the tiar of their head, and their office is their dignity, and humility is their ſplendour, and zeal is their Conqueſt, and patience is their Eminence, and they are made illuſtrious by bringing peace, and promoting holineſſe, and comforting the afflicted, and relieving the poor, and making men and women uſeful to the publick, and charitable in their miniſteries, and wiſe unto ſalvation. This is that which was ſpoken by God in the Prophet Iſaiah, Since thou waſt precious in my ſight thou haſt been honourable. And this was obſerved by the Pagan, who being ſurpris'd with the ſecular ſplendor of the Roman Biſhops lik'd it not, but ſaid that there was another way for them to be truly happy: Eſſe poterant beati revera, ſi magnitudine urbis deſpectâ quam vitiis opponunt, ad Iſai. 43. 4.

imitationem Antiſtitum quorundam provincialium viverent, quos tenuitas edendi potandique parciſſimè, vilitas etiam indumentorum, & ſupercilia humum ſpectantia, perpetuo Numini verisque ejus cultoribus ut puros commendant & verecundos. They are the words of Ammianus Marcellinus whom I lately mentioned. The Roman Biſhops might indeed be truly happy, if they deſpiſing the ſplendors of the city would live as ſome Biſhops in the Provinces, whom their temperate and ſpare diet, their plain habit and their humble carriage repreſent to God and all God's ſervants as perſons pure and modeſt. But then if this diſcourſe have any thing of reaſon, piety or truth in it, it muſt needs be infinitly certain that ſpiritual perſons are to be preferr'd before the temporal in ſpiritual honours, but not in temporal regards; they have nothing to doe with them by virtue of their order or their office: what they have to their Perſons by the favour of Princes and Nobles is of another conſideration, and ſo this queſtion is chang'd into an advice, and beſt ends in a Sermon or Declamation.

Queſtion IV.

Whether the Eminency of the ſpiritual calling, and the conſequent prelation of ſpiritual perſons, can exempt them from ſecular coercion, and make them ſuperior to Princes.

19. In what ſenſes Biſhops have any ſuperiority over Princes I ſhall afterwards explain: Now the queſtion is concerning ſecular ſuperiority, and immunity from the temporal ſword of Princes. Now to this, I ſuppoſe, what I have already ſaid may be able to give an anſwer. For the ſpiritual order gives no temporal power at all; and therefore if all temporal power be in the ſupreme Civil Magiſtrate, all men that can deſerve to feel the edge of the ſword are ſubject to it. For what? Had Archimedes reaſon to take it ill of the Romans for not ſending for him and making him General in the Syracuſan warre, becauſe he was a better Geometrician then any of all their Senate? Lewis the eleventh of France had a ſervant who was an excellent ſurgeon, and an excellent barber, and dreſs'd his gout tenderly, and had the ordering of his feet and his face, and did him many good offices. But the wiſe Prince was too fond when for theſe qualities he made him governour of his Counſels. Every good quality, and every eminence of Art, and every worthy imployment hath an end and deſigne of it's own, and that end and the proportions to it are to be the meaſure of the uſage of thoſe perſons which are appointed to miniſter to it. Now it is certain that ſpiritual perſons are appointed Miniſters of the beſt and moſt perfective end of mankind, but to ſay that this gives them a title to other Miniſteries which are appointed to other ends, hath as little in it of reaſon as it hath of revelation. But I ſhall not diſpute this over again, but ſhall ſuppoſe it ſufficient to adde thoſe authorities which muſt needs be competent in this affair, as being of Eccleſiaſtic perſons, who had no reaſon, nor were they willing, to deſpiſe their own juſt advantages, any more then to uſurp what was unjuſt.

20. When Origen complain'd of the faſtuouſneſſe and vanity of ſome Eccleſiaſtics in his time, they were bad enough, but had not come to a pretence of ruling over Kings upon the ſtock of Spiritual prelation: but the

was troubled that ſome had quit their proper excellency, conſiſting in the multitude of ſpiritual gifts, their unwearied diligence in the care of ſouls, their dangers, their patience, their humility, and their dyings for Chriſt. Et hæc nos docet ſermo Divinus (ſaith he) The word of God teaches us theſe things. But we either not uderſtanding the Divine will ſet down in Scriptures, or deſpiſing what Chriſt to ſuch purpoſes recommended to us, are ſuch that we ſeem to exceed the pride even of the evil Princes of the world: and we doe not onely ſeek for guards to goe before us like Kings, but are terrible to the poor, and of difficult acceſſe, and behave our ſelves towards thoſe who addreſſe themſelves to intercede for ſome thing or ſome perſon, that we are more cruel then Tyrants, and the ſecular Lords of their ſubjects. And in ſome Churches you may ſee (eſpecially in the Churches of the greateſt cities) the chief of the Chriſtian people neither affable to others, nor ſuffering others to be free in their entercourſes with them. Theſe things are out of the way of the Eccleſiaſtics, for theſe things cannot conſiſt with piety and humility, and the proper imployments of ſuch perſons who gain'd the world by ceſſion, and got victory over whole Kingdomes by trampling upon Devils, and being trampled upon by men. Biſhops ſhould be like the Symbols of the Bleſſed Sacrament, which although for the ornament of religion and for our ſakes and becauſe we would fain have opportunity to ſignify our love to Chriſt, we miniſter in ſilver and gold, yet the ſymbols themſelves remain the ſame plain and pure bread and wine, and altered onely by prayers, and by ſpiritual conſecration, and a relative holineſſe. But he were a ſtrange ſuperſtitious fool who, becauſe the Sacramental bread and wine are much better then all the Tables and viands of Princes and all the ſpoils of Nature, will think it fit to mingle ſugar and the choiceſt ſpices of Arabia with the bread, and amber-griece and powder of pearl and the ſpirit of gold with the chalice. Theſe are no fit honours to the H. Sacrament: the ſymbols of which are ſpoil'd when they are forc'd off from the ſimplicity and purity of their inſtitution and deſigne. So it is with ſpiritual perſons: their office is ſpiritual, and their relation is holy, and their honours are ſymbolical. For their own ſakes, Princes and good people muſt cauſe decent and honourable miniſteries and accommodations to be provided for them; but ſtill they muſt remain in their own humility and meekneſſe and piety, and not pretend to dignities heterogeneal, and Eminences ſecular, becauſe their ſpiritual imployment is very excellent. It was S. Gregory Nazianzen's wiſh, that there were in the Church μηδὲ πρωτοθρονία μηδὲ τις πρωτιμησις καὶ τυραννικὴ πρωτομία, ἵν' ἐξ ἀρετῆς μόνης ἐγινωσκόμεθα, Neither precedency of Epiſcopal Sees, nor any Eminency of one place above another, nor any Tyrannical or pompous proviſions and ſolennities, that we might be diſtinguiſhed onely by our vertue. Now if prelation by order and Eccleſiaſtical Oeconomy amongſt the Biſhops was of ſo ill effect, ſo little neceſſary, and ſo greatly inconvenient that the good Biſhop wiſhed there were no ſuch thing; there is little reaſon to doubt, but he would have infinitely condemned all pretenſions of a power over civil governments. But the Biſhops of Rome were not at that time gone ſo far. The Archimandrites of Conſtantinople, complaining againſt the Eutychians, write to Pope Agapetus, that if they be ſtill permitted [licenter omnia accedent, non contra Eccleſiaſticos ſolos, ſed etiam contra ipſum piiſſimum Imperatorem, noſtrum & veſtrum honorabile caput] They will doe inſolencies not onely to the Eccleſiaſtics, but alſo to our moſt pious Emperor, who is the honourable head both of you and us.

* This power of headſhip or ſupremacy over the whole order Eccleſiaſtical was acknowledged in the Church for about a thouſand years: for beſides the apparent practice and approbation of it, which I brought in the former pages, we find that the Emperour Henry the ſecond did deprive Widgerus of the Arch-Biſhoprick of Ravenna, and depos'd Gregory the ſixth from the Papacy.

21. And therefore we find that thoſe ancient Prelates that call'd upon Princes to pay reverence to them, and an acknowledgment of that Authority which Chriſt intruſted in their hands, accounted them wholly to be diſtinct things, and not at all invading each others limits. For Chriſt by making them Chriſtians did not make them leſſe to be Princes: and Chriſtian Emperors could not goe leſſe then the heathens; they were certainly no looſers by their baptiſme. For it had been a ſtrange argument for Sylveſter to have us'd to Conſtantine, S^r, give up your ſelf a Diſciple to the moſt Holy Jeſus, and you ſhall have a crown hereafter, and here alſo you ſhall ſtill reign over all but me and my Clergy; to us indeed you muſt be ſubject, and by us you muſt be governed, but the Crown Imperial ſhall be greater then every thing, our Mitres onely excepted. If this had been the ſtate of the queſtion, I wonder by what argument could the Prince have been perſwaded to become Chriſtian: when it was ſo obvious for him to ſay, that Sylveſter had reaſon to move him to preach Chriſt, ſince he got ſo much temporal advantage by it, but that he could ſee little reaſon why himſelf ſhould looſe and Sylveſter get, and become a Diſciple of Chriſt to be made a Minor and a Pupil to the Biſhop. And indeed it would have been a ſtrange Sermon that preaches humility to Emperors & dominion to Biſhops. But their ſermons when they were at the higheſt were of another nature. De humanis rebus judicare permiſſum eſt, non præeſſe Divinis. So P. Gelaſius declares the limit of the Imperial and prieſtly power: Of all things belonging to this world the Emperor is to judge; but not to be the preſident or chief Miniſter of holy rites. Gelaſius ſpake it upon occaſion, becauſe Anaſtaſius the Emperor did unneceſſarily interpoſe in the abſolution of Peter Biſhop of Alexandria. This Pope Gelaſius ſuppos'd was of another nature, and not relative to the things of this world, and therefore not of Imperial cogniſance. But all the things of this world belong to him. And if all things of this world, then all perſons of this world. For circa actiones propriè verſatur Imperium, ſay the Lawyers, Rule and Empire and all power of judicature is principally concerning actions; but actions are done by perſons, who therefore are ſubject to government. And upon this account the African Biſhops petition'd the Emperour that he would compel Paul the Biſhop of Conſtantinople to be of the Catholick Communion. And the Fathers of the 9 h Council of Toledo, making proviſions againſt thoſe Eccleſiaſtics who prevented the juſt dividend of the publick oblations, they firſt order them to be privately reproved, or elſe to be delated to the Biſhop, or to the Judge. But if the Biſhop coſen the Corban, let him be delated to the Metropolitan: but if the Metropolitan doe any ſuch vile thing, Regis hæc auribus intimare non differant, Let him without delay be accuſed unto the King. And Lambert the Emperour about the year of our Lord 900 having ſome conteſt with the Pope, propounded this firſt article in a Synod at Ravenna, If any Roman of the Clergy or the Senate, of what order ſoever, ſhall either voluntarily or by compulſion appeal to the Imperial Majeſty, let no man preſume to contradict him: ——untill the Emperor by himſelf or his Miſſives ſhall deliberate concerning their perſons and their cauſes.

cauſes. Thus we find Pope Leo the 4th ſubmitting himſelf to Lotharius the Emperour, and promiſing obedience: and to Ludovicus he profeſſes that if he have done amiſſe he will amend it according to his ſentence, or the judgement of his Deputies. Upon the conſideration of theſe and many other particulars Gratian, though unwillingly, confeſſes that in civil cauſes a Clergy-man is to be conven'd before the civil Judge: and although a little after he does a little prævaricate in the matter of criminal cauſes, yet it was too late; for he had ſaid it before, Regum eſt corporalem irrogare pœnam, Kings have the power of inflicting corporal puniſhments: and therefore if a Clerk were guilty in a criminal cauſe, the ſecular Judge had power over him, ſaid the Fathers of the firſt Council of Matiſcon, cap. 7. But it matters not much, for a greater then Gratian ſaid it in his own caſe before the civil power, If I have done any thing worthy of death, I refuſe not to die: they are the words of S. Paul.

Queſtion V.

Whether is to be obeyed, the Prince or the Biſhop, if they happen to command contrary things?

11. To this I anſwer, that it is already determin'd that the Emperour is to be obeyed againſt the will of the Biſhop. For ſo it was in the caſe of Mauritius and S. Gregory; for the Biſhop was fain to publiſh the Princes Edict which yet he believ'd to be impious. It was alſo moſt evident in S. Athanaſius of Alexandria, S. Gregory of Nazianzum, S. Chryſoſtom of Conſtantinople, Euſebius of Samoſata, who by injuſtice were commanded to leave their Dioceſes.

13. But this is to be underſtood in actions which can by Empire and command be chang'd into good or bad reſpectively: becauſe ſuch actions are moſt properly the ſubject of humane laws. For in what God hath expreſſely commanded or forbidden, the Civil or Eccleſiaſtical power is onely concerned to ſerve the intereſt of the Divine Commandement, to promote or to hinder good and evil reſpectively. But whatſoever is left undetermined by God, that the ſupreme power can determine: and in ſuch things if there could be too ſupreme powers, the government were Monſtrous, and there could be no obedience; for no man can ſerve two Maſters. Now the ſupreme power hath in this no limit, but that which limits both powers, the laws of Nature and the laws of Jeſus Chriſt: and if there be any thing commanded by the Prince againſt theſe, the Biſhop is to declare the contrary, that is, to publiſh the will of God, provided it be in an evident matter and without doubtfull diſputation. And then, this being provided for, the caſe cannot be ſuppoſed that the King and the Biſhop both doing their duty can command things contrary. I doe not ſay but a temporal law may be againſt the Canons of the Church; but then we are to follow the civil law, becauſe the power is by the law of Nature ſupreme and Imperial. The matter of the Civil power and Eccleſiaſtical is ſo wholly differing, that there where either hath to doe it cannot contradict the other; but if they invade the rights of one another, then the queſtion grows hard. But the ſolution is this;

24. If the Biſhop invades the rights of the Civil power he is not at all to be obeyed, for he hath nothing to doe there. But if the Civil power invades the rights of the Biſhop, then they are either ſuch rights which are his by poſitive laws and humane conceſſion, or ſuch which by Divine appointment are his due.

25. All thoſe which are the Biſhops right by poſitive laws may by the ſame power be reſcinded by which they were granted; and therefore if a King makes a law againſt the rights of the Church, and the Biſhop proteſts againſt that law, the King and not the Biſhop muſt prevail. For Neminem ſibi imperare poſſe, & neminem ſibi legem dicere, à qua mutatâ voluntate nequeat recedere, ſay the Lawyers. A man may change his will as long as he lives; and the ſupreme will can never be hindred: for ſummum ejus eſſe Imperium qui ordinario juri derogare valeat is a rule in law, He that is the ſupreme can derogate by his power from an ordinary right, viz. by making a contrary law.

26. But if they be the rights of Biſhops and the Miniſters of Religion by Divine appointment, then the Biſhops command is to prevail, cum conditione crucis; that is, ſo as the ſubject muſt ſubmit to the Princes anger, and ſuffer for what he cannot doe, according to that of S. Auſtin, Imperatores cum in errore ſunt, pro errore contra veritatem leges dant, per quas juſti & probantur & coronantur, non faciendo quod illi jubent, quia Deus prohibet, Miſtaken Princes make ill laws; but by them good men are tried and crown'd, by not doing what God hath forbidden them. This is much more modeſtly expreſs'd then that reſponſory in the Roman Breviary, ſpeaking of the Apoſtles, Iſti ſunt triumphatores & amici Dei, qui contemnentes juſſa Principum meruerunt præmia æterna, They have deſerved eternal rewards by deſpiſing the commands of Princes. The expreſſion is hard; for though their impious laws are not to be obeyed, yet indefinitely it is not ſafe to ſay, their commands are to be deſpis'd. And none ever leſſe deſpis'd the laws then they who, becauſe they could not obey them againſt God, yet obeyed them againſt themſelves; by ſuffering death at their command, when they might not ſuffer a ſinne.

27. But then this alſo ſuffers diminution. For if the Eccleſiaſtical power in ſuch things where their authority is proper and competent and Divine, give any negative or prohibitive precepts, they may and they muſt be obeyed intirely; becauſe every negative is indiviſible, and hath neither parts nor time: and in this they are but proclaimers of the Divine Commandment, which if it be negative it can never be lawful to doe againſt it. But in poſitive inſtances of commandement, though from Divine Authority, (for that's the limit of the Eccleſiaſtical power and authority) if the King commands one thing and the Biſhop another, they are ſeverally to be regarded according to the ſeveral caſes. For the rule is this, That all external actions are under the command of the Civil power in order to the publick government: and if they were not, the Civil power were not ſufficiently provided for the acquiring the end of it's inſtitution: and then it would follow that either the civil authority were not from God (expreſſely againſt S. Paul) or elſe all that God made were not good, as being defective from the end of it's creation (expreſſely againſt Moſes, and indeed againſt the honour of God.) Now becauſe external actions are alſo in order der to religion internal, it happens that the Spiritual power hath accidentally power over them. Here then is the iſſue of this inquiry: when an external action is neceſſary to the publick ſervice, and yet in order to religion at the ſame time, the poſitive commands of the Spiritual ſuperior muſt yield to the poſitive commands of the ſupreme Civil power. For that which hath a direct power is to be preferr'd before that which hath but an indirect power. Thus it is a divine precept that we ſhould not neglect the aſſembling of our ſelves together. Upon the warranty of this, the Guides of ſouls have power to command their flocks to meet at the Divine ſervice; and they are tied to obey. But if at the ſame time the Prince hath given command that thoſe perſons or ſome of thoſe who are commanded to be at the Divine Offices, be preſent on the guards, or the defence of the city walls, they are bound to obey the Prince, and not the Prieſt at that time. * For beſides the former reaſon, when external actions are appointed by competent Authority, they are cloth'd with circumſtances with which actions commanded by God, and in which Eccleſiaſtics have competent Authority, are not inveſted: and amongſt theſe circumſtances, time and place are the principal. And therefore it follows that in external actions the command of the Prince is always to be preferred before the command of the Church; becauſe this may ſtay, and that cannot: This is not by God determin'd to time and place, but that is by the Prince; and therefore by doing that now, and letting this alone till another time, both ends can be ſerv'd: and it were a ſtrange peeviſhneſſe of Government (beſides the unreaſonableneſſe of it) to croſſe the Prince to ſhew our power, when both may ſtand, and both may be obeyed; if they did not croud at the ſame narrow dore together, there is time enough for them to goe out one after another; and by a litle more time, there will be a great deal of more room. I have heard that when King James the 6th of Scotland was wooing the Daniſh Lady, he commanded the Provoſt of Edenburgh and the Townſmen upon a certain day to feaſt the Denmark Embaſſadors, and to ſhew all the bravery of their Town and all the ſplendor they could: of which when the Presbytery had notice, they to croſſe the King proclaim'd a faſt to be kept in the Town upon that very day. But the Townſmen according to their duty obeyed the King: and the Presbytery might have conſider'd that it was no zeal for God that the Faſt was indicted upon that day; but God might have been as well ſerv'd by the Tueſday faſt as by the Monday. Thus if the Eccleſiaſtic power hath admitted a perſon to Eccleſiaſtical Miniſteries or Religions, if the ſupreme Civil power requires his ſervice, or if he be needed for the publick good, he may command him from thence, unleſſe there be ſomething collaterally to hinder; as if the Prince have ſworn the contrary, or that the perſon requir'd have abjur'd it by the Princes leave: but ſuppoſing him onely bound by the Eccleſiaſtical power, the ſupreme Civil power is to prevail over it, as being the lord of perſons and actions external. An inſtance of this was given by Mauritius the Emperour forbidding his ſouldiers to turn Monks without his leave, though the law was made ſore againſt the mind of S. Gregory, who was the Biſhop of Rome. And thus * Caſimire King of Poland was taken from his gown, and inveſted with a Royal Mantle; and divers Monks have been recalled into the imployments of armies, or publick Counſels, or publick Governments. * A. D. 1040.

28. But this alſo is to be underſtood with this proviſion. The ſupreme Civil power hath dominion over external actions, ſo as to govern them for time and place and other circumſtances. He can forbid ſermons at ſuch a time; he can forbid faſts or publick ſolennities and meetings when he pleaſe, and when it is for the intereſts of government: and concerning any accident or circumſtance and manner he can give laws, and he muſt be obeyed. But he cannot give laws prohibiting the thing it ſelf, out of hatred or in perſecution of the religion: for then the Eccleſiaſtic power is to command not onely the thing, but the circumſtances too. For the thing it ſelf, it is plain; becauſe it is a Divine Commandement, and to this the Spiritual power muſt miniſter, and no Civil power can hinder us from obeying God: and therefore the Apoſtles made no ſcruple of preaching Chriſt publickly, though they were forbidden it under great penalties. But then for the circumſtances, they alſo in this caſe fall under the Eccleſiaſtical power. If the Prince would permit the thing, he might diſpoſe of the accidents; for then he is not againſt God, and uſes his right about external actions. But if he forbids the thing, they that are to take care that God be obeyed muſt then inveſt the actions with circumſtances; for they cannot be at all, unleſſe they be in time and place; and therefore by a conſequent of their power over the thing they can diſpoſe the other, becauſe the circumſtances are not forbidden by the Prince, but the thing, which being commanded by God & not being to be done at all but in circumſtances, they that muſt take care of the Principal muſt, in that caſe, take care alſo of the acceſſory. Thus we find the Biſhops in the Primitive Church indicting of Faſts, proclaiming aſſemblies, calling Synods, gathering Synaxes: for they knew they were obliged to ſee that all that ſhould be done which was neceſſary for the ſalvation of ſouls and inſtruction of lives by preaching, and for the ſtabiliment of the Church by aſſemblies and communions. Now the doing of theſe things was neceſſary, and for the doing of theſe they were ready to die; for that paſſive obedience was all which they did owe to thoſe laws which forbad them under pain of death: for it was neceſſary thoſe things ſhould be done, it was not neceſſary they ſhould live. But when the ſupreme Civil power is Chriſtian and does not forbid the thing, there is no danger that God ſhall not be obeyed by the Prince his changing and diſpoſing the circumſtances of the thing; and therefore there can be no reaſon why the Prince ſhould be diſobeyed, commanding nothing againſt God, and governing in that where his authority is competent. Thus if the ſupreme Civil power ſhould command that the Biſhops of his Kingdome ſhould not ordain any perſons that had been ſouldiers or of mean trades to be Prieſts, nor conſecrate any Knight to be a Biſhop; though the Biſhops ſhould deſire it very paſſionately, they have no power to command or doe what the Civil power hath forbidden. But if the ſupreme ſhould ſay there ſhould be no Biſhops at all, and no ordination of Miniſters of Religion according to the laws of Jeſus Chriſt, then the queſtion is not whether the ſupreme Civil power or the Eccleſiaſtical is to be obeyed, but whether Man or God: and in that caſe if the Biſhops doe not ordain, if they doe not take care to continue a ſucceſſion in the Church of God, they are to anſwer for one of the greateſt neglects of duty of which man-kind is capable; alwaies ſuppos'd that the order of Biſhops is neceſſary to the Church, and that ordination of Prieſts by Biſhops is of Apoſtolical inſtitution, and that there is no Univocal generation of Church-Miniſters but by the ſame hands which began the διαδοχὴ ſucceſſion, and hath continued it for almoſt ſeventeen ages in the Church,

Church. Of which I am not now to interpoſe my ſentence, but to anſwer the caſe of Conſcience relying upon the ſuppoſition. This onely I am to adde, that ſuppoſing this to be neceſſary, yet it is to be done cum conditione crucis, with ſubmiſſion to the anger of the laws if they have put on unjuſt armour; and to be done with peaceableneſſe, and all the arts of humility and gentleneſſe, petition and wiſe remonſtrances.

* But there is yet one reſerve of caution to be us'd in this caſe. If the Civil power and the Spiritual differ in this particular, the ſpiritual muſt yield ſo long, and forbear to doe what is forbidden by their lawfull ſupreme, untill it be certain that to forbear longer is to neglect their duty, and to diſpleaſe God. If the duty or if the ſucceſſion can be any way ſupplied, ſo that the intereſt of religion be not deſtroyed, then ceſſion or forbearance is their duty. And therefore if the King of Portugal ſhould forbid conſecrations of Biſhops in his Kingdome not for a time, but for ever, the Biſhops were bound to obey, if they could be ſupplied from other Churches, or if it were not neceſſary that God ſhould have a Church in Portugal, or if without Biſhops there could be a Church. But if they be ſure that the Biſhops are the head of Eccleſiaſtical Union, and therefore the conſervators of Being; and if the remaining Prelates are convinc'd that God hath requir'd it of them to continue a Church in Portugal (as it is certain that by many regards they are determined there to ſerve Gods Church, and to provide for ſouls and for the religion of their charges) and if they could be no otherwiſe ſupplied with Eccleſiaſtical perſons of the order and ordination Apoſtolical, as if other Churches would not ordain Biſhops or Prieſts for them but upon ſinful conditions, and violation of their Conſciences: then the Spiritual power is to doe their duty, and the ſupreme Civil power is to doe their pleaſure; and the worſt that can come is the crown of Martyrdome, which whoſoever gets will be no looſer. And therefore I cannot without indignation conſider it, that the Pope of Rome, who pretends to be a great Father of Chriſtians, ſhould not onely neglect but refuſe to make ordinations and conſecrations in that Church; which if their Prince ſhould doe, the Biſhops ought to ſupply it by their care; and therefore when the Prince deſires it, as it is infinite diſhonour to the Biſhop of Rome to neglect or refuſe, in compliance with the temporal intereſt of the King of Spain, ſo it is the duty of the Biſhops of Portugal to obey their Prince. But I have nothing to doe to meddle with any mans intereſt, much leſſe that of Princes: onely the ſcene of this caſe of Conſcience happens now to lie in Portugal, and the conſideration of it was uſefull in the determination of this preſent queſtion.

39. But this Queſtion hath an appendent branch which is alſo fit to be conſider'd. What if the Civil laws and the Eccleſiaſtical be contrary? as it happens in divers particulars; as if the Prince be a heretick, an Arrian or Macedonian, and happens to forbid the invocation of the Holy Ghoſt, or giving Divine honours to the Son of God, and the Church hath alwayes done it, and always commanded it. What is to be done in this caſe? This inſtance makes the anſwer eaſy: for in matters of Faith it is certain the Authority and laws of God have made the determination; and therefore in theſe and the like the Church is bound to doe and to believe and to profeſſe according to the commandement of God. But how if the Prince does not forbid the internal duty (for in that his authority is incompetent) but commands onely that there ſhould be no prayers to the Holy Ghoſt put into the publick Liturgies of the Church; to this the anſwer is certain, That though in all externals the ſupreme Civil power is to be obeyed, yet the ſpiritual power in ſuch caſes is tied to confeſſe the faith which the Prince would diſcountenance, and to take care that their charges ſhould plentifully ſupply in all their private devotions what is not permitted to them in publick. And the reaſon of this is not that they are tied to doe any thing in oppoſition or ſcandal to the Prince; but that they are in duty and charity to provide leſt the publick diſcouragement and alteration of the circumſtance of the duty, doe not leſſen the duty internal and eſſential: and therefore they are to put ſo much more to the private, that they may prevent the diminution which is likely to come upon the private duty from the publick prohibition.

30. But there are ſome Civil laws which are oppos'd to Eccleſiaſtical, not by contrariety of ſanction and command hinc inde, but by contrariety of declaration or permiſſion reſpectively. Thus if the Eccleſiaſtical laws have forbidden marriage in a certain Degree, and the Civil power hath permitted it, then the ſubject may more ſafely obey the power Eccleſiaſtical; becauſe by ſo doing he avoids the offending of religious perſons, and yet diſobeys no command of the Prince; for no Civil power uſually commands a man to marry in a certain Degree: and therefore when he is at liberty from the Civil law, which in this caſe gives him no command, and he is not at liberty from the Eccleſiaſtical law, which hath made a prohibition, he muſt obey the Church; which if it had no power over him, could have made no law, and if it have a power, it muſt be obeyed; for in the preſent caſe there is nothing to hinder it. So it is in ſuch things which are permitted for the hardneſſe of mens hearts or the publick neceſſity. The permiſſion of the Prince is no abſolution from the authority of the Church. Suppoſing Uſury to be unlawfull, as it is certain many kinds and inſtances of it are highly criminal, yet the Civil laws permit it, and the Church forbids it. In this caſe the Canons are to be preferr'd. For though it be permitted, yet by the laws no man is compell'd to be an Uſurer; and therefore he muſt pay that reverence and obedience which is otherwiſe due to them that have the rule over them in the conduct of their ſouls.

31. The caſe is alike in thoſe laws where the Civil power onely gives impunity, but no warranty. As in ſuch caſes when laws indulge to a mans weakneſſe and grief; as when it permits him to kill any man that creeps in at his windows, or demands his purſe of him on the high way, or to kill his adulterous wife if he ſurpriſes her in the ſin: If the Civil power promiſes impunity, and does not intend to change the action from unlawfull to lawfull, as in ſome caſes it does, in ſome it cannot; then if there be any laws of the Church to the contrary, they paſſe an obligation upon the conſcience, notwithſtanding the Civil impunity. And there is great reaſon for this. For ſince the affairs of the world have in them varieties and perplexities beſides, it happens that in ſome caſes men know not how to govern by the ſtricteſt meaſures of religion, becauſe all men will not doe their duty upon that account; and therefore laws are not made [ut in Platonis republica, but as in face Romuli] with exact and pureſt meaſures, but in compliance and by neceſſity, not always as well as they ſhould, but as well as they may: and therefore the Civil power is forc'd ſometimes to connive at what it does not approve. But yet theſe perſons are to be governed by conſcience; and therefore it is neceſſary that that part of the publick Government which is to conduct our conſciences more immediately ſhould give a bridle to that liberty which, by being in ſome regards neceſſary, would if totally permitted become intolerable. And therefore the ſpiritual power puts a little myrrhe into their wine, and ſupplies that defect which in the intrigues of humane affaires we bring upon our ſelves by making unnatural neceſſities.

32. But then if it be inquir'd, whether it be lawfull for the ſpiritual power by ſpiritual Cenſures to puniſh thoſe actions which the Civil power permits; I anſwer, that the Church makes laws either by her declarative and direct power, or by a reductive and indirect power: that is, ſhe makes laws in matters expreſſely commanded by God or forbidden, or elſe in ſuch things which have proportion, ſimilitudes and analogies to the Divine laws. In the firſt ſhe is the declarer of Gods will, and hath a direct power. In the ſecond ſhe hath a judgement of diſcretion, and is the beſt Judge of Fit and Decent. If the Church declares an act to be againſt Gods commandement, or bound upon us by eſſential duty, in that caſe, unleſſe there be error evident and notorious, ſhe is intirely to be obeyed: and therefore the refractary and the diſobedient ſhe may eaſily coerce and puniſh by her cenſures, according as ſhe ſees it agreeable and conducing to Gods glory and the good of ſouls, although the Civil power permits the fact for neceſſity or great advantages. And the reaſon is, becauſe as the Civil power ſerves the ends of the republick by impunity and permiſſion, ſo there is another end to be ſerv'd which is more conſiderable, that is, the ſervice of God and the intereſt of ſouls, to which ſhe is to miniſter by laws and puniſhments, by exhortations and the argument of rewards: and as every power of Gods appointment is ſufficient for it's own end, ſo it muſt doe it's own portion of duty for which ſo competent proviſions are made. And therefore the Spiritual power may in this caſe puniſh what the Civil power puniſhes not. * With this onely Caution, if the Civil power does not forbid the Church to uſe her Cenſures in ſuch a particular caſe: for if it does, it is to be preſumed that ſuch Eccleſiaſtical coercion would hinder the Civil power from acquiring the end of it's laws, which the Eccleſiaſtical never ought to doe; becauſe although her cenſures are very uſefull to the ends of the ſpiritual power, yet they are not abſolutely neceſſary, God having by ſo many other ways provided for ſouls, that the Church is ſufficiently inſtructed with means of ſaving ſouls though ſhe never draw her ſword. But the Civil power hath not ſo many advantages.

33. But if the lawes of Church are made onely by her Reductive and indirect power, that is, if they be ſuch that her authority is not founded upon the expreſſe law of God, but upon the judgment of diſcretion, and therefore her laws are concerning decencies and uſefulneſſes and pious advantages, in this caſe the Church is not eaſily to proceed to Cenſures, unleſſe it be certain that there is no diſſervice nor diſpleaſure done to the Civil power. For it will look too like peeviſhneſſe to croſſe the Civil laws, where it is apparent there is no neceſſity, and no warranty from a Divine commandement. The Church would not have her laws oppos'd or diſcountenanc'd upon little regards; and therefore neither muſt ſhe without great neceſſity doe that which will cauſe ſome diminution to the Civil laws, at leaſt by interpretation.

34. And after all this, if it happens that the Civil power and the Eccleſiaſtical command things contrary, there is a fault ſomewhere, and there is nothing to be done but to inquire on which ſide God is; for if he be not on the Churches ſide by a direct law in the matter, he is not on the Churches ſide for her relation, but on the Kings ſide for his authority.

From the matter of the former Queſtion ariſes another like it.

Queſtion VI.

Whether in the Civil affaires and cauſes of the Eccleſiaſtical power and perſons the preſumption ought to lie for the King, or for the Church.

35. This Queſtion muſt ſuppoſe the caſe to be dubious, and the matter equal on both ſides as to the ſubject matter; for elſe there needs to be no queſtion, but judgment muſt be according to the merit of the cauſe: and it muſt ſuppoſe alſo that neither of them will yield, but uſe their own right; for if either did, themſelves would make an end of the queſtion: but when both are in pretence, and the pretence is equal in the matter and the argument, and that the cauſe is to be determined by favour and privilege, whether is to be preferr'd? I doe not ask which is to be preferr'd in law; for in that queſtion, the laws and cuſtomes of a people are the rule of determination: but whether there be in conſcience any advantage of preſumption due to either.

36. To this I anſwer, that in the moſt pious ages of the Church the preſumption was ever eſteemed to lie for the Church when the Princes were Chriſtians: and when the queſtion is of piety not of authority, of charity not of Empire, it is therefore fit to be given to the Church, 1. Becauſe if the Civil power takes it to it ſelf, it is a Judge and a party too. 2. Becauſe whatever external rights the Church hath, ſhe hath them by the donation, or at leaſt enjoyes them by the conceſſion of the ſupreme Civil power, who in this caſe by ceſſion doe confirm at leaſt, and at moſt but enlarge their donative. 3. Becauſe the ſpiritual power is under the Kings protection, and hath an equal caſe with that of widows and orphans. It is a pious cauſe, it is the cauſe of the poor and the unarmed. 4. The King is better able to bear the loſſe, and therefore it is a caſe of equity. 5. The Church is a relative of God and the Miniſter of Religion, and therefore the advantage being given to the Church, the honour is done to God; and then on the Kings ſide it would be an act of religion and devotion. 6. If the Civil power being judge prefers the Eccleſiaſtics in the preſumption, it is certain there is no wrong done, and none hath cauſe to complain: but if it be againſt the Eccleſiaſtics the caſe is not ſo evident, and juſtice is not ſo ſecur'd, and charity not at all done.

37. And if it be thought that this determination is fit to be given by a Church-man; though it be no objection while it is true and reaſonable, yet I endeavour'd to ſpeak exactly to truth, and for the advantage of the Civil power, though the queſtion is decided for the Eccleſiaſtics. For in ſuch caſes, as the Eccleſiaſtics will have advantage if they in dubious caſes never will wil contend, ſo the Civil power will ever have the better of it if in theſe caſes they reſolve never to prevail.

38. Although theſe inquiries have carried me a little further then the firſt intention of the Rule, yet they were greatly Relative to it. But I ſhall recal my Reader to the ſenſe and duty of it by the words of S. Gregory, who ſayes that Chriſtus Imperatori & omnia tribuit, & dominari eum non ſolùm militibus, ſed etiam Sacerdotibus conceſſit, Chriſt hath both given all things to the Emperour, but a power of dominion not onely over the ſouldiers, but even over the Prieſts themſelves. And that great wiſe diſpoſer of all things in Heaven and Earth, who makes twins in the little continent of their Mothers Wombe to lie at eaſe and peace, and the Eccentric motions of the Orbes, and the regular and irregular progreſſions of the ſtarres, not to croſſe or hinder one another, and in all the variety of humane actions, caſes and contingencies, hath ſo wiſely diſpos'd his laws that no contradiction of chance can infer a contradiction of duty, and it can never be neceſſary to ſin, but on one hand or other it may for ever be avoided; cannot be ſuppoſed to have appointed two powers in the hands of his ſervants to fight againſt or to reſiſt each other: but as good is never contrary to good, nor truth to truth, ſo neither can thoſe powers which are ordain'd for good. And therefore where the powers are diſtinct they are imployed upon ſeveral matters; and where they converſe about the ſame matter, as in external actions and perſons they doe, there one is ſubject to the other, and therefore can never be againſt it.

Epiſt. 64. ad Theodorum medicum.

RULE VII.

The ſupreme Civil power hath juriſdiction in cauſes not onely Eccleſiaſtical, but internal and ſpiritual.

1. Βασιλεὺς τ πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν Κύριον ſaid Ariſtotle, Of things belonging to God the King is the Governour. Therefore beſides that the ſupreme Civil power is to govern all perſons and all actions and miniſteries which are directly external, it is to be conſidered that actions internal, as they can be made publick, have alſo influence upon the perſons and lives, the fortunes and communities of Men; and therefore either are ſo far forth to be governed by them who are governours of men in their lives and fortunes, in their ſocieties and perſons, that they may doe good to them, or at leaſt doe no hurt.

Polit. l. 3.

2. Therefore as the ſupreme Princes and Magiſtrates have in ſeveral ages of the Church indulg'd to Eccleſiaſtics a power of Civil government, privileges and defenſatives in ordine ad ſpiritualia, that is, to enable them with the help of the Civil power to advance the intereſts of religion and the ſpiritual men, which by evil men is apt to be deſpis'd, as all the threatnings of the Goſpell and the terrors of death and the horrible affrightments of the day of Judgement are: ſo God hath given to the ſupreme Civil power authority over all publick religion in ordine ad bonum temporale. Princes and States did the other, but God did this. That was well, very well; but this is neceſſary, and that was not. The reaſon of both is this, Becauſe no external accident can hinder the intentions of God in the effects of religion and the event of ſouls. Religion thrives as well in a ſtorm and in perſecution as in ſun-ſhine. God had more ſummer friends under Conſtantine, but poſſibly as many true ones under Diocletian; or if he had not, it was mens fault, their weakneſſe, not their neceſſity. But the Civil intereſt can be really hindered by the intervening of new doctrines and falſe manners of worſhip: and the common-wealth if it be deſtroyed hath no recompence in eternity: and therefore God hath not call'd them happy when they are troubled, and hath not bidden them to ſuffer rebellion, or to rejoice when men ſpeak evil of dignities, and he hath not told them that great is their reward in heaven; but the whole purpoſe and proper end of the government being for temporal felicity, though that temporal felicity is by the wiſdome of God made to miniſter to the eternal, the government expires in this world, & ſhall never return to look for recompence for it's ſufferings. But every ſingle Man ſhall; and though temporal power can be taken from Princes, yet a mans religion cannot be taken from him: and therefore God hath given to Princes a ſupreme power for the ordering of religion in order to the common-wealth, without which it had not had ſufficient power to preſerve it ſelf; but he hath not given to Eccleſiaſtics a power over Princes in matter of government in order to ſpiritual things, 1. becauſe though ſpiritual things may receive advantage by ſuch powers if they had them, yet they may doe as much harm as good, and have done ſo very often, and may doe ſo again. 2. Becauſe God hath appointed to ſpiritual perſons ſpiritual inſtruments ſufficient to the end of that appointment. 3. Becauſe he hath alſo eſtabliſhed another Oeconomy for religion, the way of the croſſe, and the beaten way of humility, and the defenſatives of mortification, and the guards of ſelf-denial, and the proviſions of contentedneſſe, and the whole ſpiritual armour, and prayers and teares, and promiſes, and his holy ſpirit, and theſe are infinitely ſufficient to doe Gods work, and they are infinitely the better way. 4. Becauſe religion being a ſpiritual thing can ſtand alone, as the ſoul can by it ſelf ſubſiſt: and ſecular violence can no more deſtroy faith, or the ſpiritual and true worſhip of God, then a ſword can kill the underſtanding. 5. Becauſe if God had given a temporal power to Eccleſiaſtics in order to a ſpiritual end, then he had ſet up two ſupremes in the ſame affairs, which could never agree but by the ceſſion of one; that is, the two ſupremes could never agree but by making one of them not to be ſupreme.

3. And the world hath ſeen this laſt particular verified by many ſad experiments. For when the Roman Emperours reſiding in the Eaſt gave great powers and truſts to the Patriarchs of the Weſt, by their Spiritual ſword they began to hew at the head of gold, and lop off many Royalties from the Imperial ſtock. And Leo Iconomachus for breaking down the images of Saints felt their power, for they ſuffered not the people to pay him tribute in Italy, threatning to interdict them the uſe of Sacraments and publick devotions if they did. But as ſoon as ever they began by ſpiritual power to intermeddle in ſecular affairs, they quickly pulled the Weſtern Empire from the Eaſt, and in a convenient time leſſened and weakned that of the Weſt. For Pope John the third combin'd with Berengarius and Adalbar his ſon againſt the Emperor Otho the great, and they muſt pretend themſelves to be Kings of Italy. Pope John the 18th made a league with Creſcentius, and ſtirred up the people againſt Otho the third. Pope Benedict the ninth excited Peter of Hungary to pretend to the Empire, onely to hinder Henry ſurnamed Niger from entring into Italy to repeat his rights. And all the world knows what Gregory the 7th did to Henry the fourth; how he firſt cauſed Rodulph of Suevia, and afterwards Ecbert of Saxony to fight againſt him: and here their great quarrel was about the power of chuſing the Pope. Then they fell out about the collation of Biſhoprics; for which cauſe Pope Gelaſius the XIIth caus'd the Arch-Biſhop of Mentz to rebel againſt Henry the 5th; and there the Pope got the better of him, and by the aid of his Norman forces which he had in Sicily beat him into compliance. Then they fell out about ſome fees of the Empire; and Innocent the ſecond raiſed up Roger the Norman againſt Lotharius the XII. about the Dutchy of Poüille: and S. Bernard being made Umpire in the Quarrel, the Pope got a ſhare in Bavaria, for whoever loſt, ſignior Papa, like the butlers box, was ſure to get, by the advantage of his ſupreme conduct of religion which by this time he got into his hands.

4. And now he improv'd it providently. For the ſame Innocent ſtirred up Guelphus Duke of Bavaria againſt Conrade the third; and thence ſprang that diſmal and bloudy faction between the Guelphs and Ghibellins. But what ſhould I reckon more? I muſt tranſcribe the Annals of Germany to enumerate the hoſtilities of the Roman Biſhops againſt the Emperors their lords, when they got the conduct and Civil government of religious affairs into their power. Frederic Barbaroſſa, Henry the ſixth, his brother Philip, Frederic the ſecond, Henry the ſeventh, Frederic of Auſtria, Lewis of Bavaria, Sigismond, Frederic the third, felt the power of a temporal ſword in a religious ſcabbard: and this was ſo certain, ſo conſtant a miſchief, that when the Pope had excommunicated eight Emperors, and made the temporal ſword cut off them whom the ſpiritual ſword had ſtruck at, the Emperors grew afraid. And Radulph of Haſpurg when he was choſen Emperor durſt not goe into Italy, which he called the Lions denne, becauſe the entrance was fair, but few returning footſteps were eſpied. And it grew to be a proverb, ſaith Guicciardine, Proprium eſt Eccleſiæ odiſſe Cæſares, The Church hates Cæſar; and the event was that which Carion complained of, Sceleribus Pontificum hoc Imperium languefactum eſt, By the wickedneſſe of the Biſhops of Rome the Roman Empire is fallen into decay.

lib. 4. Chron.

5. Theſe inſtances are more then enough to prove that if Religion be governed by any hand with which the Civil power hath nothing to doe, it may come to paſſe that the Civil power ſhall have no hands at all, or they ſhall be in bands. The conſequence of theſe is this, That if the ſupreme Civil power be ſufficient to preſerve it ſelf, it can provide againſt the evil uſe of the ſpiritual ſword, and conſequently can conduct all religion that can by evil men be abus'd, ſo as to keep it harmleſſe. If by excommunications the Biſhop can diſturb the Civil intereſt, the Civil power can hold his hands that he ſhall not ſtrike with it, or if he does, can take out the temporal ſting, that it ſhall not venome and feſter. If by ſtrange doctrines the Eccleſiaſtics can aliene the hearts of ſubjects from their duty, the Civil power can forbid thoſe doctrines to be preach'd. If the Canons of the Church be ſeditious or peeviſh or apt for trouble, the Civil power can command them to be reſcinded, or may refuſe to verify them, and make them into laws. But that we may not truſt our own reaſon reaſon onely, I ſhall inſtance in the particulars of jurisdiction, and give evident probation of them from the authority of the beſt ages of the Church.

6. And firſt in general, that Kings or the ſupreme Civil power is by God made an Overſeer, a Ruler, a carefull Father, a Governour, a Protector and Provider for his Church, is evident in the Scriptures, and the doctrine of the Primitive ages of the Church. Nutritii & patres Eccleſiæ is their appellative which we are taught from Scripture, Nurſing Fathers of the Church. Paſtores, that's the word God us'd of Cyrus the Perſian, Cyrus my ſhepherd: and when the Spirit of God by David calls to Kings and Princes of the earth to kiſſe the Son leſt he be angry, it intends that as Kings they ſhould uſe their power and Empire in thoſe things in which the Son will be worſhipp'd by the children of men. For beſides the natural and firſt end of government, which is temporal felicity, of which I have already ſpoken, there is alſo a ſupernatural, the eternal felicity of ſouls; and to this Civil government does miniſter by the Oeconomy and deſigne of God: and therefore it was well ſaid of Ammianus, Nihil aliud eſt Imperium (ut ſapientes definiunt) niſi cura ſalutis alienæ. It is true in both ſenſes; Empire is nothing elſe (as wiſe men define it) but a power of doing good by taking care for the ſalvation of others. To doe them good here, and to cauſe them to doe themſelves good hereafter, is the end of all government. And the reaſon of it is well expreſſed by the Emperor Theodoſius Junior to S. Cyril, Quandoquidem ut vera religio juſtâ actione perficitur, ita & Reſpublica utriuſque ope mixta floreſcit, As true religion is perfected by juſtice, ſo by religion and juſtice the republick does flouriſh; and therefore he addes, Deus opt. Max. pietatis & juſtæ actionis quoddam quaſi vinculum nos eſſe voluerit, The Emperor is by the Divine appointment the common band of juſtice and religion.

7. In purſuance of this truth, Euſebius tels that Conſtantine the Great was wont to ſay to the Biſhops concerning himſelf, Vos intra Eccleſiam, ego extra Eccleſiam à Deo Epiſcopus conſtitutus ſum, You within the Church walls and I without, but both of us are appointed by God to be Biſhops or Overſeers of his Saints and ſervants. And in the edict of Valentinian and Martian, which approves the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, they are both called Inclyti Pontifices, illuſtrious Biſhops: and the Emperor Leo 3. in his Epiſtle to Gregory the Biſhop of Rome ſayes of himſelf ὅτι βασιλεὺς καὶ ἱερεύς εἰμι, I am both a King and a prieſt; meaning in office, not in order, in government, not in miniſteries. Theſe and ſuch like words are often us'd in the Letters enterchang'd between the Princes and the Biſhops in the Ancient Church, of which that of Leo the Roman Biſhop concerning the French Capitulars is remarkable, writing to Lotharius. De capitulis vel præceptis Imperialibus veſtris veſtrorum Pontificum prædeceſſorum irrefragabiliter cuſtodiendis & conſervandis, quantum valuimus & valemus in Chriſto propitio, & nunc & in ævum nos conſervaturos modis omnibus profitemur. It was a direct Oath of ſupremacy. Concerning the Capitulars or Imperial precepts given by you and your predeceſſors who were Biſhops, (viz. in their power and care over Churches) we through the aſſiſtance of Chriſt promiſe as much as we are able to keep and to conſerve them for ever. The limit of which power is well explicated by S. Auſtin in theſe words, Quando Imperatores veritatem tenent, pro ipſa veritate contra errorem jubent; quod quiſquis contempſerit tempſerit, ipſe ſibi judicium acquirit, When the Emperors are Chriſtians and right believers, they make laws for the truth and againſt falſe doctrines; which laws whoſoever ſhall deſpiſe, gets damnation to himſelf.

8. For if we conſider that famous ſaying of Optatus, that Eccleſia eſt in republica, non respublica in Eccleſia, The Church is in the common-wealth, not the common-wealth in the Church, and the Church is not a diſtinct ſtate and order of men, but the common-wealth turn'd Chriſtian, that is better inſtructed, more holy, greater lovers of God, and taught in the knowledge of our Lord Jeſus; it is not to be imagin'd, that the Emperors or ſupreme governours ſhould have the leſſe care and rule over it by how much the more it belongs to God. This fancy firſt invaded the ſervants when they turn'd Chriſtians; they thought their Maſters had then leſſe to doe with them. The Apoſtle tels them as in the caſe of Oneſimus, that it is true, they ought to love them better, but the other were not the leſſe to be obedient; onely there was this gotten by it, that the ſervants were to doe the ſame ſervice for the Lords ſake, which before they did for the laws. But it is a ſtrange folly to imagine that becauſe a man hath chang'd his opinion he hath therefore chang'd his relation; and if it were ſo, he that is weary of his Maſter, may ſoon change his ſervice by going to another Tutor. Religion eſtabliſhes all natural and political relations, and changes none but the ſpiritual; and the ſame Prince that governs his people in the time of the plague is to govern them when they are cur'd; and the Phyſician that cur'd them hath got no dominion over them, onely in regimine ſalutis he is principal, he is to govern their health. The caſes as to this are parallel between the ſoul and the body. And therefore the Emperor Conſtans declar'd his power and his duty too, de omnibus curam agere & intendere quæ reſpiciunt ad utilitatem Chriſtianiſſimæ noſtræ reipublicæ, to take care and to intend all things which regard the advantage of our moſt Chriſtian common-wealth: and Aimonius tels of King Clodovæus, that in one of the Councils of Africa held at Clupea he deſcribed his office and duty by theſe two ſummaries, publicis rebus conſultores advocare, & ea quæ Dei & ſanctorum ejus ſunt diſponere; to conſult about publick affaires of the common-wealth, and to diſpoſe of thoſe things which belong to God and to his ſaints.

9. But the conſideration of the particulars will be more uſeful in this inquiry, and firſt

The ſupreme Civil power hath authority to convene and to diſſolve all ſynods Eccleſiaſtical.

10. This appears 1. in that all the firſt Councils of the Church after the Emperors were Chriſtian were convocated by their Authority. The Council of Nice was called by Conſtantine, as is affirmed by [a] Euſebius, [b] Ruffinus, [c] Sozomen and [d] Theodoret: and when the Euſebians had perſuaded Conſtantine to call a council at Tyre againſt Athanaſius, the Prince underſtanding their craft and violence call'd them from Tyre to Conſtantinople * : and by the ſame Emperour there was another Council called at Arles. The Council at Sardica in Illyria was conven'd by the authority of the Emperours Conſtans and Conſtantius, as the Fathers of that Synod themſelves wrote in their letters to the Egyptians and Africans: and Liberius the Biſhop of Rome

* Synod. conſtit. libell.

Rome with many other Biſhops of Italy joyn'd in petition to Conſtantius to convocate a Council at Aquileia; not to ſuffer them to doe it, but that he would, for to him they knew it onely did belong. Theodoſius the Emperor called the ſecond general Council at Conſtantinople; as Socrates, Sozomen and Nicephorus relate: and the Fathers of the Council * write in their Synodical conſtitutions, with this expreſſion added, ea quæ acta ſunt in ſancto Concilio ad Tuam referimus Pietatem, whatſoever was done in that Synod was wholly referr'd and ſubmitted to the Princes piety. The great Epheſin Council, which was the third Oecumenical, was conven'd by Theodoſius Junior, ex proprio munere & officio, & ex animi ſui deliberatione, ſo himſelf affirms, out of his own free choice, according to his office and his duty. But his reſcript by which he conven'd the Council is a moſt admirable letter, and contains in it a full teſtimony of the truth of this whole Rule, and does excellently enumerate and imply all the parts of the Imperial jurisdiction in cauſes of religion. The ſumme of which are in the preface of that reſcript in theſe words, Our common-wealth depends upon piety [or religion] towards God, and between them both there is great cognation and ſociety; for they agree together, and grow by the increaſe of one another: ſo that true religion does ſhine by the ſtudy of juſtice, and the common-wealth is aſſiſted by them both. We therefore being plac'd in the Kingdome by God, having receiv'd from him the care both of the Religion and the proſperity of the ſubject, we have hitherto endeavour'd by our care and by our forces to keep in perpetual union: and for the ſafety of the republic we are intent to the profit of our ſubjects, and diligently watch for the conſervation of true religion; but eſpecially we ſtrive that they may live holily, as becomes holy perſons, taking care, as it befits us, even of both (for it is impoßible we ſhould take good care of one if we neglect the other.) But above the reſt, we are carefull that the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate may remain firm, ſo as is fit to relate to God, and to be in our time, and may have tranquillity by the conſent of all men, and may be quiet by the peace of the Eccleſiaſtic affaires; and that true religion may be kept unreprovable, and the lives of the inferior Clergy and the Biſhops may be free from blame. This is the ſumme of his duty, and the limit of his power, and the intention of his Government. And to theſe purpoſes he call'd a Council, threatning puniſhment to any Prelate who was called if he neglected to come. If the Emperour took more upon him then belong'd to him, he was near a good Tutour that could well have reprov'd him, the Fathers of the Epheſin Council; but if he took upon him but what was juſt, this teſtimony alone is ſufficient in this whole queſtion. But he ended not ſo, but ſhortly after called another Council in the ſame place, againſt the will of Pope Leo, who yet was forc'd to ſend his Deputies to be aſſiſtant at it. But that Council had an ill end: and to repair the wounds made to truth by it, Pope Leo petition'd the Emperor for another to be held in Italy. But the Emperor was then not much in love with Councils, having been ſo lately deceived by one; and therefore put it off, and died: and his ſucceſſor Martianus called one at Nice, but changing his mind had it kept in Chalcedon. I ſhall proceed no further in particular, but account it ſufficient what Cardinal Cuſanus acknowledges. Sciendum eſt quod in univerſalibus octo Conciliis ſemper invenio Imperatores & Judices ſuos cum ſenatu primatum habuiſſe. For this is more then the mere power of calling them; for that he might doe upon many accounts: but the Emperors and his Judges and Council always had the primacy in the eight general Councils.

11. As the Emperors did convene, ſo they did diſmiſſe the Eccleſiaſtical conventions; as appears in the acts of the Epheſin Council, where the Fathers petition the Emperor, that he would free them from that place, and give them leave to wait upon him to ſee his face, or at leaſt he would diſmiſſe them and ſend them home to their own Churches. The ſame petition was made by the Biſhops at Ariminum to the Emperor Conſtantius, and by the Fathers at the Council of Chalcedon * to Martianus. But theſe things did never pleaſe the Italians after their Patriarch began to ſet up for Eccleſiaſtical Monarchy, and they, as ſoon as they could, and even before their juſt opportunities, would be endeavouring to leſſen the Imperial power and to take it into their own hands. But this is one of the things that grew to an intolerable miſchief; and was not onely againſt the practice of the beſt ages, and againſt the juſt rights of Emperors, but againſt the doctrine of the Church.

12. For S. Hierom reproving Ruffinus, who had quoted the authority of ſome Synod, I know not where, S. Hierome confutes him, by this argument, Quis Imperator juſſerit hanc Synodum congregari? There was no ſuch Synod, for you cannot tell by what Emperors command it was conven'd. To this purpoſe there was an excellent Epiſtle written by certain Biſhops of Iſtria to Mauritius the Emperour, enumerating from the records of the Church the convention of Eccleſiaſtical Councils to have been wholly by the Emperors diſpoſition; in which alſo they dogmatically affirm, Semper Deus præſentiâ Chriſtianorum Principum contentiones Eccleſiaſticas ſedare dignatur, God does always vouchſafe to appeaſe Church-quarrels by the preſence of Chriſtian Emperors: meaning that by their authority the Conciliary definitions paſs'd into laws. But who pleaſe to ſee more particulars relating to this inquiry, may be filled with the ſight of them in the whole third book of William Ranchin his Review of the Council of Trent.

apud Baron. A. D. 590. to. 8. n. 40.

The ſupreme Civil power hath a power of external Judgement in cauſes of Faith.

13. This relies upon the former reaſons, That ſince propoſitions of religion and doctrines of Theology have ſo great influence upon the lives of men, upon peace and juſtice, upon duty and obedience, it is neceſſary that the ſupreme Civil power ſhould determine what doctrines are to be taught the people, and what to be forbidden. The Princes are to tell what religions are to be permitted and what not: and we find a law of Juſtinian forbidding anathematiſms to be pronounced againſt the Jewiſh Helleniſts; for the Emperors did not onely permit falſe religions by impunity, but made laws even for the ordering their aſſemblies, making Eccleſiaſtical laws for enemies of true religion: ſo neceſſary it is for Princes to govern all religion and pretences of religion within their Nations. This we find in the Civil law, in the title of the Code de Judæis, in many inſtances. A law was made by Juſtinian alſo that none ſhould be admitted into the Jewiſh Synagogues that denied Angels, or the Reſurrection, or the day of Judgment. Thus the Civil power took away the Churches from the Maximianiſtæ, becauſe they were an under ſect of the Donatiſts condemn'd by their ſuperiors. But then that the Chriſtian Princes did this and might doe this and much more in the articles of true religion, is evident by many inſtances and great reaſon.

14. There is a title in the firſt book of the Code, Ne ſacroſanctum baptiſma iteretur, againſt the Anabaptiſts. Charles the Great made a decree againſt the worſhipping of Images, and gave ſentence againſt the ſecond Nicene Council in that particular: and Sozomen reports that Conſtantine cut off unprofitable queſtions, to prevent ſchiſmes in the Church; which example our Kings of England have imitated by forbidding publick preachers or Divines in ſchools to meddle in the curious queſtions of Predeſtination. Thus the publick laws of a Nation often declare who are and who are not heretics: and by an Act of Parliament in England they onely are judged heretics who for ſuch were condemn'd by the four general Councils. Upon this account many Princes have forbidden publick diſputations in matters of religion: to this purpoſe there was a law of Leo and Anthemius, l. qui in Mon. C. de Epiſc. & Clericis; and Andronicus the Emperor hearing ſome Biſhops diſputing with ſome ſubtilty upon thoſe words [my Father is greater then I] threatned to throw them into the river, if they would not leave ſuch dangerous diſputations. Heraclius the Emperor forbad any of thoſe nice words concerning Chriſt to be uſed: ſome did uſe to ſay that in Chriſt there was a ſingle energy, ſome ſaid there was a double; but the Emperor determin'd the queſtion well, and bad them hold their peace and ſpeak of neither: for, as Siſinnius ſaid to Theodoſius, diſputando de ſacris accendi tantùm contentionem, there is nothing got by diſputations but ſtrife and contention: and therefore Princes are the beſt Moderators of Church-mens quarrels, becauſe Princes are bound to keep the peace. And conſonantly to this Iſidore ſpake well, Sanè per regnum terrenum cæleſte regnum proficit, ut qui intra Eccleſiam poſiti contra fidem & diſciplinam Eccleſiæ agunt, rigore principum conterantur, ipſamque diſciplinam quam Eccleſia humilitas exercere non prævalet, cervicibus ſuperborum poteſtas principalis imponat. The Civil power advances the intereſts of the heavenly Kingdome by puniſhing them who ſin againſt the faith and diſcipline of the Church; if they be intra Eccleſiam, within the Church, their faith and manners both are ſubject to the ſecular judgment.

15. But not onely ſo, but they are to take care to ſecure & promote the intereſt of truth: for though, as S. Paul ſayes, doubtful diſputations doe engender ſtrife, yet we muſt contend earneſtly for the faith; with zeal, but yet with meekneſſe too: and therefore that matters of faith and doctrines of good life be eſtabliſhed, it is part of the Princes duty to take care. * According to which we find that when a rumour was ſpread that brought Pope Pelagius into ſuſpicion of hereſy, King Childebert ſent Rufinus to him to require him either to recite and profeſſe the Tome of S. Leo in which there was a good confeſſion of faith, or elſe that he ſhould doe the ſame thing in his own words. Pope Pelagius ſent this anſwer: Satagendum eſt ut pro auferendo ſuſpicionis ſcandalo obſequium confeſſionis noſtræ

* *Imperator, ut communis ἐκκλησιαρχης exiſtens & nominatus, Synodalibus præeſt ſententiis & robur tribuit, Eccleſiaſticos ordines componit, & legem dat vitæ politiaque eorum qui altari ſerviunt. Regibus

Regibus miniſtremus, quibus etiam nos ſubditos eſſe ſacræ Scripturæ præcipiunt, We muſt take care that for the avoiding ſuſpicion we exhibit to Kings the duty of our confeſſion: For to them the holy Scriptures command even us to be obedient. And not onely for the Faith of Biſhops and even of Popes, but for their Manners alſo Kings were to take care, and did it accordingly. Juſtinian made laws that Biſhops ſhould not play at dice, nor be preſent at publick ſpectacles; and he ſaid of himſelf, maximam habere ſe ſollicitudinem circa vera Dei dogmata, & circa Sacerdotum honeſtatem, that his greateſt care was about the true doctrines of God, and the good lives of Biſhops. 25. q. 1. c. Satagendum. Novel. 123. c. 10.

16. I doe not intend by this, that whatſoever article is by Princes allowed is therefore to be accounted a part of true religion; for that is more then we can juſtify of a definition made by a Synod of Biſhops: but that they are to take care that true doctrine be eſtabliſhed; that they that are bound to doe ſo muſt be ſuppos'd competent Judges what is true doctrine, elſe they guide their ſubjects, and ſome body elſe rules them, and then who is the Prince? By what meanes and in what manner the Civil power is to doe this I am to ſet down in the next Rule; but here the queſtion is of the power, not of the manner of exerciſing it: and the anſwer is, that this power of judging for themſelves and for their people is part of their right; that no article of religion can become a law unleſſe it be decreed by God, or by the Prince; that the Biſhops declaration is a good indication of the law of God, but that the Princes ſanction makes it alſo become a law of the Common-wealth: that the Prince may be deceived in an article of religion is as true as that he may be deceiv'd in a queſtion of right, and a point of law; yet his determination hath authority, even when a better propoſition wants it: that error muſt ſerve the ends of peace, till by the doctrines of the wiſer Eccleſiaſtics the Prince being better informed, can by truth ſerve it better.

RULE VIII.

The ſupreme Civil power is to govern in Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical by the meanes and meaſures of Chriſt's inſtitution, that is, by the aſſiſtance and miniſteries of Eccleſiaſtical perſons.

1. KIngs are ſupreme Judges of the Law; for cujus eſt loqui ejus eſt interpretari, He that ſpeaks, beſt knows his own meaning: and the law-giver is certainly his own beſt interpreter. But in caſes where there is doubt, the ſupreme Civil power ſpeaks by them whoſe profeſſion it is to underſtand the laws. And ſo it is in religion. The King is to ſtudy the law of God; nec hoc illi dictum ut totus ab alieno ore pendeat, ipſeque à ſe nihil dijudicet, ſaid that learned Prelate of Wincheſter; not that he ſhould wholly depend in religion upon the ſentences of others, but be able of himſelf to judge. But where there is difficulty, and that it be fit that the difficulty be reſolved, there the ſupreme Civil power is to receive the aid of the Eccleſiaſtic, from whoſe mouth the people are to require the law, and whoſe lips by their Tortur. Tort.

office and deſignation are to preſerve knowledge. The Doctors of the Jews tell that when Jephthah had made a raſh vow, he might have been releas'd if he had pleas'd: For if a horſe had firſt met him, he had not been bound to have offer'd it to God; but it muſt have been ſold, and a ſacrifice be bought with the price; and much more muſt a man or a woman have been redeem'd. But becauſe Jephthah was a Prince in Iſrael, he would not goe to Phinehas the high Prieſt to have had his vow interpreted, commuted, or releaſed. Neither would Phinehas goe to him, becauſe he was not to offer his help till it was implor'd. Phinehas did not goe to Jephthah, for he had no need, he had no buſineſſe: and Jephthah would not goe to Phinehas, becauſe he was the better man. In the mean time the Virgin died, or, as ſome ſay, was kill'd by her Father: but both Prince and Prieſt were puniſhed, Jephthah with a palſy, and Phinehas was depriv'd of the Spirit of God. For when the Prince needs the Prieſt he muſt conſult him; and whether he conſults him or no, the Prieſt muſt take care that no evil be done by the Prince, or ſuffer'd by him for want of Counſel.

2. But the Princes office of providing for religion, and his manner of doing it in caſes of difficulty are rarely well diſcours'd of by Theodoſius the younger in a letter of his to S. Cyril, of which I have formerly mentioned ſome portions..... Pietatis doctrinam in ſacra Synodo in utramque partem ventilatam eatenus obtinere volumus quatenus veritati & rationi conſentaneum eſſe judicabitur, The doctrine of godlineſſe ſhall be diſcuſs'd in the ſacred Council, and it ſhall prevail or paſſe into a law ſo far as ſhall be judg'd agreeable to truth and reaſon. Where the Emperour gives the examination of it to the Biſhops to whoſe office and calling it does belong: but the judgment of it and the ſanction are the right of the Emperor, who would ſee the Decrees ſhould be eſtabliſhed if they were true and reaſonable. The judgement I ſay was the Emperors, but in his judgement he would be adviſed, taught and eſtabliſhed by his Biſhops. Sed nec eam doctrinam indiſcuſſam patiemur; cui dijudicandæ eos præfici oportet qui ſacerdotiis ubivis gentium præſident, per quos & nos quoque in veritatis ſententia ſtabilimur, & magis magiſque identidem ſtabiliemur, That doctrine that is in queſtion we will not ſuffer to eſcape examination; but thoſe ſhall be preſidents of the judgment who in every Nation are the appointed Biſhops, by whom we alſo our ſelves are confirmed in the true Religion, and hope every day to be more and more eſtabliſhed.

3. When the ſupreme power hath call'd in the aid and office of the Eccleſiaſtic, good Princes uſe to verify their acts accordingly, to eſtabliſh their ſentences, to puniſh the convict, to exterminate heretics and ſuppreſſe their doctrines. Thus Honorius and Arcadius the Emperors by an Edict repreſſed Pelagius and Cæleſtius whom the Biſhops had condemn'd; Conſtantine after the ſentence of the Nicene Fathers againſt Arius, baniſh'd him. Theodoſius the Elder having diligently conferr'd with the Orthodox Biſhops, and heard patiently what the others could ſay, by a law forbad them to have publick aſſemblies who denied the Conſubſtantiality of the Son with the Father. Per Conſilium Sacerdotum & Optimatum ordinavimus, conſtituimus, & diximus; it was the ſtyle of King Pepin in the Council of Soiſſons. And of this nature the inſtances are very numerous. For ſemper ſtudium fuit Orthodoxis & piis Imperatoribus pro tempore exortas hæreſes per congregationem religioſiſſimorum Archiepiſcoporum amputare, & rectâ fide ſincerè cerè prædicata in pace ſanctam Dei Eccleſiam cuſtodire, ſaid Theodorus Silentiarius. All the pious and orthodox Emperors did uſe this inſtrument and manner of proceeding, for the cutting off hereſies, and the ſincere publication of the faith, and the conſervation of the Church in peace. in 5ta Synod. Conſtant.

4. But that this manner of Empire may not prejudice the right of Empire, it is to be obſerved that in theſe things the Emperors us'd their own liberty, which prov'd plainly they us'd nothing but their own right. For ſometimes they gave toleration to differing Sects, ſometimes they gave none; ſometimes they were govern'd by zeal, and ſometimes by gentle Counſels, onely they would be carefull that the diſputes ſhould not break the publick peace: but for their puniſhing Recuſants and Schiſmatics they us'd their liberty; ſo we find in the Acts of the great Epheſin Council, that Theodoſius the 2d reſolv'd of one, but not upon the other. At verò ſive illi veniam impetraturi ſint qui à Patribus victi diſcedent, ſive non, nos ſanè civitates ſimul & Eccleſias conturbari nequaquam ſinemus, Whether thoſe who are convict of hereſy by the Fathers ſhall be pardon'd yea or no, yet we will be ſure not to ſuffer the Republick or the Churches to be diſturbed.

5. This I obſerve now in oppoſition to thoſe bold pretences of the Court of Rome, and of the Presbytery, that eſteem Princes bound to execute their decrees, and account them but great miniſters and ſervants of their ſentences. Now if this be true, then Princes muſt confirm all that the Clergy decrees: If all, then the ſupreme Prince hath leſſe then the meaneſt of the people, not ſo much as a judgement of diſcretion; or if he have, it is worſe, for he muſt not uſe his diſcretion for the doing of his duty, but muſt by an implicite faith and a blind brutiſh obedience obey his Maſters of the Conſiſtory or Aſſembly. But if he be not bound to confirm all, then I ſuppoſe he may chuſe which he will, and which he will not: and if ſo, it is well enough; for then the ſupreme judgment and the laſt reſort is to the Prince, not to his Clercs. And that Princes are but Executioners of the Clergyes ſentences is ſo far from being true, that we find Theodoſius refuſing to confirm the Acts of the great Epheſin Council: for having been informed (though falſely) that affaires were carried ill, he commanded the Biſhops to reſume the queſtion of the Neſtorians: for their acts of condemnation againſt them he made null, and commanded them to judge it over again, and that till they had done ſo, they ſhould not ſtirre to their Biſhopricks. The miniſtery was the Biſhops all the way, but the external judgement and the legiſlative was the Princes. So Charles the Great reform'd the Church, Epiſcopos congregavi, &c. I convocated the Biſhops to counſel me how Gods law and Chriſtian religion ſhould be recover'd. Therefore by the counſel of my Religious Prelates and my Nobles we have appointed Biſhops in every City, and Boniface their Archbiſhop, and appoint that a Synod ſhall be held every year, that in our preſence the canonical decrees and the rights of the Church may be reſtor'd, and Chriſtian religion may be reformed. But becauſe this muſt be evident as a conſequent of all the former diſcourſes upon this queſtion; it will be ſufficient now to ſumme it up with the teſtimony of S. Auſtin writing to Emeritus the Donatiſt. Nam & terrenæ poteſtates cum ſchiſmaticos perſequuntur eâ regulâ ſe defendunt, quia dicit Apoſtolus, Qui poteſtati reſiſtit, Dei ordinationi reſiſtit.... Non enim fruſtra gladium portat, When the Civil power puniſhes Schiſmatics they have a warrant from an Apoſtolical Rule, which ſayes, He that reſiſts, reſiſts the ordinance of apud Acta Concil. Epheſ. in liter. Theod. ad Synod. apud Surium die 5. Jun. Epiſt. 164.

God: For they bear not the ſword in vain. It is not therefore by a commiſſion or a command from the Church that they puniſh Schiſmatics, but [conſtituunt adverſus vos pro ſua ſollicitudine ac poteſtate quod volunt] they decree what they pleaſe againſt them according to their own care and their own power.

6. So that when it is ſaid that Princes are to govern their Churches by the conſent and advice of their Biſhops, it is meant not de jure ſtricto, but de bono & laudabili: It is fit that they doe ſo, it is the way of Chriſts ordinary appointment; He that heareth you heareth me: and to them a command is given, to feed all the flock of Chriſt. In purſuance of which it was a famous reſcript of Valentinian the firſt, cited by S. Ambroſe, In cauſa fidei vel Eccleſiaſtici alicujus ordinis eum judicare debere qui nec munere impar ſit, nec jure diſſimilis. Theſe are the words of the reſcript: that is, he would that Biſhops ſhould judge of Biſhops; and that in cauſes of faith or the Church their miniſtery ſhould be us'd, whoſe perſons by reaſon of the like imployment were moſt competent to be put in delegation. But to the ſame purpoſe more of theſe favourable Edicts were made in behalf of the Church by Theodoſius and Valentinian the ſecond, by Arcadius, Honorius and Juſtinian: and indeed beſides that it is reaſonable in all caſes, it is neceſſary in very many; becauſe Biſhops and Prieſts are the moſt knowing in ſpiritual affaires, and therefore moſt fit to be counſellors to the Prince, who oftentimes hath no great skill, though he have ſupreme authority. I remember that when Gellius the Prætor was ſent Proconſul into Greece, he obſerv'd that the Scholars at Athens did perpetually wrangle and erect ſchools againſt ſchools, and divided their philoſophy into Sects; and therefore ſending for them, perſuaded them to live quietly and peaceably, and to put their queſtions to reference or umpirage, and in it offerr'd his own aſſiſtance: but the Scholars laught at his confident offer to be a moderator in things he underſtood no more then his ſpurres did. He might have made them keep the peace, and at the ſame time make uſe of their wit and his own authority. And although there may happen a caſe in which Princes may, and a caſe in which they muſt refuſe to confirm the ſynodical decrees, ſentences and judgements of Eccleſiaſtics: yet unleſſe they doe with great reaſon & upon competent neceſſity, they cannot doe it without great ſcandal, and ſometimes great impiety. But of this I ſhall diſcourſe in the next Chapter. For the preſent, I was to aſſert the rights of Princes, and to eſtabliſh the proper foundation of humane laws; that the Conſcience may build upon a rock, and not truſt to that which ſtands upon ſand, and truſts to nothing.

7. I have been the larger upon theſe things becauſe the adverſaries are great and many, and the pretences and the challenges high, and their oppoſition great and intricate, and their affrightments large; for they uſe ſomething to perſwade and ſomething to ſcare the conſcience. Such is that bold ſaying of Pope Leo the x^th^, A jure tam Divino quam humano laicis poteſtas nulla in Eccleſiaſticas perſonas attributa eſt, Both by Divine and humane laws Eccleſiaſtics are free from all ſecular power. But fierce and terrible are the words of the Extravagant Unam ſanctam. Porro ſubeſſe Romano Pontifici omnem humanam creaturam declaramus, dicimus, definimus & pronunciamus omnino eſſe de neceſſitate ſalutis, That every man ſhould be ſubject to the Biſhop of Rome, we define, we ſay, we declare and pronounce to be altogether neceſſary to ſalvation. This indeed is high; but how vain withal and and trifling and unreaſonable I have ſufficiently evidenc'd. So that now the conſcience may firmly rely upon the foundation of humane laws, and by them ſhe is to be conducted not onely in Civil affaires, but in Eccleſiaſtical, that is, in religion as well as juſtice: and there is nothing that can prejudice their authority, unleſſe they decree againſt a law of God; of which becauſe Eccleſiaſtical perſons are the preachers and expoſitors by ordinary Divine appointment, Princes muſt hear Biſhops, and Biſhops muſt obey Princes: or becauſe audire & obaudire to hear and to obey have great affinity, I chuſe to end this with the expreſſion of Abbot Berengar almoſt 1100 years agoe, Sciendum eſt quod nec Catholicæ fidei nec Chriſtianæ contrarium eſt legi, ſi ad honorem regni & ſacerdotii Rex Pontifici & Pontifex obediat Regi, It is neither againſt the Catholic faith nor the Chriſtian law that the Prince obey the Biſhop, and the Biſhop obey the Prince: the firſt is an obedience of piety, and the later of duty; the one is juſtice, and the other is religion. lib. de Myſter. ſign. in Biblioth. CHAP. IV.

Of the power of the Church in canons and cenſures, with their obligations and powers over the conſcience.

RULE I.

1. THat there are great things ſpoken by the Doctors of the Primitive Church of the Eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual power is every where evident, and that there are many expreſſions which prefer it above the ſecular; all which I ſhall repreſent in ſtead of others in the words of S. Chryſoſtom, becauſe of them all he was the moſt eloquent, and likelieſt in the faireſt imagery to deſcribe the powers of his Order. Others are the limits of the Kingdome, others of the Prieſthood; for this is greater then that: and you muſt not eſtimate it by the purple and the gold. The King hath allotted to him the things of this world to be adminiſtred; but the right of Prieſthood deſcendeth from above: Whatſoever ye ſhall bind on earth ſhall be bound in heaven. To the King is committed what is here below; to me, that is to the Biſhop, things celeſtial. The bodies are intruſted to Princes, but the ſoals to Biſhops. The King remits the guilt of bodies, but the Biſhop the guilt of ſinnes. The Prince compels, the Biſhop exhorts. He governs by neceſsity, but we by counſel; he hath ſenſible armour, but we ſpiritual weapons; he wageth warre againſt the Barbarians, but we againſt the Devil. Here then is a greater principality. For which cauſe the King ſubmits himſelf to the Prieſts hand, and every where in the Old Teſtament the Prieſts did anoint Kings. Where by the way, Hom. 4. ex verb. Iſaiæ.

2 Kings 9. 4. though it be not exactly true that the Kings of Israel and Judah were always anointed by Priests, but sometimes by Prophets who were no Priests, as in the case of Jehu; yet supposing all that, the discourse is true enough, and the spiritual power in relation to a nobler object is in that regard better then the temporal; and therefore is in spiritual account in order to a spiritual end above that which serves the lesse excellent. But the effect of this discourse is, that Kings are subject to Bishops just as the Princes of Israel were to those that anointed them; that is, they came under their hands for unction, and consecration, and blessing, and counsel, and the rites of sacrifice. And all this is very true; and this is all that was or could be intended by S. Chrysostom, or those other eminent lights of the Primitive Church, who set their Order upon a candlestic, and made it illustrious by the advantage of comparison. The advantages are wholly spiritual, the excellencies are spiritual, the operations are spiritual, and the effects are spiritual; the office is spiritual, and so is all the power. But becaus the persons of the men in whom this spiritual power is subjected are temporal as well as Princes, and so are all their civil actions, therefore whatever eminence they have for their spiritual imployment, it gives them no temporal advantage; that comes in upon another stock: but for the spiritual it is as much as it is pretended; but then it is no more.

2. For it is purely spiritual. Where any thing of temporal is mingled with it, it is not greater in that, but subject to the temporal power. Without this there could never be peace: and where the jurisdiction of two Courts doe enterfere, there is perpetual wranglings. But God having ordain'd two powers hath made them both best; and yet so that both of them are inferior: but becaus it is in differing powers, they both rule in peace, and both obey with pleasure. How the Eccleſiastic state is subject to the Civil I have largely accounted: Now I am to describe the eminencies, powers, advantages and legislations of the spiritual: concerning which we shall have the best light if we rightly understand the nature and quality of the power.

3. As my Father sent me, so send I you, said Christ to his Apostles. Now it is plain how the Father was pleas'd to send his Son; with humility and miracles, with a low fortune and a great designe, with poverty and power, with fulnesse of the spirit and excellency of wisdome. That was the manner. The end was, the redemption of Man, the conquering of the Devil, the preaching of the Gospel, the foundation of the Church, the instruction of faith, the baptizing Converts, the reformation of manners, the extirpation of sinne. This was the intire end, and that was the just manner in which Christ was sent into the world: And since his Apostles & their successors were to pursue the same ends and no other, they were furnished with the same power: and Christ gave them the Holy Ghost, and gave them commandement and power to teach all Nations, to baptise them, to bind and to loose, to minister his body and his bloud, to exhort and to reprove, to comfort and to cure, to make spiritual separations of the vile from the precious. This is the summe of all the Commissions they had from Christ.

4. This power and these commissions were wholly Ministerial without domination, without proper jurisdiction, that is, without coaction; it being wholly wholly againſt the deſigne of the religion, that it ſhould be forc'd; and it being far remov'd from perſons ſo diſpos'd, ſo imployed, ſo inſtructed to doe it. And therefore one of the requiſites of a Biſhop is μὴ εἶναι πλικτικὸν, He muſt be no ſtriker: he had no armes put into his hand to that purpoſe; the Eccleſiaſtic ſtate being furniſhed with authority, but no power, that is authoritate ſuadendi, non jubendi poteſtate (that I may uſe the expreſſion in Tacitus) an authority to perſuade and to rebuke, but no power to command, as the word is us'd in the ſenſe of ſecular dominion.

5. Concerning which that the thing be rightly underſtood, we muſt firſt truly underſtand the word. Accurſius defines Jurisdiction to be poteſtatem de publico introductam cum neceſſitate juris dicendi & æquitatis ſtatuendæ, A publick power of doing right and equity. It is poteſtas ad jus dicendum, ſo Muſcornus Cyprius, A power of giving ſentence in cauſes between party and party. But we ſhall beſt underſtand the meaning of Jurisdictio by that place of Cicero. Quid ergo iſtius in jure dicendo libidinem demonſtrem? Quis veſtrum non ex urbana jurisdictione cognovit? Quis unquam iſto Prætore Chelidone invitâ lege agere potuit? Judices citari jubet: jubet citari Heraclium: citatur reus Sopatrus: Stenium citari jubet: atque ut aliquando de rebus ab iſto cognitis, judicatis, & de judicibus datis deſiſtamus dicere, &c. From which words it is plain, that jurisdiction is a power of magiſtracy to ſummon the parties, to hear their cauſe, and to give ſentence. And therefore in Suetonius we often find theſe expreſſions, Imperatorem jus dixiſſe, cognoviſſe, judicaſſe, The Emperor took cogniſance, did judge, did give ſentence, that is, did exerciſe jurisdiction. Empire is always included under jurisdiction; and it is divided into a cognition of capital and pecuniary cauſes, as appears plainly in the title of the Code De jurisdictione, which handles both cauſes: and Aſconius Pædianus in his argument upon the 4th action againſt Verres proves expreſſely that Capital actions are part of jurisdiction. To which purpoſe is that of Suetonius in the life of Auguſtus; Dixit autem jus non diligentiâ modo ſummâ ſed & lenitate, ſiquidem manifeſti parricidii reum, ne culleo inſueretur, quod non niſi confeſſi afficiebantur hâc pœnâ, &c. But of this there is no queſtion. Now of jurisdiction thus underſtood, it is evident that the Eccleſiaſtic ſtate hath no right derived to them from Chriſt, that is, no power to puniſh any man corporally, or to compel them to anſwer in criminal cauſes; they have no power of the ſword, no reſtraint upon the body: but having care of ſouls, which cannot be govern'd by force, they are to govern as ſouls can be governed, that is by arguments and reaſon, by fear and hope, by preaching of rewards and puniſhments, and all the ways of the nobleſt government, that is, by wiſdome and by the ways of God.

6. This appears in the Apoſtles deſcription of their own office & power. What is Paul and what is Apollo, but Miniſters by whom ye believed? Miniſters of Chriſt, ſtewards of the Myſteries of Chriſt: to us is committed the word of reconciliation; we are Embaſſadors for Chriſt; ὡς κυριεύοντες we are not lords over the flock; but as though God did beſeech you by us, we pray you in Chriſts ſtead to be reconcil'd to God. Thus Chriſt ſet them over the houſhold, not to ſtrike the ſervants, but to give them their meat in due ſeaſon; that is, as Optatus expreſſes it, to miniſter the food of Gods word and Sacraments to the ſervants of the family. Nolite vobis majeſtatis dominium vindicare; nam ſi ita eſt, vindicent ſibi & miniſtri qui menſa dominica famulantur lantur, ut pro humanitate exhibita ab invitatis gratulatio eis referatur.... Est ergo in universis servientibus non dominium sed ministerium. Therefore esteem not your selves to have any thing but the ministery and service, nothing of dominion. And indeed we need challenge no more: It is honour enough to serve such a Prince, to wait at such a table, to be stewards of such a family, to minister such food. This service is perfect freedome; and that is more then can be said of the greatest temporal dominion in the world. Principes Ecclesiæ fiunt ut serviant minoribus suis, & ministrent eis quæcunque acceperunt à Christo. The same with the words of Christ, He that is greatest amongst you, let him be your minister. For the honours in Christian religion at the first look indeed like dignities; but indeed they are not divers honours, but divers services: as it seems to be an honour to the eye that it enlightens the whole body, but it is not it's honour, but it's ministery; so it is amongst the Saints; it is not his honour, but his act. And so is the Apostleship thought to be a great dignity, but it is not so; but it is his ministery. For so S. Paul sayes, If I preach the Gospel it is no glory to me: for necessity is laid upon me, and woe is unto me if I doe not preach the Gospel: for if I doe it willingly, I have a reward; but if unwillingly, there's nothing but a stewardship intrusted to me. The consequent of this discourse is this in the words of the same Father, Quicunque desiderat primatum in terra inveniet confusionem in cælo, Whosoever desires primacy (meaning amongst the Ecclesiastics, and by vertue of their order and office) upon earth, shall find confusion in Heaven.

1 Cor. 9.

7. But this is most expressely and clearly taught by the Fathers of the Church. So S. Gregory Nazianzen, He that is set over others (speaking of Bishops) laying behind him every sin, must proceed in godlinesse, so that by the example of his spiritual growth he may draw others unto vertue, especially by that form of humility which was deliver'd to us by the Lord. Non enim oportet vi vel necessitate constringere, sed ratione & vitæ exemplis suadere, For no man is to be constrained by force or by necessity, but perswaded by reason and good examples. And thus S. Hierome distinguishes the Ecclesiastical power from the Regal. Ille nolentibus præest, hic volentibus: ille terrore subjicit, hic servituti donatur: ille corpora custodit ad mortem, hic animas servat ad vitam. The King governs whither men will or no, the Bishop none but the willing. He subdues them by terror, but the Bishop is but the servant of the peoples souls. The King keeps bodies reserv'd for death, but the Bishop takes care of souls that they may live eternally. Upon this account S. Chrysostom considers the great difficulty there is in the discharge of the Episcopal office, and affirms it to be more troublesome then that of Kings; as much as the rage of the sea in a tempest is greater then the curlings of a troubled River: and he gives this reason for it, Quoniam illic plures sunt qui adjuvant, eo quod legibus ac mandatis omnia peraguntur: hic verò nihil tale, neque enim licet ex authoritate præcipere, Because there are more helpers in the secular government; for all things are transacted by laws and by commandements: but here (meaning in the Ecclesiastic state) there is no such thing; for it is lawfull, but we have no authority to command any thing. For * In potestate subjectorum est obedire vel non. They are not domestics, they are not properly subjects, but obedientiam habentes in sua ipsorum potestate, they have their obedience in their own power: they may if they will, and they shall have a good reward; but if they will not, they may chuse. For with this power and upon these termes the Holy Ghost hath made made them overſeers, to feed, not to rule, the Church of God, that is, not to rule by Empire, but by perſuaſion. And this is intimated by the Epiſtle to the Hebrews Obey them that are ſet over you, and ſubmit your ſelves; for they watch for your ſouls: that they may doe it with joy, not with grief; for that is unprofitable for you. That is, Submit your ſelves to your ſpiritual Rulers cheerfully and willingly: if you doe not, they can have no comfort in their miniſtery; it will grieve them to find you refractary, and you will be the looſers by it, for their grief will doe you no profit. Now if theſe Rulers had a power of coercion, he could quickly make them willing, and the ἀναγκὴ the anguiſh would fall upon the diſobedient. The ſame precept is in the Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians, where the words doe themſelves expound the nature of the government, We beſeech you, brethren, to know them which labour amongſt you and are over you in the Lord, and admoniſh you, and to eſteem them very high in love for their works ſake. And immediately after he calls them in partem ſollicitudinis, into a participation of this rule, νουθετεῖτε ἀτάκτους, We beſeech you, brethren, to admoniſh, or to warne, to reprove them that are unruly. That is, you muſt help us in our government: we are over you to admoniſh you, but you muſt admoniſh one another: that will help our work forward when you are willing. But they which are over you muſt be highly eſteemed, not for their dignity, but for their works ſake, not in fear, but in love; for they are over you not by Empire, but by diſcourſes, not by laws, but by exhortation. And certainly this is the beſt government in the world; that the people of God ſit populus voluntarius ſhould ſerve God with reaſon and choice, with love and pleaſure and eternity of ſatisfaction. And this is obſerved alſo by S. Chryſoſtom. The Princes of this world (ſaith he) are ſo much inferior to this ſpiritual power, by how much it is better to rule over the wills of men then over their bodies: and that's the ſtate of Eccleſiaſtical government, concerning which who pleaſe to ſee much more, may with pleaſure read it in S. Chryſoſtom in his firſt Homily upon the Epiſtle to Titus, and the 11th Homily upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians, and in his ſecond book of Prieſthood.

8. Now againſt this it will not be ſufficient to oppoſe any precedents of government under the Old Teſtament. He there that did not obey the word of the High Prieſt was to die the death; for they had ἀναγκαστικὴν δικαιοχρισίαν, a true proper formal juriſdiction given them by God: and when Moſes ſate in judgement, σωιδρευον ἱερεῦς, ſaith Philo, the Prieſts were his aſſeſſors; and Judæis ſacerdotii honos firmamentum potentiæ erat, the honour of the Jewiſh prieſthood was a great eſtabliſhment to the power of the Nation, ſaith Tacitus. For the Prieſts were ἐπίσκοποι Biſhops, and Judges of controverſies, and by the law appointed to inflict puniſhment upon criminals, ſaid Joſephus. But in the Goſpel there was no ſuch thing. The Jewiſh excommunications were acts of power and a mixt Empire; ours are ſecurities to the ſound part, and cautions againſt offenders. Their preachings were decrees ſometimes; ours can be but exhortations and arguments to perſuade and invite conſent.

contr. Appion. l. 11. c. 6.

9. But neither can it be denied but that the Apoſtles did ſometimes actions of a delegate juriſdiction. Thus S. Peter gave ſentence of death againſt Ananias and Sapphira; S. Paul inflicted blindneſſe upon Elymas the Sorcerer, and deliver'd Hymenæus and Alexander and the inceſtuous Corinthian to be buffeted by Satan; and S. John threatned to doe the like to Diotrephes. That this was extraordinary appears by the manners of animadversion, which were by miracle and immediate Divine judgment; for those which were delivered to Satan were given up to be corporally tormented by some grievous sickneſſe or violence of an evil ſpirit, as [a] S. Chryſoſtom, [b] S. Ambroſe, S. Hierom, and divers others of the Fathers doe affirm. But therefore this was an act of Divine jurisdiction, not of Apoſtolical: It was a miraculous verification of their Divine miſſion, ſeldome us'd, not by ordinary emiſſion of power, but by an extraordinary ſpirit: for ſo S. Paul threatned ſome criminals in the Church of Corinth, that if he did come he would not ſpare them: but it was becauſe they made it neceſſary by their undervaluing of his perſon and miniſtery. Since ye doe ſo, ſince ye doe look for a ſigne and proof of Chriſt ſpeaking in me, you ſhall have it. It is not S. Pauls ordinary power, nor his own extraordinary, but δοκιμὴ Χριϛοῦ an experiment of Chriſt's power, who was pleas'd to miniſter it by S. Paul, as well as by any other Apoſtle: ſomething like thoſe words of our Bleſſed Saviour, An evil and adulterous generation ſeeketh after a ſigne; and the ſigne of the Prophet Jonas ſhall be given them. But then there was great neceſſity, and ſome prodigious examples were to be made to produce the fear of God and the reverence of religion, that the meanneſſe and poverty of the Miniſters might not expoſe the inſtitution to contempt: and becauſe the religion was deſtitute of all temporal coercion, and the Civil power put on armor not for it but againſt it, therefore God took the matter into his own hand, and by judgments from heaven verified the preachings Apoſtolical. Thus when the Corinthians did uſe the Lord's Supper unworthily God puniſhed them with ſickneſſe and with death, as the Apoſtle himſelf tells them: for to denounce them after and to pronounce them before were equal actions of miniſtery, but equally no parts of jurisdiction. This way continued in the Church, though in very infrequent examples, till the Emperors became Chriſtians, and by laws and temporal coercions came to ſecond the word of Eccleſiaſtical Miniſtery. For S. Cyprian tells of ſome perſons who being afflicted with evil ſpirits were cur'd at their baptiſme, who afterwards upon their apoſtaſy from the faith were afflicted again, and again fell into the power of the Devil: Recedente ſiquidem diſciplina receſſit & gratia; when they forſook Chriſt, himſelf took the matter into his own hand, and was not wanting by an act of his own jurisdiction to declare that he was their Lord, and would be honour'd by them or upon them.

10. And this was the rod that S. Paul threatned to the Schiſmatical Corinthians; not any emanation of the ordinary power of miniſtery, but a miraculous conſignation of it: for theſe things (as S. Chryſoſtom obſerves) S. Paul calls ſigna Apoſtolatus mei, the ſignes of his Apoſtleſhip wrought among them in ſignes and miracles and powers: this was effected in healing the ſick, and in ſtriking the refractary with the rod of God; in giving ſight to the blind, and making them blind that would not ſee; in raiſing the dead to life, and cauſing them to die that would not live the life of righteouſneſſe. But this was not done ἰδίᾳ δυνάμει, not by any power of their own, but by that power to which they onely miniſtred, by the power of Chriſt who (bleſſed be his holy Name for it) keeps this power onely in his own hands. In theſe their power was no more a power of jurisdiction then Elias had, who, as S. James ſaid, prayed that it might and prayed that it might not rain; and and call'd for fire from heaven. And juſt ſo the Apoſtles being mov'd by an extraordinary ſpirit did, when the ſpirit ſaw cauſe, miniſter to the Divine judgment. But that was not their work; they were ſent of another errand, and were intruſted with other powers.

11. But after all this, it is certain that there were in the Church ſome images and ſimilitudes of jurisdiction in their ſpiritual government. The ſoul is not, cannot be, properly ſubject to any jurisdiction but that of God. For jurisdiction is the effect of legiſlation, and is in the mixt Empire as the other is in the mere. Now none can give laws to ſouls but God; he onely is Lord of wills and underſtandings; and therefore none can give judgment or reſtraint to ſouls but God. But as by preaching the Eccleſiaſtic ſtate does imitate the legiſlation of God; ſo by the power of the Keyes ſhe does imitate his jurisdiction. For it is to be obſerved that by the Sermons of the Goſpel the Eccleſiaſtics give laws to the Church, that is, they declare the lawes of God; and by the uſe of the Keyes they alſo declare the Divine jurisdiction: for as the Church can make no law of Divine worſhip or Divine propoſitions, of faith or manners, but what ſhe hath received from Chriſt and his Apoſtles; ſo neither can ſhe exerciſe any judgment but the judgment of God. To that ſhe miniſters by threatnings and denunciations, by comforts and abſolutions, as ſhe miniſters to the legiſlative of God by preaching and publiſhing, by exhortation and command.

12. For there is an Empire in preaching; there is a power of Command which the Biſhops and Miniſters of the Church of God muſt exerciſe. To this purpoſe S. Chryſoſtom diſcourſes excellently, There are ſome things which need teaching, ſome which need commanding: if therefore you invert the order, and had rather command where it is neceſſary for you to teach, you are ridiculous; and as bad if you goe about to teach where you rather ſhould command. That men ſhould doe no evil, you need not teach, but to forbid it with the force of a great authority: and ſo you muſt command them that they ſhould not give heed to Jewiſh fables: But if you would have them give their goods to the poor, or keep their virgin, here you have need of doctrine and exhortation. Therefore the Apoſtle ſaid both, Command and teach..... Thus you ſee that a Biſhop muſt not onely teach, but ſometimes it is neceſſary that he ſhould command. * But then this being a doctrinal precept, or commanding by the force of a clear and confeſſed doctrine, hath in it no other Empire but that it is a Commanding in the Name of God, and means this onely, that ſome things are ſo clear and obvious, ſo neceſſary and confeſs'd, that he who neglects them is condemn'd by himſelf; he need not be taught, but onely commanded to doe his duty: but if he will not, God, who gave him the law, hath alſo jurisdiction over him: and to this alſo the Church does miniſter; for the Biſhop commands him in Gods Name, and if he will not, he can puniſh him in Gods Name, that is, he can denounce Gods judgments againſt him; and that's our miniſterial jurisdiction: he can declare him to be out of the way of ſalvation, and unworthy to receive the holy myſteries and pledges of ſalvation. This is our coercion.

Homil. 13. in 2 Tim.

13. But the uſe of the Keyes does differ from proper jurisdiction in this great thing, That if the Keyes be rightly us'd they doe bind or looſe reſpectively; but if they erre, they doe nothing upon the ſubject, they neither bind nor looſe. Now in proper jurisdiction it is otherwiſe: for, right or wrong, if a man be condemn'd he ſhall die for it; and if he be hang'd he is hang'd. But the Church gives nothing but the ſentence of God, and tells upon what termes God will or will not pardon. If the Prieſt miniſter rightly and judge according to the will and laws of God, the ſubject ſhall find that ſentence made good in heaven by the real events of the other world, which the Prieſt pronounces here upon earth. But if the Prieſt be deceived, he is deceiv'd for himſelf and for no body elſe; he alters nothing of the ſtate of the ſoul by his quick abſolution, or his unreaſonable binding. For it is not true here which the Lawyers ſay of humane Jurisdictions, Quod Judex errans pronunciavit, ob authoritatem jus dicentis tranſit in rem judicatam. The Prieſt hath no ſuch authority, though the Civil power have. The error of the Judge does not make the ſentence invalid; his authority prevails above his error: but in the other it is the caſe of ſouls, and therefore is conducted by God onely as to all real and material events, and depends not upon the weakneſſe and fallibilities of men. And therefore the power of remitting ſins given to the Church, is nothing but an authority to miniſter that pardon which God gives by Jeſus Chriſt. The Church pardons ſins as the Levitical Prieſt did cleanſe the lepers, ſaid S. Hierom; that is, he did diſcern whether they were clean or no, and ſo reſtor'd them to the congregation: but apud Deum non ſententia Sacerdotum, ſed reorum vita quæritur, God regards not the ſentence of the Prieſt, but the life of the penitent. For the Prieſt, aliquid eſt ad miniſtrandum ac diſpenſandum verbum ac ſacramenta, ad mundandum autem & juſtificandum non eſt aliquid; is ſomething as to the miniſtery and diſpenſation of the word and ſacraments, but nothing as to the purifying and juſtification of a ſinner: for none works that in the inward man but he who created the whole man. They are the words of S. Auſtin. This therefore is but verbum reconciliationis; the word of reconciliation is intruſted to us: but we properly give no pardon, and therefore inflict no puniſhment.

14. Indeed the power of the Keyes is by a Metaphor chang'd into a ſword, and S. Pauls wiſh [I would they were even cut off that trouble you] ſeems to be the warrant; and by excommunications evil perſons are cut off from the congregation of the Lord. And it is true that the Eccleſiaſtical authority is a power of juriſdiction, juſt as Excommunication is a ſword. But ſo is the word of God, ſharper then a two edged ſword; and ſo is a ſevere reproof, it cuts to the bone. Nec cenſorium ſtylum, cujus mucronem multis remediis majores noſtri retuderunt, aque poſthac atque illum gladium Dictatorium pertimeſcamus, ſaid Cicero. The Cenſors tongue was a ſword, but our Anceſtors ſometimes did not feel it ſmart; and we fear it not ſo much as the ſword of the Dictators. But how little there is of proper juriſdiction in Excommunication we can demonſtrate but by too good an argument. For ſuppoſe Julian robbing of a Church, ſtriking the Biſhop, diſgracing the religion, doing any thing for which he is ipſo facto excommunicate: tell him of the penalty he incurs, cite him before the Biſhop, denounce it in the Church; what have you done to him that ſhall compel him to doe his duty? Suppoſe he will not ſtay from the Church, that he will goe to another, to a ſtrange country, or that he deſpiſes all this. Have you made him afraid? have you troubled him? have you griev'd him? have you done that which ſhall make him doe ſo no more? But Julian was about to renounce Chriſtianity, and thinks it all a Fable. Or ſuppoſe leſſe then that: ſuppoſe a man that keeps a concubine, and knowing that he ſins, and yet reſolves not to quit the ſin, he abſtains from the communion and the publick ſervice of the Church; if the Biſhop admoniſhes him to leave the partner of his ſin, how if he will not? By what compulſory can the Eccleſiaſtic ſtate enforce him? If you threaten to drive him from the Communion, he hath prevented you; he never comes at it. If from prayers, you doe him a kindneſſe; for he loves them not. If from Sermons, then he will enjoy his luſt without controlment. What can the Church doe in this caſe? But ſuppoſe yet once more, that a violent hand ſhall pull down the whole Epiſcopal order, what ſhall the Church doe then? will ſhe excommunicate the men that doe it? They ſay the order it ſelf is Antichriſtian; and can they fear to be excommunicated by them? And who fears to be excommunicated by the Presbytery that believes them to be a dead hand and can effect nothing? And in the ſumme of affaires, onely the obſtinate and the incorrigible are to be proceeded againſt by that extreme remedy. And to them who need that extreme it is no remedy: for they that need it, care not for it: & what compulſion then can this be? If it be any thing really effective, let it be perſuaded to them that ſhall deſerve it; for it muſt work wholly by opinion, and can affright them onely who are taught to be afraid of it. It can onely doe effort upon them who are willing to be good in the way of the Church: for it is a ſpiritual puniſhment; and therefore operates onely upon the ſpirit, that is upon the will and underſtanding, which can have no coercion: ſo that in effect it compels them who are willing to be compell'd, that is, it does not compel at all, and therefore is but improperly an act of Jurisdiction.

15. For that which the Eccleſiaſtics can doe, is a ſuſpenſion of their own act, not any power over the actions of other men: and therefore is but an uſe of their own liberty, not an exerciſe of jurisdiction. He does the ſame thing in Sacraments as he does in preaching: In both he declares the guilty perſon to be out of the way to heaven, to be obnoxious to the Divine anger, to be a debtor of repentance; and refuſing to baptize an evil Catechumen, or to communicate an ill-living Chriſtian, does but ſay the ſame thing: he ſpeaks in one by ſignes, and in the other he ſignifies by words. If he denies to give him the Holy Communion, he tels him he is not in the ſtate of grace and the Divine favour, he tels him that he hath no communion with Chriſt; and therefore by denying the Symbols ſayes that truth which by his Sermons he publiſhes. All the effect and real event is produc'd by the ſin of the man; and the Miniſter of religion tells him as God's meſſenger what he hath done to himſelf, and what will come upon him from God. This is judicium, non jurisdictio, a judging, not a jurisdiction; a judging a man worthy or unworthy; which does not ſuppoſe a ſuperiority of jurisdiction, but equals doe it to their equals, though in this the Clergy hath a ſuperiority, and an authority from God to doe ſo.

16. Adde to this, that the other effects of Excommunication are not any force or impreſſion upon the Delinquent, but are the caution and duty of the Church, or ſanior pars of them that are innocent; for it is a command to them to abſtain from the ſociety of the criminal: for to him it is no direct obligation; indirectly it is, as I have already affirm'd and ſhall afterwards diſcourſe.

17. This diſcourſe cannot leſſen the power and authority of the Church; it onely explicates the nature of it, becauſe it is uſeful to many caſes of conſcience, and does rightly eſtabliſh the foundation of this great meaſure of conſcience, [Eccleſiaſtical laws] and it addes grandeur to it. For it is in the Eccleſiaſtical government as it was in the Judaical before they had a King. They had no King of their own, but God was their King; and he did exerciſe Jurisdiction, and appointed Judges over them, and wrought miracles for their puniſhment or their eſcape reſpectively: and ſo it is in the Church; Chriſt our head keeps the ſpiritual regality and the jurisdiction in his own hands, but ſends us to miniſter it according to his laws; which if we doe, they who are found criminals cannot indeed be ſmitten by us, but they ſhall be ſmitten by God: and therefore Chriſt ſaid the ſame thing to his Miſſionaries as God did to Samuel, They have not rejected thee, but me, ſaid God; and, He that deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth me, ſaid Chriſt. And now, although Kings have the ſword in their own hand, and can ſmite the diſobedient; yet we cannot: but God will ſmite them that are diſobedient to the Church: and that's worſe for them that feel it, and better for them that are but threatned; for it is true, that by repentance they may eſcape that which is threatned by the Church, which in the Common-wealth they cannot: but theſe that feel it are in a worſe condition; for it is a fearfull thing to fall into the hands of the living God; and, who can dwell with the Everlaſting burnings? For our God is a conſuming fire.

Rule II.

The Church hath power to make laws and to give Commands obliging the conſcience, that is, tying the ſubjects to obedience under the penalty of committing ſin, or of incurring the Divine diſpleaſure.

1. BY the Church it is certain I muſt firſt mean the Church Catholick, or all the Governours of the Chriſtian aſſemblies in the world: becauſe if it be in a part it is in the whole; and if it be neither in a part nor in the whole, it is no where. But yet becauſe the whole Catholick Church, that is, all the Governours of Churches (for if we ſpeak of the Church making laws, we muſt mean the governing part of the Church) did never meet ſince the days of the Apoſtles, who being few and united and abſolute and ſupreme could then doe what could never be done ſince: it is neceſſary for the reducing this Rule to practiſe, that the legiſlation and the power of commanding be ſubjected in ſome more particular ſubject; and therefore I ſhall inſtance in the leaſt. By the Church, I mean every particular Church joyn'd to the head of Union; and by the particular Church, I mean the Angel of that Church, the Biſhop; according to that ſaying of S. Cyprian, Scire debes Epiſcopum in Eccleſia eſſe, & Eccleſiam in Epiſcopo, The Biſhop is in the Church, and the Church in the Biſhop: that is, he is in the Church as the head is part of the body, and the Church is in him as in their repreſentative, and all their power is miniſtred by his hand, and their intereſt promoted by him; and he is the hand of God and the hand of the people; this lifted up, and that let down; this in the miniſtery of prayers, and that in the miniſtery niſtery of bleſſings. And therefore S. Chryſoſtome expounding thoſe words of Chriſt, Tell it unto the Church, ſays that they mean, tell it to the Biſhop of the Church, who is to miniſter food and Diſcipline to the congregation. Homil. 61. in Matth.

2. Now all the power of commanding and making Eccleſiaſtical laws, that is, laws of Religion, is wholly in the Paſtors and Biſhops in the ſupreme order of Eccleſiaſtics. If there be two orders of Divine inſtitution, it is certain that one is the ſuperior; and therefore one onely is to rule in eminency, and the other can rule but in minority and ſubſtitution: and that which is appointed to rule is the ſuperior. Now the caſe then is clear as to the preſent purpoſe: the Presbyters were under Biſhops, and might be accuſed before them and rebuk'd by them; we ſee it plain in the caſe of Timothy and Titus, to whom S. Paul gave rules of Court, and meaſures of taking cogniſance of cauſes brought before them. There was plainly the judging order and the judged: The Elders or Presbyters were judged; over them were Overſeers plac'd. Par in parem poteſtatem non habet. Since therefore a judicatory was plac'd in the Church, though it was a ſpiritual onely and without temporal coercion, yet it had a juſt authority; and therefore muſt ſuppoſe a diſtinction in the Clergy of ſuperior and inferior. Now becauſe there can be no union political without government, and the government which was appointed was that of the ἄνδρες ἡγεμόνες the ruling Clergy, it follows that the Biſhop being the head of ſpiritual union in the firſt inſtitution of the Church, every ſociety of Chriſtians is reckoned one by the unity of the Biſhop; and therefore that ſociety of a Biſhop and his pariſh is the leaſt indeed, but it is a Chriſtian Commonwealth. Now the practice Apoſtolical and Primitive adminiſtring this power by one and one in every Church, where there were many Presbyters, it muſt be evident that he who was ſuperior to the Presbyters was to rule in every congregation; and becauſe there was none ſuperior to him by Divine or Apoſtolical appointment, all the legiſlative or commanding power in the Church is founded in the Epiſcopal order, and therefore that one Biſhop hath in his own charge a legiſlative or power of command; and therefore much more when many Biſhops meet together. A Dioceſe is the leaſt circuit of government, but it is an intire body ſubject to diſtinct commands; that is, every Dioceſe hath one ſet over them in the Lord, to whom the people are by the commands of Jeſus Chriſt tied to give obedience.

3. Whether the Dioceſe be little or great, allowed or diſallowed, in City or in Country, divided into pariſhes or not divided, under Metropolitans or not under, of many Churches or but one, it matters not: where there is a Biſhop and a congregation there is a Dioceſe, and there is a power of commanding and a neceſſity of obeying, intra limites diſciplinæ, within that pale in which they have warranty and power to govern and to give commandements. As for pariſhes in the late ſenſe of the word, that is, the charge of a ſingle Presbyter, it is no body politic of Apoſtolical or Divine appointment: for the Presbyters were called in partem ſollicitudinis into the help of the Miniſtery; but they had no cure of ſouls, ſave onely by delegation & ſpecial and temporary appointment, for ſome whole ages in the Church: and therefore the Governing and the Commanding Authority cannot be extended to Pariſhes and to their Curates which are of late date, and received no power from Chriſt but that of Miniſtery, which is alſo conveyed by the Biſhops hands. But then becauſe above the Biſhop there is no appointment in the whole religion, it is neceſſary that the legiſlative be eſtabliſhed in him: if we goe higher we can never come to a ſociety of Apoſtolical or Divine inſtitution in the Church, becauſe between the whole Catholick Church, either in diffuſion or repreſentation, and a ſingle Dioceſe, all the intermedial unions, as of Metropolitans, Primates, Patriarchs, Councils Provincial or Oecumenical, are by conſent and poſitive and humane inſtitution, but they directly eſtabiſh no Divine Government. This onely is properly ſuch. And though this can ſuffer alteration as to the adminiſtration of it, yet the proper ſeat of the authority is the Biſhop, by virtue of his order. Whether the Biſhop of Rome receiv'd the power into himſelf alone, and ſo conveyes it to all other Biſhops, is not material to our preſent inquiry; for that is a queſtion of the manner of receiving it, not of the power when it is receiv'd. I ſhall in order to other purpoſes diſcover the unreaſonableneſſe of that fond pretence and novelty. But that which I ſay is, that thoſe perſons who by Chriſts appointment to or by the Apoſtles were authoris'd to govern the Church, are the heads of Chriſtian ſocieties, and every ſuch ſociety is a diſtinct government; and that this cannot be the diviſion of pariſhes, becauſe that diviſion was later then the authority: and though this be true alſo of Dioceſes as they are now divided, yet that diviſion being but accidental to the charge, and the charge being an appointed relation, that which is accidental and ſuperinduc'd cannot prejudice the nature and inſtitution of it, but that a Biſhop and his charge more or leſſe is an intire ſociety or Common-wealth, as much as the thing can be; that is, according to the nature and capacity of the ſubject matter, it is an intire government, and Prelate and people make the parts of the integral conſtitution.

4. To the verification therefore of the power thus ſubjected, all thoſe titles of eminency and ſuperior office recorded in Scripture doe aptly miniſter: as that they are called Paſtors, and Rulers, and Præpoſiti, and ἐπίσκοποι Biſhops or Overſeers of the Church: He that hears them, hears Chriſt, who hath ſent them as himſelf was ſent. Upon the account of theſe the firſt rulers of Churches in Scripture did give laws to their people, and threatned the diſobedient not onely by the force of their extraordinary power, but by the effects of their ordinary miniſtery. The particular inſtances of command I ſhall enumerate when I give account in what things they have power to make laws; but theſe words of power were ſufficient warrant, and were like ſeals to their Commiſſions and Monitors of their duty. But ſo the Rulers of the Church did practiſe their power, and taught the neceſſity of obedience.

5. To this purpoſe are thoſe words of S. Clement to S. James the Bro-
1 Epiſt. Clem. 1. ad fin. ther of our Lord; Theſe things, moſt dear Brother, I have received from the mouth of holy Peter, who gave the commands, and I have endeavour'd to ſhew them to thee, that thou mayeſt command them all to be kept inviolate, becauſe Eccleſiaſtical affaires ought not to be done careleſly but with diligence. Therefore let no man think that without danger he can neglect theſe precepts, or diſſemble them; quia in judicio Dei ignis æterni tormenta ſuſtinebit qui Eccleſiaſtica decreta neglexerit, becauſe in the judgment of God he ſhall ſuffer the torments of an Eternal fire who ſhall neglect the decrees of the Church. But he

he that ſhall hear thee as the Miniſter of Chriſt commanded, ſhall receive glory: But he that ſhall not hear thee, or rather the Lord ſpeaking by thee, ſhall receive to himſelf damnation.

6. S. Ignatius is very frequent and expreſſe in this particular. Be ſubject to the Biſhop as to the Lord. For he watches for your ſouls as he that muſt give an account to God. For it is neceſſary that you doe nothing without the Biſhop. For he that is diſobedient to Biſhops, will be altogether without God, impious, and a deſpiſer of Chriſt, and a diſparager of his ordinance. And again, It is fit that you obey your Biſhop, and in nothing to contradict him. For he that does, deſpiſes not him that is viſible, but in him deſpiſes the inviſible God, who cannot be deſpis'd of any one. For the Biſhop hath not his promotion from men, but from God. Epiſt. ad Tralli an. Epiſt. ad Magnel.

7. Tertullian ſpeaking of the power and judicatory of the Church, ſaith, Ibidem etiam exhortationes, caſtigationes & cenſura Divina; nam & judicatur magno cum pondere, ut apud certos de Dei conſpectu, There are exhortations, chaſtiſements and a Divine cenſure; for the judgment of the Church is with great weight and efficacy, becauſe it is amongſt them who are certain that they ſhall appear before God: and it is the greateſt forerunning of the great Judgment, if any one ſins ſo that he be baniſhed from the communion of prayers, aſſemblies and all holy entercourſe. in Apologet.

8. To which if we adde the words of S. Cyprian, we ſhall find not onely the power and authority warranted, but the ſubject of the power declar'd to be the Biſhop. Since there are ſuch and ſo great and many other examples and precedents by which the Authority of the Biſhop and his power is eſtabliſhed by Divine ordinance, what ſort of men doe you ſuppoſe them to be who, being enemies of Biſhops and rebels againſt the Catholic Church, are not affrighted with the threatning of God admoniſhing them, nor yet with the revenge of the future judgment? For hereſies have ariſen and ſchiſms commenc'd from no other cauſe then this, that men doe not obey [the Biſhop] the Prieſt of God: neither doe they conſider that there is in the Church for a time a Judge in the ſtead of Chriſt, to whom if all the Brethren would obey according to the Commands of God, no man would move any thing againſt a college of Biſhops; no man would after the Divine judgment is paſſ'd, after the ſuffrage of the people, and the judgment of the Biſhops his aſſeſſors, make himſelf a judge not of the Biſhop, but indeed of God himſelf; no man would divide the Unity of the Church; no man by a ſelf-pleaſure and pride would make a new hereſy apart by himſelf. Ep. ad Cornel. Papam lib. 1. ep. 5.

9. I onely adde the teſtimony of S. Hierom, it being in a clear caſe as to the thing it ſelf; and the difficulty being onely in the meaſures, the manner and inſtances of obedience. Epiſcopus veſter cui Eccleſiæ commiſſum eſt regimen, &c. Your Biſhop to whom the government of the Church is committed, whom God hath plac'd as the ſurveyor of his vineyard, the ſhepherd of the ſheep, the director of the flock, the leader of the people both in the city and the country in which ye live, let him nouriſh you with a ſingular care, and feed you with the meat of holy doctrine, and in the preſence of God take eſpecial care of your ſouls: let all men devoutly and with an even mind as to God obey him to whom all the city is committed. in Regul. Monachor. cap. 17.

But becauſe I have given a larger account of this duty in general, in * a Diſcourſe on purpoſe, I ſhall more properly conſider in what particular caſes the conſcience is, or is not, bound to obey the Church-governours.

* Epiſcopacy aſſerted Sect. 34, 35.

Rule III.

The Church hath power to make laws in all things of neceſſary duty, by a direct power and a Divine authority.

1. SAint Ignatius diſcourſing of the Biſhops power, commands ſubjection to him in ſo large and comprehenſive termes, that they ſeem to put an end to all further inquiries in this rule of conſcience, by making all inquiries to be uſeleſſe; becauſe an obedience univerſal is due. Neceſſe eſt ut quicquid facitis, nihil ſine Epiſcopo tentetis, & in nullo illi refragari: And again, Nec quicquam videatur vobis conſentaneum quod ſit præter illius judicium; quod enim tale eſt, Deo inimicum eſt. It is neceſſary that whatſoever ye doe, ye doe nothing without the Biſhop; that ye be obedient to him, and be refractary againſt him in nothing: Neither let any thing pleaſe you that is beſides his judgment; for whatſoever is ſo is an enemy to God. The ſame alſo he repeats in other places, and gives it in command to other Churches. But this is too general to guide any man, and therefore of it ſelf requires a limit: and therefore himſelf does explicate it in his letter to the Church of Smyrna. Sine Epiſcopo nemo quicquam faciat eorum quæ ad Eccleſiam ſpectant, Without the Biſhop let no man doe any thing of that which belongs to the Church; that is, whatſoever is intruſted to the Biſhops charge, the conduct of ſouls, the duties of religion, the commandements of God, the Sacraments of the religion, the Orders of the Divine inſtitution, the interior actions of grace, and the external which are of neceſſary miniſtery and relation to them, are under the Diſcipline and legiſlation of the Church. For in theſe things onely his charge, and therefore in theſe things onely his authority does lie.

ad Trallian. ad Magneſ. Epiſt. ad Epheſ.

2. Thus the Biſhop hath power to command his ſubject or pariſhioner to put away his concubine; and if he does not, he not onely ſins by uncleanneſſe, but by diſobedience too. For the authority of the Church being ſpiritual, it hath power over the ſpirit, and introduces guilt upon the ſoul if it be diſobeyed. So that it is but folly and ignorance to think the Biſhop hath no power, becauſe he is to command onely in thoſe things where God hath commanded already. For though he is God's Miniſter and commands not by his own will, but by God's, yet he hath the authority of God given to him to doe that: and beſides that it is not reaſonable to think that God would give the Church-Rulers his authority for trifling and needleſſe purpoſes; it is alſo evident in the thing it ſelf, that it is of great effect, becauſe even in theſe things he is the voice of God, and judges in the place of God, and affrights ſinners with the accents of his diſpleaſure, and upon this account brings a burden upon the diſobedient which was not brought upon him before the command and ſentence of the Church.

What-

3. Whatſoever therefore the Biſhop commands us as from God, in that his power and legiſlation is properly exerciſed: and it is abſolutely to be obeyed without any other condition or reſerve, but that it be indeed the will and commandement of God. So S. Bernard, Quicquid vice Dei prælatus homo præcipit, quod non ſit tamen certum diſplicere Deo, haud ſecus omnino recipiendum eſt ac ſi præcipiat ipſe Deus, Whatſoever the Prelate in the ſtead of God commands, provided you are certain it does not diſpleaſe God, it muſt be receiv'd as if God himſelf commanded it. For what difference is it whether God by himſelf, or by men his Miniſters, or by his miniſtring Angels make his will and pleaſure known unto us? Where it is obſervable that he does not give leave to diſobey if we queſtion whether it be God's will or no; for if it be a queſtion, the preſumption is for the authority impoſing it: and in that caſe, though it be a doubt in theory, yet that muſt not hinder the practical obedience; becauſe it is as certain that our lawfull ſuperior hath power to command us to obey when we are not certain of the thing, as it is certain that it is a ſin if we doe it in a doubting conſcience by our own authority. For the authority of God in the hand of a Prelate is warrant enough to determine us when we know nothing to the contrary, though our own will is not. If we have a doubting conſcience, we have nothing (while the doubt remains) to oppoſe againſt it but our will, and that is not ſufficient, but a Divine authority is. Now although in the preſent caſe it does not work to the clearing of the material doubt, yet it does operate to the clearing of the duty: and therefore S. Bernard ſaid well [quod non ſit tamen certum diſplicere Deo] unleſſe you are ſure, that is, be fully perſuaded, you diſpleaſe God in obeying the Biſhop, it is certain you doe diſpleaſe God by diſobeying him. lib. de Præcepto & diſpenſatione

4. For it is a part of our obedience not to judge his ſentence, that is, not to give judgment againſt him in a queſtion of difficulty, but to ſtand to his ſentence. Credas tibi ſalutare quicquid ille præceperit; nec de Majorum ſententia judices, cujus officii eſt obedire & implere quæ juſſa ſunt, ſaid S. Hierom in a like caſe. It is your part to obey, and to doe what is commanded, and not to judge your judges, but to believe all that to be good which your Prelate commands you; meaning when his command is inſtanc'd in the matter of the Divine Commandement. In things that are plain and eaſy, every man can be a Judge, becauſe indeed their needs none, for there is no queſtion: but in things of difficulty, and where evidently God is not diſhonour'd, it is very much our duty to obey the Church. ad Ruſticum Monach.

5. Thus the Church hath power to command us to be devout in our prayers, to be charitable to our Brother, to forgive our enemy, to be heartily reconcil'd to him, to inſtruct the ignorant, to follow holineſſe, and to doe juſtice, and to be at peace with all men; and he that obeys not, does walk diſorderly, and may be us'd accordingly with all the power the Church hath intruſted to her, according to the merit of the cauſe: but it is certain he ſins with a double iniquity that refuſes Gods Commandement and the precept of his ſpiritual ſuperior; for in theſe things every Miniſter can exhort, but the Biſhop can command, that is, he binds the Commandement of God by a new obligation and under a diſtinct ſin, the ſin of diſobedience.

Rule

Rule IV.

The Church hath power to make laws in ſuch things which are helps and apt miniſteries and advantages of neceſſary duty.

1. This Rule is expreſſely taught by S. Baſil : Neceſſariò ea nos in memoriam debemus redigere quæ dicta ſunt ab Apoſtolo, Prophetias nolite ſpernere.... Ex his autem intelligitur quod ſi quid nobis imperatum eſt quod idem ſit cum mandato Domini, aut adjuvet, illud tanquam voluntas Dei ſtudioſius diligentiusque à nobis ſuſcipi debet, We muſt remember what the Apoſtle ſaid, Deſpiſe not propheſyings. But if any thing be commanded us which is all one with the command of God, or may help it, it ought to be undertaken by us with diligence and ſtudy as if it were the will of God. Thus if our Biſhop in his precepts and ſermons of chaſtity command that the women goe not to the publick ſpectacles, where are repreſented ſuch things which would make Cato bluſh, and Tuccia have looſer thoughts, they are bound in Conſcience to abſtain from thoſe impure ſocieties; and not onely from the luſt, but from the danger. For in vain is it that God ſhould intruſt the ſouls of the people to ſpiritual Rulers, and give them wiſdome to doe it, and commandment to doe it with diligence, and gifts of the Holy Spirit to enable them to doe it with advantage, if the people were not tied in duty to decline thoſe places and cauſes where and whence they doe uſually periſh.

In regul. brevior. cap. 14.

2. And in purſuance of the Epiſcopal authority in the like inſtances it was that S. Chryſoſtom held his paſtoral ſtaffe over the diſobedient: for the Church had declar'd that in the holy time of Lent the people ſhould live auſterely, and therefore he told them at that time eſpecially that they ſhould not goe to the publick ſhews and theatres; and to the diſobedient he addes this threatning, Sciant omnes his criminibus obnoxii, ſi poſt hanc noſtram admonitionem in ea negligentia manſerint, non toleraturos nos, ſed legibus Eccleſiaſticis uſuros, & magnâ auſteritate doctturos ne talia poſthac negligant, néve tanto contemptu Divina audiant eloquia, Let all that are guilty of ſuch crimes know that if after this admonition they perſiſt in this neglect, we will not ſuffer it, but uſe the laws of the Church againſt them, and ſhall teach them with great auſterity that hereafter they doe not hear the Divine Sermons with ſo great contempt.

Homil. 6. in Geneſ.

3. Upon the ſame account the Church in her Sermons of repentance does uſually, and hath authority to enjoyn actions of internal and external ſignifications and miniſteries of repentance. In the Primitive Church the Biſhops did indict faſting-dayes, and publick Letanies and proceſſions or ſolemn ſupplications and prayers to be us'd in the times of publick danger and neceſſity. This we find in Tertullian, Epiſcopi univerſæ plebi mandare jejunia aſſolent, non dico de induſtria ſtipium conferendarum, ut veſtræ capturæ eſt, ſed interdum & ex aliqua ſollicitudinis Eccleſiaſticæ cauſa, The Biſhops are wont to command faſting-dayes to all the people, not for ſecular ends, but for

for Eccleſiaſtical neceſſity and advantage. For when God hath eſtabliſhed an office and miniſtery, it is certain he made it ſufficient to acquire all the ends of it's deſignation: ſince therefore the government even of internal actions and a body or ſociety of men muſt ſuppoſe external acts, miniſteries, circumſtances and ſignifications, no man can from without govern that which is within, unleſſe he have power to govern that without which the internal act cannot be done in publick, in union and ſociety.

4. And here comes in that Rule of the law, The Acceſſory follows the nature of the Principal; which hath been ſo infinitely miſtaken and abus'd by the pretences of Romaniſts and Preſbytery for the eſtabliſhing an Empire Eccleſiaſtical in things belonging to themſelves, not to God. For the ſoul being the principal and the body it's inſtrument, they hence argue that they to whom the ſouls are committed, have therefore a right to govern the body, becauſe it is acceſſory to the ſoul; and if the body, then alſo the acceſſories of the body, actions, circumſtances, time, wealth, lands and houſes, in order to the ſpiritual good of the ſoul: which propoſition becauſe it is intolerable, it can never be the product of Truth, and therefore muſt be deriv'd from a falſe underſtanding of this true rule of the lawyers. But becauſe in it's true meaning it ſerves to conduct many, and particularly this rule of Conſcience, it is neceſſary that we know the true meaning of it.

The Rule [The Acceſſory followes the nature of the Principal] explicated.

5. Therefore for the underſtanding of it ſo far as can be in order to our deſign, it is to be inquir'd, how we ſhall know which is the principal and which is the acceſſory? 2. In what ſenſe the acceſſory muſt follow the nature of the principal.

6. 1. That which is principal to one purpoſe, is but the acceſſory to another ſometimes. If Titius hires my land and builds a houſe upon it, the houſe is but the acceſſory, becauſe it came after my land was in poſſeſſion. But if Titius buyes my houſe ſtanding upon my own land, he buyes the land too; for the land is but the acceſſory, and the houſe is the principal: becauſe the houſe being the purchaſe, it cannot be at all but upon a foundation, and therefore the ground is the acceſſory, and after the houſe in the intention of the buyer. Villa fundum quarat, it is ſometimes true; but ordinarily, Fundus quærit villam.

7. 2. That which is of greateſt value is not always the principal, but ſometimes is the acceſſory. The picture of Apollo upon a laurel board is much more precious then the wood, and yet if Apelles ſhould take Lucian's wood and draw the picture, Lucian will make bold with the board, and conſequently carry away the picture. A jewel ſet in gold is much better then the gold, but yet the gold is the principal, becauſe it was put there to illuſtrate and to adorn the gold; according to that of Ulpian, Semper cum quærimus quid cui cedat, illud ſpectamus, quid cujus rei ornandæ cauſâ adhibetur. And therefore if Caius dying leave me in legacy his black-cloth ſuit, I ſhall alſo receive the diamond-buttons that adorn it: becauſe theſe were

l. cum aurum. 19. §. pervenimus ff. de aur. & argent. leg.

plac'd there to adorn it; and therefore are the acceſſory, becauſe they are uſu minores, and wholly ſet there for the miniſtery of the other. Quod adhibetur alterius rei cauſâ; that is principal for whoſe ſake the other was ſent or put. And therefore it is no good argument to conclude that the body is the acceſſory, becauſe the ſoul is more noble. Cedent gemmæ phialis vel lancibus incluſæ auro argentóve. The ſoul is indeed a jewel ſet in gold; but is therefore an acceſſory to the body in ſome caſes. He that buyes the body of a ſlave, hath right to all the miniſteries of the ſoul; and the man is bound to ſerve his Maſter with a ready mind and a good will; and the ſoul is a παρακολούθημα of the body. The body is firſt, and the ſoul comes afterwards to give it life and motion.

8. 3. When two ſubſtances concurre to the conſtitution or integrity of a third, one is not the acceſſory to the other. The eye is not the acceſſory to the head, nor the foot to the leg, nor the hand to the arme; for that onely is an acceſſory, quod alterius rei cauſâ adhibetur aut accedit: If it comes in accidentally and be wholly for the others ſake, then it is an acceſſory. Thus order and decency and circumſtances of time and place are for the miniſteries and ornament of religion, and therefore are acceſſories. The outward act is the leſſe principal and an acceſſory to the inward, for to the inward it wholly miniſters; and conſequently he that diſpoſes of one may alſo govern the other, becauſe the leſſe principal is included in the more, and the leſſe and the more have not two adminiſtrations, becauſe they have but one uſe. But the ſoul and the body are two diſtinct ſubſtances of differing miniſtrations, acting to ſeveral and ſometimes to contrary purpoſes; they are parts of the ſame man, a better and a worſe, but not a principal and acceſſory, unleſſe it be by accident and in ſome uſes and to ſome purpoſes; and then ſometimes one ſometimes the other is the principal. Concerning which the Rule is this.

9. 4. Thoſe things which of themſelves are not, but by accident may be made acceſſories to a principal, are then to be eſteem'd to be ſo when they actually and wholly are joyn'd in uſe to the principal, and ſerve the end of the principal, but have none of their own. Thus when the ſoul prays paſſionately, if the lips move without a deliberate act of underſtanding, but obeying the fancy, the body in that caſe is purely the acceſſory. I ſay in that caſe: for if the body receive a command to other purpoſes, as to attend upon the Prince at the ſame time when the ſoul prays, in that caſe they are both principals; and neither of them is acceſſory to the other. And therefore although it will follow that when the body miniſters to the action of the ſoul wholly, and hath no diſtinct work & office of its own in that action, he that commands the ſoul, can alſo command the body; for they are in that miniſtery but as one: yet it will not follow that when the body is not the acceſſory, is not conjunct in Miniſtery, but does or can act diſtinctly and to other purpoſes, he that is of proper authority to command one hath authority alſo of the other. And the reaſon of this will help well to explicate this whole inquiry. For

10. 5. He that pretends to a power over the acceſſory becauſe he rules the principal, claims his power wholly for its relation to the principal, and therefore it can be extended no further then the relation: but if that relative have alſo an abſolute and irreſpective nature, operation or deſigne, it cannot cannot be governed in any thing of this, because of it's relative nature and conjunction in the other; for there it is not accessory. For it is the nature of the συνεκτικὸν αἴτιον· ὃ παρόντος μὲν τὸ ἀποτέλεσμα, καὶ ἀιρομένου αἴρεται, The conjunct cause or reason, when it is there, the work will follow: but when it is away, there will be no event, says the Philosopher.

11. 6. It is not enough to make a thing to be accessory, that it is design'd for the use and ministery of another that is principal; but it must be actually applied: for till then it is but a potential accessory, which gives no right, and changes no nature, and produces no effect. Bridles and saddles are made to be us'd with horses: but he that buyes all the horses in a faire cannot claim all the saddles and bridles which are in the same faire to be sold; because they are not yet become the accessories, but are onely design'd to be so. It is intended that the body should minister to the soul in matters of religion; but because it ministers also to other actions of the soul, he that rules the soul does not by consequence rule the body, unless it be actually applied, and be conjunct with the soul in the ministeries of religion.

12. 2. These may be sufficient to declare so much of the nature of accessories as is of use in our present questions. The next inquiry is, what is the meaning of these words, [The accessory [follows the nature] of the principal.] For it cannot be meant that whatsoever is said of one may be said of the other; or whatsoever may be done to one, may be done to the other. The Rulers of souls have power to excommunicate or to cut them off from the body of the Church, which is the greatest spiritual power, and is after it's own manner a spiritual death. Now suppose the body be an accessory to the soul, it will not follow that he that can cut the soul off from the Church, can cut the body also off from the Commonwealth. But the meaning is, that duplici & diverso jure censeri non debent, they who are joyn'd in one action are to have one judgment, though according to their respective measures. If the soul does well, so does the body ministring to the soul. If it be good to pray, it is good to appoint times and places to pray in, because without time and place you cannot pray: If time and place be contingent and irregular, so are our prayers; if our prayers be solemn and fixt, so must they. And thus also it is in matter of Government. If the Bishop is to guide the devotion of the soul, he can also give rules to the body in all that which it ministers to that action of the soul; and when they two make one compleat action by way of principal and accessory, they are the same one intire subject of government. But this is to be extended no further. This passes not to the distinct actions or ministeries of the body; but is confin'd to that in which it is, and so long as it is one agent with the soul: neither can it passe to warrant any other impression upon the body, but that it be commanded and conducted in the pursuit of that action.

13. And after all, though the Rule be thus warily conducted to keep it from running into error, yet neither thus is it always true. Cum principalis causa non consistat, plerumque ne ea quidem quæ sequuntur locum habent, says the law. It is sometimes so, sometimes not. Money is accessory to the man, and cloths to the body: but he that hath the man in cure is not the Curator bonorum; and the Physician that gives physic to the body, and conducts the regiment of health, is not Maſter of his wardrobe: and the Epigram derided Herod the Empiric,

Deprenſus dixit, Stulte, quid ergo bibis?

becauſe when he came to take away his patients ſickneſſe, he took away his plate. If the principal act be confirm'd by an acceſſory oath, though the principal act prove null and invalid in law, yet the man is tied by the remaining oath. A man cannot offer to God an indifferent action or thing. And therefore he that promiſes to God to walk three turns every day, hath done nothing; the act is null, and he is not obliged to pay that to God: but if an oath did ſupervene, that muſt ſtand, * though the principal of it ſelf be null; becauſe every oath that can without ſin be kept, muſt ſtand. The alienation of a Minors lands is reſcinded by law, yet the obligation and caution of the Tutor for the acceſſory verification of the principal ſale will ſtand: becauſe there is a reaſon that ſeparates the acceſſory from the principal, and the law intending to reſcind the tranſlation of the Dominion, not to reſcind the contract, leaves the principal looſe, and the acceſſory bound. This is alſo thus in actions principal and acceſſory, which the law cals perſonales & hypothecarias. Mævius dies and divides his eſtate between Lucius and Lucullus; but he was indebted 20 talents, and for caution had ingag'd ſome jewels. Lucius payes his five talents, and Lucullus payes foure of the other: the perſonal action of Lucius is diſſolv'd, but the acceſſory is not; for till Lucullus his perſonal or principal be taken off, the acceſſory and cautionary remaines upon them both: and this alſo hath a particular reaſon, and ſo have all thoſe caſes in which this Rule failes.

14. From whence I inferre, that this thing is ſometimes reaſonable, and ſometimes unreaſonable, but it is never neceſſary but in one caſe; and that is when the acceſſory is neceſſary and inſeparable, either by reaſon of a natural or poſitive conjunction. For ſome things are acceſſory by uſe and cuſtomes, ſome by laws and commandements, ſome by the nature of the thing. Now of the firſt two ſorts the meaſures are contingent and alterable: the laws ſometimes declare a thing to be acceſſory, and at other times it is no ſo: and if by uſe or contract or cuſtome a thing be acceſſory, it ceaſes to be ſo if the acceſſory be particularly excepted. As if I buy a houſe, it is by cuſtome concluded that I intend the garden that is joyn'd to it; and he that ſels a horſe, ſels his bridle: but if the garden be reſerv'd, & the bridle be excepted, the rule is then of no uſe.

15. Now to apply this to the preſent inquiries. 1. Becauſe the body is not in the nature of the thing an inſeparable, neceſſary acceſſory to the ſoul in ſpiritual actions and miniſteries, but the ſoul can pray alone, and be charitable alone, and love God alone, and the body hath actions, and intentions, and intereſts which mingle not with that which the ſpiritual rulers are to govern; therefore it cannot be inferr'd that the body is ſubject in all things to them who govern ſouls.

16. But 2. It does follow and may by force of this rule be inferr'd that they who are to govern the religion and ſpiritual actions of the ſoul, can alſo govern the actions of the body which miniſter immediately and neceſſarily to the neceſſary actions of the ſoul: & therefore becauſe it is a duty that we communicate in the Communion of Saints, when that duty is actually and and of neceſſity to be done, the Biſhop hath power to command the bodies of men to be preſent in Chriſtian aſſemblies, according to the precept of the Apoſtle, Neglect not the aſſembling of your ſelves together.

17. And yet further, to come home to the preſent Rule, there are ſeveral degrees of neceſſitie, and ſeveral reaſons of it. Some things are neceſſary for life, and ſome for health. Some are neceſſary for ſingle Chriſtians, ſome things are neceſſary for ſocieties; ſome things are neceſſary in private, and ſome in publick; ſome things are for order, and ſome for preciſe duty; ſome things are abſolutely, and ſome are but reſpectively and in order to certain ends neceſſary. The body is an acceſſory to the ſoul, atque eodem jure cenſendum, to be judg'd by the ſame laws, govern'd by the ſame perſons, ſubject to the ſame ſentence and conduct, not onely in things of abſolute neceſſity, but even in things of great advantage; not onely in private neceſſity, which is always indiſpenſable, but even in publick neceſſities of the Church, in which there is greater latitude and more liberty: and the reaſon is, becauſe even theſe leſſer degrees of neceſſity are requir'd of us by Divine Commandement; and it is not onely commanded to us to doe that which is lawful, but that alſo which is of good report; not onely that we glorify God, but that our Brethren be edified. And in proportion to this, it is requir'd of the guides of ſouls that they give good account of them, but it is requir'd of us alſo that we ſo comport our ſelves that they may doe it with joy: which cannot be ſuppos'd, if their power be kept within the bounds of a ſimply and indiſpenſably neceſſary internal religion; it cannot be done without proſperous circumſtances and advantages of religion: in theſe therefore if ſpiritual guides have not power to give commands, they have not all that is neceſſary by all the kinds of neceſſity which God made. Hebr. 13. 17.

18. But this Rule we ſee verified by authentic precedents. For the Apoſtles at Jeruſalem indeed thought fit to impoſe nothing but thoſe neceſſary things which are ſpecified in their decretal: but S. Paul us'd alſo this authority by the meaſures of the preſent Rule, and commanded beyond the limits of abſolute neceſſity, even that which he judg'd convenient; and verifies his authority in his Epiſtle to Philemon, I might be much bold in Chriſt to enjoyn thee that which is convenient: and this he actually did to the Corinthian Church, commanding that all things ſhould be done decently and in order. Philem. 8. verſ.

19. Now although it be true that in theſe things the Apoſtle had ſome advantages which the Biſhops in ſucceſſion have not; he had an infallible ſpirit, and what he call'd convenient was ſo indeed; and he had converted Philemon, he was his Father in Chriſt, and he was one of the pillars upon which Chriſt built the Church, and he was to lay the foundation for an everlaſting building: yet becauſe the inſtance to the Corinthian Church was ſuch which was of a perpetual reaſon, and it would be for ever neceſſary that things ſhould be done in the Church decently and in order, and the queſtion of decency would for ever have variety and flux, ſucceſſion and a relative uncertainty, it was neceſſary that of this there ſhould be perpetual Judges and perpetual Dictators: and theſe can be no other but the Rulers of the Church, who have the ſame power as the Apoſtles had in this, though not ſo many advantages of power. When the Biſhops judge truly concerning neceſſity, & ſuch decencies and reaſonableneſſes as are next to neceſſity, ceſſity, they can enjoyn them, onely they cannot judge ſo ſurely; and therefore although there may be more cauſes of laying aſide their commands, yet it is never lawfull without cauſe.

20. But this is not to be extended to ſuch decencies as are onely ornament, but is to be limited to ſuch as onely reſcue from confuſion: the reaſon is, becauſe the Prelates and ſpiritual guides cannot doe their duty, unleſſe things be ſo orderly that there be no confuſion, much leſſe can they doe it with joy; and ſo far their power does extend: for although that is not required of the governours but of the people, that the Rulers office be done with joy; yet becauſe it is required of the people, they ſin if they hinder it; therefore the Rulers have power to enjoyn it. But if it can goe beyond this limit, then it can have no natural limit, but may extend to ſumptuouſneſſe, to ornaments of Churches, to rich utenſils, to ſplendor, to Majeſty; for all that is decent enough, and in ſome circumſtances very fit. But becauſe this is too ſubject to abuſe, and gives a ſecular power into the hands of Biſhops, and an authority over mens eſtates and fortunes, and is not neceſſary for ſouls, and no part of ſpiritual government, it is more then Chriſt gave to his Miniſters.

21. This alſo is to be added: that becauſe this power is deriv'd to ſpiritual Rulers upon the account of reaſon and experience of things and the duty of the people, that the Rulers ſhould be enabled to give an account of their charges with joy, therefore it is onely left to the people to doe it or not, under the pain of a ſin; but they are not to incurre ſpiritual cenſures upon the ſtock of non-compliance in things not ſimply neceſſary or of eſſential duty. For to compel them to advantages will bring but little joy to the Ruler: he muſt ſecure the main duty whether they will or no; that himſelf is to look to, and therefore to uſe all the means God hath put into his hand; and for that he muſt look for his joy when he comes to give up his account: but that he himſelf ſhould doe his duty with joy, that is with advantages, with eaſe, with comfort, being a duty wholly incumbent on the people and for their profit, if they will not comply, they ſin; and it is not profitable for them, ſaith the Apoſtle, that is, they looſe by it; but to this they are at no hand to be conſtrain'd, for that will deſtroy his joy as much as the letting it alone.

Hebr. 13. 17.

22. Beyond this the Biſhop hath no authority to command what he can perſuade by argument, he is to take care it be well and wiſely, to the glory of God and the good of his Church, to the edification of all men that are intereſted, and the ſpecial comfort and ſupport of the weak. The ſumme of which power is excellently ſumm'd up by S. Paul. For ye know what Commandements we gave you by the Lord Jeſus. For this is the will of God, even your ſanctification: That ye abſtain from fornication.... that no man defraud his Brother. In theſe things the ſpiritual power is proper and competent. But the Apoſtle addes, He therefore that deſpiſeth, deſpiſeth not man but God, who hath alſo given us his holy Spirit. That is, In thoſe things which are certainly the laws of God the Biſhop is to rule intirely according to the power given him. But becauſe God hath not onely given his authority, but his ſpirit too, that is, he hath given him wiſdome as well as power, it cannot be ſuppoſed to be for nothing: whatever he wiſely orders, that is of neceſſary relation to the expreſſe command of God, or is ſo requiſite quiſite for the doing of it, that it cannot be well done without it by any other inſtrument, nor by it ſelf alone. In this it is to be ſuppoſed that the ſpirit of government which God hath given to his Church will ſufficiently aſſiſt, and therefore does competently oblige: leſſe then this the Spirit of God cannot be ſuppos'd to doe, if it does any thing beſide giving and revealing the expreſſe commandement and neceſſary duty.

23. Beyond theſe ſtrict and cloſe meaſures there is no doubt but the Spirit of God does give aſſiſtance: as the great experience of the Church, and the effects of government, and the wiſe rules of conduct, and the uſefull Canons, and the decent Ceremonies, and the ſolemn rites, and the glorifications of God conſequent to all this doe abundantly teſtify. But yet beyond this, the Biſhops can directly give no laws that properly and immediately bind the tranſgreſſors under ſin: and my reaſons are theſe.

24. 1. Becauſe we never find the Apoſtles uſing their Coercion upon any man but the expreſſe breakers of a Divine Commandement, or the publick diſturbers of the peace of the Church and the eſtabliſh'd neceſſary order.

25. 2. Becauſe even in thoſe things which were ſo convenient that they had a power to make injunctions, yet the Apoſtles were very backward to uſe their authority of commanding; much leſſe would they uſe ſeverity, but intreaty. It was S. Paul's caſe to Philemon before mention'd; Though I might be much bold in Chriſt to enjoyn that which is convenient; yet for love's ſake I rather intreat thee. Philemon 8, 9.

26. 3. In thoſe things where God had interpos'd no Command, though the rule they gave contain'd in it that which was fit and decent, yet if men would reſiſt, they gently did admoniſh or reprove them, and let them alone. So S. Paul in caſe of the Corinthian men wearing long haire, If any man liſt to be contentious, we have no ſuch cuſtome, nor the Churches of God: that is, let him chuſe; it is not well done, we leave him to his own liberty, but let him look to it.

27. 4. If the Biſhops power were extended further, it might extend to Tyranny, and there could be no limits beyond this preſcrib'd, to keep him within the meaſures and ſweetneſſe of the government Evangelical: but if he pretend a Divine authority to goe further, he can be abſolute and ſupreme in things of this life which doe not concern the Spirit, and ſo fall into Dynaſty, as one anciently complain'd of the Biſhop of Rome, and change the Father into a Prince, and the Church into an Empire.

28. But this hinders not but that the power of ſpiritual Rulers may yet extend to a further uſe, not by a direct power of command, or of giving laws, but by all the indirect and collateral ways of obligation, as of fame, conſent, reputation of the man, the reverence of his perſon, and the opinion of his wiſedome and ſanctity, by voluntary ſubmiſſion, and for the avoiding ſcandal: when any of theſe cauſes of action or inſtruments of obligation doe intervene, the Biſhop does not directly bind, but the people are bound: and their obligation from all theſe principles are reduc'd to two heads. The matter of ſcandal; in which caſe, under pain of ſin they muſt obey in all lawfull things, when by accident and the concurſe of emergent cauſes it is ſcandalous to diſobey. And the other is, Their own conſent; for however it be procur'd fairly, if they once have conſented, they are become a law unto themſelves, and ſo they remain till this law ſuffers diminution as other laws doe that die: of which I am afterwards to give account.

There is one way more by which Eccleſiaſtical laws doe bind; but this is the matter of the next Rule.

Rule V.

When the Canons or Rules of Eccleſiaſtical Rulers are confirmed by the ſupreme Civil power, they oblige the Conſcience by a double obligation.

1. Τὸ νομοθετεῖν ἀνέπαφον τοῖς βασιλεῦσι, ſay the Greek Lawyers. The power of making laws, viz. of determining things not commanded by God, or of puniſhing prevarications againſt Gods laws or their own, is granted to Kings. And therefore as ſecular Princes did uſe to indict or permit the indiction of Synods of Biſhops; ſo when they ſaw cauſe, they confirm'd the ſentences of Biſhops and paſs'd them into laws. Before the Princes were Chriſtian, the Church was governed by their ſpiritual guides, who had authority from God in all that was neceſſary, and of great conveniency next to neceſſity; and in other things they had it from the people, from neceſſity and from good will, by hope and fear, by the ſenſe of their own needs, and the comfort of their own advantages. It was populus voluntarius, the people came with free-will-offerings, and were at firſt govern'd by love as much as now they need to be by fear and ſmart. But God was never wanting to his Church, but made proviſions in all caſes and in all times. Of that which was neceſſary Chriſt left in his Miniſters a power of government: and in that which was not primely neceſſary, but emergently and contingently came to be uſeful and fit, he onely left in his Miniſters a power to perſwade; but he gave them an excellent ſpirit of wiſedome and holineſſe by which they did prevail, and to the people the ſpirit of love and obedience: and theſe together were ſtrength enough to reſtrain the diſobedient. For as in the Creation there was Light before the Sun, that we might learn that the Sun was not the fountain of light, but God: ſo there was a government in the Church even before the Princes were Chriſtians, that the ſupport and ornament of Gods Church might be owned as an efflux of the Divine power, and not the kindneſſe of Princes. But yet as when the Light was gathered and put into the body of the Sun, we afterwards deriv'd our light from him, and account him the Prince of all the bodies of light: ſo when the government external of all things was drawn into the hands of Princes becoming Chriſtians, to them the Church owes the heat and the warmth, the light and the ſplendor, the life of her laws, and the being of all her great advantages of maintenance and government. At firſt the Church was indeed in the Common-wealth, but was reckoned no part of it, but as enemies and outlaws, were perſecuted with intolerable violence; but when the Princes of the Common-wealth became came servants of Christ, they were also nurses of the Church, and then it became a principal part of the Republick, and was car'd for by all her laws.

2. For this first way was not like to last long; for good manners soon corrupt, and a precarious authority, though wise and holy, useful and consented to, was not stable as the firmament of laws that could compel: and yet it became necessary by new introduc'd necessities that there should be rules and measures given in things relating to the Church, concerning which God himself had given no commandement; as concerning order in Synods and conventions Ecclesiastical, the division of Ecclesiastical charges, the appointment of under-ministeries in the Church, the dispensation of revenues, the determination of causes and difficulties in manners of speaking or acting, and whatsoever was not matter of faith or a Divine Commandment: in all that new necessities did every day arise, and the people were weary of obeying, and the Prelates might presse too hard in their governing, or might be suppos'd to doe so when they did not, and the peoples wearinesse might make them complain of an easy load; and it was not possible well to govern long by the consent of the people who are to be governed. It pleased God to raise up a help that should hold for ever, and when the Princes became Christian and took care of all this, that is, of all the external regiment of the Church, of all that was not of spiritual nature and immediate necessary relation to it, then the Ecclesiastical laws were advised by Bishops and commanded by Kings; they were but Rules and Canons in the hands of the spiritual order, but laws made by the secular power. And now these things are not questions of the power of the Clergy, but a matter of obedience to Kings and Princes.

3. These Canons before the Princes were Christian were no laws further then the people did consent; and therefore none but the men of good will, the pious and the religious children of the Church did obey: but now that Princes have set the Crosse upon their Imperial globes and scepters, even the wicked must obey; all are tied by all manner of ties, and all can be compelled that need it. These Ecclesiastical laws so established the Greeks call Διαταγματα, διορισματα, χρυσόβυλλα, κυρῶντα τὰς συνοδικὰς ἀποφάσεις, Edicts, orders, and golden bulls, commanding or making into laws the sentences and rules of Synods. The ἀποφάσεις, that's the effect and production of Bishops in their conventions; that is, they have jus pronunciandi quid sanctum, quid non, a right of pronouncing what is for Gods glory and the interests of religion, and what not: but the τὸ κῦρος καὶ τὸ κελεύειν, the establishment and the command belong to Princes. The Synod hath a κρίσις or a right of judging, but the βεβαίωσις or confirmation of it into a law belongs to the Civil power. So we find in a Synodal Epistle de non avellendis episcopis à sua Metropoli, εὑρέθη τι καὶ παρὰ τοῖς πάλαι νενομισμένον κρίσει συνοδικῇ καὶ βεβαιώσει βασιλικῇ κεκωλῦσθαι, some such thing as this hath been found done by the decree or judgement of a Synod, but established by after-judgement of the King. To the same sense are those words of Βασιλικὰ διατάγματα applied to the Bishops Canons, and προστάγματα to the Kings Edict upon them; and therefore the Emperors and Princes were said βεβαιοφανίζειν τὰ κεκριμένα, * to put the seal of their authority to the decrees of the Fathers †.

† Vidè Chapt. 3. Rule 8. hujus libri.

4. For it was never known in the Primitive Church that ever any Ecclesiastical law did oblige the Catholick Church unlesse the secular Prince did eſtabliſh it. The Nicene Canons became laws by the Reſcript of the Emperor Conſtantine, ſays Sozomen. He wrote an Epiſtle and commanded that all Churches ſhould keep Eaſter by the Canon of the Nicene Fathers, and made it capital to keep any of the books of Arius. * When the Council of Conſtantinople was finiſh'd the Fathers wrote to the Emperor Theodoſius, and petition'd ut edicto Pietatis tuæ confirmetur Synodi ſententia, that he would be pleaſed to confirm the ſentence of the Council by his Edict: ut quemadmodum literis quibus nos vocabas Eccleſiam honoraſti, ita etiam decreta communibus ſuffragiis tandem facta ſigillo tuo confirmes. The Emperor had done them favour and honour in calling them together, and they petitioned he would alſo confirm what they had agreed upon, and by his ſeal make it authentic. The confirmation of the Canons and Decrees of the great Epheſin Council by the Emperor is to be ſeen at the end of the Acts of the Synod: and Marcian the Emperor wrote to Palladius his Prefect a letter in which he teſtifies that he made the Decrees of the Council of Chalcedon to become laws. For having forbidden any perſon to make aſſemblies and orations of religion in publick, he addes this reaſon, Nam & injuriam facit reverendiſſimæ Synodi judicio, ſi quis ſemel judicata ac rectè diſpoſita revolvere & publicè diſputare contenderit; cùm ea quæ nunc de Chriſtiana fide à Sacerdotibus qui Chalcedone convenerunt per noſtra præcepta ſtatuta ſunt, &c. For he does injury to the judgement of the moſt reverend Synod, if he ſhall unravel and diſpute the things which were there judged and rightly diſpoſed; ſince thoſe things appointed by the Biſhops met at Chalcedon concerning Chriſtian faith were commanded by us; or were appointed by our Commandement.... Nam in contemptores hujus legis pœna non deerit, They that deſpiſe this law ſhall be puniſhed. Thus alſo the Fathers of the fifth General Synod petition'd Juſtinian to confirm and eſtabliſh their Canons into a law, in the ſame form which was ſent to Theodoſius by the Biſhops of the General Council at Conſtantinople before mention'd. * The ſame Prince alſo publiſhed a Novel in which he commands vim legum obtinere Eccleſiaſticos Canones à quatuor Synodis, Nicena, Conſtantinopolitana prima, Epheſina prima & Chalcedonenſi expoſitos & confirmatos; that all the laws which were made or confirm'd by the four firſt General Councils ſhould have the force of laws: that is, all their own Canons and thoſe of Ancyra, Gangra, Antioch & Laodicea, which were then adopted into the Code of the Univerſal Church, though they were but Provincial in their original.

* Vide Concil. Tolet. 6.

5. So that now upon this account the Eccleſiaſtical laws are as obligatory to the conſcience as thoſe which are made in a Civil matter; and there is no difference but in the matter onely: but for that there will be ſome advantage; for as the Civil power hath authority in Eccleſiaſtical matters, ſo the ſpiritual power hath a ſhare in the legiſlative: the matter is handled by the Eccleſiaſtics, and the law is eſtabliſhed by the ſecular. And therefore if it be thought that the cogniſance of theſe things is not proper for ſeculars, thoſe that think ſo may be ſatisfied that the Biſhops have judged the thing already; and they that think the Biſhops have no power of making the law, may learn to obey, becauſe the Prince hath by his legiſlative eſtabliſhed it. So one hand helps another, and both are lift up to God, but will fall heavy upon the diſobedient.

§. 2. Of CENSURES Eccleſiaſtical.

I have given the general meaſures of the Legiſlative power of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate: next to this I am to account concerning their Coercitive §. 2. and then return to the inquiries after the more particular ſubjects of this power §. 3. and their particular laws and their obligations upon the conſcience in external order §. 4. and in matters of faith §. 5.

RULE VI.

Kings and Princes are by the ties of Religion, not of power, oblig'd to keep the laws of the Church.

1. THe laws of the Church I have already divided into ſuch which ſhe makes by a Divine authority, ſuch which concern our eſſential duty, in which ſhe hath power to command and rule in her appointed manner; and into thoſe which are external, political and contingent, ſuch which Princes if they pleaſe make up into laws, but the ſpiritual power cannot. In the firſt ſort, Kings and Princes are as much tied to obedience as the meaneſt Chriſtian ſubject. For the King, though he be ſupreme in government Political, yet his ſoul is of Chriſts fold, and to be conducted by a proper ſhepherd. It is no contradiction that the ſame perſon ſhould be ſupreme, and yet obey in another regard in which he is not ſupreme. The Captain that fights in a ſhip commands the ſouldiers in chief, but himſelf obeyes the Maſter; and the ſafety of the ſouldiers depends upon them both: for they are diſtinct powers in order to diſtinct purpoſes. For Kings muſt give an account for Biſhops that they live well in the political capacity, and Biſhops for Kings in their ſpiritual; and therefore they muſt obey each other: and we find that perſons of greateſt honour in the days of peace, ſerve under Captains and Generals in the time of warre; and when Themiſtius, an excellent Philoſopher, who from his chair did rule and dictate wiſe things, and give laws to the underſtandings of his Auditors, and was admir'd by his Prince, was by the Emperor Conſtantius advanc'd to a prefecture, in an excellent Epigram he ſays to himſelf, Νῦν ἀνάβηθι κάτω, γὰρ ἄνω κατέβης, Now aſcend downwards, for thou haſt already deſcended upwards. The ſame dignity is above and below in ſeveral regards. But in this there is no difficulty, becauſe the ſouls of Princes are of equal regard, and under the ſame laws of God, and to be cleans'd and nouriſh'd by the ſame Sacraments, and tied to the ſame duty by the Commandements of God as any of the people; in this there is no difference.

2. But in matters not of neceſſary duty, not expreſſely required by God's law and the neceſſary, unavoidable, immediate conſequents of it, there being no laws but what themſelves have made, they are no otherwiſe oblig'd then by their own civil laws, of which I have already given account. This thing is particularly noted by Balſamo upon the 16th Canon of the Council of Carthage, who affirms that by the reaſon of the power given to Princes Princes from God they are ſubject neither to their laws nor Canons. And of this latter he gives this inſtance, That although by the XIIth Canon of the Council of Chalcedon it was decreed that no city ſhould for the future acquire the title of a Metropolis; yet after this Juſtinianea prima was made an Archiepiſcopal ſeat and had Metropolitical rights, to the diminution of the former rights of Theſſalonica: but Balſamo inſtances in divers others. There was an ancient Canon of great celebrity in the Church, that every city ſhould have a proper Biſhop: but the Biſhops of Iſauropolis and Tolma beſides their own, had others; ſo had the Biſhops of Lichfield and of Bath in England: they had other cities under their juriſdiction which had no Biſhops in propriety. For if Kings did give limit to their Dioceſes they might divide again, and give a new limit; ſince it is not in Kings as it is in people. The power that goes from the people is like water ſlipt from their hands, it returns no more, and does not abide in the firſt place of it's efflux; but when an act of power paſſes from the King, any deputation or truſt, any act of grace or delegation of juriſdiction, it is like heat paſſing from the fire, it warms abroad, but the heat ſtill dwells at home. It is no more the leſſe, then the Sun is for the emiſſion of it's beams of light.

3. And this is apparent in all the privileges and conceſſions made to the Church, which are as revocable as their duty is alterable. For Princes are ſo far from being oblig'd to perpetuate ſuch rights which themſelves have indulg'd, that it is a rul'd caſe, and the Greek Fathers ſometimes make uſe of it to this very purpoſe, ὁ δωρεαμένος βασιλεὺς, ἐι ἀχαριστίαν παρεμπίπτοι λόγος, ἀναλαμβάνει πάλιν δωρεάν, If a King hath given a gift, he may recal it in caſe the beneficiary proves ingratefull. The ſame with that in the feudal laws of the Lombards, Feudum amittit qui feudum ſciens inficiatur. If he wittingly denies the fee, or refuſes homage, he looſes it. But this depends upon the reaſons of the ſecond Rule in the third Chapter of this Book.

Leunclav. Basilic.

4. But although in ſtrict right the Kings laws oblige him not, yet becauſe de bono & laudabili he is in the ſenſes above explicated oblig'd to his civil laws, therefore much more is he tied to the obſervations and Canons of the Church, as being ſpecifications of religion, inſtances of love to God, ſignifications of ſome internal duty, or outer guards to piety, great examples to the people, and honours to the Church of Chriſt, and that which above all external things will enable the Rulers and guides of ſouls to render their account with joy; and the King ſhall never ſo well promote the intereſts of religion by any thing, as by being himſelf ſubject to the religion: for who will murmure at thoſe laws which the King himſelf weares in a phylactery upon his forehead and his wriſts? Facere rectè cives ſuos princeps optimus faciendo docet; cumque ſit Imperio Maximus, exemplo major eſt, ſaid Velleius Paterculus. This is moſt of all true in religion, whoſe laws look too like policy when they are eſtabliſhed onely by penalties, but they are accounted religion when they are made ſacred by example. To which purpoſe is that of Tacitus, Obſequium in Principem & æmulandi amor validiora quam pœna ex legibus. It is duty to our Prince, and it is our honour to imitate the example of the Prince; and theſe prevail more then penalties. Hæc enim conditio principum, ut quicquid faciant, præcipere videantur, ſays Quintilian. Their example is the beſt law.

Declam. 4.

Sic

Sic agitur censura, & sic exempla parantur,
Si Judex, alios quod jubet, ipse facit.

So laws and judgements and good manners are best established, when by the examples of Kings and supreme Judges they are made sacred.

Adde to this, that the laws of religion have most of them the warranty of some internal grace or other; and are to be reckoned in the retinue and relation of that vertue, and therefore cannot in many instances be broken without some straining of our duty to God, which is by the wisedome and choice of men determin'd in such an instance to such a specification. But this is to be understood onely in such laws which are the περιφυλακαὶ outerguards, the exercises of internal religion, not in the garments and adornments of the relatives and appendages of religion. If a Prince despises the Festival of the Church, nothing but a competent reason will excuse him from being or at least from seeming irreligious. And in whatsoever instance he hath made or consented to laws of religion, if by them he can suppose the people may serve and please God, he is much more oblig'd then they; not by the duty of obedience, for he owes none, but by the vertue of religion: for besides that his soul must live or die by greater measures and exactions of those vertues which bring the people unto heaven, every action of his that deserves an ill report, it is but scandal in the lesser people, but to him it is infamy. For the Kings Escutcheon is blazon'd otherwise then that of his subjects: the Gentry by metals, the Nobility by precious stones, but Kings by planets. For in a King there is nothing moderate. Cavere debet qualem famam habeat, qui qualemcunque meruerit, magnam habiturus est, said Seneca. His fame, let it be good or bad, it will certainly be very great. de Clementia

5. The summe is this: Kings are so tied to their own Ecclesiastical laws, that they must take care they be not despis'd by their example, that the religion design'd by them be promoted, that that part of the Commonwealth which most secures to them obedience and peace, and procures them the most and greatest blessings, be not discouraged or disadvantag'd: but they are not so tied that every act of omission is imputable to them, though it have no other cause but the use of his liberty; for in this his duty differs from that of his subjects: for obedience which the subject owes is a part of justice, and that hath no degrees, but consists in an indivisible point where it can be practis'd, and where it can be understood; for he is unjust that does one act of injustice. But religion hath a latitude of signification and instances, and a man may be very religious who yet does not keep a Saints day where by obedience he is not bound; which is the case of Kings. Therefore what Seneca said of the cares of Kings, may be said of the external observations of the laws of religion, Remissum aliquando animum habebit, nunquam solutum, He may remit something of the strict observance, but he must never esteem himself wholly quit.

6. But this is to be understood onely in externals and rituals; concerning which one said excellently, Pleraque ex iis magis ad morem quam ad rem pertinent, They are nothing of the substance of religion, but onely appendages, and manner, and circumstances: and therefore; Sapiens servabit ea tanquam legibus jussa, non tanquam diis grata, A wise man will observe rituals because they are commanded by laws, not that they are pleasing to God. They are the words of Seneca quoted by S. Austin. Since therefore these lib. 6. de civit. Dei.

are wholly matter of obedience, Kings are free, ſave onely when they become bound collaterally and accidentally. But in matters of eſſential duty, the King hath equally with his ſubjects no liberty, but much more direct duty, and many more accidental obligations. The whole affaire is well enough expreſs'd by Cicero, Religioni parendum eſt: nec patrius mos contumaciter repudiandus. The Prince muſt obey religion, and he muſt not deſpiſe the cuſtomes and the manners of his Country; that is, in the better words of our Bleſſed Saviour, Theſe things they ought to doe, and not [wholly] to leave the other undone.

de Divinat. 2.

7. But the liberty of Princes in theſe Eccleſiaſtial laws of order, and circumſtance, and ritual obſervances is very apparent in the practice of the Hebrew Kings, who yet poſſeſs'd this liberty, that even in the rituals of the Divine ordinance they ſometimes did diſpenſe. Thus David eat the ſhew-bread; and Hezekiah permitted ſome that were unclean to eat the paſſeover, otherwiſe then it was written: onely Hezekiah prayed to God not to impute it to them, and gave them way: and under his reigne the Levites did kill the ſacrifice twice, which was onely lawfull for the Prieſts to doe. But it was a favourable caſe, becauſe the Prieſts were but few, and the ſacrifices were very numerous: and if it be (as the Greek expreſſion is) lawfull χαλάσαι τι τ ἀκριβείας to looſe a litle of the exactneſſe of the rituals of the Divine appointment, it is certain where the man is the lawgiver, he can much more uſe the liberty. But it is not good to doe all that is lawfull.

Levit. 7. 20. 2 Chron. 30. 18.

Levit. 1. 5. 2 Chron. 29. 24. & 30. 17.

Rule VII.

It is not lawful for the Eccleſiaſtical power to excommunicate Chriſtian Princes, or the ſupreme Civil power.

1. IN the ſentence & penalty of the leſſer excommunication as it is us'd in the Church there are three portions of evil. In one the Biſhop is the author or miniſter, in the other the people, and in the third the Prince. The firſt is a denying to miniſter the holy myſteries. The other is a withdrawing from the communion and converſation of ſuch a perſon: which although it be done moſt of all in the greater excommunication, yet it is done alſo in ſome proportion in the leſſe, for emendation of the erring brother; not for extermination, as appeares in the Apoſtolical precept given to the Church of Theſſalonica, 2 Theſſal. 3. v. 6, and v. 14, 15. And the laſt is, the ſupervening temporal puniſhments by which Princes uſe to verify the juſt ſentences of the Church againſt refractary Criminals.

2. Concerning the laſt, it is certain it wholly is owing to the power and favour of the Prince; who by that favour is not ſuppos'd to lay violent hands upon himſelf, who if he did, could quickly take them off again: however the Church inflicts not them by her own authority, but by that of the Prince, who will not, like the tree in the Fable, lend a ſtick to the hatchet, hatchet, to be hewen down or hurt by it afterwards.

3. But then concerning that part which is inflicted by the people, which is abſtinence from the ſociety of the offender till he repent and make amends and get his pardon, it is infinitely certain the Church cannot inflict that on Kings; becauſe it is deſtructive of the duty which the people owe to their Prince, and of the rights which the Prince hath from God independently from the religion.

4. Beſides this, nothing ought to be done to the diſhonour of the ſupreme power, to whoſe happy government fame is almoſt as neceſſary as power: and the impoſing upon them diſgracefull penalties is κρίσις βλασφημίας, a note of diſhonour and blaſphemy; for they are to eſteem their King as a heathen and a publican, from whoſe ſociety they are to eſtrange themſelves as from a peſtilence. Inviſum ſemel principem ſeu bene ſeu malè facta premunt, ſaith Tacitus. If he once fall into ſuch a calamity and diſhonour, whether he doe well or ill afterwards, it ſhall be evil to him.

5. And yet further, the power of aſſemblies and publick meetings is wholly by the laws and permiſſion of Kings; and nothing is more unreaſonable then that any man ſhould interdict Kings from publick meetings by whom himſelf hath leave to meet publickly. And therefore we find Imperial laws making proviſions in this very particular, and ſo far from being ſubject to any thing of this nature, that the Emperors gave orders and ſtrict meaſures to the Biſhops when they ſhould, and whom they ſhould or ſhould not ſeparate from Churches and Communions; as is to be ſeen l. 30. Cod. de Epiſc. & Clericis and in the 123. Novel of Juſtinian. For even in thoſe actions of Biſhops in which themſelves have liberty & Divine authority, yet the ſupreme Civil power hath external juriſdiction. Thus Mauritius the Emperor commanded Gregory the Great, Biſhop of Rome, to communicate with John of Conſtantinople; and anciently in France the Princes were wont to compell the Clergy to officiate; and when the Pope had interdicted the kingdome of England, the King compelled the Prieſts and Biſhops to open their Churches: ſo it is in Holland, and ſo in Venice, and ſo in all places where Kings know their power and their intereſt and their duty.

6. For if excommunication be onely an act of caution and prudence, it is very great prudence not to involve Kings in it, leſt they be provok'd by the evil uſages of the Church; and if it be nothing elſe, certainly it cannot be neceſſary to be done at all. But if it be an act of external juriſdiction, it derives from Kings, and therefore they are not under it but over it: for no coercion in the hands of man ought to touch thoſe who are reſerv'd onely for the judgement of God. Apud ſereniſſimum Regem opus eſt exhortatione potius quam increpatione, conſilio quam præceptis, doctrina quam virga, ſaid Hildebertus the Biſhop. The King is to be exhorted, not reproved; counſelled, not commanded; and to him not a rod, but doctrine is to be us'd: and Ivo Biſhop of Chartres * ſaid the ſame thing. Kings if they abuſe their power are not to be provok'd; but in caſe they refuſe the admonition of Biſhops, they are to be left to the Divine judgement; where they will be puniſh'd the more ſeverely, by how much they were the leſſe obnoxious to humane monitions. So Gregorius Turonenſis, Si tu exceſſeris, * Epiſt. 171.

quis te corripiet ? Si autem nolueris, quis te damnabit, niſi is qui ſe pronunciat eſſe Juſtitiam ? He ſpake to King Chilperic. If thou beeſt exorbitant, who ſhall correct thee ? If thou refuſeſt, who ſhall condemn thee, but he onely who is the Everlaſting Righteouſneſſe ? For if S. Paul gave in charge to Timothy that each perſon ſhould receive an impreſſion and emanation from the Paſtoral charge according to his quality, and commanded that he ſhould
1 Timoth. 5.1. not rebuke an Elder, but intreat him as a Father ; much leſſe would he have permitted any to have puniſh'd the Father of the Country and his own ſuperior, and him who is leſſe then none but God, and by whom himſelf can rule others in external actions, and who in theſe very adminiſtrations is ſuperior, and can give laws, and inflict penalties, and is judge and the remedy of all abuſes.

7. And if concerning this inquiry we conſult the doctrine and practices of the Fathers in the Primitive and Ancient Churches, we ſhall find that they never durſt think of excommunicating Kings. They had no power, no right to doe it. Nam Sacerdotis tantum eſt arguere, & liberam præſtare admonitionem, ſaith S. Chryſoſtom, Prieſts can onely reprove and argue, and give a free admonition : and therefore the firſt ſupreme Prince that ever was excommunicated by a Biſhop, was Henry the Emperor by Pope Hildebrand.
Homil. 4. de verbis Iſai. Vidi Dominum.

8. But againſt this that I ſay now, the Doctors of the Church of Rome make a mighty out-cry, ſaying that Philip the firſt Chriſtian Emperor was excommunicate and thruſt amongſt the penitents ; that Babylas the Biſhop of Antioch thruſt the Emperor Decius with his hands againſt his breaſt from the doors of the Church ; that Athanaſius excommunicated the Prefect of Libya, and S. Baſil commanded in his Dioceſe that he ſhould be avoided ; that S. Ambroſe did excommunicate the Emperor Theodoſius ; that S. Chryſoſtom forbad Eudoxia the Empereſſe to enter into the Church doors ; that Innocentius excommunicated Arcadius ; ſo did Syneſius to Andronicus the Prefect, S. Auſtin to Bonifacius, Pope Symmachus to Anaſtaſius the Emperor, Pope Vigilius to Theodora the Empreſſe, Gregory the ſecond to the Exarch, Gregory the third to Leo Iſaurus. Inſtances enough, if they be right and true, to ſhew that the Fathers were of another mind then the Rule pretends.

9. But in this heap I muſt ſeparate what is true and certain from what is falſe and uncertain, and give an anſwer to them, and the reſt will not trouble us. * The ſtory of the Emperor Philip is vehemently ſuſpected : but if it were true, yet it was no excommunication, but his own ſubmiſſion to the diſcipline of penitents ; to which, ſaith Euſebius, he was perſuaded by the Biſhop. * And the ſame was the caſe of S. Ambroſe to Theodoſius : the Prince was perſuaded to it, * but it was onely to doe his repentance after the manner of the penitents in thoſe days ; the Biſhop onely refus'd to celebrate in the preſence of the Emperor if he would not give teſtimony of his repentance towards God. This the Emperor did, becauſe he was a good man, and things were then in ſuch a conjunction, that there was nothing amiſſe : but that S. Ambroſe could not have verified his power, if the Emperor had been unwilling, and the Emperor did doe more then was neceſſary. But S. Ambroſe ſaid that he had his warrant to uſe the Emperor ſo, from

from a viſion. His warrant was extraordinary: for he had no ordinary power or commiſſion. * The excommunications of the Prefects by S. Athanaſius, S. Baſil, S. Auſtin, Syneſius and Gregory the ſecond doe not come home to the inquiry, becauſe the Prefects were but ſubjects and had not the privilege of ſupreme Princes. * The fact of Babylas to Decius was not excommunication: for Decius was a Heathen, and the Church hath nothing to doe with them that are without; but Babylas was zealous and fierce, and acted with the ſpirit of a Martyr, to which he haſtned by his fervor. * S. Chryſoſtom indeed did that to Eudoxia which did not become him, and which he had leiſure and cauſe enough afterwards to repent: he did in anger what himſelf in the ſober hours of his life profeſſed to be more then he could juſtify. That of Innocentius to Arcadius is of no credit, and ſo is that of Symmachus to Anaſtaſius, as being onely ſeen in the Epiſtles of the Popes of Rome; concerning which there is nothing certain, but that very many of them are certainly ſpurious. The pretended excommunication of Theodora by Vigilius hath no teſtimony. Contra Theodoram & Acephalos Vigilius pronunciavit damnationis ſententiam, ſaid Gregory. But this was nothing but a condemnation or rejection of the hereſy of the Acephali with which ſhe was partaker. And the like was the caſe of Leo Iſaurus; it was ſententia damnatoria, a condemnation of his opinion, called by Zonaras ἀνάθεμα σωοδικόν. But theſe things are onely pretended to make noiſes. Pope Hildebrand was the firſt that ever did any thing of this nature; as is expreſſely affirmed by Authors of great credit, by Otho Friſingenſis, by Godefridus Viterbienſis, and by Onuphrius, who counted all the other pretences either fabulous or to no purpoſe.

lib. 2. Ep. 36.

10. But yet there is a third portion of excommunication, which is a denying to adminiſter the holy Communion to Princes of a ſcandalous and evil life; and concerning this there is no queſtion but the Biſhop not onely may, but in ſome caſes muſt doe it. Nolite dare ſanctum canibus, ſaid Chriſt, Give not that which is holy to dogs; and caſt not pearls before ſwine. But this is not an act of juriſdiction, puniſhment or coercion, but of charity to the Prince and duty in the Biſhop. It is juſt as if a Phyſician ſhould refuſe to give drink to an hydropic patient; he may have it if he will be willing to die, but if the other refuſes his miniſtery in the reaching it, he is charitable and kind, not imperious and uſurping. For whatſoever is in the Eccleſiaſtical hand by Divine right, is as applicable to him that ſits upon the Throne as to him that ſits upon the Dunghil. But then the refuſing it muſt be onely by admonition and caution, by fears and denunciations Evangelical, by telling him his unfitneſſe to communicate, and his danger if he doe: but if after this ſeparation by way of ſentence and proper miniſtery the Prince will be communicated, the Biſhop hath nothing elſe to doe but to pray, and weep, and unwillingly to miniſter. S. Gregory's caſe with Mauritius the Emperor was like this. The Prince commanded him to be the miniſter to hand an unlawfull Edict to the Churches: the Biſhop told the Prince it was a ſinne which the Prince went about, prayed, admoniſh'd, declam'd, did all that he could to hinder it, and then obeyed; that is, he did all he could to God, by uſing all his authority, the word of his proper miniſtery, and then all that he owed to the Prince, by ſubmitting his external miniſtery to his command. The unlawfull proclamations and Edicts of a true Prince may be publiſhed by the Clergy in their ſeveral charges; but yet they muſt not conceal from the people any thing of their duty, nor yet from their Prince when they can declare it. It was alſo the caſe of 1 Sam. 15. 25. Saul and Samuel. The King deſir'd Samuel to joyn and communicate with him in the ſervice of the Lord. He with the liberty of a Prophet refus'd at firſt, and declar'd the heinouſneſſe of Sauls ſinne; but at laſt, when the King's will was preſſing and importunate, Samuel did obey his voice and did joyn with him. Ivo Biſhop of Chartres tells that in ſuch caſes where Princes will not comply with the cuſtomes and diſciplines of the Church, the Biſhops muſt doe their duty by ſaying, Nolo te fallere; introitum hujus viſibilis Eccleſiæ periculo tuo te habere permitto. Fanuam regni cœleſtis tali reconciliatione tibi aperire non valeo. Sr, I will not deceive you; at your peril be it if you will come into the holy place to partake of holy myſteries. I declare to you, that this miniſtery [of the communion] is not any reconciling of you to God. I cannot doe that, unleſſe you repent. But the reaſon of this is wholly upon this account, becauſe the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate hath no proper coercion by Divine right, but is a Miniſter of the Divine coercion, of ſpiritual promiſes and threatnings; their power is ſpiritual and internal, it hath it's effort upon the ſpirit, and not upon the outer man, and therefore is to proceed by methods fitted to the ſpirit, that is, by reaſon and argument, by the fear of God, and the terror of his threatnings, by the love of God and the invitation of his promiſes. But all the miniſteries and compulſions about the external is the gift and leave of Princes; and therefore it deſcends, but aſcends not, unleſſe they pleaſe; [of which by and by.] Admoneri quidem poſſunt, increpari, argui à diſcretis viris: quia quos Chriſtus in terris Rex Regum vice ſuâ conſtituit, damnandos & ſalvandos ſuo judicio reliquit, ſaid the Church of Liege in their Epiſtle to Paſchalis: Kings may be admoniſhed and reprov'd and argued by diſcreet perſons; but they whom Chriſt the King of Kings hath appointed to be his vicars on earth, are intirely to be left to his judgement.

Upon the likeneſſe of matter it is to be inquir'd

11. Whether the guides of ſouls have a proper and ſpiritual power to enjoyn penances or Eccleſiaſtical ſatisfactions to a Prince that hath ſinn'd publickly.

12. The anſwer to this depends upon the premiſſes. For the Church when ſhe enjoyn'd publick ſatisfactions, did ſeparate from the Communion thoſe whom they thruſt into the place of publick penitents. Now if the Biſhops may not ſeparate the Prince from the Communion, then neither impoſe thoſe penances to which that ſeparation did miniſter: But this is one of the Cenſures of the Church, and part of that coercitive power which ſhe hath by the permiſſion of Princes and the voluntary ſubmiſſion and conſent of good people: And therefore it cannot be done, unleſſe the Prince pleaſe. In the Primitive Church, when this diſcipline was in godly uſe, none could be compelled to it, but by conviction in publick, or private confeſſion, and in both caſes their own conſent was either expreſſe or implied; and therefore much leſſe can this be done to the ſupreme power whether he will or no. Imperatoriâ unctione pœnitentiam tolli, ſaid Balſamo, From the ſuffering penances Kings are quitted by their anointing: and upon thoſe words of David, [Againſt thee onely have I ſinned] S. Ambroſe hath this note, He was a King, he was held by no laws, becauſe Kings are free from the bands of delinquents; Neque enim ullis ad pœnam vocantur legibus tuti Imperii poteſtate, Neither are they by any laws call'd to penance, being ad Can. 12. Synodi Ancyranæ

safe by the power of their Empire. And since the Primitive Church was infinitely restrain'd in imposing publick penances on Bishops, for the honour of their order and dignity of their persons, we shall the lesse need to doubt of their opinion or practises concerning Kings.

13. But yet we find that some excellent good Princes did submit to such imposition of penances, and did abstain from the publick communions till they had given testimony of their repentance toward God. So the Emperor Philip, προθύμως ἐπεδάρχησε, he of his own willing mind plac'd himself amongst the penitents. So did Theodosius under the discipline and conduct of S. Ambrose. But these things are but cautelously to be drawn into example, and as they give no power to the Bishop, so very seldome doe they advantages to Kings. Henry the Emperor was a sad example of it, for his affaires went into diminution, and his person into contempt, and his power into pupillage as soon as ever he had done penance at Canusium bare-footed, in a cold winter, for three dayes together, and had endur'd the insolency and scorn of Hildebrand. And when Kings made themselves lesse, the Bishops became greater without any good to the Church, but not without much detriment to religion.

14. But neither may Princes be reprov'd publickly. For if he will not be obedient to the will of God in the voice of his ministers publickly teaching, or privately admonishing, and prudently reproving; he that goes about to reprove him publickly, intends by that meanes by some indirect coercion to compel him, either by shame or by fear; neither of which ought to be impos'd by a subject on the Prince. For it is to be observed that reproof is a part of Empire and superiority, and differs not from teaching, save onely that it is manus linguæ, it is the hand of the tongue, not the voice onely. He that reproves teaches onely minors: and though Kings are so in respect of the conduct of their souls, yet it must not be done to them but very sparingly, because it can very hardly be done without diminution of their dignity; and teaching or declaring their duty will doe their work for them if they please, and if they doe not please, he that reproves will doe the Prince no good, but he shall hurt himself, and shall not be a Martyr when he is smitten. Let no man therefore pretend zeal for God in excuse of any boldnesse more then Priestly towards Kings. For the work of God is oftentimes better done by a gentle hand, then by a strong.

Quod violenta nequit: mandatáque fortiùs urget
Imperiosa quies—— Claud. in Paneg. Mallii.

And if we esteem reproof unseasonable where it is likely we maydoe hurt, & where it is not likely we shall doe good, much more is not this course prudent to be us'd to Kings, who may be provok'd by your ungentle Sermon, or may be hardened by your fire. For every Prince hath not the gentlenesse of Antigonus, patiently to hear himself revil'd: but if he had, yet it was but reason that Antigonus spake when he bade the Souldiers if they would revile him, to goe further off. And such men should doe well to consider how ill themselves would take it if they were publickly in the Pulpit call'd schismatics or incendiaries. * But how and if the people be as zealous as the Priest, and think it lawfull to call their King by all the names of reproach which they hear in the sermons of the Ministers? And if the Bishop calls a ſpade a ſpade, it is very poſſible the people may doe ſo too, for they are ſoon taught to deſpiſe their rulers; and then it is to be remembred what Ariſtotle ſayes, ἐκ τῦ καταφρονεῖσθαι πολλὰς γίγνεσθαι τ καταλύσεων. If they once come to deſpiſe their Prince, they will ſoon unclaſp his royal Mantle.

15. It is true that the Miniſters of religion are ſtewards of the myſteries of God and Embaſſadors for Chriſt: and though I cannot ſay that they who upon this account think they have power publickly to reprove vitious Kings, and in plain language give names to their vices and publiſh their ſhame, doe overvalue their dignity, for that cannot eaſily be done; yet I ſay they uſe it incompetently and imprudently; for the effect of this power and dignity is not to upbraid, or to diſgrace, but to edify and doe good to all men according to their capacity: and therefore S. Paul, when he had declar'd his office and commiſſion to be Chriſt's Embaſſador, he addes, as the full, expreſſe and proper iſſue of that power, we pray you in Chriſts ſtead to be reconciled to God.

16. The old Prophets took liberty, and were bold in their reproofs, and troubled Kings; and the people ſometimes were ſtirred too much upon ſuch accounts: but when the Prophets were charged with ſedition, they onely gave in anſwer the expreſſe Commandement of God. And therefore it was that Amos being very bold was bidden not to propheſy any more at Bethel, becauſe it was the Kings Chappel and the Kings Court: and he was forc'd to plead a ſpecial miſſion; which the Prieſts had not, and therefore we doe not find that ever they us'd any ſuch licence and freedome of reproof, except in ſuch caſes in which they alſo became prophets; as it happened to Jehoiada, 2 Chron. 24. 20. and that's the very caſe of the Miniſters of the Goſpel, who unleſſe they had a ſpecial commiſſion, muſt teach according to the duty and obedience, the gentleneſſe and prudence of the religion; leſt it be ſaid to them as was ſaid by King Amaziah to a bold man that ſpake openly to him, Have they made thee the Kings Counſellor? ceaſe thou, why ſhould they ſmite thee?

Amos 7. 10.

2 Chron. 25. 16.

17. Now in this there can be the leſſe doubt, for they miſtake it that ſuppoſe this to be a queſtion of duty; it is onely an inquiry after the manner of doing the duty: and therefore although for the former reaſons this manner of doing their duty is not fit, yet it is neceſſary that the duty ſhould be done. For miſer eſt Imperator cui vera reticentur. No miſery is greater then that Kings ſhall not be taught their duty. They muſt be taught it all: and in this no liberty, if it be prudently conducted, can become licentious. To which purpoſe, the Biſhops and Miniſters of religion muſt thus comport themſelves to Kings.

18. 1. Let the publick doctrines be inſtructive, but not apt to raiſe ſuſpicion of the Prince. 2. Let it be in things certain and of evident and apparent duty. 3. Let no doctrines be fitted to private intereſts and partialities in the State. 4. Let no reproof of Kings be in Pulpits, for it is uncivil toward any ut quis crimen audiat eo loco quo refellendi copia non ſit, as the Roman ſaid, that a man ſhould be reprov'd in that place where for reverence and religion ſake the man may not anſwer for himſelf. And therefore Clement the third caus'd a Clergy-man to be puniſh'd becauſe multis coram

coram astantibus verba quædam in depressionem officii & beneficii nostri protulit, he spoke words in a publick audience tending to his disparagement: and the Emperors Theodosius, Arcadius and Honorius made a law, Si quis modestiæ nescius, & pudoris ignarus, improbo petulantique maledicto nomina nostra crediderit lacessenda, &c. That if any man, forgetting shame and modesty, thought fit to dishonour the Emperors, he should not presently be punish'd: for if the man were a fool or a light person, the thing was to be despis'd; if he were a mad man, he was to be pitied; if injurious or angry, he might be forgiven: but, ad nostram scientiam referatur, ut ex personis hominum dicta pensemus, & utrum prætermitti an exquiri debeant censeamus: the Princes would have it referr'd to their cognisance and judgment whether such persons should be punish'd or no. 5. Let there be no doubtful speeches in publick sermons scatter'd amongst the people concerning Princes, for they are publick seditions, not sermons. 6. When it is necessary or when it is prudent that private addresses to Princes be with a sacerdotal freedome, let it be in cases of great crimes, and evidently prov'd and evidently vitious, neither deriv'd from uncertain rumors of the people, nor from trifling suspicions, nor yet be in matters of secret concernment and undiscerned reason. A Prince may be reprov'd for notorious adultery, or evident murder against the forms of law; but not so freely in the questions of warres or judicature: for the Bishops private opinion may be warrant enough for him to speak it when he is requir'd, but not to reprove a Prince upon pretence of duty, and by a spiritual authority, when the matter of fact or the question of right is uncertain.

tit. C. Si quis Imper. maled.

RULE VIII.

Ecclesiastical Censures are to be inflicted by the consent and concurrence of the supreme civil power.

1. BY Ecclesiastical censures I mean the greater and lesser Excommunication. This is a separation of a Criminal (who is delated and convict by witnesses, or by confession voluntary) from the peace and communion of the Church, till he hath by exterior signes signified his internal repentance: this is called the lesser excommunication. The greater is onely of refractary & desperate persons, who will be subject to no discipline, make no amends, return to no goodnesse, and forsake no sinne. These the Church throws out from her bosome, and shakes the fire from her lap, and quits her self of the plague: and this is called the greater excommunication, or the anathema. Both these are bound by the Ecclesiastical power: but the first is bound that he maybe purged of his sins; the second, that the Church maybe purged of him. The first is bound as a man is tied fast that he may be cut of the stone; the other is bound as a Criminal that is going to execution: he is bound that he may be thrown into outer darknesse. Not that the Church hath power to damne any man, but when she observes a man confirm'd in impiety, she does antedate the Divine judgment, and secures the sound members, and tells what will befall him in the day of judgment. In the first case, the penitent is like a wandring sheep; in the second he is turn'd a goat or a woolf;

& by their own acts also as well as by the power of the Keyes they are both bound: the first consents to the Medicin, and the reprobate hath by his own act incurr'd that death which the Church declares; and both are acts of discipline, and directly or indirectly consequent to that power which Christ hath given to his Church of binding and loosing, and to the charge of the conduct of souls.

2. These two are by the fifth Roman Synod under Symmachus distinguish'd by the names of excommunication (meaning the lesser) and anathema. He that breaks the decrees of this Synod, let him be depriv'd of the Communion: but if he will not amend, anathemate feriatur, let him be anathema. The same we find in the Synod of Turon. c. 25. which commands that all the curses of the 108 [alias 109] Psalm be cast upon Church-robbers, ut non solùm excommunicati, sed etiam anathematizati moriantur; that they may die not onely excommunicate, but anathematiz'd. They which are never to be restor'd to the Communion, but are to be accurs'd; so Agapetus expresses it in his 6th Epistle. This is called eradication; while the lesser excommunicates are still members of the Church, as S. Austin notes.

Hom. 50. in Psal. 101.

3. There is yet a third sort of excommunication, brought in by zeal and partiality, a willingness to rule or to prevail; which is no part of the power given by Christ, but taken up as it happen'd; it is no part of Jurisdiction so much as improper, not an act of the power of the Keyes: and that is a refusing to communicate with him who is not excommunicate, a punishing one whom we have no power to punish, a doing that which we have no power to doe at all, or to such a person over whom confessedly we have no authority or jurisdiction. For when this humor was got into the manners and customes of the Church they made a new distinction; and there was a communio cum fratribus, and a communio cum omnibus Christianis. He that might communicate with the people might not in some cases communicate with the Priests and Bishops his Brethren. The distinction we find in the 45. Chapter of the Council of Auxerre, and in pursuance of it we find one Bishop refusing to communicate with another. Thus if a Bishop came not to the Synod of his province it was decreed in the fifth Council of Carthage, ut Ecclesiæ suæ communione debeat esse contentus, that he should onely communicate with his own Diocese. The like to which we find in the second Council of Arles can. 19. in the Council of Tarracon can. 6. and the Council of Agatho cap. 35. Thus Epiphanius Bishop and Metropolitan of Cyprus refus'd to communicate with the Bishop of Jerusalem, who was not his suffragan.

Can. 10.

Vide distinct. 18. cap. placuit. &c. si quis autem, & cap. si quis Episcopus.

4. Concerning which way of proceeding, 1. it is evident that there is no authority in it, or any thing that is like to jurisdiction, and 2. sometimes there may be duty, but 3. most commonly there is danger. 1. * There is evidently no authority: for if the authority were competent and the cause just, they might proceed to excommunication. But this was sometimes done by equals to equals, as by Bishop to Bishop, by Church to Church, as by Victor to the Churches of Asia, by Stephen to the Churches of Africa, and by angry or zealous Bishops to them that were not of their humor or opinion. Sometimes it was done by inferiors to their superior, the people withdrawing themselves from their pastor; so the Samosatenians refus'd to communicate with their Bishop that was thrust upon them after the expulsion expulſion of Euſebius. So that evidently in this matter there is no authority to verify it.

5. 2. Sometimes there may be duty: as if a Biſhop be a heretic or an open vitious perſon, his Brother that is a Biſhop may uſe that liberty to him as the people might doe to a Brother that walks diſorderly; that is, withdraw from his ſociety, that he may be aſham'd: and if his communicating with him will give countenance to his hereſy, or offence to his people, he is bound then to abſtain and to refuſe it: and ſo is the people tied not to communicate with their Prieſt or Biſhop, if the condition of his communion be a ſin, or the countenancing of a ſin. And thus we find in the Annals of Spain, that a daughter of an Arrian King of Spain ſuffer'd death rather then receive the Communion from the hands of an Arrian Biſhop. In her caſe her refuſal was duty, and her ſuffering was Martyrdome, becauſe her Father impos'd his command of communicating with the heretical Biſhop as a ſecret allowance of the hereſy, which in that caſe ſhe was to refuſe, and obey God unto the death.

6. But when this does accidentally become a matter of duty, the charity of our communion is no further to be refus'd then we are oblig'd by our duty; we are not to refuſe it to that perſon, but for that cauſe, and therefore in other caſes & upon all other accounts we are tied to doe the charity of Chriſtians. I will not communicate with a Roman Prieſt in his worſhip of Images, or in his manner of Praying for the dead, or invocation of Saints; but I may not refuſe to ſay the Lords Prayer and the Credo with him, unleſſe by chance it give offence to ſome weak uninſtructed perſon. I will not receive the Communion from the hands of him who was ordain'd by a Presbytery without a Biſhop; becauſe his hand is a dead hand, and reaches me nothing: but becauſe he is my Brother, I will not refuſe to give him the Communion if he will require it at my hand, which was made ſacred by the Holy Ghoſt invocated by the prayer and the lifting up of the Biſhops hand. I will not come to their Communions; but if they would uſe good formes of Liturgy, and preach well, I would not refuſe to communicate in ſuch aſſemblies: unleſſe (as I ſaid before) I be accidentally hindred by ſome other duty drawing me off a while.

7. But then thirdly, when it is not an expreſſe and a clear duty, it is alwayes a great danger, an occaſion of ſchiſms and diviſions in the Church, and conſequently may be an infinite breach of duty, a certain violation of one vertue, for the uncertain preſervation of another: it is commonly the daughter of ſpiritual pride, an accounting of our ſelves more holy then our Brethren, whom by ſuch meanes we oftentimes provoke to jealouſies and indignation; and ſo ſometimes altars are erected againſt altars, and Pulpits turn to cock-pits, and ſeates of ſcorners and of proud and illiterate declamations. Upon this account Chriſtendome hath bled for many ages. The diviſion of the Eaſt from the Weſtern Churches, and in the Weſt the diviſion of Rome from divers Churches, the Proteſtants and Reformed, came in at this door; while one Church either pretends the ſingularity of truth, or the eminency of authority over other Churches: by which two things the Church of Rome hath been author of the permanent and greateſt ſchiſms of Chriſtendome. For indeed little better can be expected when the Keys of the Church, which were given for the letting in or ſhutting out of ſingle criminals or penitents reſpectively, are us'd to oppoſe multitudes. A man may lock his chamber-door, but he cannot put a lock upon the Ocean: and it was wiſely ſaid of S. Auſtin, that to excommunicate a ſingle perſon cannot make a ſchiſm, unleſſe the multitude favour him; intimating that a multitude is a dangerous thing to be involv'd in cenſures. The King nor the people are not to be excommunicated, is an old Rule. For if the whole multitude be excommunicate, with whom ſhall we communicate? if great parts of them be, they plainly make a ſchiſm, if they unwillingly ſuffer the cenſure; and therefore that one Church ſhould doe this to another is very hardly poſſible to be done with wiſedome, or charity, or neceſſity. For when S. Paul bad his flock to abſtain from the ſociety of fornicators, he told them he meant it onely in the ſmal numbers of the Brethren, where, it may be, one or two in a Dioceſe or city of that religion might be criminal; for he would not have them to goe out of the world to keep that Canon, and therefore meant not to involve the multitudes of fornicators which were in the world. But now he that excommunicates a Church, either does nothing at all, or he obliges every one in that Church to ſeparate from that multitude; and then if he muſt not goe out of the world, he muſt goe out of that Country, which no ſpiritual power can command, and which the Apoſtle never did intend, as appears in his caution and the whole Oeconomy and reaſon of that Canon.

Contr. Epiſt. Parmen. l. 3. c. 2.

8. But I am to adde this alſo, That there is ſcarce any caſe practicable in which, if it be indifferently permitted to the people to ſeparate from the communion of their ſuperior, it will not very quickly proceed to miſchief and become intolerable; a remedy worſe then the diſeaſe. When Neſtorius had preach'd theſe words, whoever ſhall ſay that the Virgin Mary is the Mother of God, let him be accurſed, the people had reaſon to be offended; but they did ill when they made a tumult: for when the people are ſtirred, zeal is the worſt thing about them. Thus when the two Deacons of Pope Vigilius were diſpleaſed with their Biſhop in the cauſe of the three articles which the Pope had condemn'd in the fifth General Council, they very pertly withdrew themſelves from his communion; and the effect of it was, that almoſt all the Roman Church and divers other Weſtern Churches did ſo: and ſo did the people of Iſtria to their Biſhops in the ſame cauſe, and ſo did many more: and the evil grew ſo great, when every one would as he pleas'd withdraw himſelf from the communion of their Biſhop or Prieſt, that it was under great penalty forbidden by the eighth Synod the tenth Chapter.

S. Cyril. Ep. 18. ad Cæleſtinum.

Paulus Diacon. de geſt. Longob. lib. 3. c. 12.

9. But this may be done in theſe following caſes.

1. When the ſuperior hath manifeſtly erred in faith, that is, in an article of his Creed, or a plain propoſition of Scripture, or in an article eſtabliſhed or declar'd by that authority which hath bound him and them equally, and in which they conceive no error. Thus the Prieſts and people of Conſtantinople withdrew themſelves from the communion of Eunomius, becauſe he erred in an article determined by the whole Church, and eſtabliſhed by the laws of Emperors, and as they believed clearly declar'd in Scripture. But when Plato the Monk withdrew himſelf from the communion of Taraſius the Patriarch of Conſtantinople becauſe he refus'd to excommunicate the Emperor, it was an inſolence fit to be chaſtis'd by the rod of Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline.

Theodoret. lib. 4. c. 14.

Baron. A. D. 795.

2. Prieſts

10. 2. Prieſts may withdraw themſelves from the communion of their Biſhop, and people from the communion of their Prieſts, in things declar'd by laws to be againſt the peace of God and the Church, when the fact is evident and notorious. But this is not to be done by ſingle perſons, but by the whole community: and the reaſon is, becauſe the fact is not evident, or not ſcandalous to that degree as to deſerve this canonical puniſhment, unleſſe the congregation be offended, or the congregation note it; for though the Biſhop be more publick then any ſingle perſon, yet he is not more publick or of more concernment then all his Dioceſe. Theſe particulars, that is, this leave and this caution I have from Origen, explicating in what ſenſe we are bound to cut off our right hand. Ego qui videor tibi manus eſſe dextra, & Presbyter nominor, & verbum Dei videor prædicare, ſi aliquid contra Eccleſiaſticam diſciplinam & Evangelii regulam geſſero, ita ut ſcandalum tibi Eccleſia faciam, in uno conſenſu Eccleſia conſpirans excidat me dextram ſuam, & projiciat à ſe. If I that am thy right hand, and preach the word of God, doe any thing againſt the diſcipline of Gods Church and the rule of the Goſpel, ſo that I give offence to the whole Church, let the whole Church conſenting together cut me off and throw me away. in Joſu. Hom. 7.

11. 3. But all this is to be underſtood to be done by permiſſion or authority of the Prince, in caſe he ſhall interpoſe, becauſe where publick diviſions and breach of peace are in agitation, the Common-wealth is more concerned oftentimes then religion; and therefore where the laws of God doe not intervene, the laws of the King muſt, or the whole ſeparation is a ſin. And therefore we find that when Gregory the firſt, Biſhop of Rome, had thus refus'd to communicate with John Biſhop of Conſtantinople, he was commanded by the Emperor Mauritius to communicate with him. And it is very fit that ſuch heats and private judgments and zealous, but unneceſſary, proceedings ſhould be kept from inconveniences by ſuch publick perſons who are to take care of peace and of the publick. For if ſuch ſeparations be not neceſſary, they are not lawful; and if they be not the onely way to avoid a ſin, they are a ready way to commit one. For becauſe every mans cauſe is right in his own eyes, when ſuch heats as theſe happen between confident perſons, every man is judge in his own cauſe; and what is like to be the event of ſuch things, all the world can eaſily imagine.

12. But now concerning thoſe other two proper kinds of excommunication, the greater and the leſſer, they have the ſame conſideration, if we mean them according as the Church now uſes them; that is, if they be impos'd upon men againſt their will. For as for the leſſer excommunication, ſo as it was us'd in the Primitive Church, and ſo as the Church of England wiſhes it were now reſtor'd, when penitents came and ſubmitted themſelves to the diſcipline of the Church, and had exerciſes, ſtations and penitential times allotted to them, and were afterwards with joy and comfort reſtor'd to the peace of the Church, it is a miniſtery done by conſent, and without any evil, and no man hath to doe with it. But if the conſent of the Criminal be not in it, the Biſhop cannot compel him; but the Biſhop and the King can. And therefore we find that the Emperors made laws in this very particular; and Juſtinian in his 123 Novel commanded that no Eccleſiaſtic perſon ſhould excommunicate any one, unleſſe the cauſe were firſt approved. Which law was commended by the Council of Paris under Ludovicus; and by John the 8th, who upon the authority of that law

13. By this I doe not mean to ſay that the Eccleſiaſtical judge hath not power to deny a Criminal the peace and communion of the Church, by declaring him to be unworthy to communicate; but becauſe as the laws and as the cuſtomes of the world are now, there is diſgrace, and there is temporal evil conſequent to ſuch Eccleſiaſtical ſeparations, the Biſhop can be reſtrain'd in the actual exerciſe of his ſpiritual authority, if there be any thing in it of temporal concernment.

14. And therefore if the Biſhop did excommunicate any of the Princes ſervants, or any whom the Prince had a mind to communicate and converſe withall, the cenſure was to be revers'd; ut quod principalis pietas recipit, nec à ſacerdotibus Dei alienum habeatur, as the Fathers of the 12th Council of Toledo did decree; that what the piety of the Prince does receive, the Biſhops may not reject. For to avoid the company of any perſon is an effect of excommunication indeed, but not inſeparable: and becauſe to converſe with any of his ſubjects is a right of Kings that none of his Biſhops can deveſt him of, the Biſhop can excommunicate no man without the Kings leave; that is, he cannot ſeparate him from the ſociety of the faithful. And therefore Ivo Biſhop of Chartres juſtified himſelf upon this account for converſing with one Gervaſius that was excommunicate. Pro Regia enim honorificentia hoc feci fretus authoritate legis, ſi quos culpatorum, &c. I did it (ſaith he) relying upon the authority of the law, and for the honourable regard of the King. And this he adviſes to others alſo, in his 171 Epiſtle: and S. Anſelme, though he was extremely troubled with the Popes peeviſh injunctions againſt the King of England's right in the matter of Inveſtitures, yet in his Epiſtle to Prior Ernulph he gives leave that though he durſt not by reaſon of the Popes perſonal command to the contrary, yet they might communicate with thoſe whom the Pope had excommunicated for receiving Inveſtitures from the King. Now although this appendage of excommunication, that is, abſtention from the civil ſociety of the Criminal, is wholly ſubject to the lawes and power of Princes; yet the ſpiritual part of the excommunication, that is, a ſeparation from the communion by declaring ſuch a perſon to be unworthy, and uſing to him the word of his proper miniſtery, is ſo wholly under the power of the Eccleſiaſtic order, that when the King commands that the company of the excommunicate ſhould not be avoided, yet the man is not abſolved from his ſentence in the Court of Conſcience, but is bound to ſatisfy the Church if ſhe have proceeded legally and canonically. The King can take off the temporal penalty, but not the ſpiritual obligation; that is, the man is not to demand the Sacrament till he be abſolved. If the King commands it, the Biſhop muſt not deny his externall miniſtery: but the man ſins that demands it, becauſe he communicates unworthily, that is, by a juſt power, but not by a juſt diſpoſition. He muſt repent of his crime before he can come innocently.

15. For it is to be obſerved that in this affair one part concerns the Criminal, and another concerns the people. The Criminal is bound to abſtain from the communion: that duty is incumbent upon him, becauſe he is judg'd to be unworthy of it by that authority which he is bound to truſt, in caſe there be no apparent error. But to be thruſt from civil ſociety is not not directly any duty of his, but is incumbent on the people. Now though the Biſhop can in ſome caſes adviſe this, yet in a Chriſtian Common-wealth he cannot without leave command it: and therefore the cenſure or judgment of the Church is to have effort upon the Conſcience of the guilty, and this invades no mans right; it is for his good that is concerned, and is wholly a ſpiritual power, and intrenches not upon the civil right of any man, much leſſe upon the publick and ſupreme power. * In the leſſer excommunication, if the ſubjects be not voluntary, or be not ſubjected by him that hath the power over them, that is, the King, they cannot be compell'd by the Biſhop to any external act or abſtention. But if they doe themſelves ſubmit, or are ſubmitted by their ſupreme, they are bound not onely to obey the cenſure of the Church, but themſelves to goe away from company that know not of this calamity: as I have * already inſtanc'd.

* Chapt. 2. Rule 2. Num. 15.

16. 3. The ſentence of the greater excommunication, though to be eſtimated in many particulars by the former meaſures, yet hath in it ſomething of particular conſideration. This is the great Anathema Maranatha, the exciſion of a man from the body of the Church; without which body, whoſoever is in that manner juſtly ſeparate, there is no ſalvation to him: and this the Church called by the name of anathema. Not that whenever the word anathema is us'd, the greater excommunication is ſignified; for it is very often us'd as an earneſt expreſſion of the diſlike of a thing: ſo the Clergy of Edeſſa, when they purg'd their Biſhop Ibas of the Crimes objected to him in the Council of Chalcedon, they ſolemnly proteſted they knew no evil of him, anathematizantes noſmetipſos, & terribili gehennæ noſmetipſos obnoxios facientes, ſi novimus, anathematizing themſelves and expoſing themſelves to the guilt of eternal damnation if they knew any ſuch thing. Such anathemata are denounc'd againſt ſacrilegious perſons in the donatives made to the Church: and thus divers Councils doe pronounce anathema to falſe propoſitions, and Juſtinian in the Code uſes the ſame execration againſt certain hereſies. Now to ſuch an anathema as this all perſons can be ſubject, Kings and Princes, Biſhops and Prieſts, Multitudes and ſingle perſons. There is nothing conſiderable in this, but that the cauſe be great and worthy: for whoever he be that works abomination, let him be who he will, yet he is abominable, and ſhall be ſeparated from the communion of Saints in the day of the New Jeruſalem.

Act. 10.

Cod. de ſumma Trinit. l. 1.

17. But the inquiry that remains is concerning the great anathema or exciſion of obſtinate criminals from the body of the Church, which is the onely excommunication that Chriſt gave in commiſſion and warranty. For ſo the Fathers expound thoſe words of Chriſt, But if he will not hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an heathen and a publican; that is, not to be eſteem'd for a Brother, or a Chriſtian, ſaith S. Gregory; quia neque influxum habet à capite, neque participat de Spiritu Chriſti, ſaith S. Auſtin, he neither hath any influence from the head, nor partakes of the Spirit of Chriſt. This man the Church does not pray for, does not pray with, does not communicate, does not hope well of; he receives no aſſiſtance and gifts of grace from the holy Spirit of God: and S. Jude ſayes, his works are gone aforehand unto judgement. Videlicet peccator gravis & ſcandaloſus, notorius, aut accuſatus & convictus, he who is a grievous and a ſcandalous ſinner, notorious or convict, being prov'd by the Biſhop in the publick aſſemblies in Pſal. 5. pœnit. in it. Tract. 27. in Johan.

of the Church, if he will not be humbled, but remains incorrigible and perſeveres in his ſcandalous ſinnes, tum anathemate feriendus eſt, & à corpore Eccleſiæ ſeparandus, then he is to be ſmitten with the anathema, and to be ſeparated from the body of the Church: ſo S. Gregory. To this there is nothing elſe conſequent, but that the man, unleſſe he timely and mightily repent, will be damned; and in the mean time that every man account him to be no Brother, and have no entercourſe with him, but as with a Turk or a Jew.

18. Now concerning this, he that is in Eccleſiaſtical authority, and hath received the holy order, hath this power; and he that hath a charge can miniſter this power: and ſo long as nothing temporal and ſecular is mingled with it, the Biſhop can doe it wholly by his ſpiritual authority; and in this he does nothing depend on the ſupreme Civil power, ſave that he be permitted to exerciſe his ſpiritual office. For though it be true that any Biſhop can by the Civil power be hindred from miniſtring in publick aſſemblies, for he may be baniſhed or depos'd, and another put in his chair, or all his offices maybe ſuſpended quoad exercitium actus (as the Schools ſpeak) ſo that he may not exerciſe his power; yet a Biſhop that hath a flock, that is permitted actually to doe what Chriſt hath impower'd him to doe, can by his own ſole authority inflict this ſentence upon ſcandalous and refractary, diſobedient and impenitent, rebellious and perſevering ſinners: and if the Church could not doe this, ſhe had not power ſufficient to the ends of her deſignation; ſhe were no body politic, but without government and power; and all that diſcourſe of our Bleſſed Saviour in the 18th of S. Matthew, and his commands of delating refractary Criminals to the Church, & the promiſe to verify in heaven what they ſhall reject on earth, were words ſignifying nothing and of no effect. But becauſe no wiſe man will imagine that it muſt follow that the Eccleſiaſtic ſtate, they to whom Chriſt promiſed to give the keyes of the Kingdome of heaven, they who are Stewards of the houſhold and diſpenſers of the myſteries of the Goſpel, have this power ſubjected in themſelves independently from the Civil power, as they have a power to baptize, and to conſecrate, and to ordain Miniſters of religion; and they can no more be hindred from one then from the other; they may de facto, and they may by a competent power, but if they be, it is perſecution. That this Biſhop or that, that Cyprian or Silveſter, that Valerius or Auguſtine ſhould be the man, is under the power of the Civil Magiſtrate; but the man that is permitted to uſe the powers Chriſt put into his hand, can upon perſons ſo diſpoſed pronounce God's anathema and the Churches.

Matth. 18. 15, 16, 17, 18.

19. Now the reaſon of the difference why the Biſhop cannot doe this in the leſſer excommunication, and yet can in the greater, is this, becauſe the greater is of Divine inſtitution, and the other is of humane, never us'd but by conſent, or by a ſuperinduc'd civil authority, and therefore muſt ſtill depend upon the cauſes of it's being. Adde to this, there is a precept annexed to this power: there is a double duty; the Biſhop is to ſeparate the vile from the precious, the leprous from the ſound, and the people are to take heed of ſuch impure mixtures. But in the leſſer excommunications there may poſſibly be ſomething of prudence; yet as there is no proper authority in the Eccleſiaſtical ſuperior but what is given him by conſent, ſo there is no obligation or duty in the ſubjects: it is well when they ſubmit

to this diſcipline, and goe to be cur'd by the publick hands even for every malady; but they are not bound to this: but if they be delated or be notorious and great Criminals, here the Church is warranted by God to proceed to diſcipline, and to ſeparation and exciſion of the refractary. This onely hath effort upon the ſoul; but the leſſer excommunication is a diſcipline of Eccleſiaſtical inſtitution; and ſo is that denying of communion to equals or ſuperiors, and ſo is irregularity, and ſo is refuſing to mention a name in our collects and publick or private prayers, and ſo is ſuſpenſion and interdict, degradation and depoſition: they are all of Eccleſiaſtical poſitive conſtitution, no part of the power of the Keyes, nothing of Divine authority; but are introduc'd by the conſent of Churches, and verified by cuſtome, conſent and the laws of Princes, and ſo come accidentally to paſſe an obligation, but effect nothing directly upon the ſoul. That is a peculiarity of the greater excommunication: and that which ſtands next to it is the leſſer excommunication; which although it be humanum inventum and of poſitive inſtitution, yet becauſe it is a part of the greater, and proceeds in the ſame way, upon leſſer cauſes, but to deſignes of charity and edification, it is an uſe of the ſpiritual ſword, it is the lancing of a ſore, but not the cuteing off a dead part; but it may be admitted to be a conſequent of the power of binding or looſing, and ſo I have already call'd it*. For it is a part of that intermedial monition which Chriſt hath in general commiſſionated his Miniſters and guides of the Church to make. If an offendor will not mend by private, and by a more publick admonition, tell it to the Church; then the Church is to doe ſomething when the ſtubborn criminal is delated to her. The Church muſt try if he will repent upon her monition: for then the Eccleſiaſtical Rulers are to exhort him into repentance, to reprove, to correct, to doe what ſpiritual Fathers ought to doe: the particulars of which becauſe they are not ſpecified by our Bleſſed Lord, they are left to the prudence of the Eccleſiaſtical Governours; ſo that the general Diſcipline is warranted, but the particular is left to their choice who by the analogies of the conſequent power of the Keyes can proceed by leſſer and an intermedial proceſſe. But the power of the Keyes is given in order to ſomething that is to be done afterwards. For that is onely the warranted and expreſſe authority, and that which imitates coercitive jurisdiction the neareſt, that thoſe be cut off from the Church who by their voluntary ſubmiſſion will not amend and ſubmit to the paternal rod & gentle correption.

* Numb. 1. of this Rule.

RULE IX.

Excommunication inflicted upon a light cauſe binds externally, but not internally; but if it be inflicted upon an unjuſt cauſe, it binds not at all.

1. THis latter part of the Rule is evident and conſented to by all. For in this the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical power differ. The Civil power, if it condemns the Innocent, hath effect upon him, and does afflict or put him to death: But the Eccleſiaſtical power does nothing, unleſſe the man hath done the miſchief to himſelf. For God having undertaken to verify what the Church does, it muſt be ſuppos'd that the Church muſt doe right, elſe

God will not verify it; and then it ſignifies nothing, but that the Governours Eccleſiaſtical have ſinn'd. Ejiciunt oves qui contra juſtitiam de Eccleſia ſeparant, ſaith S. Hierom, They that againſt right caſt a man from the Church, they are ill ſhepherds, and drive the ſheep from their folds where Chriſt loves to ſee them: and therefore Alexander the ſecond 24. q. 1. c. Audivimus, ſayes that unjuſt excommunications are not to be ſlighted and neglected; and Gerſon ſayes, it is honorable to the Church that ſuch a Prelate ſhould be reſiſted to his face. But this in caſe of injuſtice and manifeſt abuſe: ſuch are thoſe excommunications in the Bulla cœnæ Domini, n which thoſe perſons who doe their duty, who doe not conſent to the errors and abuſes of the Church of Rome, who read good books that diſcover their horrible impieties, are excommunicated: it is Brutum fulmen; it is harſh as the noiſe of peacocks, but does no more harm to them that are intended.

De vita ſpirit. an. lect. 2. ad em.

2. But now in the other part of the Rule there is difficulty, and it is occaſion'd by a diſcourſe of S. Leo in his 93. Epiſtle; Let not the Communion be eaſily or lightly denied to any Chriſtian, nor at the pleaſure of every angry Prieſt; becauſe the mind of the avenger ought unwillingly and with a kind of grief to proceed to the infliction of vengeance even upon a great guilt. For we have known ſome for ſlight actions and words excluded from the grace of the Communion, and a ſoul for which the bloud of Chriſt was ſhed, by the infliction of this ſo ſevere a puniſhment wounded, and as it were diſarm'd and ſpoil'd of all defence, expos'd to the aſſaults of the Devil, that it might be eaſily taken.] By which words S. Leo ſeems to ſay that he who for a trifling cauſe is excommunicate, does nevertheleſſe feel all the evils of that greateſt cenſure. He ſayes well and true: But he does not ſay that he is ſeparate from God, that he ſhall periſh everlaſtingly, that God will in heaven verify what is done upon earth; but he reproving this impiety, that the greater excommunication ſhould be inflicted for trifles, tells the real evils which doe follow: for the excommunicate being ſeparate from the communion, denyed the prayers of the Church, baniſh'd from the communion of Saints, is deveſted of all theſe excellent helps and ſpiritual defenſatives againſt the power of the Devil. Now this is very true, though the cauſe were wholly unjuſt; and much more if the cauſe be ſomething, though not ſufficient. De facto the man is depriv'd of the helps of the Church, and the advantage of holy Ordinances: and though God will, if the man be a good man and devout, hear his private prayers, and ſupply him with ſecret ſtrengths, and in his behalf rebuke the Devil; yet it was a worthy cauſe of complaint in S. Leo, to conſider that this evil was done for little things, and that for ſo ſmall occaſions God ſhould be put to his extraordinary way, and the man be depriv'd of the bleſſings of the ordinary.

Tract. 6. in Matth.

3. But whether this ſentence ſo ſlightly inflicted doe really bind the ſoul before God, is a queſtion which Origen inquir'd into, but durſt not affirm it; but concludes that it obliges in the Church and before men: for whether it obliges before God or no, Deus ſcit; nos autem pronunciare non poſſumus, ſecundum quod ſcriptum eſt, Nolite judicare] God onely knows, but we muſt not judge. But yet if it be his unhappy lot to fall into ſuch a calamity, factum valet, fieri non debuit; the eccleſiaſtical Ruler did very ill in it, yet the man is bound to the Church. Qui ergo in peccato levi correptus ... non ſe emendat, nos quidem ſic eum debemus habere quaſi publicanum & ethnicum, abſtinentes ab eo, ut confundatur,

He

He therefore that is taken and excommunicate for a small fault, and will not amend, we must esteem him as a Heathen and a Publican, that he may be ashamed. Indeed the Church hath put a heavy and an unequal load upon such a person, and hath erred greatly; for no man is to be separate from the Church of God, but he that separated himself from God, and hath left his duty: but therefore if the Church doe excommunicate him whose action or words though it be faulty, yet it can consist with the state of a good man, and does not destroy the love of God, the censure was too heavy as to the external, and false as to the internal; for the man is not fallen from God, but does communicate with the Head, and continues to receive of the Spirit of Christ.

4. But yet even such a man is bound externally: for this is the meaning of that famous saying of S. Gregory, Pastoris sententia etiam injusta timenda est, The sentence of a Bishop though it be unjust is to be fear'd; that is, though it be in a cause that is not great and competent enough, but if it be in a light matter, yet it is to be feared; not onely because the man is depriv'd of the prayers and communions of the Church (which though it happen to an innocent person is a great evil, and therefore is to be fear'd, though it be in all senses unjust) but also because it binds the man that is deprehended even in a light fault, to submit to the judgment and satisfactions of the Church. The burden is very great, and ought not to have been impos'd; but when it is it must be suffer'd, because no repentance can be too great for any sinne: and although the Bishop made a false judgment concerning the man, and he does not stand so before God as before the Church, that is, for his first little offence; yet being censur'd and unfortunate, if he refuses to obey that which is indeed too much to be impos'd, but will doe him no hurt, it is not his first little sin, but his great contempt that is to be accounted for before God with the greatest severity. In Evangel. Homil. 26.

5. But then if it be inquir'd in what cases onely excommunication may be lawfully inflicted; the answer is easy: but I chuse to give it in the words of the Fathers, because there is in this case reason and authority too. Ubi peccatum non est evidens, ejicere de Ecclesia neminem possumus, ne forte eradicantes zizania, eradicemus simul cum ipsis etiam triticum: So Origen. Unless the fact be evident, no man must be excommunicate, for else we may peradventure root up the wheat with the tares. But that's not enough. In Josue. Homil. 21.

6. 2. No man must be excommunicate but he that is peccator gravis & scandalosus, a grievous and a scandalous sinner; so S. Gregory: and like to this is that of Aristotle, Διαλυτέον οὐ πᾶσιν, ἀλλὰ τοῖς ἀνιάτοις διὰ τὴν μοχθηρίαν, We must not separate from every sinner; but from the intolerable and malicious. For what should a man proceed to violent remedies, when a gentle application will make the cure? and for a trifling cause to cut a man off from the communion of the Church, is to doe as the man in the fable, that espying a fly upon his neighbours forehead, went to put it off with a hatchet, and struck out his brains. And therefore the Fathers in the Council of Worms can. 2. decreed, Ut nullus Sacerdotum quenquam rectæ fidei hominem pro parvis & levibus causis à communione suspendat: præter eas culpas pro quibus antiqui patres arceri jusserunt aliquid committentes. In the infliction of Censures the Church should follow the practice of the primitive Fathers, excommunicating no true believer but for some very grievous fault. In 5 Penit. Psal.

7. 3. Neither is this ſufficient of it ſelf: a ſcandalous ſin alone is not enough, for excommunication is the laſt remedie. Omnia prius tentanda quam bello experiendum; when nothing elſe will doe it, then this is to be us'd: for if the man will be amended by private correction, or by publick admonition, if he be ready to hear his brother, or to obey the Church, why ſhould he be eſteemed as a heathen man and a publican? Si non audierit eccleſiam, is the condition of uſing the keyes; if he will not hear the Church: ſo it is in the Charter, if being publickly convict and reprov'd by the Biſhop, he will not be humbled, but remains incorrigible and perſeveres in his ſin, then he is to be excommunicated and ſmitten with the anathema. Like to this is that of Chryſippus, τροπὴν τὰ μὲν ὅλως ἀποκεκινῆσθαι, τὰ δὲ μικρὰς ὑπεκφυγὰς τυγχάνειν· τὰ δὲ ὅτι μᾶλλον, τὰ δὲ ὅλως διαλύσεως ἀξιοῦσθαι. Some things are to be turned from, with our head a little aſide; and from ſome things we muſt run away. Some things are more earneſtly to be avoided; and from others we muſt be parted for ever. So S. Gregory in the place above cited. Spirituali gladio ſuperbi & contumaces necantur dum de Eccleſia ejiciuntur, ſo S. Cyprian, The proud and the contumacious are ſlain by the ſpiritual ſword when they are thrown out of the Church. Inobediens truncatur, is S. Hierom's expreſſion, He that is rebellious or diſobedient to the diſcipline and correction of the Church, he is to be cut off.

8. Now all theſe muſt be joyned together. If the fact be not notorious or prov'd, a man muſt not be ſo ſeverely ſmitten we know not why. And if the fact be evident, yet unleſs it be great, it deſerves not the biggeſt puniſhment. For the judge is cruel, and not juſt, that puts a man to death with torments for ſpitting in his parlour: and the judgment of the Church being nothing elſe but an effective and terrible declaration of the judgment of God, muſt not be exterminating and final for things of little concernment, but according to the wiſedome which we ſee, and the mercy which we hope for. And after all, if it be evident and great, yet the laſt remedy muſt not be us'd at firſt; and a man will not have his arm cut off for a felon upon his finger, or the gout in his wriſt, or an ulcer that can by any other means be cur'd. But when in a great peſtilence and danger of infection there is no other remedy; when the fire rages deſperately, and can by no other means be ſtopp'd; then pull the houſe down, and ſeparate the infected from the city; he is fit for nothing but charnel-houſes, and the ſociety of the dead.

9. 4. This caution Gerſon inſtances in pecuniary matters. For (ſaith he) not every contumacy againſt the orders of Courts Eccleſiaſtical is to be puniſh'd with this death. If it be in matters of faith or manners, then the caſe is competent: but when it is a queſtion of money and fees, beſides that the caſe is full of envy and reproach, apt for ſcandal and to bring contempt upon the Church, the Church hath no direct power in it; and if it have by the aide of the civil power, then for that a civil coercion muſt be us'd. It is certainly unlawful to excommunicate any man for not paying the fees of Courts; for a contumacy there is an offence againſt the civil power, and he hath a ſword of his own to avenge that. But excommunication is a ſword to avenge the contumacy of them who ſtubbornly offend againſt the diſcipline of the Church in that wherein Chriſt hath given her authority, and that is in the matters of ſalvation and damnation immediate, in ſuch things where there is no feculur intereſt, where there there can be no diſpute, where the offender does not ſin by conſequence and interpretation, but directly and without excuſe. But let it be conſidered how great a reproach it is to eccleſiaſtical diſcipline if it be made to miniſter to the covetouſneſs or to the needs of Proctors and Advocates; and if the Church ſhall puniſh more cruelly then civil Courts for equal offences: and becauſe ſhe hath but one thing to ſtrike withall, if ſhe upon all occaſion ſmites with her ſword, it will either kill too many, or hurt and affright none at all.

10. 5. Spiritual cenſures muſt not be inflicted for temporal cauſes, in queſtions of right and ſecular concernment, for which the civil ſword is ſharp enough and proper. In the Church of Rome it hath been very uſual to uſe excommunications for the diſcovery of theſts, or the manifeſtation of ſecret actions. Divers examples of which are in the Decretals and later Canons of the Church; but not till the Church had been extremely corrupted both in Doctrine and Manners. But this advice is the ſame almoſt with the former, and relies upon the ſame reaſon. But who pleaſe to ſee more of it may ſee it in Gerſon de vita ſpirit. anim. lect. 4. Corol. 7. & ſerm. in Concil. Rhemenſ. partit. 2. conſid. 2. proviſ. 2.

11. As a Corollary to theſe advices, I am to adde one thing that is of great uſe and conſideration, and that is, That when a law is made that who ever ſhall commit ſuch a fact ſhall be ipſo facto excommunicate, it muſt never be underſtood of the greater and proper excommunication; for if it be, it is unlawful and it is ridiculous. For the abſciſſion from the Church is not to be us'd but after all other remedies: when the crime is delated or notorious, and the perſon called, when he hath been admoniſhed and reprov'd, and called to repentance, if after all he refuſes and rebels, then he is to be cut off, elſe not: and therefore no man is ipſo facto cut off. The offence alone deſerves it juſt as it deſerves damnation: but becauſe God is pleas'd graciouſly to call a ſinner to repentance, and cuts him not off till he hath refus'd his gentleneſs and forbearance, the Church muſt doe ſo too, following the Oeconomy of God; for if the Church kills on earth, and God ſaves in heaven, it is clear ſhe hath not rightly us'd her power, and therefore muſt not kill at the firſt daſh.

12. If therefore it be inquired whether all ſuch ſentences in law which declare a man to be in certain caſes ipſo facto excommunicate be unlawful, the Arch-Bp. of Spalato, who is fierce againſt them, anſwers affirmatively and confidently, and diſputes well againſt them: but his reaſons are overvalued by him and are not demonſtrative; for they all rely upon this propoſition, That no man can be tied to be executioner of any ſentence againſt himſelf, which I have proved to be falſe*. * What then doe ſuch ſentences effect more then others which are comminatory, and threaten the ſentence onely to be inflicted by the Judge if the crime be delated and prov'd? Gerſon ſaith he learn'd thus to anſwer from his Maſter, That the Judge in ſuch caſes, when the fact is prov'd or confeſs'd, may paſs to ſentence without any further Judicial proceſs; which in other caſes he cannot doe. But Gerſon and his Maſter would fain have been at a new thing, but they could not hit it right. For whether any ſuch thing was effected or no, or whether any more was intended, is not a matter of conſcience; for this whole proceeding is not the miniſtery of the keyes, but wholly a humane invention, done with great reaſon, and is of prudent conduct, and warranted by precedents in Scripture: and ſince in thoſe places where many ſuch laws are made and us'd it is certain that the law-givers intend more, and more is practis'd, it is not true that Gerſon's Maſter told him, that theſe laws produc'd nothing but a power for the Judge to proceed ſummarily. And therefore he neither anſwered right in the point of law, nor in the caſe of Conſcience; & yet he ſaid well, that ſuch ſentences of excommunication doe not oblige others to abſtain from the ſociety of the excommunicate. It is true, but not for his, or for the reaſons of the learned Arch-Bp. of Spalato; but for this reaſon, becauſe theſe ſentences doe not intend to involve the offender in the greater excommunication, which is not to be inflicted but upon him that hath ſinn'd grievouſly, and after admonition refuſes to amend. For if the greater excommunication were intended, the laws were unlawful, and the ſentence unjuſt. For a crime in manners is like an errour in faith: this without pertinacy is not hereſy, and that without contumacy does not deſerve excommunication. But what then?

Lib. 5. de Rep. Eccleſ. cap. 9. n. 23, 24.

13. Therefore all thoſe laws which inflict the ſentence of excommunication ipſo facto are to be underſtood of the leſſer excommunication, and they mean thus much onely, That the Church declares that all ſuch criminals are obliged to confeſſe their ſin, to abſtain from the Communion till they have truly repented, to ſubmit themſelves to the judgement of their ſpiritual guide, to receive diſcipline at his hand, and manners of emendation; and in this ſenſe the laws are pious and reaſonable, uſefull and of great effect: but how much the conſcience of the criminal is by them oblig'd is a ſecret of which we know nothing; but this we know, that where ſuch laws are us'd and underſtood, without ſuch ſubmiſſion and amends, a man that deſires to be good can have no peace of conſcience.

14. The like is to be ſaid of thoſe ancient Canons of Councils which for light cauſes impoſe and decree the ſentence of excommunication. Thus the fourth Council of Carthage decrees him to be excommunicate qui ſacerdote verbum faciente in Eccleſia egreſſus de auditorio fuerit, who ſhall goe out of the Church before the Sermon be ended. Very many of the ſame nature might be produc'd, but they all mean the ſame thing; that he that is delinquent in the inſtance when he is delated and convict ſhall be ſeparate a while from the Communion, (for that was the Diſcipline of thoſe times) and thruſt into the place of publick penitents.

Rule X.

It is not lawfull to communicate with thoſe whom the Church hath by a juſt ſentence excommunicated.

1. That is, all prohibited Communion is unlawful: as if they be driven onely from holy offices, then we muſt not admit ſuch perſons to our aſſemblies; if a civil entercourſe be prohibited, that the Criminal by ſhame might be brought to repentance, then that alſo muſt be denied him: for if he

he be bound by the censure of the Church, then we also who are the relatives of that coercion are tied to doe our duty to the Church.

2. To which purpose there is an excellent discourse in S. Cyprian, Wherefore (saith he) although there be some of our collegues that think it fit to neglect the Divine discipline, and doe rashly communicate with Basilides and Martialis, this thing ought not to disturb our faith; since the Holy Ghost in the Psalms threatens such persons, saying, Thou hast hated discipline and cast my words behind thee: if thou sawest a thief thou didst goe with him, and wert partaker with the adulterers. He shewes that they were consorts and partakers of other mens sins who were joyned with the delinquents. But this thing also the Apostle Paul writes, saying, They are whisperers, backbiters, haters of God.... who knowing the judgement of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not onely doe the same, but have pleasure in them that doe them. For (saith he) they that doe such things are worthy of death. He manifests and proves that they are worthy of death and shall come to punishment, not onely that doe evil, but they who consent to them that doe evil; who whilest by an unlawfull communication they are mingled with evil sinners, and that will not repent, are polluted with the contact of the guilty, and because they are joyned in crimes, they are not separated in punishment. lib. 1. Ep. 4. Rom. 1. 29, 30, 31.

3. The Church having so good warrant from Scripture proceeded to adde Ecclesiastical penalties to those that would not verify her Sentences of just excommunications. For when some had got a trick to meet in houses and pray in Conventicles, because they were forbidden, or did voluntarily refuse to enter into Churches, the Council of Antioch took notice of it, and forbad all such communions and assemblies and entercourses under the pain of excommunication. But this was decreed by the Canons commonly called Apostolical, Si quis cum excommunicato saltem in domo simul oraverit, iste communione privetur, He that prayes with an excommunicate person so much as privately in a house, let him be depriv'd of the Communion. The same we find often in the Ancient Epistles of the Popes; in the [a] second and in the [b] fourth Council of Carthage, in the first Council of [c] Toledo, and in the Synod at [d] Auxerre in France, in the first Council of [e] Bracara, in the Council of [f] Touraine, and the Council of [g] Verne. 4. But this is to be understood with one caution, and to be reduc'd to practice by another. 1. Although the Church excommunicates them that communicate with excommunicates, yet it is alwayes to be understood that the partners are onely smitten with a lesser excommunication, and oblig'd onely externally, not internally. For there may be many cases very favourable in which an innocent person may innocently communicate with a heathen and a publican: and therefore in such cases in which a man does not take part against, or directly or by intention despise the Church, or give countenance, strength or increment to the sin of the excommunicate, but with simplicity pursues other lawfull purposes, and designs nothing of these, he is onely tied to give satisfaction to the Church; but is not guilty before God. For the places of Scripture quoted by S. Cyprian above-mention'd are onely spoken of such persons who by their society approve, and in their hearts doe consent to such crimes. But every man that goes along with them in their journey or in their Merchandise, does not goe along with them in their crime; and yet if they be forbidden to goe along the road with with them, and yet will doe it, they may juſtly be preſum'd to goe along in their conſent and approbation: and therefore the Church does well to forbid ſuch to come to her communions till ſhe be ſatisfied, that is, till the contrary does appear, or amends be made. But becauſe in many caſes the contrary can be made to appear, and in more caſes the contrary is true, whether it can be made to appear or no, therefore in ſuch caſes it muſt be underſtood, that the companion of the excommunicate is onely bound in the face of the Church by ſuch cenſures, and not in the Court of heaven. And to this accords that of S. Leo, Certainly when any ſuch cauſe does happen, that for the hainouſneſſe of ſome crime committed any one is juſtly depriv'd of the Communion, he alone ought to be puniſh'd who is involv'd in the guilt; nec particeps debet eſſe ſupplicii qui conſors non docetur fuiſſe commiſſi, neither is he to partake of the puniſhment that was not a conſort of the fact.

5. 2. This rule is to be reduc'd to practice with this caution, That the Church intends not to forbid any ſuch entercourſe or communion to which we ſtand preoblig'd by the law of Nature, or any law of God, or of the Civil ſupreme power, from which the Church cannot abſolve us. The ſentence of excommunication does not enjoyn a ſon not to help his aged Father, nor the Phyſician to give him phyſic in his ſickneſſe, nor the tenants to pay their rent, and talk with their land-lord about his and their neceſſities, nor the feudatary to pay homage to his lord: to prohibite Natural or Civil duties the Eccleſiaſtical power hath nothing to doe. If the Civil power hath forbidden a civil duty, he may, and then the ſubject is civilly bound in all things but where God hath commanded a duty. For even the King cannot command a wife not to pay her duty to her husband, nor a child to his mother. To theſe they are bound by God, though they die for it; and if the Prince be angry, yet God is well pleaſed.

6. For although the ſupreme power can forbid even an action that is of it ſelf good and pious, and we are in the proper circumſtances bound to obey him, and in this caſe alſo obedience is better then ſacrifice; yet when the piety is neceſſary, and not under choice and counſell, but under a Commandement, the King and the Biſhop ſingly or conjunctly have no power to forbid it.

Ζῇ τοῦτο, κοὐδεὶς οἶδεν ὅθ' ὅτι φάνη, for theſe are things that are not of to day or yeſterday, but of an eternal rectitude, and no man knows when they did begin. For upon this account Antigona in Sophocles defends the fact of burying her dead Brother againſt the Kings commandement, Even the Gods themſelves, that is, the great Rulers of the world, are ſubject to theſe laws. So Euripides,

In Hecuba.

Ἀλλ' οἱ θεοὶ σθένουσι, κἀ ὦ καίνων κρατῶν
Νόμος· νόμῳ γὰρ τοὺς θεοὺς ἡγούμεθα
Καὶ ζῶμεν ἄδικα κ δίκαι ὡρισμένοι.

This law rules them that rule the world: and therefore the Greek Tragedy does rarely well call theſe laws ὑπόδικας, becauſe all men and all things are under their feet. It is, as Pindar calls it, ὁ νόμος βασιλεὺς θνατῶν τε κ ἀθανάτων, a law that is the King of all things mortal and immortal. And therefore excommunications, though verified by the ſecular power, cannot forbid the neceſſary neceſſary and dutifull entercourſes of relations, or the iſſue of any duty commanded by a former obligation in the law of God.

7. But if the Church will take her meaſures from the words of her commiſſion, which as they are her onely warrant, ſo they are the beſt rule, the external effect of excommunication is this onely, that we eſteem him that refuſes to hear the Church as a heathen and a publican. If we account and uſe him ſo, it is bad enough; but then we have no warrant to uſe him worſe. And then as we eat and drink and talk and buy and ſell with heathens without ſin, why alſo not with excommunicates, this precept notwithſtanding? I ſay, this precept notwithſtanding, for it is more then an indulgence or a leave to uſe them ſo; it is a commandement: the Rulers and ſtewards of God's houſhold are tied to ſeparate refractary Criminals from the ſound part; and the people are bound to be ſeparate, for they alſo have a ſhare in this binding and looſing by way of conſent and compliance and verification, according to that of S. Auſtin, Si fratrem habes pro Ethnico & publicano, ligaſti illum in terris; ſi correxeris fratrem, ſolviſti illum in terris. The people are to bind and looſe, that is, to eſteem him that is bound as a heathen and a publican, and to aſſiſt in the correcting of him, by bringing him to repentance by the inſtrument of ſhame. But this being matter of office, and not merely of benefit, it is evident that it is a precept, and not a leave onely, a Commandement, and not an indulgence.

de verbo Domini, Homil. 15.

8. But then if we enquire to how much and to what manner of uſages it does oblige us, we ſhall be able to underſtand our duty beſt by conſidering that it is a proverbial expreſſion, or a form of execration, to ſignify impious and prophane perſons, of the vileſt reproach. Juſt as in the Old Teſtament, of what Nation ſoever he was, yet a ſtranger from the Covenant of God was called an Aramite or a Syrian; and when S. Paul ſaid that S. Timothie's Father was a Greek, the Syriac interpreter calls him an Aramite: ſo here a heathen and a publican ſignifies a wicked and a reprobate perſon; as we call cruel people Turks, and in the time of the holy warre all very vile and intolerably vitious or hated perſons were called Saracens. Harlots and Publicans Chriſt joynes together; ſo Publicans and Sinners the ſame with Heathens and Publicans. Meaning that all contumacious ſinners, that upon admonition and Eccleſiaſtical correption refuſe to repent, are to be accounted enemies and ſtrangers to the rights and promiſes of the Goſpell, enemies to the religion, and ſeparate from God, and given over to a reprobate ſenſe.

Levit. 25. 47.

Matth. 21.

9. But it cannot be inferred from hence that the ſame uſage which the Jews gave to Heathens and Publicans, we are tied to have towards excommunicates. That we muſt have no worſe is certain, but not ſuch, not ſo bad, is alſo very true; becauſe our Bleſſed Saviour did not even amongſt them approve of thoſe harſh and contemptuous uſages; μὴ συγχρῆσθαι, κολλᾶσθαι, συνεσθίειν, προσέρχεσθαι, they would not eat, nor drink, nor trade, nor come to them.

Non monſtrare vias eadem niſi ſacra colenti,
Quæſitum ad fontem ſolos deducere verpos.

They would not doe common civilities or charities to an uncircumciſed man, to a heathen. But when our Bleſſed Saviour had us'd them better, and ſo taught others to converſe with them, to doe them good and to ſave their ſouls, it will be very reaſonable to collect from hence, that Chriſt did not intend by this to enjoyn us to ſuch treatments of the excommunicates as the proud Phariſees gave to Publicans and heathens: but the manner of ſpeech was in uſe among the Jews to ſignify impious perſons and great ſinners, and ſo Excommunicates are to be accounted.

10. That therefore which remains is, that the uſage here intended is, that they ſhould be ſeparate from the communion of holy offices, from partaking in the myſteries of religion; for that was the known uſe of the words of binding and looſing among the Jews, which Chriſt us'd in giving the Church a power of excommunication. To bind ſignifies to forbid, and to looſe ſignifies to give admiſſion and leave, according to that uſual ſaying of the Jews, There was nothing bound by Ezekiel or by David but what was bound in the Law, that is, they forbad nothing elſe. So that the accounting theſe perſons ſeparate from God, and forbidding them to enter into the communions of the ſons of God in the myſteries of their religion, is all that can by any probability be inferr'd from hence, excepting what is ſuperadded from common reaſon and the laws of nature; that if beyond this there be danger of receiving hurt, the ſeparation goe further: and therefore the Apoſtles gave caution to their converts that they ſhould not ſalute or admit into their houſes falſe Apoſtles, becauſe of the imminent danger; but beyond this I find no Divine Commandement.

11. Whatſoever therefore beſides theſe things is ſuperadded by the laws of the King or the Canons of the Church is to be obeyed upon thoſe accounts, where no other duty is prejudic'd; and therefore in this there is no other rule of Conſcience, but that we firſt attend to the laws of God concerning our other duties, and then to the laws of the King in this. But in the thing it ſelf, excommunication cuts the refractary ſinner from the communion or religious entercourſe of the Church; he is not to be reckon'd as a Brother, or a relative in our religious friendſhip and union. The offices of humanity and civility are not to be denied to him; but there ought to be no dearneſſe and proximity of friendſhip: we are not to take much care of reproving him; his eares are ſhut to truth, and he cannot hear good counſel; hujus ergo deſperanda ſalus (as Cicero ſaid of the like perſons) unleſſe a new hope ariſe, we may deſpair of his ſalvation.

12. One thing more I adde, That when the Church inflicts cenſures upon thoſe who communicate with the Excommunicates, it is not upon a real belief that all ſuch perſons are guilty of the ſame crimes by ſecret approbation or conſent, but becauſe ſhe cannot tell whether they be or no; for it is a juſt legal preſumption, and hath ſome natural probability that it is ſo; and the Church is but too juſtly offended and ſcandaliz'd at ſuch communications and entercourſe. But then on all ſides there is a difference to be made, and the Church muſt not be ſo offended when he that communicates with the excommunicate apparently does not, or by that communion cannot be preſumed to partake of the principal ſin: and therefore beſides the tyranny and uſurpation and illegal proceedings of Hildebrand againſt the Emperor Henry, excommunicating him upon pretence of Simony in the matter of Inveſtitures, he did fooliſhly and unreaſonably excommunicate all them that did partake or converſe with him. For firſt the Church hath no power directly to make laws in the matter of ſecular converſation: and if it be

ſaid, by conſequence and legal preſumption the Church concludes ſuch perſons that communicate with the excommunicates to conſent or partake of the crime; that is according as the matter is, and in this caſe is extremely unreaſonable and fooliſh: for it cannot be imagined that all the ſubjects of the Emperor ſhould be partners of the bargains, or ſhould know of them, or believe any ſuch thing, or approve it, if they did know or believe it; and the communicating with their Prince as ſubjects could not infer it, with any ſeeming probability, that they were all ſimoniacs.

13. But then on the other ſide, the ſons of the Church muſt be with curioſity reſtrain'd in their communions with ſuch excommunicates, whoſe converſation does with probability involve us in the guilt and participation of the principal crime: and this is eſpecially to be obſerved in ſins about Government, and in matters of perſuaſion, that is, in matters of hereſy and ſchiſme; for their word eateth like a canker, that is, theſe crimes are infectious and ſcatter themſelves into all that converſe with them, or is very likely ſo to doe; and therefore in theſe caſes the ſubjects may be more reſtrained from entercourſe with excommunicates, and it muſt be a greater neceſſity that muſt warrant it, then may paſſe and be allowed in other caſes.

14. This is all I find neceſſary to be conſidered in the matter of Eccleſiaſtical cenſures, in order to the regulating of conſcience: which the Caſuiſts in the Roman Church have handled in great volumes, and make it commonly the one half of all their inquiries and miniſteries of Conſcience. For all the queſtions and conſiderations concerning ſuſpenſions, irregularities, interdicts, depoſitions and degradations, abſolutions of the dead and of the abſent, the forms of abſolution, reſervation of caſes, delegations and licenſes, abſolutions againſt our wills, and by others who bound us not, and upon falſe ſuggeſtions, abſolutions upon condition and reincidences, ſentences uncertain and unknown, excommunications comminatory & ipſo facto, papal and epiſcopal, common and ſpecial, principal and delegate, by regulars and ſeculars, the excommunication of Angels and Devils, of fowls and beaſts, Pagans & Jews, and thouſands of queſtions, caſes, accidents, incidents, limitations of times appendant to all theſe, which make the peace of conſcience to be as impoſſible as the conduct of it, all theſe are cut off by the ſimplicity of truth, and the plaineneſſe of Divine inſtitutions, which are few, and eaſy, and uſeful, and reaſonable; wiſe, but not perplext; ſevere, but not inſnaring. But thoſe things which are introduc'd by humane authority and rely upon ſecular intereſts, the artifices of covetous or ambitious men, and are maintain'd by force and falſe or uncertain principles, they are fit for the forum contentioſum for Courts of ſtrife, but not for the Court of Conſcience, which is troubled by any thing that deſtroys peace as certainly as by that which deſtroys innocence.

§ III. Of CANONS Eccleſiaſtical.

That which I am next to inquire of, is, concerning the more particular perſons or communities of men in whom the Eccleſiaſtical power is ſubjected, and where we are to find the records of Eccleſiaſtical laws, and from whom the obligations of Conſcience doe proceed, and in what matters their authority is competent, and their Canons obligatory. That is, to what and whoſe Eccleſiaſtical Canons the Conſcience is, and how far it is bound.

Rule XI.

The Canons of the Apoſtles which are of Order and external government doe oblige the Conſcience by being accepted in ſeveral Churches, not by their firſt eſtabliſhment.

1. THat the Canons which the Apoſtles made did oblige the Churches to whom they were fitted & directed is without all queſtion, according to
2 Cor. 2. 9. that of the Apoſtle, To this end alſo did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things. For whatſoever was their ordinary power, yet they had ſo much of extraordinary, had ſuch ſpecial commiſſions and warranties from Chriſt, had ſuch gifts and miracles of power, ſo much wiſdome, ſo much charity, and ſo intire a government, and were the onely fountains from whence the rules of the Church were to be deriv'd, that their word ought to be a law to whom it was ſent, and a precedent to them that ſhould hear of it: it was like the pattern in the Mount, to which all Churches in equal circumſtances and the ſame conjunction of affairs might conform their practices.

2. Thus we find that the Apoſtolical decree of abſtaining from blood was obſerved by more Churches then thoſe of Syria and Cilicia to which the Canon was directed; and the college of Widows or Deaconeſſes, though provided for the firſt miniſtery of the churches and relief of ancient widows, deriv'd it ſelf into the manners of the Weſtern Churches, and laſted longer then there was need. There was no hurt in it; the reverence to the perſons and dignity Apoſtolical was foundation enough to bear a greater burden: but the retention of ſuch Canons and orders was juſt like the retention of the Judicial laws in ſome commonwealths, which they did in regard to the divine wiſdome; though they in ſo doing did piouſly indeed, but yet did not imitate that wiſdome by which thoſe laws were made.

3. But becauſe it is evident that the laws of order and government were fitted to times and places and preſent neceſſities, the ſame wiſdome that ſo fitted the laws and things together, did alſo know that thoſe rules were not good when the things were changed and grew unfit for that meaſure. The Apoſtles in their firſt preachings and converſation in Jeruſalem inſtituted a cœnobitic life, and had all things in common with the believers; indeed no man was tied to it: and of the ſame nature were their Canons, Counſels and advices, and propoſitions of what was beſt. But that adviſe related to the preſent neceſſities of believers: they were likely to ſuffer perſecution, and the nation was in a little time to be deſtroyed, and therefore it was prudence to ſell their lands, and charity to divide the uſe of it. But if any man ſhall ſay that this obliges all Chriſtians, he is unreaſonable; but if they doe not, then it is certain that their laws oblige according to the ſubject matter and the changing reaſons of things, and therefore not by their their authority alone, but by their authority alſo who are judges of the reaſon of things, and can declare with obligation.

4. But yet further, The orders which the Apoſtles gave to their Churches, though they be as good now as they were then, and have equal circumſtances, yet unleſs it can appear that they by them intended to oblige all ages of the Church, although they were not free then, yet they are free now. Now this is certain, that they gave no ſuch laws but what they receiv'd in Commandement from Chriſt; and when ever they ſaid of any particular, This ſay I, not the Lord, they gave but an advice, or made a temporary order; but when they ſaid, This we have receiv'd from the Lord, it is alwaies a doctrine of faith, or a moral Commandement. So that the rules of order being neither of theſe are but topical, and limited, and tranſient; ſuch which when they are choſen by the Rulers of Churches they become Canons and meaſures of practice, but elſe not. The Apoſtle made an order in the Corinthian Church that men ſhould not pray or propheſy having their heads covered: but yet in France the preachers are covered, and doe not think they prevaricate an Apoſtolical Canon; becauſe they ſuppos'd it reach'd no further but to that Church, or at leaſt was agreeable to the manners and cuſtomes of thoſe places. S. Paul appointed that they ſhould lay aſide every firſt day of the week ſomething for the poor: but he that ſhall chuſe to doe this upon his weekly faſting-day, does as well; he does the ſame thing in another circumſtance. * S. Paul gave in order to Timothy that a Biſhop ſhould not be a novice; meaning in age, or in Chriſtianity, or both: and yet S. Timothy himſelf was but a novice, being choſen Biſhop at the age of xxv years, as the Eccleſiaſtical hiſtories report; and Theodoſius choſe Nectarius being but newly converted; and the people choſe S. Ambroſe to be Biſhop before he was baptiz'd, and the election was confirmed by Valentinian. Fabianus, Cyprian, Nicolaus, Severus, Taraſius, were all novices or new Chriſtians when they were choſen Biſhops; and yet the Church made no ſcruple of that Canon of the Apoſtles, becauſe to break it was more for the edification of the Church. And I remember that Caſſander, ſpeaking of the intolerable evils that fell upon the Church by the injunction of ſingle life to Prieſts and Biſhops, he ſaies this law ought to have been relaxed, although it had been an Apoſtolical Canon. * Thus alſo it happened in the Canon concerning the college of widows, Let not a widow be choſen under threeſcore years; and yet Juſtinian ſuffer'd one of forty years old to be choſen, and had no ſcruple, and he had no reproof: but that was no great matter; for the whole inſtitution it ſelf is now laid aſide, and other appointments are eſtabliſhed. * And which is moſt of all, that Decretal of the Apoſtles which was made in full Council, the moſt Oecumenical Council that ever was in Chriſtendome, made at the requeſt of the Churches of the Gentiles, and the inquiry of the Jews, forbidding to eat things ſtrangled, is no where obſerved in the Weſtern Churches of Chriſtendome; and S. Auſtin affirm'd that if any man in his time made a ſcruple of eating ſtrangled birds, every man did laugh at him. But of this I have given a full account *.

5. Now if thoſe Canons Apoſtolical which are recorded in Scripture, and concerning which we are ſure that they had Apoſtolical authority, be without ſcruple laid aſide in all Chriſtendome, ſome every where, ſome in ſome places, it is evident that it is the ſenſe of the whole Catholick Church, that the Canons of the Apoſtles for order and external meaſures of Government had a limited ſphere of activity, and bind not beyond their reaſon and convenience, that is, as every Church ſhall find them fitted to their own meaſures; and therefore this is much more true in ſuch things which are but pretendedly Apoſtolical, whoſe name is borrowed, whoſe ſtory is uncertain, whoſe matter is dubious, whoſe records are not authentick: and therefore whatever elſe can be pretended to be Apoſtolical, and is of this contingent nature and variable matter, is evidently ſubject to the preſent authority of every Church or Chriſtian Kingdome which is ſupreme in its own dominion.

6. But beſides the reaſonableneſſe of the thing, we ſee it practis'd in all places without diſpute or queſtion; that thoſe things which are called Canons Apoſtolical, and either were not ſo, or not certainly ſo, are yet laid aſide by thoſe Churches who pretend to believe them to be ſo. The 5th Canon of the Apoſtles in that collection which is called Apoſtolical, appoints that the firſt-fruits ſhall be ſent home to the houſes of Biſhops and Prieſts, and makes no queſtion but they divide them amongſt the Deacons and Clercs; but I think in the Church of Rome they pay no firſt-fruits, and what they doe pay, the Biſhops and Prieſts keep unto themſelves. But this is nothing. The 6th Canon commands that a Prieſt or a Deacon ſhould not under pretence of religion put away his wife: now this is ſo far from being receiv'd in the Church of Rome, that for this very Canon's ſake Baronius calls the collection apocryphal, and rejects them from being Apoſtolical. The 7th Canon forbids a Biſhop or Presbyter to have any thing to doe in ſecular affaires, under pain of depoſition. This would deſtroy much of the grandeur of the Church of Rome if it were receiv'd. And the 10th deſtroys one of their great corruptions in diſcipline and doctrine, for it is a perfect deletery of their private Maſſe; it excommunicates thoſe of the people who come to Churches and goe away before they have received the Communion, calling them diſturbers of the Church: now this at Rome would ſeem a ſtrange thing. And yet all theſe are within that number of fifty which Baronius ſayes were known to antiquity. But he that deſires more inſtances in this affaire, may conſult the Canons themſelves, amongſt which he will find very few obſerved at this day by any Church in Chriſtendome. The Church of Rome pretends to believe that the wedneſday and friday faſt were ordained by the Apoſtles; and yet the wedneſday faſt is not obſerved except by particular order and cuſtome but in very few places. * I ſhall give one inſtance more. The Apoſtles commanded the feaſt of Eaſter to be celebrated upon the Sunday after the full Moon which ſhould happen after the vernal Æquinox: So the Weſtern Churches ſaid. The Eaſtern pretended another Canon from S. John to celebrate it after the manner of the Jewes: and though they were confident and zealous for that obſervation upon the Apoſtolical warrant; yet the Weſtern Biſhops at firſt, and afterwards the whole Church did force the Eaſterlings to change that rule which they and their forefathers had avowed to all the world to have received from S. John; and it is obſervable that this was done upon the deſignes of peace and unity, not upon any pretence that S. John had never ſo given it in order to the Aſian Churches.

Rule

RULE XII.

All thoſe Rituals which were taught to the Church by the Apoſtles concerning miniſteries, which were of Divine inſtitution, doe oblige all Chriſtendome to their obſervation.

1. INſtance in the Holy Sacrament firſt of all: concerning which the Apoſtles delivered to the Churches the eſſential manner of celebration, that is, the way of doing it according to Chriſts commandement: for the words themſelves being large and indefinite were ſpoken indeed onely to the Apoſtles, but yet they were repreſentatives of all the whole Eccleſiaſtical order in ſome things, and of the whole Chriſtian Church in other, and therefore what parts of duty and power and office did belong to each the Apoſtles muſt teach the Church, or ſhe could have no way of knowing without particular revelation.

2. Thus the Apoſtles taught the Biſhops and Prieſts to conſecrate the Symbols of bread and wine before they did communicate; not onely becauſe by Chriſts example we were taught to give thanks before we eat, but becauſe the Apoſtles knew that the Symbols were conſecrated to a myſtery. And this was done from the beginning, and in all Churches and in all ages of the Church; by which we can conclude firmly in this Rule, that the Apoſtles did give a Canon or rule to the Churches to be obſerved always, and that the Church did never believe ſhe had authority or reaſon to recede from it. For in thoſe rites which are Miniſteries of grace no man muſt interpoſe any thing that can alter any part of the inſtitution, or make a change or variety in that which is of Divine appointment. For the effect in theſe things depends wholly upon the will of God, and we have nothing to diſcourſe or argue; for we know nothing but the inſtitution, nothing of the reaſon of the thing: and therefore we muſt in theſe caſes with ſimplicity and obedience apply our ſelves to practice as we have received, for we have nothing elſe to guide us: memory and obedience, not diſcourſe and argument, are here in ſeaſon.

3. And in this we have an evident and apparent practice of the Church handed to us by all hands that touch theſe myſteries: as who pleaſe may ſee in [a] Juſtin Martyr, [b] Irenæus, [c] Origen, [d] S. Cyril of Jeruſalem, and of [e] Alexandria, [f] S. Baſil, S. Gregory Nyſſen de vita Moyſi, [g] Optatus Milevitanus, [h] S. Chryſoſtom, [i] S. Ambroſe, [k] S. Hierom, [l] S. Auſtin, [m] Theodoret, [n] Gregorius Emiſſenus, [o] Gregory the Great, [p] Damaſcen, [q] Remigius, [r] Paſchaſius and divers others, & abſolutely in all the liturgies that ever were us'd in the Church: ſo that the derivation of this Canon from the Apoſtles is as evident as the obedience to it was univerſal.

4. But where the Apoſtles did not interpoſe, there the Churches have their liberty; and in thoſe things alſo which evidently were no part of the appointed liturgy or miniſtration, in thoſe things though it be certain the Apoſtles did give rules of order and decency, yet becauſe order is as variable as the Tactics of an army, and decency is a relative terme, and hath a tranſient and changeable ſenſe, in all theſe things there is no preſcription to the Church, though we did know what the Churches Apoſtolical did practiſe, for they did it with liberty: and therefore we are not bound; the Churches are as free as ever; though the ſingle perſons in the Churches can be bound, yet the Churches always have liberty.

5. And indeed that is the beſt ſigne that the Apoſtles gave no perpetual order in any inſtance, and that it is no part of the inſtitution or the miniſtery of grace, when the Ancient Churches, who were zealous for the honour Apoſtolical, and accounted every thing excellent that deriv'd from them, did differ in their practices. Thus the Greek and Latine Churches did always differ in the Sacramental bread, the Latins conſecrating in unleavened bread which the Greeks refuſe: if either one or other had been neceſſary they ſhould have been clearly taught it, and if they had, there is no reaſon to believe but they would have kept the depoſitum, there being no temptation to the contrary, and no difficulty in the thing, and no great labour to preſerve; the daily uſe of the Church would have had in it no variety; for no traditions are ſurer, or eaſier preſerved then the λειτουργικὰ the matters of liturgy and the Rituals Apoſtolical: which when we find that they were unitedly and conſentingly kept by the Ancient Churches, we may well ſuppoſe the Apoſtles to be the firſt principle of derivation, and that the thing it ſelf was neceſſary and a part of the religion; but if at firſt they varied, they had no common principle, and therefore they had no neceſſity.

6. Thus that the Biſhop or Prieſt ſhould be the onely Miniſter of conſecration is an Apoſtolical Canon or Rule, ad quorum preces Chriſti corpus ſanguisque conficitur, ſaith S. Hierom: and the continuation and deſcent of this particular from the manners of the Apoſtolical miniſtration is evident in the fore-alleged teſtimonies. Now becauſe by this conſtant derivation we can purſue the track up to the Apoſtles, and from their practice and teaching of it we can underſtand it to be the will of God, and becauſe this whole miniſtery is an act of grace and depends onely upon the will of God, we perceive the thing to be neceſſary and unalterable, we muſt look for grace in the miniſteries of grace ſo as God hath appointed them; and therefore in theſe things the Churches of the ſucceeding ages have no authority, no liberty, no variety. * That women do communicate in the holy myſteries is not ſet down in the inſtitution: but the Church derives her warranty from the interpretation and order and practice Apoſtolical: the Church was taught by the Apoſtles to admit them, and ſhe always did it: and theſe things amongſt ſober and modeſt men doe ſufficiently prove one another. They always did it, and therefore they were taught it by the Apoſtles: and they were taught to doe ſo by the Apoſtles, and therefore they were oblig'd to doe it. And now in matters of ſalvation and common duty, the rule of the Church is, Scriptura loquens in Maſculino procedit etiam in fœminino. There is no difference in ſexes, and before God it is now as it ſhall be in the reſurrection, There is neither male nor female with him, but all alike.

That

7. That the Symbols were to be conſecrated, and who were to conſecrate, and who were to receive, were of great neceſſity to be taught and determin'd: and in all this we ſee unity and neceſſity, authority and obedience; but when we goe beyond this and the plain & neceſſary & conſtituent parts of the inſtitution we find variety and uncertainty. That bread is to be us'd is plain: but whether leavened or unleavened neither Chriſt nor his Apoſtles have left in charge or memory. That wine is to be bleſs'd is certain: but whether mingled with water or not mingled, we are not determined by any authority. That the bread and wine are to be bleſs'd we are ſure: but in what form of words, and whether by the myſtic prayer, or the words of inſtitution, is not deriv'd to us by ſufficient tradition. That the Lords Supper is ſacredly and with reverence to be receiv'd is taught us by the Apoſtles: but whether this reverence ought to be expreſs'd by taking it virgine ſalivâ, faſting, or not faſting, the Apoſtles left the Churches to their choice. In thoſe things which did cooperate immediately to the grace of the Sacrament, in thoſe we were not to invent any thing, and in thoſe we were tied to obey what was deliver'd us.

8. And the ſame is the caſe in Baptiſme, in which that which was neceſſary is that the perſon be baptized in water, and in the name of the Father, Son and holy Ghoſt: but whether the Prieſt ſhall ſay, Ego te baptizo, as the Latins doe, or Baptizetur ſervus Chriſti, as the Greeks doe, is indifferent: and if the Apoſtles had us'd any other little variety of words, yet if there was not in the firſt Churches an unity and univerſality of practice, it is certain the Apoſtles did not by their act or Canon intend to oblige all Chriſtendome; but themſelves did it with liberty, and therefore ſo might the Churches after them.

9. For, excepting thoſe things which the Apoſtles received from Chriſt in which they were miniſters to all ages, once for all conveying the mind of Chriſt to the generations to come, in all other things they were but ordinary Miniſters, to govern the Churches in their own times, and left all that ordinary power to their ſucceſſors, with a power to rule their Churches, ſuch as they had, and therefore what ever they conveyed as from Chriſt, a part of his doctrine or any thing of his appointment, this was to bind for ever; for Chriſt onely is our law-giver, and what he ſaid, was to laſt for ever: in all things which he ſaid not, the Apoſtles could not be law-givers, they had no ſuch authority; and therefore whatſoever they order'd by their own wiſdome, was to abide as long as the reaſon did abide; but ſtill with the ſame liberty with which they appointed it; for of all men in the world they would leaſt put a ſnare upon the Diſciples, or tie fetters upon Chriſtian liberty. But in Divine Commandements, and in what were the appointed miniſteries of grace, they were but the mouth of Chriſt and Miniſters of his holy ſpirit; and in thoſe things, what they told to the Churches is our law for ever.

10. Of the ſame nature is the diſtinction of Biſhops from Presbyters, and the government of the Church by them: for this being done in the Apoſtles times, and immediately receiv'd by all Churches, who every where and ever ſince were governed by Biſhops and by Presbyters under them, it is not onely ſtill to be retain'd unalterably, and is one of thoſe great things in which the preſent Churches have no liberty or authority to make a change, but it is to be concluded to be a law of Christ, which the Apostles did convey with an intent to oblige all Christendome; not onely becauſe the Apoſtles could not in things indifferent oblige or make a law to ſucceeding ages, for they had no authority and could not govern Churches after they were dead, and it was againſt the laws of Chriſt that the commandements of men ſhould be taught for doctrines, and it is againſt Chriſtian liberty, that a laſting neceſſity ſhould by man be put upon any thing, and the ſucceeding Churches would be ſtreightned in the liberty which Chriſt had given them, and in which they were bound to ſtand faſt; not onely all this, but this was a Miniſtery of grace, the Biſhops were for ever appointed to give a gift by the laying on of hands: and therefore here was an appointment by Chriſt and by Chriſts ſpirit; for there is not in the world a greater preſumption then that any ſhould think to convey a gift of God, unleſſe by God he be appointed to doe it. Here then could be no variety, and no liberty: this Canon Apoſtolical is of eternal obligation, and the Churches cannot otherwiſe be continued.

11. But then in the appendages and annexes of this, the Apoſtles did doe their miniſteries; they did invocate the holy Spirit upon thoſe which were to be ordained: but in theſe they had no commandement what form to uſe. Impoſition of hands and prayer were the neceſſary and appointed miniſtery; for in theſe things the Churches did not vary, but took them from the Apoſtles as the appointed liturgy: but with what forms of words, and with the tradition of what inſtruments, is left to the choice and Oeconomy of every Church.

Rule XIII.

In the Rules which the Apoſtles gave to their Churches in things indifferent, the Church hath a liberty; but it is not to be uſed but for great reaſon and great neceſſity, and for the edification of the people committed to their charge.

1. THe reaſons of this Rule are theſe two. Firſt, becauſe it is a great regard to the honour'd names of the Apoſtles, the pillars and foundations of the Church, that there be not an eaſy change made of what they in wiſedome had determin'd to be the meaſures of order and decency.* But this is to be underſtood in ſuch things which change not, and whoſe nature although it be not of moral obligation, yet the reaſon that bound it firſt may be perpetual, and ſuch which cannot be ſucceeded to, and cannot be excelled. Thus the keeping of the Lords day, beſides all the other reaſons deriv'd from the nature of the thing, yet even for this alone, becauſe it deriv'd from the Apoſtles, is to remain ſo for ever: becauſe the reaſon being at firſt competent for which they kept their aſſemblies, and gave that day to religion, and the ſame reaſon remaining for ever, and another cannot come in place of it, and a greater there cannot be, although the Churches are are not in Conſcience directly bound, yet collaterally and indirectly they are. For it would be a plain contempt of the perſons and wiſedome of the Apoſtles, beſides the diſreſpect to the myſtery it ſelf, to change the Sunday Feſtival into any other day; for ſince there can be no reaſon for ſo doing, and a greater bleſſing then Chriſts Reſurrection we are not to expect, and a greater reaſon for the keeping of a day then a thanksgiving for the greateſt bleſſing there cannot be (except a Divine commandement) the onely reaſon why any Church ſhould change it muſt relate to the Apoſtles, and therefore be no leſſe then a contempt of their perſons and a leſſening of their eminence, and could not be leſſe then an intolerable ſcandal.

2. The other reaſon is, becauſe the Apoſtles even in things where they had no Divine Commandement, yet had the Spirit of God, * the ſpirit of wiſdome and government; and therefore where evidently there is not an inconvenience, or an uſeleſneſſe, or an unreaſonableneſſe by reaſon of the change of times and circumſtances, the Churches are on the ſurer ſide when they follow the practice and precedents of the Apoſtles, and have the confidences of a reaſonable hope that ſuch appointments are pleaſing to Chriſt, ſince it is not unlikely that they were deriv'd from the Spirit of Chriſt. But in theſe caſes the practices and Canons Apoſtolical muſt be evident and prov'd: For ſince in theſe particulars of leſſer concernment, we doe but preſume and conjecture that the Apoſtles were taught by the Spirit immediately; if it be but a conjecture alſo that the Apoſtles did teach or practiſe it, we have two lame feet, and cannot tread ſecurely.

* 1 Cor. 7. 40.

3. I ſhall give one inſtance in this particular, but it will be of great uſe, not onely for the verification of this explication of the Rule, but in order to conſcience, becauſe it is in ſome Churches tied with ſtraight cords, and pretended to be very neceſſary, and of great obligation upon this ſtock, becauſe it was appointed by the Apoſtles: and it is the obſervation of Lent and the weekly faſting-days.

Of the Lent-faſt, and the weekly faſting-days.

4. The faſt of Lent of all that are not pretends the moſt fairly to have been an Apoſtolical tradition; and if it could prove ſo it would with much probability pretend to have been impoſed with a perpetual obligation.

5. Of the firſt we have many teſtimonies from the Ancient Fathers. So S. Hierom, Nos unam quadrageſimam ſecundum traditionem Apoſtolorum toto anno, tempore nobis congruo jejunamus. So S. Leo, Quod ergo in omni tempore unumquemque convenit facere Chriſtianum, id nunc ſollicitius eſt & devotius exequendum, ut Apoſtolica inſtitutio quadraginta dierum jejuniis impleatur. And again, A Sanctis Apoſtolis per doctrinam ſpiritus ſancti majora ſunt inſtituta jejunia, ut per commune conſortium crucis Chriſti, nos etiam aliquid in eo quod propter nos geſſit ageremus. To theſe agrees Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis, Quadrageſima in univerſo orbe inſtitutione Apoſtolicâ obſervatur circa confinium Dominicæ paſſionis. To which Dorotheus a Greek Abbat does conſent, ſave onely that he ſayes more; for he affirms that the Apoſtles did conſecrate the ſeven quadrageſimal weeks of faſting. So that here here we have four Ancient Authors giving teſtimony that the Lent-faſt was a tradition or an appointment Apoſtolical.

6. Now if it came from the Apoſtles by way of precedent or authority, the thing it ſelf hath in its nature or appendage ſome advantages by which with much reaſonableneſſe we may believe it was intended to bind all ages of the Catholick Church. Becauſe the uſefulneſſe of it will be as much now as ever it was; and it being a ſpecification of the duty of faſting, which will never be out of ſeaſon, and having always the ſame common cauſe, that is the precedent of Moſes and Elias, and the example of our Bleſſed Saviour himſelf, the duty not being relative to time or place, and the reaſon of the inſtitution being of perpetual regard, and the uſefulneſſe very great, and the thing pious and holy, and adde to theſe, all Churches ancient and modern having received it till now of late, it will be very like a duty incumbent upon all Churches and all ages to obſerve this faſt which the Apoſtles with ſo much reaſon did preſcribe.

7. And in purſuance of this we find ſome excellent perſons in the Ancient Churches ſaying expreſſely that this inſtitution is warranted to us from Chriſt. So S. Auſtin, The Careſme or Lent-faſt hath an authority of a Faſt both in the Old Teſtament from the faſt of Moſes and Elias, and out of the Goſpel (becauſe ſo many dayes the Lord faſted) demonſtrating that the Goſpel does not differ from the law: and again, By that number of fourty in which Moſes and Elias and our Lord himſelf did faſt, was ſignified unto us that we muſt abſtain from ſecular delights. The ſame thing alſo is affirmed by S. Hierom, Moſes and Elias in their forty days hunger were filled with the converſation of God: and our Lord himſelf faſted ſo many days in the wilderneſſe that he might leave to us the ſolemn days of faſting; or, as he ſays in another place, hæreditatem nobis jejunii derelinquens, ad eſum corporis ſui ſub hoc numero animas noſtras præparat, leaving to us the inheritance of faſting, under this number he prepares our ſouls for the eating of his body. So Iſidore, The firſt is the faſt of Lent, which began from the faſt of Moſes and Helias and of our Bleſſed Lord, who faſted ſo many days.

8. Now although theſe Fathers intend not to ſay that our Lord did command this faſt, but gave us a precedent and an example to imitate as well as we can; he was the occaſion why the Church took that time, and perform'd that ſeverity: yet the example of our Bleſſed Lord cannot be neglected without ſin: Non enim, Fratres, leve peccatum eſt indictã Quadrageſimam à Domino non jejunare, & jejunia conſecrata ventris voracitate diſſolvere, &c. ſaid the Author of the 25th ſermon in the works of S. Ambroſe. It is not a light ſin not to keep the Lenten-faſt which was indicted by our Lord, and with the greedineſſe of the belly to diſſolve theſe conſecrated faſting-days. For what does he deſerve that breaks the faſt which Chriſt indicted? If therefore thou wilt be a Chriſtian thou muſt doe as Chriſt did. He that had no ſin faſted forty days: and wilt not thou who haſt ſinned keep the Lent-faſt? He (I ſay) that had no ſin yet faſted for our ſins: Think therefore in thy Conſcience what a kind of Chriſtian thou art, when Chriſt faſting for thee thou wilt eat thy dinner. This Author whoever he was (for it was not S. Ambroſe) ſuppos'd that the example of Chriſt was a ſufficient indiction of the Quadrageſimal faſt. But it is to be obſerved that it is not unuſual with Ancient writers to affirm a thing to be by Divine right, if there there be in Scripture but an authentic precedent and example of it. Thus when the Canon law affirms in 6. de cenſibus, cap. Quanquam, That the Churches & Church-men are free from ſecular exactions not onely by humane but alſo by Divine right: which ſaying becauſe to our eares it muſt needs ſeem extremely harſh, the Gloſſe upon the place does ſoften it, by referring it to the fact of Joſeph to the Egyptian Prieſts, & of Artaxerxes to the Iſraelites. So that it is not intended that things of this nature be Divine precepts properly ſo called; but ſuch which the Church for decent regard takes up in imitation of ſo great examples: and indeed they are ſuch, which when the Church hath upon ſuch accounts taken up, cannot be omitted without ſin, if they be omitted without cauſe: for then they have authority when they are commanded by our ſuperiors. But the example of our Bleſſed Lord in ſuch extraordinaries as theſe is but a very weak argument to introduce an inſtitution, ordinary and perpetual, troubleſome and enſnaring. But of this that we may be rid at once, I will ſet down the judgement of S. Auſtin and of S. Chryſoſtom. In what ſhall we imitate the ways of Chriſt? Shall it be in that magnificence in which God was in the fleſh? Or does he exhort us to this, or exact of us to doe miracles ſuch as he did? He did not ſay, Ye ſhall not be my diſciples unleſſe ye walk upon the ſea, or unleſſe ye raiſe to life him that hath been dead four days, or unleſſe ye open the eyes of one that was born blind. What therefore does he mean, ſaying, Ye muſt enter by the doore; Learn of me, becauſe I am meek and humble in heart? that's entring in by the door, that's the imitation of Chriſt that is requir'd of us. But S. Chryſoſtom ſays the ſame thing, and more pertinently and applied to this matter of faſting: He doth not ſay his faſt is to be imitated, although he might propound thoſe fourty days of his: But, Learn of me, for I am meek and humble in heart: yea rather contrarily, when he ſent the Apoſtles to preach the Goſpel, he did not ſay, Faſt, but, Eat whatſoever is ſet before you. Now this argument of our Bleſſed Lord's example being remov'd, and it being certain that from his example to conclude a Divine precept in ſuch extraordinaries and external actions is the worſt argument of the world, and it being expreſſely affirmed by S. Chryſoſtom that Chriſt did not in his faſting propound himſelf as imitable by us, we may now return to the firſt conſideration and pretence, and inquire whether or no the faſt of Lent was a tradition and Canon Apoſtolical: that is, not onely whether this did deſcend from their practice (for if Chriſts example did not oblige us in this, much leſſe could that of the Apoſtles;) but alſo whether the Apoſtles did deliver this as a rule for the practice of the Churches in all deſcending ages.

The Lent-faſt is not a tradition or Canon Apoſtolical.

§. This firſt appears in that we find it affirm'd often in Antiquity that the faſts of the Church were arbitrary and choſen, without neceſſity and impoſition from any authority. Which thing was obſerved by Socrates, ſpeaking of the Lent-faſt. Becauſe no man can ſhew in any record that there was a Commandement concerning this thing, it is manifeſt that the Apoſtles did permit a free power in the ſame, leaving it to every ones mind and choice, that every one might doe what was good, without the inducement of fear or of neceſſity. For ſo we ought to faſt and to abſtain (ſaith Proſper) that we may not ſubmit our ſouls to a neceſſity of faſting and abſtaining, that we may not doe a voluntary thing by an involuntary devotion. But of this we have elder elder teſtimony: for when Tertullian ſcrap'd together all that he could to juſtify the Lents of Montanus, the new faſts which he for diſcipline would have had the Churches for ever to obſerve, he lay'd hold upon the practice of the Catholics to verify Montanus his impoſition, ſaying that the Catholic Biſhops did injoyn faſts ſometimes and ex aliqua ſollicitudinis Eccleſiaſticæ cauſa, upon the occaſion of ſome trouble or affliction in the Church, that is, temporary faſts, or ſolemn dayes upon ſpecial emergent accidents. He addes alſo that they kept the Paſchal faſt, the two days before Eaſter, in which the Bridegroom was taken from them: but in theſe days they did ſometimes live on bread and water, ut cuique videbatur, & hæc ex arbitrio agentes & non ex imperio; they did this not by any command, but by choice and as they pleas'd themſelves: for ſo the Catholics did ſay and believe, ſic & obſervaſſe Apoſtolos, nullum aliud imponentes jugum certorum, & in commune omnibus obeundorum jejuniorum, that the Apoſtles did faſt as every Chriſtian elſe did and ought to doe, ex arbitrio, pro temporibus & cauſis uniuſcujuſque, as every one had cauſe and opportunity and will; but they impos'd no other yoke of certain, and for ever to be obſerved faſts.

So Prudentius, expreſſely affirming that even in his time there were no laws of ſet and annual faſts: for that very thing Victor Antiochenus makes to be a difference between the Old and New Teſtament; for the faithfull in that time had faſting-days appointed by God, quæ proinde modis omnibus explere obligabantur, etiamſi alias noluiſſent, which they were bound by all means to obſerve though againſt their will; but under the Goſpel we faſt by the love of vertue, and the choice of our own will, rather then by the coaction of any law. 10. 2. This alſo appears in that we find the original of the Quadrageſimal or Lent-faſt attributed to other cauſes and beginnings then the tradition or Canon Apoſtolical. Caſſian ſayes, that as long as the perfection of the Primitive Church did remain, there was no obſervation of a Lent-faſt; for they who ſpent the whole year in abſtinence were not tied with the neceſſity of a precept or legal ſanction. But when the multitude of the believers every day cooling in their devotion did brood upon their wealth..... id tunc univerſis ſacerdotibus placuit, then it ſeem'd good to the Biſhops to recal men to the work of holineſſe by a Canonical indiction of faſts, and to give to God the tenth of their days. So that the cauſe of the inſtitution of this faſt was the univerſal declenſion of the Primitive piety: and the Authors of it were the whole conſent of Biſhops. Something like this was that of S. Chryſoſtom, who complaining of the diminution of the Primitive heats of piety, and their unworthy communicating, eſpecially at Eaſter, addes, σωμελ-

When

When the Fathers had obſerv'd the hurt that came from ſo careleſſe conventions, they meeting together appointed forty days for faſting and prayer and hearing Sermons, and holy aſſemblies. S. Auſtin does not, as Caſsian, impute it to the ſanction of the Biſhops, nor to a Council of the Fathers, as S. Chryſoſtom, but to the cuſtome of the Church. Ut quadraginta illi dies ante Paſcha obſerventur Eccleſiæ conſuetudo roboravit : Sic etiam ut octo dies Neophytorum diſtinguantur à cæteris, The cuſtome of the Church hath eſtabliſhed the obſervation of forty dayes before Eaſter, and the eight dayes after Eaſter for the Novices. Both from the ſame principle. But it was not the authority of the Apoſtles, but the cuſtome of the Church that made it into a law. In Irenæus his time there was a cuſtome of faſting about that time, for one or two dayes or more, but it was κατ' ἀπλότητα καὶ ἰδιωτισμὸν συνήθειαν a ſimple and a private cuſtome. But when it was made, it was onely for the imperfect, and the men of the world that ſpent their year in gathering money, and miſpent their time, they onely were intended in the conſtitution. This we have from S. Hierom, jejunia à viris prudentibus propter eos conſtituta fuiſſe qui magis ſæculo vacant quam Deo, Some prudent men appointed the ſolemn faſts for their ſakes who ſpent their time in the affaires of the world, more then in religion. And ſince it is conſentingly affirmed that the great end of the Lent-faſt is for preparation to the Eaſter communion, what uſe (at leaſt to this great purpoſe,) can it be of to thoſe pious perſons who communicate every fortnight, or it may be every week in the year? But it is true that the great end and miniſtery of the Lent-faſt was in order to the Eaſter communion, but it was of ſuch perſons who being admitted to publick penance upon Aſhwedneſday were reconcil'd and admitted to the communion upon Eaſter-day: which cuſtome being not in uſe, the uſe of Lent in order to the chief end to which it did miniſter is wholly loſt. It was therefore true which S. Hierom ſaid, that Lent was for the imperfect and ſecular perſons, for publick penitents and perſons convict of ſcandalous crimes, for men of the world, and not for the religious, who every moneth or week obſerve the religion of Eaſter, and live in a ſtate of perpetual preparation. Perfecti non tenentur lege jejunii, They that all the year liv'd ſtrictly were not bound to the obſervation of Lent: ſo Caſsian; and from him * Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis and † Rabanus Maurus: and the ſame thing alſo was affirmed by S. * Chryſoſtom, from whom Caſsian, who was his ſcholar, might receive it.

11. 3. Some of the Ancient and Primitive writers affirm Pope Teleſphorus to have been the firſt author of Lent-faſt about the year 136. So Euſebius in his Chronicon affirms, Quadrageſimale jejunium à Teleſphoro per hoc tempus inſtitutum ac præceptum quidam ſcribunt, Some write that Teleſphorus commanded the Quadrageſimal faſt. Scaliger believes this not to be the ſaying of Euſebius, as not being to be found in the Greek MS. copies: but however, till Scaliger's time it was in the middle ages of the Latin Church and ſo downwards believed; and it was affirmed expreſſely by * Rabanus Maurus and † Rupertus.

12. 4. The Thing and the Name was unknown in the Church in the firſt three Ages. This is very apparent in Tertullian, who making his apology for the faſting-dayes of Montanus, ſayes they are no ſuch great matter that the ψυχικοὶ the ſpiritual men (ſo he calls the Catholics) ſhould complain of them as of ſo intolerable yoke upon the Diſciples. It was but ten dayes in all; two weeks, abating Saturdays and Sundays: and Sozomen sayes these two weeks were before Easter. Now if the Catholics had known of our Lent then, of forty dayes fast, they would never have been so unreasonable to complain of the ten dayes of Montanus; and that was all he impos'd in the whole year, let the time be when it will. And yet this was more then the Catholics did; for when from their practice (as I noted before) Tertullian would fain have drawn some warranty and countenance, he sayes that the Apostles did not quite extinguish all difference of dayes; for if they did, why did the Catholics then observe Easter every year? why the fifty dayes of joy after it? why the Wednesday and Friday fast, and [good Friday or] the preparation-day? and why the Saturday fast? though indeed this ye never fast but at Easter. Here is all the solennities both of feastings and fastings which the Church then had: and therefore it is easy without much diligence to discover the weakness of those pretences which derive from more ancient record, but indeed are nothing but deceptions and interpolations. Such as is the 69th Canon Apostolical, which commands the observation of Lent to a Clergy-man under pain of deposition, to a lay-man under excommunication. But the imposture of these Canons, especially of the last 36, amongst which this is one, are abundantly acknowledged by men of all persuasions. And so is that of S. Ignatius to the Philippians, Despise not the Lent, for it contains an imitation of the conversation of our Lord. But of this Epistle the Ancients make no mention, and that it is suppositious is very fully proved by the learned and most Reverend Primate of Ardmagh, and it is so notorious as nothing can be more; for the author of this Epistle condemns that which S. Ignatius and his neighbour-Churches did, and calls him a companion of them that killed Christ, that keeps Easter after the manner of the Jews. But of this enough. But as to the thing; If the Lent fast were of Apostolical institution, it were strange there should be no mention of it in the certain writings of the three first ages; not a word of it in Justin Martyr or S. Irenæus, in Tertullian or Clemens Alexandrinus, in Clemens Romanus his genuine Epistle to the Corinthians, nor in S. Cyprian. There is indeed a little shred taken out of Origen's tenth homily on Leviticus [Habemus enim quadragesimæ dies jejuniis consecratos] we have the dayes of Lent design'd for fasting. But concerning this I can onely say that the homilies were supposed to be S. Cyril's, written in the fifth age and publish'd in his Name; but whoever be the author, he that wrote them destroys the letter of the Scripture all the way, out of his own brain, and is a man of no great authority, sayes Bellarmine: and therefore it remains certain that in the three first ages of the Church there was no mention made of the quadragesimal or forty-dayes fast in Lent, and therefore it was not deriv'd as a law or by rule from the Apostles: but so strange a thing it was that there should be any common prescript fasts, that Apollonius accus'd Montanus for it, he was διδάξας λύσεις γάμων, καὶ νηστείας νομοθετήσας, he taught the solutions of marriage, and made a law for fasting-dayes.

13. 5. The Quadragesimal fast was relative and ever in order to the Easter feast, and therefore could not be before that for whose sake it was appointed. But the feast of Easter was, and the Sunday festival was introduc'd by custome and arbitrary choice, for relaxation of labours and the memory of Christs resurrection: indeed it was at the beginning of the dissemination and prevailing of Christianity, but it was without a Divine command, or an Apostolical Canon, if we may believe Socrates. πάσχα πάσχα οἱ ἄνθρωποι... ἕκαστοι κατὰ χώρας ὡς ἐβουλήθησαν... οὐδ' ἔθους τινὸς ἐπετέλεσαν. οὐ γὰρ νόμῳ τοῦτο παρεφυλάττειν ὁ Σωτὴρ ἡμῶν οἱ Ἀπόστολοι ἡμῖν παρήγγειλαν, The feaſt of Eaſter and other feaſts, every man as they pleas'd in ſeveral places did out of a certain cuſtome celebrate the memory of the ſalutary Paſſion. For neither our Saviour nor the Apoſtles appointed this by a law. For the Apoſtles did not trouble themſelves about making laws for feaſts, ἀλλὰ βίου ὁρθοῦ καὶ τοῦ θεοσεβεῖν εἰσηγήσασθαι, but to introduce piety and a good life. The reſt was permitted to the good will of the Churches, who being ſenſible of the great benefits of Chriſts paſſion and reſurrection, would quickly introduce a cuſtome of ſuch a pious gratitude: and Nicephorus tels the ſame ſtory, and in words very like. And the thing was not long in doing; it was ſo reaſonable, ſo pious, ſo obvious, ſo ready and prepar'd, that at the very beginning all Chriſtians did it, though, as it happens, in ſeveral Churches after ſeveral manners. And ſuppoſing that theſe Greeks ſay true, yet it is no more leſſening to the ſacredneſſe of that great feaſt, that the Apoſtles did not intend to make laws concerning it, then it is to Baptiſme, that S. Paul ſayes, Chriſt ſent him not to baptize, but to preach the Goſpel; that is, though to baptize was a holy office, yet he was to attend ſomething that was greater and requir'd his diligence and preſence. But this addes ſome moments to the ſacredneſſe of this and other ſuch feaſts, that the Apoſtles left it to the piety and good will of the Churches, as knowing that the Spirit of God, which they had receiv'd to this and greater purpoſes, was more then ſufficient for the leading them into a ſpecification of their piety and gratitude upon ſuch great cauſes: and it was a very great matter that inſtantly all Churches did conſent in the duty, without any law, or common teacher, but the Spirit of God and right reaſon. The reſult of this conſideration is this, That if the Apoſtles left the celebration of Eaſter and other feaſts to the choice and piety of the Churches, it is not likely that they bound the Lent-faſt by a Canon, ſince the Lent was always acknowleged to be a preparation for Eaſter, and was never heard of before there was a Chriſtian Eaſter. But if I may have leave to interpoſe my conjecture (for it is no more) I ſuppoſe Socrates by Paſcha does not mean the day of the Reſurrection, but the day of the Paſſion; and that he intends onely to ſay that the ſolemnity of the good-Friday devotion was not appointed by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, but left to the piety and gratitude of the Church. The reaſons of my conjecture are theſe. 1. Becauſe Socrates calls it μνήμην τοῦ σωτηρίου πάθους the memorial of Chriſts paſſion; which the Eaſter Sunday was not, but of the reſurrection. 2. Becauſe we find the word Paſcha us'd by the Ancient Fathers in the ſame ſenſe; τὸ πάσχα νηστεύειν ſaid Timotheus Alexandrinus, to faſt on the Paſch: ſo ἡ νηστεία τοῦ πάσχα, S. Clement calls the good-friday faſt, the Paſchal faſt, meaning that then began the Jewiſh paſſeover, and then Chriſt our Paſſeover was offered for us. So Tertullian, Sic & die Paſchæ, quo communis & quaſi publica jejunii religio eſt, merito deponimus oſculum, &c. The day of the Paſch is a publick and a common day for the religion of faſting; which becauſe it was never true of Eaſter-day, and being always true of good-friday, he muſt mean this. 3. Becauſe it is very probable that the Eaſter feſtival was in uſe, though not commanded, in the Apoſtles time, therefore becauſe they kept the memorial of the reſurrection the firſt day in every week; and therefore Socrates could not in all likelyhood mean that day, but the Paſcha paſſionis, the Paſchal paſſion, not the Paſchal reſurrection. And then upon this account, though this fifth argument will not prevail, it is becauſe we need it not; for whatever deſtroys the premiſſes in this caſe, does eſtabliſh the Concluſion. For if by Paſcha he means the Paſchal faſt, that is, good-Friday, then he gives teſtimony, and that very conſonantly to the prime antiquity, that it was left free and undetermin'd by Chriſt and his Apoſtles: but if he ſhould mean the Eaſter feaſt, and did ſay true, yet it will follow from hence, that much more muſt the preceding faſt be left undetermin'd.

14. 6. If any man ſhould ſay that Kings are all created, as Adam was, in full ſtature and manhood by God himſelf immediately, he could beſt be confuted by the midwives and the nurſes, the School-maſters and the ſervants of the family, and by all the neighbourhood, who ſaw them born infants, who took them from their Mothers knees, who gave them ſuck, who carried them in their armes, who made them coats and taught them their letters, who obſerved their growth & chang'd their miniſteries about their perſons. The ſame is the caſe of the preſent article. He that ſayes our Lent, or forty days faſt before Eaſter, was eſtabliſhed by the Apoſtles in that full growth & ſtate we now ſee it, is perfectly confuted by the teſtimony of thoſe ages that ſaw it's infancy & childhood, & help'd to nurſe it up to it's preſent bulk.

15. For it is not to be denied but that from the very firſt ages of the Chriſtian Church of which we have any records, it was with ſacredneſſe and religion obſerved that before the feaſt of Eaſter they ſhould faſt. Τὼ ἡσεῖαν τὸ πάσχα S. Clement calls it; τὰς φαδεδομένας νησείας εἰς τὸ κοινὸν, καὶ φυλασσομένας ὑπὸ τῆς Ἐκκλησίας, ſo the Council of Gangra about the time of the Nicene Council, the faſts which were delivered in common, and obſerved by the Church; τὰς ὡρισμένας νησείας, the appointed faſts, ſo Conſtantine call'd them. But this Paſchal faſt was nothing like ours, it was not our Quadrageſimal; it was but a faſt of one or two days at firſt and in ſome places. For at firſt the Chriſtians were very ſhie of receiving any load of ordinances and burdens to their conſciences, as ſoon as ever they had entred into the liberty of Chriſtians. They did all that reaſon, and all that love would require: but if love was the parent of their obſervations, they would doe them in love, and not in neceſſity, leſt they ſhould be again intangled in a yoke of bondage. That they kept their faſts with liberty, beſides the foregoing teſtimonies, is expreſſely affirmed by Theodoret, who blaming the heretics that abſtain'd from fleſh and wine as being abominable, Eccleſia vero (ſaith he) de his nihil præcipit: neque enim horum uſum interdicit. Ideo alii quidem permiſſis voluptatibus ſecuri fruuntur, alii verò abſtinent: & nemo qui rectè ſapiat condemnat eum qui comedit; nam & abſtinentia & participatio ſunt in mentis poteſtate. But the Church commands nothing in theſe things, and forbids not to uſe fleſh and wine; and therefore ſome enjoy them freely, others doe abſtain, and no wiſe man condemns him that eats: for to eat or to abſtain is in the power of every mans will. Now if the Church had from the Apoſtles receiv'd a law of the Lent-faſt, or if in the Church there had been a law to command abſtinence from fleſh in Lent, it had not been truly ſaid of Theodoret, Eccleſia de his nihil præcipit; for a commandement for a time and a revolving period, certainly is a commandement. But this further appears in the variety which is in all the actions and minds of men when they are at their own choice. Of this a fragment of Irenæus mention'd by Euſebius is a great teſtimony: for there had been an unlucky difference between the Weſtern and Eaſtern Churches about their keeping of Eaſter, and Pope Victor was transported into heats upon the question, and received from S. Irenæus this sober advertisement, For there is not onely a controversy about the day of Easter, but about the kind of fasting. For some suppose they ought to fast but one day, others two, others more; some measure their day by forty hours of day and night. And this variety of them that observe the fasts did not begin in our age, but long before us with our Ancestors, who, as it is likely, retaining a custome introduc'd by simplicity and a private choice, did propagate it to posterity. And yet nevertheless all these liv'd peaceably one with another, and we also keep peace together; for the difference of the fast is so far from violating the agreement of faith, that it does commend it rather. Here was the Paschal fast observ'd by all men, but with great variety and a proportionate liberty. The cause of the variety was this, which was also the ground of their practice. They thought that the words of Christ, [when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, in those days shall they fast] were to be meant of the interval of Christs death and burial, as we learn from Tertullian. Now because it was but one whole day that Christ was in the grave, some fasted but one day, beginning on the Friday afternoon. Others consider that Christ was about 40 hours dead, and the bridegroom was absent so long; and therefore reckon'd their fast to 40 hours, beginning from the ninth hour on good-Friday, & eating nothing till the morning of Easter day: and this was the most severe and the most prevailing amongst them; and this is the τεσσαρακοστὴ the quadragesimal fast, this gave occasion to the name, which was kept when the forty hours was chang'd into forty dayes, and new analogies and new reasons found out for it, and their fasting for the absence of the bridegroom was chang'd into a fasting in imitation of Moses and Elias and our Blessed Saviour in the wilderness. Onely by the way let me observe that at first they had no appointed fasts, but of those hours in which the bridegroom was taken from them, that is, none but the Paschal fast; as Tertullian expressely affirms, illos dies jejuniis determinatos putasse in quibus ablatus est sponsus, & hos esse jam solos legitimos jejuniorum Christianorum, The Catholics had no other days appointed for fastings, no other were the legitimate fasting days for Christians (as they thought) but onely those in which the Bridegroom was taken from them.

lib. de Jejun. cap. 2.

16. But S. Irenæus said that some fast one day, some two, and others more. Some kept the whole six days of the Passion week; we find mention made of it in Dionysius Alexandrinus about the 255th year of Christ, τὰς ἐξ τῶν νηστειῶν ἡμέρας, the six days of fasting; but he affirms that all doe not equally observe them. For some fast all the six days, some two, some three, some four, some none. But by Epiphanius his time the fast had possess'd the whole six days almost every where, πὰς ἓξ ἡμέρας τὸ πάσχα ἐν ξηροφαγίᾳ διατελοῦσι πάντες οἱ λαοὶ, All the people spend the six days of the Pasch, or before Easter, in dry diet: but by this time the word τεσσερακοστὴ or Quadragesima had prevail'd, and was us'd to signify the Paschal fast. The word was us'd in the Council of Nice, which commanded two Synods every year to be held in the Provinces, and the first of them to be ἐν τεσσερακοστῇ in the Quadragesimal fast. But this did not signify the fast of forty days, for that was not yet brought into the Church.

lib. 3. Exp. fidei & hæres. 75.

17. But first the matter is clear that the word Quadragesima is often us'd in antiquity and by other good Authors to signify a set time of fast, but plainly lesse then forty days. S. Hierom sayes that the Montanists doe make tres in anno quadrageſimas, three Lents; and yet two of them were but of five days a piece, and whether the third was more or leſſe we cannot tell: and this Tertullian plainly affirms, who was himſelf a Montaniſt. And this thing alſo came into the practice of ſome Catholics; for they did ſo too in the time of Amalarius, they kept tres quadrageſimas, three quadrageſimal faſts; and yet that before Midſummer and that before Chriſtmas were much ſhorter then forty days. The ſame word is ſeveral times uſed by [a] Rabanus Maurus and [b] Durandus. But that the uſe of the word may be no prejudice to the right underſtanding of the thing, we find the thing noted by [c] Socrates and wondred at exceedingly, that ſince there was ſo great difference in the number of days, yet all alike called it τεσσαρακοστὴ, or the quadrageſimal faſt. The ſame alſo we find in [d] Sozomen, noting that ſome did onely obſerve three weeks of five days to the week, out of the number of the ſeven antepaſchal weeks, and yet nevertheleſſe called it Quadrageſima: and the ſame alſo we find in Nicephorus, who (I ſuppoſe) tranſcrib'd it from them: and in Caſſian's time, when the Lent-faſt came up to the number of 36 days, yet he ſtill calls it the Quadrageſima or the 40 days faſt: and it is no wonder, if Rigaltius ſay true, that all the ſet and ſtationary faſts of the Primitive Chriſtians were called Quadrageſimals. But the firſt uſe of the word is in the Nicene Council; unleſſe the words of Origen be allowed to be good record: but yet both in Origen, and in the Nicene Council, though the word be us'd, yet without any remark of the number of the days, or intimation of it, untill the Council of *Laodicea, which mentions more weeks then one in the Lent, commanding to faſt alſo upon the Thurſday of the laſt week in Lent. For by this time it was come to three weeks, in ſome places more, and in ſome leſſe, as appears in Socrates, Sozomen, Caſſian and Nicephorus above quoted.

18. But for the reaſon of the word Quadrageſima there are various conjectures. Caſſian ſays it is an imitation of Chriſts faſt of forty days, and ſo had the name from thence. But he addes ſome little Cabaliſtical things of the number of forty in the Scripture, which are to no great purpoſe. But his firſt conjecture is not altogether unreaſonable; and Rigaltius makes uſe of it, ſaying that the Apoſtles having obliterated the Jewiſh faſts, to which Chriſts forty days faſt put an end, and aſſerted us into liberty, they would upon that day on which Chriſt wrought our liberty for us, nailing the handwriting of ordinances to his Croſſe, conſecrate a faſt to the memorial of this great work of redemption for us; [ut obliteratis Judæorum Sabbatis jejunia ſua Chriſtiani, quæ Domino ſuo tantula pro tantis offerrent, de jejunii Dominici ſpatio vocitarent] that the Chriſtians might call their faſt by a name taken from the duration of the Lords faſt, that ſince they could not attain to that great faſt, they might at leaſt have it in venerable memory. But this although it be ingenious and pretty, yet it is ſomething violent, and hath no warrant from antiquity; and the queſtion is better anſwer'd from the words of Irenæus in Euſebius, who ſayes that they who kept the Paſchal faſt would ſome of them produce the faſt to forty hours: now the whole faſt being in memory of the bridegrooms being taken away, and he having been abſent, as they computed it, forty hours, this proportion did better carry the analogy, and therefore eaſily carried away the name, and a quadrageſimal of hours is as proper as a quadrageſimal of days, and hath a better warranty then any other conjecture. But this I remark'd before.

19. But afterwards the number of weeks increas'd: it came in some places to six and seven weeks; so Cassian. But it was diverso more, for some would fast Saturdays, and some would not; but they made it but to be 36 days however: so we find it in S. Gregory, that 42 days were the appointment of Lent, but taking away the Sundays, six and thirty days remain for fasting. But in all this whole affair there was nothing yet universally determin'd by any law of the universal Church. For in Rome about the year 437 they fasted but three weeks before Easter, [and out of them they excepted Saturdays and Sundays*.] But in Illyricum, in Greece & Alexandria they begin their Lenten fast above six weeks before Easter. Others begin seven weeks before Easter, but fast by intervals, and observe but fifteen days in all: and yet all call this the quadragesimal fast. So * Socrates. And S. Chrysostom sayes it was the custome against Easter to ask every one how many weeks he had fasted; and you should hear some answering two, some three, some all. For at Constantinople the Lent was longest: It was of seven weeks there and all up unto Phœnicia, as Sozomen and Nicephorus report: but all this while with liberty, by custome, and without a law. S. Austin tells that in some places they would not fast the Thursdays in Lent: indeed the Council of Laodicea had commanded they should, but that was but provincial, and did not oblige and was not received every where; and that saying which is reported out of the constitutions of S. Clement might prevail as far, Jejunium quintæ hypocritarum est. But at Rome this was then observed, they did not fast on Thursdays, nor yet on Tuesdays, or they might chuse: so we find in S. Leo exhorting them to the Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday fast, and on Saturday to watch beside. And because of the defalcation of these days in every week, some that were very zealous made up their Lent to be eight weeks, and began it on Sexagesima Sunday, but at last it setled upon Ash-wednesday, and hath endur'd so to this day in many of the Western Churches.

20. Now if all this be not sufficient to prove that the forty days fast of Lent was not a Canon or institution Apostolical, I cannot tell by what measures the question can be filled: and if the Apostles were the Authors of it, yet because the Churches kept themselves in great liberty and variety, it is certain that if they did so still, there would be no diminution to religion. For the use of it being wholly for preparation to the Easter communion, and the setting apart some portion of our time for God's service, it can then onely be of use, when it ministers to such ends with an advantage so great as to recompence the trouble, and so material as to quit it from a vain observance. * But how it can be enjoyn'd, and how it ought to be practis'd, I shall consider in the inquiries concerning the condition of Ecclesiastical laws. Here I was onely to quit the Conscience of this snare which is laid for her by some unskilfull Fowlers, and to represent that the Apostles did not by any Rule or Canon oblige the Christian Churches.

21. That which remains is this, that we consider that it is and ought to be no prejudice to this liberty, that S. Hierom calls Lent an Apostolical tradition. For it was very easy for them who lov'd the institution, and knew it very ancient, and that the custome of it did descend from Apostolical persons, to call it a tradition Apostolical. It is no wrong to S. Hierom if we think he did ſo here: for he did as much as this comes to in the queſtion of the Saturdays faſt, for in his Epiſtle to Lucinus he ſayes, Unaquæque provincia abundet in ſenſu ſuo, & præcepta majorum leges Apoſtolicas arbitretur, Let every Province abound in their own ſenſe, and ſuppoſe the precepts of their Anceſtors to be Apoſtolical laws. But that the Churches had no ſuch law upon them, but were at liberty, appears from all the premiſſes; which I ſumme up with the words of S. Auſtin. The Chriſtians, not that the meats are unclean, but for mortification, doe abſtain from fleſh and fruits; ſome few always, or elſe at certain times: Sicut per quadrageſimam ferè omnes, quanto magis quiſque vel minus voluerit, ſeu potuerit, As in Lent almoſt all men, more or leſſe according as every man is able, or as every man is willing.

22. He that deſires to ſee more particulars concerning the hiſtory, the original, the variety and increaſe of Lent, may, if he pleaſe, read them in Caſſian, in Amalarius, Alcuinus & Rabanus of old, and of late, in Durandus, in Hugo Menardus a Benedictine his notes in Gregor. Sacramentarium, in Petavius his notes upon Epiphanius, Rigaltius upon Tertullian, Scaliger's admirable animadverſions upon Euſebius, in that excellent Epiſtle of Eraſmus to the Biſhop of Baſil de interdicto eſu carnium, in Delaunoy, Fileſcac and *Daille. Out of theſe any man may ſatisfy his curioſity; I have endeavour'd onely to ſatisfy the Conſcience.

23. Concerning the weekly faſts of Friday and Saturday, the former of them is of great antiquity in the Church, as being in uſe in Tertullian's time, and without variety alwayes obſerved after it once began. We find the Wedneſday and Friday faſt mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus, and the Wedneſday ſtation is equally in Tertullian. But the Saturday faſt was for ſome ages counted abominable in the whole Church; but it came into the Latin Church in time, but with ſo much ſcandal to the Greeks, that in the year of our Lord 707 they excommunicated them that faſted on the Saturday, and to this day perſevere in the ſame mind. But that neither one nor the other was of Apoſtolical inſtitution, is of it ſelf clear by the conſequence of the former diſcourſe concerning Lent; the Apoſtles having made no laws concerning faſting-days, as I have made apparent. * The Rogation faſt (all the world knows) was inſtituted by Mammercus Biſhop of Vienna: and as for the Ember-weeks, they can pretend to no antiquity that is Primitive, and rely for their authority upon a ſpurious epiſtle of Pope Calixtus, which is pretended to have been written about the year 221, and which is abundantly detected of forgery by many perſons, but eſpecially by M^r Blondel. Tertullian's words are a hatchet to cut off all faſting-days from pretending to Apoſtolical authority, affirming that the Montaniſts did faſt but two weeks in the whole year, and in them not on Saturdays and Sundays (though S. Hierom is pleas'd to lay three Lents to their charge,) and that the Catholics blam'd them for impoſing ſo much; but themſelves did faſt onely upon thoſe days the bridegroom was taken from them, that is, the paſchal faſt; that they did ſometimes interpoſe half faſts, and live on bread and water for ſome time, but ut cuique videbatur, hæc ex arbitrio agentes, non ex imperio, as every man ſaw cauſe, doing theſe things by choice and not by command.

The

24. The result of this discourse is this, That the Apostles did not lay a yoke upon the Disciples neck in the matter of fasting, much lesse in the forty days fast of Lent; that as in relation to the Apostles, the Conscience is at liberty. Now whether or no any positive constitution of the Rulers of our Churches can or doe oblige the Conscience to the observation of Lent, and how farre, I shall consider in the next Paragraph of this Chapter.

RULE XIV.

The Canons of the ancient General and Provincial Councils are then laws to the Conscience when they are bound upon us by the authority of the respective Governours of Churches.

1. A General Council is nothing but the union of all the Ecclesiastical power in the world. The authority of a General Council in matters of Government and Discipline is no greater, no more obligatory then the authority of a Provincial Council to those who are under it. A General Council obliges more Countries and more Dioceses, but it obliges them no more then the Civil and Ecclesiastic power obliges them at home A General Council is an Union of Government, a consent of Princes and Bishops, and in that every one agrees to govern by the measures to which there they doe consent: and the consent of opinions addes moment to the laws, and reverence to the sanction; and it must prevail against more objections then Provincial decrees, because of the advantage of wisdome and consultation which is suppos'd to be there, but the whole power of obligation is deriv'd from the Authority at home. That is, if twenty Princes meet together and all their Bishops, and agree how they will have their Churches governed, those Princes which are there and those Bishops which have consented are bound by their own act, and to it they must stand till the reason alters, or a contrary or a better does intervene; but the Prince can as much alter that law when the case alters, as he can abrogate any other law to which he hath consented. But those Princes which were not there, whatever the cause of their absence be, are not oblig'd by that General Council; and that Council can have no authority but what is given them by consent, & therefore they who have not consented, are free as ever.

2. The Council of Florence, so called because, though it was begun at Ferrara, yet it was ended there, Pope Clement 7th calls the eighth General Council in his Bull of April 22th 1527. yet others call it the 16th: but it was never receiv'd in France, as Panormitan * tells us: for the King of France did forbid expressely and upon great penalties that any of his subjects should goe to Ferrara to celebrate that Council; and after it had been celebrated, and Charles the 7th was desir'd by Pope Eugenius to accept it, he told the Legates plainly, that he had never taken it for a Council, and he never would. The Council of Basil, though the King of France had sent his Embassadors thither, and had received it as a Council, yet he approved it but in part, for he rejected the last thirteen sessions, and approv'd onely the the first two and thirty; some of them as they lie, others with certain forms and qualifications: and this was done to fit and accommodate them to the exigencies of the times and places and persons, saith Benedict a French lawyer. And upon the like accounts the last Council of Lateran is there rejected also. Thus in England we accept not of the Council of Trent, and excepting the four first General Councils, which are established into a Law by the King and Parliament, there is no other Council at all of use in England, save onely to entertain scholars in their arguments, and to be made use of in matters of fact, by them to understand the stories of the Church. Where any thing else is received into custome and practice of law, it binds by our reception, not by it's own natural force.

3. But I have already spoken sufficiently of this thing*. I now onely mention it to the purpose that those religious and well-meaning persons who are concluded by the canon of an Ancient Council, and think that whatever was there commanded it layes some obligation upon the Consciences of us at this day, and by this means enter into infinite scruples and a restlesse unsatisfied condition, may consider that the Ancient Doctors of the Church had no jurisdiction over us who were born so many ages after them; that even then when they were made they had their authority wholly from Princes and consent of Nations; that things and reasons, that jurisdictions and governments, that Churches and Dioceses, that interests and manners are infinitely alter'd since that time; that since the authority of those Fathers could not be permanent and abide longer then their lives, it being certainly not greater then that of Kings, which must needs die with their persons, that their successors may be Kings as well as they, and not be subjects of the dead, the efficacy of their rules must descend upon succession by a succeeding authority; that therefore they prevail upon us by a new force, by that which is extrinsecal to them; and therefore in such cases we are to inquire whether the thing be good, and if it be, we may use it with liberty till we be restrained, but we may also chuse; for then we are to inquire whether the thing be a law in that Government to which we owe obedience: for that the Fathers met at Laodicea, at Antioch, at Nice, at Gangra, a thousand, 1100 or 1300 years agoe, should have authority over us in England so many ages after, is so infinitely unreasonable, that none but the fearfull and the unbelievers, the scrupulous and those who are δοῦλοι τῇ φύσει of a slavish nature, and are in bondage by their fear, and know not how to stand in that liberty by which Christ hath made them free, will account themselves in subjection to them. If upon this account the Rulers of Churches will introduce any pious, just and warrantable Canon, we are to obey in all things where they have power to command; but the Canon, for being in the old Codes of the Church, binds us no more then the laws of Constantine.

* Chapter 3. Rule 7. and Chapter 4. Rule 5.

RULE XV.

The laudable Customes of the Catholick Church which are in present observation doe oblige the Conscience of all Christians.

1. THis we have from S. Paul, who reproves the contumacy and regardlesse comport of those who, against the usages of Christians and the places where they liv'd, would wear long hair : We have no such custome, nor the Churches of God. In such cases where there is no law, the manners of Christians introduce a law so far, that we cannot recede from it without some probable cause ; or if we doe, we cannot doe it without scandal and reproach. And indeed it is an act of love to conform to the customes of Christians with whom we doe converse, who either will think you blame their custome, or despise their persons, if you comply not. S. Austin gave his advice to the same purpose, In his rebus de quibus nihil certi tradit scriptura Divina, mos populi Dei vel statuta Majorum pro lege tenenda sunt. Et sicut prævaricatores divinarum legum, ita contemptores Ecclesiasticarum consuetudinum coercendi sunt. If the holy Scriptures have not interpos'd in the particular, we must keep the customes and decrees of our Ancestors as a law: and as they that prevaricate the Divine laws are to be restrained, so are all they that despise the customes of the Church. * It is a Catholic custome, that they who receive the Holy Communion, should receive it fasting. This is not a duty commanded by God : but unlesse it be necessary to eat, he that despises this custome, gives nothing but the testimony of an evil mind.

Epist. 76. ad Casulanum Presbyter.

2. But this is first to be understood in such Customes as are laudable, that is, such which have no suspicion or moral reproach upon them, such which are reasonable and fit for wise and sober persons. It was a custome of the Primitive Church, at least in some places, not to touch the earth with the bare foot within the Octaves of Easter : this was a trifle, and tending to phantastic opinions and superstitious fancies, and therefore is not to be drawn into imitation ; onely so long as it did remain, every man was to take care he gave no offence to weak persons, but he was to endeavour to alter it by all fair means and usages. It was a custome in many Churches anciently, and not long since in the Church of England, that in cases of the infants extreme danger the midwives did baptize them. This custome came in at a wrong door, it lean'd upon a false and superstitious opinion ; and they thought it better to invade the Priests office, then to trust God with the souls which he made with his own hands and redeem'd with his Sons bloud. But this custome was not to be followed if it had still continued ; for even then they confess'd it was a sinne, factum valet, fieri non debuit ; and evil ought not to be done for a good end. Quod si à mulieribus baptizari oporteret, profecto Christus à Matre baptizatus esset, & non à Joanne : aut cum nos ad baptizandum misit, misisset mulieres nobiscum ad hoc : nunc vero nusquam neque jußit Dominus, neque per Scripturam tradidit, utpote qui naturæ convenientiam & rei decorum nosset, tanquam naturæ author & legislator, said the Author of the Constitutions under the name of S. Clement.

lib. 3. c. 9.

If

If women might be ſuffer'd to baptize, Chriſt need not have gone to S. John, but might have been baptized by his Mother; and Chriſt would have ſent women along with the Apoſtles when he gave them commiſſion to preach and to baptize. But now our Lord hath neither commanded any ſuch thing by his word, or in Scripture; for the author and law-giver of Nature knew what was agreeable and decent for their Nature. To this agrees that of Tertullian, lib. de Virg. veland. Non permittitur mulieri in Eccleſia loqui, ſed nec docere, nec tingere, nec offerre, nec ullius virilis muneris nedum ſacerdotalis officii ſortem ſibi vendicare, A woman is not permitted to ſpeak in the Church, nor to teach, nor to baptize, nor to offer, nor to doe the office of a man, much leſſe of a Prieſt. *ſee the Divine inſtitution of the order and offices Miniſter. ſect. 4. * This cuſtome therefore is of the nature of thoſe which are to be laid aſide. Οὐδεὶς βαπτίζει εἰ μὴ χειροτονίαν ἔχει, No man baptizes but he that is in holy Orders, ſaid Simeon of Theſſalonica; and I think he ſaid truly. But above all things, opinions are not to be taken up by cuſtome, and reduc'd to practice: not onely becauſe cuſtome is no good warranty for opinions, and voluntas fertur carere oculis, intellectus pedibus, the will hath no eyes, & the underſtanding hath no feet; that is, it can doe nothing without the will, and the will muſt doe nothing without that; they are a blind man and a lame when they are aſunder, but when they are together they make up a ſound man, while the one gives reaſon, and the other gives command: but beſides this, when an opinion is offer'd onely by the hand of cuſtome, it is commonly a ſigne of a bad cauſe, and that there is nothing elſe to be ſaid for it; and therefore Diſput. 18. in 1 Cor. 11. in ſolut. 8vi. dub. it was a weakneſſe in Salmeron to offer to perſuade us to entertain the doctrine and practice of Indulgences, Purgatory, Invocation of Saints, Images and the like, becauſe they are cuſtomes of the Church, meaning his own.

3. 2. This is to be underſtood alſo of the Cuſtomes of the Catholick Church. For if the Churches differ, it is indifferent to take either lib. 3. Pædagog. cap. 3. or neither as it may happen. Clemens Alexandrinus ſaid it was a wickedneſſe to pull the beard, becauſe it is our natural, it is a generous and an ingenuous ornament: and yet Gregory the 7th, Biſhop of Rome, made Arch-Biſhop James ſhave his beard cloſe, pretending that it had been always a lib. 8. Regiſtri, Epiſt. 10. cuſtome in the Weſtern Churches; Conſuetudini ſanctæ obedire coegimus, We have conſtrained him to obey the holy cuſtome. In ſuch caſes where ſeveral Churches have ſeveral uſages, every Church is to follow her own cuſtome, and every of her ſubjects to obey it.

4. 3. Though every ſubject is tied to the cuſtome of his own Church, yet he is not to give offence when he converſes with another Church that hath a differing cuſtome: according to that rule and example of S. Ambroſe, Quando hic ſum, non jejuno Sabbato; quando Romæ ſum, jejuno Sabbato: & ad quamcunque Eccleſiam veneritis, ejus morem ſervate, ſi pati ſcandalum non vultis aut facere, When I am at Millain I doe not faſt on the Saturday, when I am at Rome I doe: and to whatſoever Church you ſhall come, keep the cuſtome of that Church, if ye will neither give nor receive offence. And theſe Epiſt. 118. words S. Auſtin made uſe of to this very purpoſe, Totum hoc genus liberas habet obſervationes, nec diſciplina ulla eſt in his melior gravi prudentique Chriſtiano, quam ut eo modo agat quo agere viderit Eccleſiam ad quamcunque fortè devenerit. The beſt way is to doe as that Church does where you happen to be. And in the ſame inſtance S. Hierom gave anſwer to Lucinus, ſervandam eſſe propriæ Eccleſiæ conſuetudinem, The cuſtome of the place of our own Church is to be obſerved. And therefore at Millain it is counted counted a violation of their rights when the Roman Prieſts come into the Ambroſian Churches, and refuſe to uſe the Miſſal of S. Ambroſe, but uſe the Roman. It is a cuſtome in the Church of England to uncover the head or to bow the knee when the name of Jeſus is named: the cuſtome is not onely innocent but pious, and agreeable to the duty of every Chriſtian, and therefore abſtracting from the injunction, the cuſtome it ſelf is ſufficient to exact conformity of all modeſt perſons. But if a ſon of the Church of England ſhall come into other Proteſtant Churches who uſe it not, he is to comply with them in the omiſſion, unleſſe himſelf be perſuaded that it is a Divine Commandement; and yet even then alſo, the ſpecification and the circumſtances of time and place may be undetermin'd, and leave him in a capacity to comply for a time, and in a limited place.

5. 4. It is requir'd that the cuſtome be of preſent obſervation, or elſe it does not oblige the Conſcience. Thus it is a cuſtome of the Catholic Church that at the Baptiſing of Infants there be God-fathers and God-mothers. This cuſtome is ſtill of uſe in the Church of England: and although much of the reaſon for which they were firſt introduc'd is ceas'd, and the caſe alter'd; yet it is enough to every man that is a ſubject, that it is the cuſtome: and therefore if any man ſhall diſpute and prove that the thing it ſelf is not now neceſſary, that is no warranty to him to omit it, ſo long as the cuſtome is allowed & upheld, & is no evil. But if the cuſtome be left in a Church, that it was a Catholic cuſtome & of long uſe in the Church is of no obligation to the Conſcience. Socrates tells that omnes ubique in orbe terrarum Eccleſiæ, all the Churches in the world, every week upon Saturday celebrate the myſteries. Alexandrini tamen & Romani ex antiqua traditione iſtud facere renuunt. But the Churches of Alexandria & Rome refuſe to doe ſo, becauſe they have an ancient tradition to the contrary. And in this they had their liberty. It was a long & a general cuſtome in the Church upon all occaſions and motions of ſolemnity or greater action to make the ſigne of the Croſſe in the aire, on the breaſt, or on the forehead; but he that in England ſhould doe ſo upon pretence becauſe it was a Catholic cuſtome would be ridiculous. For a cuſtome obliges by being a cuſtome amongſt them with whom we doe converſe, and to whom in charity and prudence we are to comply: and therefore to doe an action that was a cuſtome there where it is not a cuſtome, muſt be done upon ſome other reaſon then becauſe it is a cuſtome; or elſe it is done becauſe there is no reaſon. It was a cuſtome of the Catholic Church to reſerve infants all the year till Eaſter to be baptiz'd, except it were in caſes of neceſſity or great danger: but we have no ſuch cuſtome now; nor the Churches of God; and therefore to think we are bound to comply with that or any ſuch cuſtome, is to make our ſelves too fond admirers of the actions, and more then ſervants to the ſentences and cuſtomes of Ancient Churches.

lib. 5. Hiſt. cap. 21.

6. 5. An Eccleſiaſtical cuſtome againſt an Eccleſiaſtical law does not oblige the Conſcience. It does in many caſes excuſe, but when there is no ſcandal accidentally emerging, it never binds us to follow it. I ſay it can excuſe from penalty, then when the Eccleſiaſtical law hath been neglected, becauſe the Governours are preſumed to doe their duty; and therefore if they who made the law ſuffer it to be commonly broken, it is to be ſuppos'd they are willing the law ſhould die: and this is the ſenſe of that in the Comedy, Mores leges perduxerunt jam in poteſtatem ſuam, Cuſtomes give limit limit to laws; and they bind according as the manners of men are. And this the lawyers extend even to a cuſtome that is againſt the law of God. So the Preſidents of Sena at the entry into their office take an oath in form that they will never receive bribes; and yet they doe ſo, and are known to doe ſo, and becauſe of the general cuſtome are never puniſh'd: and much of the ſame nature are the oaths taken at the Matriculations and admiſſions into Univerſities and offices reſpectively, concerning which it were very well there were ſome remedy or prevention. But if it can be underſtood that the law-giver intends the law ſhould be in force, and that the negligence of his Miniſters or the ſtubborn and uncomplying nature of the ſubjects is the cauſe of the want of diſcipline; then the conſcience is oblig'd to the law, and not excus'd by the cuſtome*. And yet further, when the law is called upon, then although there be a cuſtome in the Church againſt the Canon, it neither preſerves from ſin, nor reſcues from puniſhment: quia lex derogat conſuetudini, ſay the lawyers; when the law is alive the cuſtome is dead, becauſe the cuſtome took it's life from the diminution of the law; and when there is a law actually called upon, the cuſtome to the contrary is a direct evil, and that againſt which the law is intended, and which the law did intend to remedy. The Church hath made laws that no man ſhall faſt upon the Lords day, nor the great Feſtivals of the year: if a cuſtome of faſting upon Chriſtmas-day ſhould in evil and peeviſh times prevail, and the law be unable or unwilling to chaſtiſe it, but ſuffer it to grow into evil manners; when the law is again warm and refreſh'd and calls for obedience, the contrary cuſtome is not to be pretended againſt the law, but to be repented of. In the Church of England there is a law, that when children are baptized they ſhall be dipped in the water; onely if they be ſick it ſhall be ſufficient that it be ſprinkled upon them: but yet the cuſtome of ſprinkling all does prevail. In this caſe we are to ſtand to the law, not to the cuſtome, becauſe the law is ſtill in force, and is actually intended to prevail according to the mind of the Church, and it is more agreeable with the practice, the laws and cuſtomes of the Primitive Church, and to the practice of Chriſt and his Apoſtles. But of this I ſhall ſpeak again in ſome of the following Numbers.

Paldus in l. obſervare, §. prohciſci, circa fin. ff. de officio proconſul. & leg.

* See the VIth Rule of the laſt Chapter of this Book.

7. 6. An Eccleſiaſtical cuſtome muſt be reaſonable or uſefull, or it cannot oblige the conſcience, except to avoid ſcandal, for that is in all things carefully to be obſerved, right or wrong, ſo it be not a ſin againſt God; Cuſtomes muſt be kept, when the breaking them is ſcandalous. But excepting this caſe, an unreaſonable cuſtome does not oblige. For no man is bound to be a fool, or to doe a fooliſh action. Now a cuſtome in the Canon law is concluded to be reaſonable if it tends to the good of the ſoul. In the Civil law it is allowed to be reaſonable if it tends to any publick good. Thus it is a cuſtome that Judges ſhould wear their Robes upon their ſeates of judicature; that the Clergy wear blacks. Doctores portant varium, quia habitus virum oſtendit, ſaith the law, l. ſtigmata, C. de fabri. And that Prieſt were a ſtrange peeviſh or a weak perſon who ſhould chuſe to wear gray, becauſe there is no religion in the colour: his religion in this would have nothing elſe: and though theſe things tend not to the good of the ſoul, yet they tend to the good of the publick, they diſtinguiſh men, that honour may be given to them to whom honour belongs.

For

8. For it is conſiderable, what the wiſer Lawyers ſay, 1. That a cuſtome is good if it contains bonum honeſtum, any honeſty or matter of publick reputation. Thus it is a cuſtome that civil perſons ſhould not walk late in the night, but be in their houſes at ſeaſonable times; it is a good cuſtome that Biſhops and Prieſts abſtain from going to Taverns; this cuſtome is reaſonable, and therefore does oblige thoſe that are concerned in it. 2. A cuſtome is good if it contains bonum commune, if it be for the common good: and of this ſort there are many cuſtomes in every nation which are paſs'd into laws, as that in the cauſe of Dowries the Judge ſhould proceed ſummarily; that a fact be tried in the country where it was done; that when any man is accuſed he ſhould have his accuſers brought before his face. And thus alſo in the laws Eccleſiaſtical there are very many of this nature; as that when Biſhops viſit their Churches there be allowance of procurations and Synodals, and aptneſſes for their entertainment; that when we ſee a Biſhop we beg his bleſſing; that when we come to a city we firſt goe to the Cathedral to pray, then to the Biſhop to be bleſs'd and prayed for; that the contract of Marriage be publickly ſolemniz'd in Churches after three publications; that children ask their Parents benediction: theſe things are of publick uſe, for the advancing of a neceſſary duty, for the mutual endearment of Relatives, for the eſtabliſhment of piety, for the conciliating authority, and to many other good purpoſes, which whoſoever can advance by the keeping of a cuſtome & complying with the manners of the Church where he lives, is not to be excus'd if he will be ſtubborn and ſingular and proud. 3. Baldus ſayes, Bona eſt conſuetudo quæ continet bonum honorabile, It is a good cuſtome that gives honour and regard to whom it is due. Thus it is a cuſtome that the Conſecration of Biſhops ſhould be in publick Churches; that the Degree of Doctor, becauſe it is an honour, be not conferred ſneakingly and in conventicles. And upon this account, when any cuſtome is honourable to religion or to a myſtery, it is not to be omitted, becauſe the cuſtome is good, and in ſome proportions miniſters to Religion and it's advantage.

C. ſi Judex laicus deſent. excommunicat. lib. 6.

9. Thus the Miniſters of religion when they officiate are by an immemorial cuſtome veſted in albes or ſurplices: it was intended as an honour to the religion, becauſe the white and the purple colours are the enſignes of Civil and Eccleſiaſtical dignity reſpectively, and are in honour to each other alternately indulg'd, and Kings weare albes, and Biſhops and Judges weare purple; and our Bleſſed Saviour was pleas'd to call it the glory of Solomon, when he was cloth'd in the pureſt linen of Egypt, whoſe whiteneſſe though very bright, yet it fell ſhort of the natural whiteneſſe of the lilly. Glory is nothing but the exceſſe and greatneſſe of honour, and therefore theſe garments which were glorious upon Solomon, at leaſt were given to the Religious as enſignes of honour: the ſame which the Epigram ſays of the purple Mantle which was ſtoln from Criſpinus,

Quisquis habes, humeris ſua munera redde precamur:
Non hoc Criſpinus te, ſed abolla rogat.
Non quicunque capit ſaturatas murice veſtes:
Nec niſi deliciis convenit iſte color.

lib. 8. Epigr. 48.

Such garments are not fit for every ſhoulder, they are marks of honor, and the delicacies of the greateſt and the worthieſt Men. But that the white garment was given to Religion, it had beſides the honour to the perſons, the ſignification and embleme of a precept: It ſignified purity and truth, which in Philoſtratus in the image of Amphiaraus is ſaid to be clothed with garments of ſnow, and cover'd with the pureſt whiteneſſe; and [a] Clemens Alexandrinus writes that Cæus the Sophiſter in the deſcription of vertue and vice, deſcrib'd vertue in a white robe; and ſo does [b] Themiſtius inveſt truth, ſitting upon an adamant, holding a bright ſplendor in her hand, and clothed with an albe. Concerning this S. Clement of Alexandria * ſpake much, even as much as the thing it ſelf will bear: for it being nothing but the colour of a garment, is not to be prov'd to be neceſſary, & therefore not to be valued in ſuch a quality: but yet neither is the cuſtome of that colour to be deſpis'd, becauſe that colour is a good embleme, and hath as much advantage as a colour can have; and therefore there can be no reaſon to deſpiſe the thing, or peeviſhly to goe againſt the cuſtome, where it is quitted from abuſe. But I ſhall adde this to it, which is warranty enough for the Churches choice, that the Primitive Chriſtians, who were free enough from any ſuperſtitious fancy concerning it, did nevertheleſſe particularly affect and chuſe this colour. They ſaw that the Saints in the Revelation had λευκὰ ἱμάτια white garments, and they were dipt in the bloud of the Lamb: and S. Anthony to repreſent himſelf a Chriſtian did goe in white, as S. Athanaſius tells of him. † Eunapius tells that the Monks in Egypt went in black; and that many Chriſtians that liv'd in other places did ſo too, for modeſty ſake and gravity, in humility and abjection, who pleaſe, may ſee demonſtrated by many inſtances in Baronius: & that is a good precedent to warrant the cuſtome of the ordinary Clergy habit. But yet it is evident that very many Chriſtians were pleas'd rather to uſe the ſimple and native colour of truth, the embleme of purity; and Syneſius writing to one John the Monk that choſe to goe in a black coat, writes that which is enough to be ſaid in this whole affaire, Atqui nihilo deterius erat ſi candida foret: ſplendidiſſimæ quippe naturæ dicatum ac conſecratum id potius fuerit quod in his quæ ſenſu percipiuntur purius atque lucidius eſt. Sed ſi pullum ideo colorem probâſti, quod id aliorum qui ante te uſurpârunt imitatione feceris; laudo quicquid Dei cauſâ ſuſcipitur. But it had been no worſe if you had choſen the white, as that which is agreeable to the nature of ſplendor and purity, and brighter and purer to the eyes. But if you choſe the black garment becauſe it was the cuſtome of others that went before you, it is well; I commend any thing that is done for God, and for the cauſe of piety. Colorem album Deo maximè decorum, ſaid Cicero, quòd ſit index puritatis & nitelæ, omnemque fucum excludat veritate nativâ contentus. The white garment is moſt comely for religion, as being content with it's native ſimplicity, and an indication of brightneſſe and purity. Upon this account it is a cuſtome of clothing the bodies of dead in white; for they that are dead are juſtified from ſins, and they are candidates of immortality. But it may be this was too much to be ſaid of ſo ſmall a thing: I inſtanc'd in this, to ſhew that this colour was intended for an exteriour honour to religion, and that is ſufficient (ſay the lawyers) to make a cuſtome reaſonable; and if it be reaſonable, it muſt be complied with.

10. 7. A cuſtome whoſe reaſon is not known, yet if it be of an immemorial time, and does tranſmit a right to Eccleſiaſtical perſons, is not without great reaſon and evident neceſſity or publick utility to be refus'd. Thus it is a cuſtome in the Church of England that certain rights be paid to the Rector of the Church if the corps be interred in the Chancel: and though in some places this did run into great abuse, which was excellently reprov'd by that learned and good man Sir Henry Spelman ὁ μακαρίτης, in his learned and pious Tract de Sepultura; yet the thing was not wholly to be blamed for the abuse sake, and the rights of any man are not easily to be snatched away because he cannot prove how he came by them, if he have had them long in possession. The thing was to have been reformed; but not after the new manner, that is, wholly taken away. Consuetudo cujus initii memoria non sit in contrarium præsumitur rationabilis, say Geminianus, Cardinal Alexander and Panormitan; and they instance in a Prelate receiving money beyond his procurations in his visitation. For though the reason of it be not now known, yet it is presum'd at first, there was a reason; & though we have lost the record, yet he must not loose his right; unless that right of his be manifestly other mens wrong. But this instance is to be understood so, that the Sepulture be first perform'd, and the charity and the ecclesiastical right be done to the dead; for these things cannot be contracted for: but when the piety is performed, the oblations of the faithful which at first were voluntary, and afterwards came into custome, and so transferred a right, may be receiv'd by the Rector, but must not be detained by the heire. Here in Ireland there is a custome of receiving oblations at the baptisme of infants; but if the Priest refuses to baptise the child till he be secur'd of the money, he is a direct Simoniac, for he contracts and takes a price for the Sacrament: but if he confer the Sacrament, to which he is tied by his charge and by the laws of God and Man, then afterwards he hath a right to the oblation which by law or custome was to be given. But the office is to be done without it: for the Infant hath a right to the Sacrament before the Priest hath a right to the offering; and that came in by the laws of God, this by the customes of Men.

11. 8. A Custome Ecclesiastical that is but of a legal and presum'd reasonableness does oblige us to a conformity. I call that a legal or presum'd reasonableness, when the law in certain cases does suppose it reasonable; and though it be not known to be naturally or precisely so, yet because it is not known to be unreasonable, but there is a probability to conjecture that it entred upon a right cause, it is permitted and allowed. This happens in two cases. The first is when a Custome is besides the law, and not against it. For if it be against a law, it ought not to prevaile at all, unless it be precisely reasonable, that is, unless the law in the changing of affairs or in it self at first be unreasonable; for in that case a custome that is naturally reasonable may be admitted, and if it be, must be observed. But if it be only besides the law, and not against it, then it is presum'd to be reasonable, hoc ipso quod introducta est, say the Doctors, therefore because it is introduc'd: and the reason is, because every thing is presumed to be reasonable that is done generally, unless it be known to be unreasonable; and the very interests of peace and the reputation and honour of mankind require this, without any more inquiry; save onely that this be added, that if the custome introduc'd besides law be either universal, or of an immemorial beginning, the law presumes the more strongly of the reasonableness of it, and therefore in these cases it ought to prevail the rather. For to this sense is that rule of S. Austin, Illa quæ non scripta sed tradita custodimus, quæ quidem toto terrarum orbe observantur, dantur intelligi vel ab ipsis Apostolis, vel plenariis Conciliis, quorum est in Ecclesia saluberrima authoritas, commendata atque statuta retineri, Those things which are delivered to us not by writing, Epist. 118. cap. 1.

but by tradition [or cuſtome] which are obſerved in all the world, we underſtand them to be either retain'd by the appointment or commendation of the Apoſtles, or ſome General Councils, whoſe authority in the Church is of great uſe.] That is, when the cuſtome is univerſal and immemorial. For the firſt we preſume it to be very reaſonable, it could not elſe have eaſily prevail'd upon the whole Church: and for the ſecond we ſuppoſe it to have had a very good beginning; for it addes moments to the cuſtome, that when we know nothing to the contrary, we preſume the beſt of its original. Not that we ought to conclude or to believe a Cuſtome to have come from the Apoſtles, if it be univerſal or immemorial; but that we ought to regard and reverence it as if it did, becauſe we know not in ſome caſes whether it did or no. * But if it be either one or other, it is ſufficient to oblige us to retain it, or to comply with it ſo long as it is retained. Thus the ſolemn daies of Rogation which we obſerve in the Church of England were not of an immemorial beginning; for they were firſt us'd by the Biſhops of Vienna, Mamertus, Iſicius and Avitus; but yet they were quickly univerſal, non per Gallias tantummodo, ſed penè per totum orbem, not onely in France, but in almoſt all the world, ſaid Alcimus Avitus in his time: and therefore this cuſtome is not to be neglected by any ſingle perſon, where the Church ſtill retains it; for this is ſufficient to make a legal preſumption of its reaſonableneſs.

Homil. de Rogat.

* The other caſe is, that a Cuſtome is preſum'd reaſonable when the nature of it is ſuch that it can have no poſitive and natural unreaſonableneſs, but is capable of ſome extrinſic and accidental decency and fittingneſs. The cuſtome that is actually in the practice and manners of a Church is preſum'd reaſonable: and this is of uſe but in ſmall matters, but yet ſuch which little and great men ſometimes make great matters of; I mean preſidencies and priorities of place, ſittings in the quire, precedencies in Councils. Now in theſe caſes Cuſtome ought to prevail, for where there is no reaſon in the thing, there Cuſtome is a reaſon ſufficient; and if a law ought to prevail though there be no reaſon known for it, then ſo muſt Cuſtome, becauſe this is eſteemed as a law. Capit. Conſuetudo 1. diſt. & l. de quibus, ff. de legibus. And it is remarkable, that although in the introducing of a Cuſtome, it concerns the Governours of Churches to take care that it be reaſonable; yet when it is introduc'd that care is over, and then they are to take care to keep unity and to avoid ſcandal. Præſtat illic eſſe ubi nihil licet quam ubi omnia, ſaid one, It is better to be under a Tyranny then under an Anarchy; it is better to be too much reſtrain'd then to be too looſe: and if a Cuſtome hath ſeiz'd upon us, it is better to ſtand ſtill under that arreſt, then to break the gentleſt cords of a man, and inter into licentiouſneſs. Pernicioſior temeritas quam quies. It is not good to move any ſtirs in a quiet Church, for certainly peace is better then that which is onely a little better then a cuſtome. And we ſee it by a ſad experience, that thoſe who are enemies and ſtubborn to the innocent Cuſtomes of a Church, intend nothing but to get the government into their own hands. Genus hominum potentibus infidum, ſperantibus fallax; as Tacitus ſaid of the Aſtrologers, we have too much reaſon to ſay of them, They are a ſort of men that deceive their own confidents, and are no ſure friends to their Superiors: for to diſavow Cuſtomes is a great diſhonour to the Government, and a reproach to the miniſtery of laws; and to their diſciples they preach liberty, that themſelves onely may rule them abſolutely. Quanto majore libertatis imagine teguntur, tanto eruptura ad infenſius ſervitium;

Tacitus

Tacitus ſaid it of ſuch perſons: by the exempting fools from the juſt rule of their ſuperiors, they make them their own ſlaves. But to rebel againſt the Cuſtomes of a Church is an accuſation not onely of the Rulers, but a condemnation of the whole ſociety of the faithful.

12. 9. A Cuſtome in the adminiſtration of a Sacrament introduc'd againſt the analogy and myſtery, the purpoſe and ſignification of it, ought not to be complied with. I inſtanc'd before in a Cuſtome of the Church of England of ſprinkling water upon infants in their baptiſme; and I promiſed to conſider it again. Baptizabant enim veteres, non manibus ſuis aquam baptizando aſpergentes, ſed trinâ immerſione hoc Evangelii ſequentes, Aſcendit ex aqua, ergo deſcenderat. Ecce immerſio, non aſperſio; ſaid Jeremy the Patriarch of CP. Straightway Jeſus went up out of the water, ſaith the Goſpel: He came up, therefore he went down. Behold an immerſion, not an aſperſion. And the Ancient Churches following this of the Goſpel, did not in their baptiſmes ſprinkle water with their hands, but immerg'd the Catechumen, or the infant. And therefore we find in the records of the Church, that the perſons to be baptized were quite naked; as is to be ſeen in many places, particularly in the 11th Myſtagogic Catechiſme of S. Cyril of Jeruſalem: and S. Dyonis * deſcribes the ritual in the ſame manner. The Biſhop puts his hand upon the Catechumen's head, and giving a ſign to the Prieſts, commands that they write the name of the Catechumen and of his God-father; which being written he ſaies the office or prayers, which when the whole Church hath perform'd together with him, he deveſts him of his garments by the Miniſters. And the ſame thing out of the ſame Author is obſerved by Elias Cretenſis in his notes upon the fourth Oration of S. Gregory Nazianzen, and is reported alſo by S. Ambroſe in his tenth Sermon. Nudi in ſeculo naſcimur, nudi etiam accedimus ad lavacrum, We are born naked, and naked we enter into the waters of baptiſme. All which are a perfect conviction that the Cuſtome of the Ancient Churches was not ſprinkling, but immerſion, in purſuance of the ſenſe of the word in the Commandement, and the example of our Bleſſed Saviour. * Now this was of ſo ſacred account in their eſteem, that they did not account it lawful to receive him into the Clergy who had been onely ſprinkled in his baptiſme; as we learn from the Epiſtle of Cornelius to Fabius of Antioch, μὴ ἐξὸν εἶναι τὸν ἐν κλίνῃ διὰ νόσον περιχυθέντα ὥσπερ καὶ ἐκεῖνος εἰς κλῆρόν τινα γενέσθαι, It is not lawful that he who was ſprinkled in his bed by reaſon of ſickneſs ſhould be admitted into holy orders. Nay it went further then this, they were not ſure that they were rightly Chriſtned yea or no who were onely ſprinkled; as appears in the ſame Epiſtle of Cornelius in Euſebius, εἰγε χρὴ λέγειν τὸν τοιοῦτον εἰλῆφθαι, which Nicephorus thus renders [if at leaſt ſuch a ſprinkling may be called baptiſme:] and this was not onely ſpoken in diminution of Novatus and indignation againſt his perſon, for it was a formal and a ſolemn queſtion made by Magnus to S. Cyprian, an habendi ſint Chriſtiani legitimi, eo quod aquâ ſalutari non loti ſunt, ſed perfuſi, Whether they are to be eſteemed right Chriſtians who were onely ſprinkled with water, and not waſhed or dipped. He anſwers, that the Baptiſme was good when it is done neceſſitate cogente, & Deo indulgentiam ſuam largiente, in the caſe of neceſſity, God pardoning and neceſſity compelling. And this is the ſenſe and law of the Church of England, not that it be indifferent, but that all infants be dipped, except in the caſe of ſickneſs, and then ſprinkling is permitted. And of this ſprinkling, beſides what is implyed in the former teſtimonies, there was ſome little uſe in the Primitive Church. Quis enim tibi tam infidæ pœnitentiæ viro aſperginem unam cujuſlibet aquæ commodabit? ſaies Tertullian ſpeaking to an impenitent perſon: Who will afford thee ſo much as one ſingle ſprinkling of water? (meaning) for his baptiſm. And Surius in the life of S. Laurence tells that as he was going to his Martyrdome, one Romanus a ſouldier brought to him a pitcher of water that he might be baptized of him as he went; which in that caſe muſt needs have been done by powring water upon him. Fudit aquam ſuper caput ejus: ſo did S. Laurence alſo to Lucillus, he powred water upon his head. And Walafridus Strabo from theſe very examples concludes that in caſes of neceſſity it is lawful to uſe ſprinkling. He addes alſo, that it is lawful to doe it when there is a great multitude of perſons at once to be baptized: and Aquinas ſuppoſes the Apoſtles did ſo when the 3000 and when the 5000 were at once converted and baptized. But this is but a conjecture, and hath no tradition and no record to warrant it: and therefore although in caſes of need and charity the Church of England does not want ſome good examples in the beſt times to countenance that permiſſion, yet we are to follow her command, becauſe that command is not onely according to the meaning and intent of the word βαπτίζειν in the Commandement, but agrees with the myſtery of the Sacrament it ſelf; For we are buried with him in baptiſme, ſaith the Apoſtle. In aqua tanquam in ſepulchro caput immergentibus vetus homo ſepelitur & ſubmergitur, deinde nobis emergẽtibus novus reſurgit inde: ſo S. Chryſoſtom, The old man is buried and drowned in the immerſion under water, and when the baptized perſon is lifted up from the water, it repreſents the reſurrection of the new man to newneſs of life. In this caſe therefore the contrary Cuſtome not onely being againſt an Eccleſiaſtical law, but againſt the analogy and myſterious ſignification of the Sacrament, is not to be complied with, unleſs in ſuch caſes that can be of themſelves ſufficient to juſtify a liberty in a ritual and ceremony; that is, a caſe of neceſſity.

13. And of the ſame conſideration is it, that the baptiſme be performed with a trine immerſion, and not with one onely. In England we have a cuſtome of ſprinkling, and that but once. To the ſprinkling I have already ſpoke; but as to the number, though the Church of England hath made no law, and therefore the cuſtome of doing it once is the more indifferent and at liberty, yet if the trine immerſion be agreeable to the analogy of the myſtery, and the other be not, the Cuſtome ought not to prevail, and is not to be complied with, if the caſe be evident or declar'd. Now in this particular the ſenſe of Antiquity is clear. Nam nec ſemel, ſed ter ad ſingula nomina in perſonas ſingulas tingimur, ſaith Tertullian: Dehinc ter mergitamur, We are thrice put under water, not once; at the mention of every perſon we are dipped. The very ſame words we read in S. Hierom againſt the Luciferians. But more largely it is explicated by S. Ambroſe. Thou wert asked, Doeſt thou believe in God the Father Almighty? and thou didſt ſay, I doe believe: and thou wert plunged, that is, buried. Thou wert asked again, Doeſt thou believe in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt? and thou ſaideſt, I doe believe: and thou wert dipped or plunged; and therefore thou art buried together with Chriſt. The third time thou wert asked, Doeſt thou believe in the Holy Spirit? and thou ſaideſt, I doe believe: and the third time thou wert plunged; that thy three-fold confeßion might waſh away the many lapſes of thy former life. S. Denis ſays that the trine immerſion ſignifies the Divine eſſence eſſence and beatitude of God in a Trinity of Perſons. S. Athanaſius ſays it ſignifies the death, burial, and reſurrection of our Bleſſed Saviour, together with his being three dayes in the grave. And this thing was ſo the practice and cuſtome of the Church, that in the Canons of the Apoſtles * (as they are called) he that does not uſe trine immerſion is to be depoſed from his dignity. Τὼ μίαν βαπτισιν καταδυσιν ἀσεβεῖ ἐστι, It is impious and ungodly to immerge but once in baptiſme; ſo Zonaras upon that Canon: and S. Chryſoſtome derives it from Chriſts inſtitution, Omnibus myſteriis velut ſignum imponens Dominus, in tribus merſionibus aquæ unum baptiſma diſcipulis ſuis tradidit, Our Lord did as it were impoſe a ſigne upon every myſtery, and delivered one baptiſme to his Diſciples in three immerſions or dippings: and therefore ſays, that though this deſcended by tradition, yet it hath the authority of a law. And the ſame thing we find affirmed by Pope Pelagius, as he is cited by Gratian de conſecrat. diſt. 4. And Theodoret ſpeaking of the heretic Eunomius, who firſt of all without authority and againſt reaſon did uſe but ſingle immerſion, he ſays that he ſubverted the rite of holy baptiſme which at firſt was delivered by our Lord and his Apoſtles.

14. Now in theſe particulars it is evident that the Ancient Churches did otherwiſe then we doe: but that is not ſufficient to force us to break the Eccleſiaſtical cuſtome which is of long abode with us. But when they ſay, theſe things are to be done by Divine precept, we are to conſider that upon it's own account: and though ſome of the Fathers did ſay ſo, yet it can never be proved to be ſo; and it were ſtrange that there ſhould be a Divine Commandement of which there is no mention made in the four Goſpels, nor in the Acts or Epiſtles of the Apoſtles. But then that there is in dipping, and in the repetition of it more correſpondencie to the analogy and myſtery of the Sacrament, is evident; the one being a Sacrament of the death and burial of Chriſt, the other a confeſſion of, and an admiſſion to the faith and profeſſion of God in the moſt Holy Trinity: and therefore I ſay, it is ſufficient warrant that every ſingle perſon break that cuſtome of ſprinkling which is againſt the Eccleſiaſtical Law; and it is alſo a ſufficient reaſon to move the Church to introduce a contrary cuſtome to the other of ſingle immerſion, concerning which as yet there is no law. But becauſe there is even in ſprinkling ſomething of the analogy of the myſtery, as is rightly obſerved by Aquinas and Dominicus à Soto; and becauſe it is not certain that the beſt repreſentation and the moſt expreſſive ceremony is requir'd; therefore the Church upon great cauſe may lawfully doe either: but becauſe it is better to uſe dipping, and it is more agreeable to the myſtery to uſe it three times, and that ſo the Ancient Church underſtood it, therefore theſe things are a ſufficient warrant to acquit us from the obligation of the contrary cuſtome; becauſe a cuſtome againſt which there is ſo much probability, and in which there is no neceſſity and no advantage, is to be preſumed unreaſonable.

15. But if the cuſtome of ſingle immerſion ſhould by ſome new-ariſing neceſſity become reaſonable, then it not onely might be retained, but ought to be complied with. Thus it hapned in Spain in the year DC. the Arrian Biſhops finding their advantage in the readily-prepared cuſtome of trine immerſion, uſed it and expounded it to ſignify the ſubſtantial difference of the Son and the Holy Ghoſt from the Father. Upon this Leander the Biſhop of Sevil gives advice and notice to S. Gregory Biſhop of Rome; who commends mends Leander for using a single immersion, which he did to signify the Unity of nature in the Divinity, & that he might not comply with the Arrians: and this was afterwards brought into custome, and then into a law by the Can. 5. alias 6. fourth Council of Toledo. But unless such an accident happen, and that the reason be changed, every Church is to use her first customes, those which be right, and agreeable to the sense and purpose of the Sacrament. But otherwise an evil custome is better broken then kept.

Rule XVI.

The Decrees and Canons of the Bishops of Rome oblige the conscience of none but his own subjects.

1. THis must needs follow from divers of the former discourses: for if Bishops in their spiritual capacity have no power of making laws of external regiment without the leave of their Princes, or the consent of their people, then supposing the Popes great pretence were true, that he is the head or chief of the Ecclesiastical order, that from him they receive immediately all the spiritual power they have, yet this will afford him no more then what Christ left to the whole order; of which I have already given accounts.

2. But in this there will be the lesse need of inquiry, for since the Bishop of Rome by arts which all the world knows had raised an intolerable Empire, he us'd it as violently as he got it, and made his little finger heavier then all the loyns of Princes: and in the Council of Trent, when in the Cap. 20. 25th Session the Fathers confirmed and commanded the observation of all Canons, General Councils, Apostolical ordinances made in favour of Ecclesiastical persons and Ecclesiastical liberty, they at once by establishing the Popes Empire, destroyed it quite, for they made it impossible to obey, and the Consciences of people were set at liberty, because they were commanded every man to beare a steeple upon his back. For first there were Lib. 2. c. 11. an infinite number of Apostolical ordinances, saith Cardinal Cusanus, which were never received even when they were made. Then let it be considered what there is to be done to Gratian's decretum, which is made part of the Popes law: and who knows in that Concordantia discordantiarum, that contradictory heap of sayings, which shall, and which shall not oblige the Conscience? But then the Decretals of Gregory the 9th and of Boniface the 8th, the Clementines and Extravagants, all those laws in that book which is called Collectio diversarum constitutionum & literarum Romanorum Pontificum, and in another called Epistolæ decretales Summorum Pontificum in three volumes, and in another called Eclogæ Bullarum & motuum propriorum, and in another called Summa Pontificum, and in the seventh book of the Decretals not long since composed, and in their Rules of Chancery, their Penitentiary taxes, and some other books of such loads as these that I need not adde to this intolerable heap: but that a Christian Bishop should impose, and a Council of Christian Bishops and Priests should tie upon the Consciences of men such burdens which they can never reckon, never tell over, never know, never understand; and that they should doe it then when a Christian Emperour had given advice that the Decrees and Canons should be reduc'd to a less number, and made to conform to the laws of God, is so sad a story, so unlike the spirit of Christ and to government Apostolical, that it represents the happiness of Christendome that they are not oblig'd to such laws, and the unhappiness that would be upon them if the Pope had the rule and real obligations of the Consciences of Christendome.

3. But of these things the world hath been long full of complaint; as appears in the writings of the [a] Cardinal of Cusa, in [b] Marsilius of Padua, in Aventinus, in [d] Albericus Rosate, in [e] Gregory Hambourg, in [f] Matthew of Paris, [g] Matthew of Westminster, [h] Nicolaus de Clemangiis, [i] Franciscus Duarenus, [k] the Cardinal of Cambray, and many others both collected by Goldastus, and the Catalogus testium veritatis by Illyricus. Insomuch that if the people had not been ignorant and superstitious, qui facilius vatibus quam Ducibus parent suis, and more willing to obey their Priests then their Princes, and if the Princes had not been by such means over-powered, these Decrees and Canons would have been as easily rejected as many others have been. For if by the Papal sanction they doe oblige the Conscience, then they all oblige. If they all oblige, how comes it to pass that, as Cusanus saies, infinite numbers of them are rejected when they are newly made? And if so many of them may be rejected, then which of them shall oblige? If they oblige by the authority of the Pope, that is alike in them all: If by the condition of the matter, then they bind as they agree with our duty to God and to Princes, with the publick good, and the edification of the Church; and then the authority it self is nothing.

4. And it is no trifling consideration, that the body of the Canon law was made by the worst and the most ambitious Popes. Alexander the third, who made Gratian's decree to become law, was a schismatical Pope, an Antipope, and unduly elected: The rest were Gregory the ninth, Boniface the eighth, Clement the fifth, John the 22, persons bloudy and ambitious, traitors to their princes, and butchers of Christendome by the sad warres they rais'd, and therefore their laws were likely to be the productions of violence and warre, not of a just and peaceable authority.

5. But to come nearer to the point of Conscience; who made the Bishop of Rome to be the Ecclesiastical law-giver to Christendome? For every Bishop hath from Christ equal power, and there is no difference but what is introduc'd by men, that is, by laws positive, by consent, or by violence. Ad Trinitatis instar, cujus una est atque individua potestas, unum est per diversos Antistites sacerdotium, said Pope Symmachus. As is the power of the holy Trinity, one and undivided; so is the Episcopacy, divided amongst all the Bishops, but the power is the same. So S. Cyprian, Una est Ecclesia per totum mundum in multa membra divisa: item Episcopatus unus, Episcoporum multorum concordi numerositate diffusus; As there is but one Church in the whole world divided into many members, so there is but one Bishoprick parted into an agreeing number of Bishops. And again, Let no man deceive the Brotherhood with a lie, let no man corrupt the truth of faith with a perfidious

Epiſt. 5. the ſame purpoſe is that of Pope Damaſus, writing to the African Biſhops to require their aide in a matter of diſcipline, Nos excuſare non poſſumus, ſi ejus Eccleſiam quæ nobis generaliter commiſſa eſt in quantũ prævalemus puram à tam illicitis ſuperſtitionibus non cuſtodiamus, quia non aliter unus grex & unus Paſtor ſumus, niſi quemadmodum Apoſtolus docet, id ipſum dicamus omnes, &c. The Church is committed to us in common, and we have no other way of being one flock and one ſhepherd, but by ſpeaking the ſame things] that is, conſenting and joyning in the common government. This is the ſame which S. Hierom affirm'd, Omnis Epiſcopus, ſive Romæ fuerit, ſive Eugubii, ſive Conſtantinopoli, ſive Rhegii, ſive Alexandriæ, ſive Tanais, ejuſdem eſt meriti, ejuſdem ſacerdotii: It is all one, there is no difference in worthineſs and power, whether he be Biſhop of Rome or Eugubium, Conſtantinople or Rhegium, Tanais or Alexandria. For as it was with the Apo-

Cyprian de unit. Eccleſ. ſtles, ſo with their ſucceſſors; Hoc utique erant cæteri Apoſtoli quod erat Petrus, pari conſortio præditi & honoris & poteſtatis, What Peter was that the reſt of the Apoſtles were; He was the Vicar of Chriſt on earth, and ſo were they, and ſo are their ſucceſſors. Caput enim Eccleſiæ Chriſtus eſt, Chriſti autem Vicarii Sacerdotes ſunt, qui vice Chriſti legatione funguntur in Eccleſia, ſaid Pope Hormiſda: and S. Cyprian calls the Biſhop, unum ad tempus vice Chriſti Judicem, the Deputy and vicegerent of Chriſt. S. Peter had

Vide S. Cypr. l. 1. ep. 3. & lib. 5. ep. 6. S. Ambroſe in 1 Cor. 11. the Keyes given him, ſo had the Apoſtles, and ſo have their Succeſſors; S. Peter was the pillar of the Church, and ſo were the other Apoſtles; He was a foundation, and ſo were they; for Chriſt hath built his Church upon the foundation of the Apoſtles and Prophets. He was Πέτρος, and every one of them was πέτρα, a rock, and Chriſt was the Corner-ſtone. And what they were in their perpetual office, that the Biſhops are. Antiſtitem puriorem cæteris eſſe oportet, ipſius enim [Chriſti] perſonam habere videtur, eſt enim

In Quæſt. Vet. & N. Teſt. q. ult. & ad fratres in Eremo, cap. 37. vicarius ejus, ut quod cæteris licet, illi non liceat, quia neceſſe habet quotidie Chriſti vicem agere, ſaid S. Auſtin. A Biſhop ought to be more holy then others, becauſe he hath the perſon of Chriſt, he is his Vicar, what is lawful to others is not lawful for him, for he every day is in his place or ſtead. Adde to this, that the power which the Biſhops have, they have it immediately from Chriſt, they are ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles, of all, not of Peter onely, many Apoſtolical Churches which were eſtabliſhed by others being ſucceeded in as well as Rome; that theſe things are evident in matter of fact, and univerſally affirmed in antiquity clearly and without diſpute.

6. From hence it muſt needs follow that by the law of Chriſt one Biſhop is not ſuperior to another. Concerning which I need no other teſtimony then that excellent ſaying of S. Cyprian in the Council of Carthage, It remains (ſaith he) that we all ſpeak what every one of us does think, judging no man, and refuſing to communicate with no man that ſhall happen to be of a differing judgment. Neque enim quiſquam noſtrum ſe Epiſcopum Epiſcoporum conſtituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obſequendi neceſſitatem collegas ſuos adegit; quando habeat omnis Epiſcopus pro licentia libertatis & poteſtatis ſuæ arbitrium proprium, tanquam judicari ab alio non poſſit, cum nec ipſe poſſit alterum alterum judicare: ſed expectemus univerſi judicium Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti, qui unus & ſolus habet poteſtatem & præponendi nos in Eccleſiæ ſuæ gubernatione, & de actu noſtro judicandi, For none of us makes himſelf a Biſhop of Biſhops, or by tyrannical terror compels his collegues to a neceſsity of complying: for every Biſhop hath a liberty and power of his own arbitrement, neither can he be judged by any one, nor himſelf judge any other; but we all muſt expect the judgment of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who by himſelf and alone hath power of ſetting us over the government of his Church, and of judging us for what we doe. Now if all Biſhops be equal in their power, then the Pope can by the laws of Chriſt make laws no more then any Biſhop can; and what the legiſlative of the Biſhop is, I have already declar'd and prov'd: and therefore for theſe and infinite other reaſons the Conſciences of Chriſtians may be at peace as to the Canons of the Popes, out of his temporal juriſdiction. Concerning which other reaſons who pleaſe to require them may find enough in * Spalatenſis, in the replies of our Engliſh Prelates in the queſtions of ſupremacy and allegeance, in Chamier, Moulin, Gerard, and divers others. I have the leſs need to inſiſt upon any more particulars, becauſe I write in a Church where this queſtion is well underſtood, and ſufficiently determin'd to all effects of Conſcience. I onely adde the ſaying of Æneas Sylvius who was himſelf a Pope, Ante Concilium Nicenum quiſque ſibi vivebat, & parvus reſpectus habebatur ad Eccleſiam Romanam, Before the Nicene Council every man lived to himſelf (that is, by his proper meaſures, the limits of his own Church) and little regard was had to the Church of Rome.

§. IV.

Of the matter and conditions of ECCLESIASTICAL Laws requir'd to the obligation of Conſcience.

RULE XVII.

Eccleſiaſtical laws that are meerly ſuch cannot be Univerſal and perpetual.

1. I Doe not mean onely that Eccleſiaſtical laws can be abrogated by an Authority as great as that which made them; for all poſitive laws both of God and man can be ſo, and yet there are ſome of both which have been obligatory to all men under ſuch a government, and during ſuch a period, that have been called perpetual & for ever. But that which is here intended is of greater conſequence and concern to the Conſcience, and it is this, That Eccleſiaſtical laws meerly ſuch, that is, thoſe which doe not involve a divine law within their matter, muſt be ſo made as that they doe not infringe Chriſtian liberty; and ſecondly, that they be ſo enjoyn'd, that the Commandements of men be not taught for doctrines. Theſe are very material conſiderations, but of great difficulty; and therefore it is fit they be moſt ſeriouſly conſidered.

2. They muſt be impoſed ſo as to leave our liberty unharm'd; that is, that the law be not univerſal, not with an intent to oblige all Chriſtendome, except they will be obliged, that is, doe conſent. For laws are in publick as actions in particular; actions are done by ſingle men, and laws are made by limited communities. A Society cannot be ſaid to doe an action, and the whole world cannot be ſaid to make a law; but as the action is done by a determin'd perſon, ſo the law is made by a determin'd Government, as by the Church of England, of Rome, of Millain; and the Catholick Church never yet did meet ſince the Apoſtles daies in any aſſembly to make a law that ſhall bind all Chriſtians whether they conſent or no. And becauſe one Church hath not by any word of Chriſt authority over another Church, and one King is not ſuperior to another King, but all are ſupreme in their own dominions, of which the Church is at leaſt a part, and if they be all Chriſtian, it is that Church, that Chriſtian dominion; it muſt neceſſarily follow that no Eccleſiaſtical law can be made with a power of paſſing neceſſary obligation upon all Chriſtians. And therefore the Code of the Catholick Church was nothing but a collection of ſome private conſtitutions which were conſented to by many Churches, and to which they bound themſelves, but did not long ſtand ſo, but changed them more or leſs according as they pleas'd. And when the Roman Emperors made any Canon Eccleſiaſtical into a law, it was a part of the Civil law, and by that authority did oblige as other civil laws did, not all the world, but onely the Roman world, the ſubjects of that dominion.

3. But when any law or Canon Eccleſiaſtical is made, it is made by a certain number of Eccleſiaſtics, or by all. If by all, then all conſent firſt or laſt, and then every Biſhop may govern his charge by that meaſure; but that was never yet reduc'd to practice, and prevails onely by conſent: But if by a certain number onely, then they can but by that meaſure rule their own ſubjects; but if they obtrude it upon others, then comes in the precept of the Apoſtle, Stand faſt in the liberty with which Chriſt hath made you free, and be not again intangled in the yoke of bondage.

4. For when Chriſt had made us free from the law of Ceremonies which God appointed to that nation, and to which all other nations were bound if they came into that Communion; it would be intolerable that the Churches, who rejoyced in their freedome from that yoke which God had impoſed, ſhould ſubmit themſelves to a yoke of ordinances which men ſhould make: for though before they could not, yet now they may exerciſe communion and uſe the ſame religion without communicating in rites and ordinances.

5. This does no way concern the ſubjects of any government (what liberty they are to retain and uſe, I ſhall diſcourſe in the following numbers) but it concerns diſtinct Churches under diſtinct Governments, and it means, as appears plainly by the context and the whole analogy of the thing, that the Chriſtian Churches muſt ſuffer no man to put a law upon them who is not their Governour. If he have undertaken a pious diſcipline, let him propound it, and for God's glory and the zeale of ſouls endeavour to perſwade it; for all that is not againſt Chriſtian liberty, untill any man or any Church ſhall impoſe it, and command it, whether the Churches pleaſe or no, whether they judge it expedient or no, whether it be for their edification or not for their edification: that's not to be ſuffered; it is againſt our Evangelical liberty, and the Apoſtolical injunction.

And

6. And this was ſo well underſtood by the Primitive Churches, that though the Biſhops did appoint temporary and occaſional faſts in their Churches upon emergent and great accidents, as Tertullian affirms, yet they would ſuffer no Biſhop to impoſe any law of faſting upon others, but all Churches would keep their own liberty, as I have already proved in this Chapter*: & when Montanus did νηστείας νομοθετῆν make a law of faſting, not for his own Church, but intended that all Chriſtians ſhould keep the faſts appointed, they made an outcry againſt him & would not endure it; & yet he did it onely for diſcipline, not for doctrine, for piety, not as of neceſſity, as appears in Tertullian's book of faſting, in the firſt & ſecond Chapters: and they alſo did keep faſting-days ſet and ſolemn, every Biſhop in his own Church, at what times they would, but almoſt all upon Good-Friday; but this was by conſent and with liberty, and that they ought to defend, and ſo they did. * Rule 13. n. 9. Vide etiam c. 13. & 15.

But Eccleſiaſtical laws muſt not be perpetual.

7. That is, when they are made, they are relative to time and place, to perſons and occaſions, ſubject to all changes, fitted for uſe and the advantage of Churches, miniſtring to edification, and complying with charity. Now whatſoever is made with theſe conditions, cannot be perpetual: and whatſoever Eccleſiaſtical Law hath not theſe conditions, the Churches ought not to receive, becauſe they are impediments, not advantages to the ſervice of God. If they be thus qualified, no good man will refuſe them; if they be not, they are the laws of Tyrants, not of Spiritual Fathers: For this whole affaire is fully ſtated in thoſe words of our Bleſſed Saviour; reproving of the Phariſees and their Eccleſiaſtical laws, he ſays, they by their traditions did evacuate the Commandement of God, and they taught for doctrines the commandements of men. The full ſenſe of which when we underſtand, we have the full meaſure of Eccleſiaſtical laws, not onely as they relate to the Churches and communities of Chriſtians under diſtinct governments, but to every ſingle Chriſtian under his own governour and ſuperior. Theſe I ſay are the Negative meaſures: that is, Eccleſiaſtical laws are not good and are not binding if they be impos'd againſt the intereſt of a Divine Commandement, or if they be taught as doctrines. Of the firſt there is no doubt, and in it there is no difficulty: But in the latter there is a very great one.

8. For when our ſuperiors impoſe a law of diſcipline, they ſay it is good, it is pleaſing to God, it is a good inſtrument and miniſtery to ſome vertue, or at leaſt it is an act of obedience, and that it is ſo, is true doctrine: what hurt can there be in all this? The commandements of men are bound upon us by the Commandement of God, and therefore when they are once impoſed, they ceaſe to be indifferent, and therefore may then become διδαχαὶ doctrines and points of religion; what then is that which our Bleſſed Saviour reproves? and what is our Negative meaſure of Eccleſiaſtical laws?

9. To this the anſwer is beſt given by a narrative of what the Phariſees did, and was reproved: for all was not repugnant to the law of God, neither is all that amiſſe which men teach to be done. For our Bleſſed Saviour commanded us to hear them that ſate in Moſes chaire, and to doe whatſo-ever they commanded: not abſolutely whatſoever, but whatſoever of a certain ſort; that is, 1. whatſoever they taught by a probable interpretation of what was doubtfull, 2. or by faithfull counſel concerning things belonging to piety and charity, 3. or by a determining to circumſtances of time and place thoſe things which were left to their choice and conduct.

10. Whatſoever was beſides theſe, that is, 1. whatſoever had it's foundation in the opinions of men, and not in ſomething certainly derived from God, if brought into religion, and impos'd on mens conſciences as a part of the ſervice of God, this is the teaching for doctrines the commandements of men. But beſides this 2. if what is deduc'd onely by probable interpretation be obtruded as a matter of faith; or 3. if what is piouſly counſel'd, be turned into a perpetual and abſolute law; or 4. if that which was left to the choice and conduct of the governours, be handled not as matter of liberty, but of neceſſity; in all theſe caſes the commandements of men are taught for doctrines.

11. The reaſon of theſe things is plain. For the firſt; If it have no foundation in the law of God, but in humane opinions, and yet be taught for doctrine, it is literally the thing that is here reproved. For the ſecond: Whatſoever is but probably collected is not the word of God, for that is always certain: it is true it is not probable in it ſelf, but in it ſelf is true or falſe; but to him it is but probable, and therefore to ſay this is the word or the Commandement of God, is more then the man can ſay; it is to ſay that it is true in it ſelf, that is, it is a doctrine of God, when indeed it is but the word of Man for ought we know.* For the third; When God hath left it at liberty, if man turnes it into a commandement, and teaches it for the law of God, he does more then God would doe, and more then is true; for God never made it into a law, and man cannot make it to become God's law: for the Eccleſiaſtic order being but God's Miniſter and the publiſher of God's will, muſt propoſe things as they received them from God; that which is law, as neceſſary, that which is Counſel, as highly rewardable. For the fourth; If it be left in the power of the Governours, then it is hoc ipſo evident that it is not neceſſary, and therefore though it may miniſter to order and diſcipline, yet it muſt doe no more: it may be called obedience, ſo long as it is juſtly bound upon us with the cords of a man; but it muſt not in any other ſenſe nor at any time be called religion. How theſe two laſt ſorts may be made into laws I ſhall account when I ſpeak of the poſitive meaſures of Eccleſiaſtical laws; but abſtracting from that ſuperinduc'd obligation, to teach theſe things as neceſſary which God hath not made ſo, is to doe as the Phariſees did, whom our Bleſſed Saviour ſo reproves.

12. An example of the firſt is the Phariſees teaching the waſhing of cups and diſhes, becauſe they ſaid that if a Gentile or any unclean perſon had touch'd their veſſel that touch'd their meat, the impurity would goe into their body that eat it, and from thence into their ſoul; and therefore they taught the doctrine or tradition of cleanſing veſſels and waſhing their hands,

Πρὸς τὸ κενὸν, as he ſaid in the Greek Comedy; finding out a vain remedy to cure a phantaſtical diſeaſe. Thus in the Church of Rome, they exorciſe ſalt and water to caſt out Devils; they give verſes out of the Pſalms or Goſpels to charm witches; they ring the bells to appeaſe tempeſts, and very many more ſuch ridiculous devices. 2. Of the ſecond we have examples enough in the Council of Trent, who drew into a body of articles, and declar'd thoſe things, ſome of which are but probable at moſt, and ſome of them apparently falſe, to be articles of faith: and under this thoſe alſo muſt needs be involved, who perſecute men for opinions and doubtfull diſputations. 3. Of the third, they are very evil examples who to ſome whole orders of men lay an injunction of keeping Evangelical counſels: ſuch who forbid the whole order of the ſuperior Clergy to marry, and command them that are married to forſake their wives or their office and livelihood. 4. But they are guilty of the fourth kind of prevaricating of the words of our Bleſſed Saviour, who perſecute the breakers of an Eccleſiaſtical Law with a ſeverity greater then the violators of a Divine Commandement. For if there be any liberty of any ſort left after an indifferent action is made into a law of man, it is all deſtroyed by them who give leſſe liberty to the tranſgreſſion of that law then to the breach of God's law, under which there is left no liberty, but the liberty of a chearfull and voluntary obedience. For they that doe ſuch things muſt needs at leaſt ſay that ſuch humane injunctions are as neceſſary as the Divine Commandements; for elſe why are they more ſeverely puniſhed?

13. The ſumme is this; Not onely thoſe who expreſſely teach that what they have invented is a Commandement of God, but all they that ſay any thing is a law of God which is not, though it be good, though it be probable, and all they which uſe arts and ſecret devices and little arguments and inforcements, and preſſe indifferent things up to the height and neceſſity of religion and a Divine Commandement, are guilty of this Phariſaiſme, obnoxious to our Saviours reproof, and if it be in the matter of Eccleſiaſtical laws, have exceeded their meaſures and their power, and bind themſelves, but not the conſciences of their ſubjects. A Commandement is not onely then broken when we bid open defiance to it, but then alſo when we doe actions unlike the vertue of it, and actions tending to the violation of it; that is, there are degrees of violation of a Divine law: and an Eccleſiaſtical law that does in any degree break this law of our Bleſſed Saviour is therefore void, and is become intolerable.

14. Of theſe things I ſhall yet give two great examples, one of the Phariſees, and another of ſome that follow their example in this affair. God gave a Commandement to the Jews of keeping holy the Sabbath-day, their new Moons and ſome other ſolemnities. Now there were many particulars in the obſervation which were not determin'd in the Law; but 1. what was doubtfull was to be expounded by their Doctors. 2. Some things were left to the liberty of good people, and the meaſure of them was beſt determin'd by their Doctors and men learned in the Law. 3. There were ſome Canons Eccleſiaſtical which were outer guards and hedges to the law it ſelf, that men might by thoſe diſtances be kept farther off from ſin; and in theſe things their Rulers alſo had power. Now though all this they could doe, and might pretend an authority from God to interpret the Law and to guide the Conſciences, yet when they fell into ridiculous Commentaries and uſeleſſe Gloſſes, neither the law it ſelf about which their interpretations were imployed, nor their authority which they had from God could ſecure them from tyranny, and corruption, and doing violence to Conſcience, and impoſing unequal burdens. "Thus we find that their "Rabbins taught that upon a ſolemn feaſt-day it was not lawful to catch "fiſh in their ponds, but they might hunt the hens and catch the geeſe in "their yard. They might not blow the fire with a pair of bellows, becauſe "that was too like the labour of Smiths; but they might blow it through "a hollow Cane. They might make a fire and ſet on their pot, but they muſt "not lay on their wood like the ſtructure of a houſe, that is, too artifici-"ally; and you muſt roſt or boyle no more then was neceſſary: and if you "made a fire, you might waſh your feet with warm water, but not your "whole body. You muſt not touch an egge that was laid that day; nay if "you were doubtful whether it were laid that-day or no, yet you might not "eat it, and if that were mingled with a thouſand, you might touch none of "them: but if you kill'd a hen, you might eat the perfect eggs that you "found in her. Theſe and many more ſuch little doctrines they taught to be obſerved, as explications and manners of the obſervation of the Divine Commandement: but theſe I have here tranſcrib'd from the Jewes books, that we may perceive the ſenſe of our Bleſſed Saviour's reproof by the inſtances of their prevarication. He was pleaſed to ſpeak to that of waſhing of cups and platters: but it is alſo ſaid there, καὶ ἄλλα πολλά ἐστιν, there are many other things, ſuch as that was which they have received and teach, ſome of which I have recited. Now we doe not find that the Phariſees taught theſe as divine Commandements, but they us'd them as if they were; they did them ὁσίας χάριν, they thought themſelves the more holy for doing them, they accounted them profane that did not, they plac'd much of their religion and Phariſaiſme or ſeparation in them, eſteeming them a part of the divine worſhip: This was their caſe, and Chriſt gave their ſentence.

15. The other inſtance which I promiſed is the law of the Roman Church in keeping of Lent; which it is certain was no law of Chriſt, not ſo much as the interpretation of a Divine law. Some of them pretend it was enjoyned by the Apoſtles; others of them ſay not, and theſe ſay true; ſo that it is a Commandement of men: but yet this they teach for doctrine in the culpable and criminal ſenſe, that is,

16. 1. They value it more then ſome Commandements of God. I need no other proof but the words of Eraſmus, Veluti parricida, penè dixerim, rapitur ad ſupplicium, qui pro piſcium carnibus guſtarit carnes ſuillas, He that in ſtead of fiſh ſhall but taſt a piece of pork is dragg'd to puniſhment almoſt as if he were a parricide. Guſtavit aliquis carnes, clamant omnes, O cœlum! O terra! O maria Neptuni! Nutat Eccleſiæ ſtatus, &c. If they ſee a man eat fleſh, they are amaz'd, they think the Church is in danger; they put men to death, to the ſharpeſt death of burning alive, for eating fleſh; they ſhut up the Butchers ſhambles, but leave open the publick Stews.

Epiſt. ad Epiſ. Paſil.

17. 2. They account it to be a part of the ſervice of God, not onely as it is an act of obedience to ſuperiors, but in it ſelf and without any relative conſideration. Bellarmine ſaies they are not Chriſtians that eat fleſh in Lent: which words are extremely falſe, or elſe every one that diſobeys an Eccleſiaſtical law hath forfeited his Chriſtendome; or elſe he places the ſumme and life of religion in the keeping of Lent, and makes it a vital part, expreſsly prevaricating one of the moſt glorious propoſitions of Chriſtianity, anity, placing the Kingdome of God in meat and drink, not in righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost; and doing that which the Apostle hath forbidden, when he said to the Colossians, let no man judge you in meat and drink. If it were onely a question of obedience to the law, it were to be considered upon a distinct account, and were a sin or duty respectively according to the several dispositions of the person and the law: but no man saies that he is no Christian who at any time breaks any Ecclesiastical law; and therefore in this more is pretended, and it is to be reckoned amongst the διδασκαλίαι, ἐντάλματα ἀνθρώπων, the commandements of men that are taught for doctrines.

Rom. 14. 17.

Coloss. 2. 16.

18. 3. They account the exterior action, the body of the injunction, the element of it to be a service of God; and for that part of it esteem themselves the more holy and the better Christians, as appears in their contentions about it, using arguments to prove the very Fast to be a sacrifice, a pure oblation *. Now it is true that fasting is a good ministery to divers holy purposes, but it is no more; it is that which can be supplied by other ministeries as apt, and therefore that in kind is not necessary, nor requir'd; it is that whose work can be done without any ministery at all in some persons & some cases, even by love and by obedience, by hope and fear, which are of themselves direct graces, vertues and parts of the service of God. And therefore the Fathers of the Church press in their Sermons and exhortations to fasting, that they would take care to acquire the end of fasting, to be free from vice, to mortify the affections and lusts; according to that saying of Isidore, Fastings with good works are acceptable to God: But he that abstains from meat, and does evil, imitates the Devils, quibus esca non est, & nequitia semper est, They never eat, but ever doe wickedly and perversly. But he fasts well that fasts from maliciousness and secular ambitions. Take heed therefore, saies S. Hierom to Celantia, that when you begin to fast and use abstinence, you doe not think your self holy. For this strength adjumentum est, non perfectio sanctitatis, it is not the perfection of sanctity, but a help onely. Νηστείας ὄφελος οὐδὲν, ἂν μὴ καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ ἕπηται πάντα, and there is no profit at all of fasting, unless all things else doe follow, saith S. Chrysostome; that is ἀποχὴ ἁμαρτημάτων an abstinence from sin intirely: and again, what gain is it if ἔρημοι καὶ κοιλοδωμάτων being void and empty of good works we have kept the fast? If therefore another saies, I have fasted all the Lent, say thou, I had an enemy, but I am reconcil'd; I had an evil Custome of detracting from my neighbours fame, but I have left it off; I had an ungodly custome of swearing, but it is now amended. The summe is this, which I represent in the words of Prosper, jejunia, abstinentiæ, ac cætera hujusmodi, non pro justitia, sed cum justitia Deo sunt exhibenda, Abstinence and fastings are not to be given to God for good works, but with them. That is, they are of use in order to certain purposes, which when they doe effect they are good, when they doe not, they are useless troubles; and if they then be urg'd beyond their ministery, and instrumentality, and for themselves, then we return to the beggerly elements and rudiments of the synagogue: and if we suffer our selves to be brought under the power of these things by laws and affrightments and spiritual terrors, then we have lost our Christian liberty which was bought by the best bloud of the world.

L. 3. de vitâ contemplat. cap. 10.

19. 4. But not onely the exterior and instrumental act is absolutely urged and taught as necessary, but a circumstance, a manner and forme of that exterior inſtrument is enjoyned. It is enjoyn'd not that we faſt totally; but that we faſt ſo: you may dine if you will eat at the Merchants hours, after twelve or one of the clock, but you may not eat fleſh; you may eat ſweetmeats, the moſt delicious fiſh, the Sturgeon and the Scarus, the Lamprey and the Oyſter, the Eele and the Salmon, and all the delicacies of Nature, ſo you doe not touch the fillets of a Veal, nor eat an Egge or Milk, Curds or Cheeſe, or any thing that comes from a beaſt or bird. Now what can be the meaning of this, when it comes to be expounded by wiſe and ſober men that can judge of the cauſes and differences of things? For if abſtinence and faſting be the thing that is requir'd, this is nothing of it: if we may dine, if we may fill our bellies with wine and delicacies, if we may eat and, as Adam might, of all the garden of Eden, it is no great matter as to temperance and abſtinence, as to mortification and auſterities, if we abſtain from one; it may be ſomething as to our health, and ſo certainly it is to very many bodies. It may be an inſtrument of vexation, but it cannot edify. Is any man cur'd of his luſt by eating nothing but fiſh and broaths for forty daies? He may indeed be made ſick by it, and ſo very many are, but the intereſt of no vertue is ſerv'd by it, but by the other permiſſions it may be more deſtroyed; and by fiſhes and broaths and artificial meats proviſions may be too abundantly made for the fleſh to fulfill the luſts thereof. What therefore is in this manner of the law, but ſomething of the beggerly religion of meats and drinks? In the daies of Proſper they abſtain'd from the fleſh of beaſts, but not of birds; and his ſentence of that kind of faſting is this, "But they that abſtaining from the fleſh of four-footed beaſts, enjoy "the fleſh of Pheſants and other precious birds or fiſhes, ſeem to me not "to cut off the delights of their bodies, but to change them, and to caſt "away the common and cheap delicacies of fleſh, that they may fill their "pleaſures with more delicious and more precious fleſh; not for abſti-"nence, but becauſe ſome fleſh is unclean, or rather, as I ſuppoſe, for the "tenderneſs of their wanton ſtomacks: ſince the nature of any fleſh is not "to be condemned, if it be intended for mans uſe and appointed by God; "but the luſts of the fleſh are to be avoided, which the Devil hath ſuperin-"duc'd and offers to our ſenſes. But they that would ſeem to themſelves "more abſtinent, and by it acquire fame and noiſes, doe ſo abſtain from "fleſh, that they fill their vaſt appetite with rare fruits and curious "broaths: but ſpiritual abſtinence perſwades not to refrain the uſe of cer-"tain meats, but the reſtraint of the luſt and the deſire; and they are ra-"ther to be eſteem'd abſtinent, who forbid not to themſelves the uſe of "ſome meats, but the delights of the body.] And indeed let it be conſi-dered; if a man pretending to mortify his body ſhall abſtain from wine, and will nevertheleſs drink ſherbets and delicious beurages, ſtrong ale and Spirits, I ſuppoſe his body will not by that diſcipline be dead to ſin: and ſo it is in the abſtinence from fleſh, unleſs he alſo abſtain from all nouriſh-ment but what is neceſſary and made pleaſant by want. For thus the holy Primitives when they had gotten the cuſtome of the Lenten faſt, for two daies, or ſix daies, or ten daies, or fifteen daies, according as the humor in-creaſed, they did generally abſtain from fleſh; but ſo they did alſo from fiſh, and wine, and all delicacies, and eat a drie diet, bread and water, herbs and common fruits, turneps and berries, flies and nuts: and yet this they did without making it a religion not to eat a bit of fleſh; but upon occaſion would eat a meale of fleſh, but not very delicious; and when their faſts were of many daies, they were not continual but intermitted. This latter

Lib. 2. de vit. contempl. cap. 23.

I have already proved; but that even in Lent the Primitive Chriſtians did not abhorre fleſh, appears beyond diſpute in the caſe of Spiridion Biſhop of Cyprus, who when a traveller came to him in the time of Lent very weary and faint, and there was no cold proviſions in the houſe ready dreſs'd, it being a time of faſting, bids his daughter to boyle ſome pork which was in the houſe powder'd for the uſe of the family: ſhe did ſo, and her Father the Biſhop eat of it, and bade his gueſt doe ſo too; who refus'd, ſaying that he was a Chriſtian. The Biſhop replied, therefore the rather you ought not to refuſe; becauſe the word of God hath ſaid, To the pure all things are clean. So Sozomen tels the ſtory. By which it is apparent, that then it was not the cuſtome for Chriſtians to eat fleſh in Lent, for they eat nothing that was pleaſant, but they abſtain'd becauſe it was pleaſant, not becauſe it was fleſh; for of this they made no religion, as appears in the fact and exhortation and argument of Spiridion. And of the ſame conſideration was that law of Juſtinian, in whoſe time, which was in the middle of the ſixth Age, the Cuſtome of abſtaining from fleſh in Lent did prevaile much; but becauſe it hapned in Conſtantinople to be great ſcarcity of other proviſions, the Emperor commanded the ſhambles to be open and fleſh to be publickly ſold. But Nicephorus tells that the people would not buy any, for they began to think it to be religion not to touch, not to taſt, not to handle. But the Emperor and the wiſe men knew no religion againſt it. And that which Marcian ſaid to Avitus in the like caſe is very conſiderable, We know that charity is better then faſting; for charity is a work of the Divine law, Νηστεία ὃ τῆς ἡμῶν ἐξουσίας, but faſting is a thing arbitrary and of our own choice. * Since therefore to eat fleſh or not to eat it, may become good or bad as it is us'd, and does not ſerve the end of faſting, and ſuch faſting does not ſerve the end of the ſpirit, not onely to make faſting to be religion, to which it does but miniſter, but to call that faſting which they who firſt began Lent would call feaſting and luxury, and to make that to be eſſential to that faſt, and that faſt neceſſary to ſalvation in the ordinary way of neceſſity, is not onely to teach for doctrine the Commandements of men, but to make the impotent, fantaſtick and unreaſonable devices of men to become Commandements.

Theodoret. hiſt. relig. in Marcian.

20. 5. That this may be an exact parallel with the practice of the Phariſees in that folly which our Bleſſed Saviour reprov'd; the Commandement does ſo little regard the true end of faſting, and that faſting ſo little advance the uſe and intereſt of any vertue, that they ſpend themſelves even in the circumſtances of ſome circumſtances, and little devices of ſuperſtition, taking care not to eat a turnip if boyl'd in a veſſel in which fleſh was put, not to cut their bread with a knife that had carv'd fleſh, not to taſt it, but to waſh their mouth after a little whey or broath, if by chance it hath been touch'd: which things becauſe they can ſerve no end of religion, the law that requires ſuch things muſt needs be fooliſh or ſuperſtitious; it muſt either play with mens conſciences as with a tenniſ-ball, or intimate ſome pollution and unholineſs at that time to be in the fleſh, or elſe at leaſt muſt pretend to greater ſtrictneſs then God does in the obſervation of his poſitive laws; and it certainly introduces the greateſt tyranny in the world, deſtroys peace, and is the moſt unwarrantable of all the follies which can be incident to the wiſer part of mankind, I mean to them that govern others.

I will

21. I will not inſtance in the ridiculous and ſuperſtitious queſtions which they make about the keeping of this Eccleſiaſtical law; as whether it be a dinner or a ſupper if we eat after Even-ſong ſaid at high noon; whether a mornings draught does break the Eccleſiaſtical faſt; whether a man may eat a bit of bread with his drink, and yet be a good ſon of the Church; whether a Cook that dreſſes meat for ſick perſons may lawfully lick his fingers; whether he that eats one bit of fleſh, ſins anew if he eats another; and whether or no he may not at the ſame rate eat fleſh all the Lent after; whether the wet nurſe may eat fleſh, becauſe her baby may have good milk; whether it be lawful to eat birds and fowls, becauſe they were produc'd out of the water: which doughty reaſon did incourage ſome to doe it, of whom Socrates ſpeaks, and is mention'd by Peter Comeſtor the Maſter of the ſcholaſtical hiſtory. Which queſtions, if they that make them be in their wits, and think other men are ſo too, they muſt needs believe that the keeping of Lent is ſo ſacred, ſo principal a point of religion, ſo great a ſervice of God in the very letter and body, in the cruſt and outſide of it, that the obſervation of it muſt conſiſt in a mathematical point: it is like the Decalogue, the very letters of which are numbred; and if a haire be miſſing, religion ſuffers diminution: and which of all theſe it be, yet in every one of them they doe what the Phariſees did and what Chriſt reprov'd in them, and therefore forbids in all men, they teach for doctrines the Commandements of Men.

Lib. 5. hiſt. cap. 21.

22. 6. To return to the particular of the Rule, They make an Eccleſiaſtical law, which is of a relative uſe and nature, to be periodical and perpetual, which is unreaſonable, and may be ſometimes unjuſt, and very often uncharitable, and therefore not the fit matter of an Eccleſiaſtical law. For this is certainly the greateſt deletery of the liberty of Chriſtian Churches, and a ſnare to Conſciences, and is of it ſelf apt to introduce ſuperſtition and the opinion of direct religion into the diſcipline.

23. But this is to be underſtood of ſuch laws which are intended for diſcipline, and are 1. a burden, and 2. of a nature relative to the future, and 3. of an alterable uſe. For if a law were made that every man at a certain time of the year ſhould doe a certain diſcipline to mortify his luſt, it were a fooliſh law; for the man at that time, it may be, needs it not, or he hath another remedy, or he is ſufficiently contrite for his ſins, and does his penance by internal ſorrow, or it may be he cannot at that time mourn, or it may be the cauſe is alter'd, or a greater cauſe intervenes, and that ought to be ſerv'd, and therefore not this, for if you ſerve both, you tire obedience, and make religion to be a burden: but which is moſt of all, a law of burden if it be perpetual, makes the willing to be ſlaves, and tempts the unwilling to be rebels; and becauſe it is intended to miniſter to things contingent and infinitely alterable, if the law be not ſo too, it muſt paſs into an opinion of being a Divine worſhip and religion, or elſe into more then an opinion and imagination of tyranny. Adde to this, that laws of burden are alwaies againſt charity, if they be not done in great neceſſity, or not effective of a good greater then the evil; and therefore to impoſe ſuch laws with a perpetual obligation upon Churches, when it cannot be of perpetual uſe, and at all times good, or juſt at ſuch times neceſſary, is againſt the equity & charity of that power which Chriſt intruſted in the hands of them whom he made ſtewards of his houſhold, feeders of his flock, and Fathers of his family.

24. But if the laws be relative to what is paſt, and no burden, but matter of eaſe or benefit, or comes from a perpetual cauſe, or that which is unalterable, then the law may be ſuch which will be perpetually conſented to, and kept for ever. Thus the Catholic Church keeps the Lords day, not by an everlaſting ordinance, but by a perpetual conſent, and for a never-failing reaſon; and that which makes it neceſſary now to keep that day, and will doe ſo for ever, is becauſe the reaſon of it is always the ſame; and in this caſe that which was fit at firſt, will be ſo at laſt, and all the way: and things are in that conſtitution and conjunction, that no man can deſpiſe that day, without being careleſſe to return thanks for the reſurrection of Chriſt, and to ſeparate a juſt portion of his time to the more ſolemn ſervice of God. But for all this, this is not a perpetual law impos'd upon all Churches; for God did not impoſe it, and no man hath power to doe it; for no mans power can laſt longer then his life: and therefore no Biſhop can oblige his ſucceſſors by any Canon, without the Civil power ſupervenes and fixes that law by continuation. And therefore although God did enjoyn the Jews an annual faſt for ever, and although the Rulers of the Jews did add ſome more, and they were obſerved for ever: yet this will not infer that therefore now this may be done in a law of the Church. For God who is a law-giver does abide for ever, and therefore his laws are to remain as long as he pleaſe: & the Rulers of the Jews had both the powers, Civil and Eccleſiaſtical, conjunct, and they by a current legiſlation ſtill caus'd their faſts to be obſerved; but yet the ſucceeding ages had been at liberty, and the Sanhedrim might have chang'd thoſe ſolemn days, but that they were eſtabliſhed by Prophets and by thoſe whom they believ'd to ſpeak the will of God: all which make their caſe ſpecial, and not to be drawn into example and warranty in the ſanction of Eccleſiaſtical laws in the Chriſtian Church. * To which let this be added, that the Jews might keep and obſerve a religion of days and meats, and it not being againſt the analogy of their manner of ſerving God, their Rulers had an equal power to make laws in the difference of days and meats, as in any other matter whatſoever. But the laws of the Church muſt miniſter to piety and holineſſe, and to nothing elſe; and they muſt be exacted with prudence and charity, and in no other manner; and they muſt be obeyed in love and liberty, and by no other meaſures: but the day or the meat muſt ever be the leſſe principal in the conſtitution; they may be the circumſtances, but no part of the Religion, and therefore cannot be perpetual; but juſt as a Venice glaſſe may, that is, if there be nothing to break it, it may abide for many ages, but every thing that ſtrikes it can break the glaſſe, & every requiſite of reaſon or charity can put a period, or take off the neceſſity of that portion in the law, which becauſe it muſt be leſſe principally regarded, muſt accordingly be impoſed and exacted, but cannot be univerſal and perpetual.

25. The reſult of theſe conſiderations is this; 1. Eccleſiaſtical laws may be made by particular Churches, to prevail in their own governments, and to paſſe on their own ſubjects, but may not by one Church be impoſed upon another, much leſſe from one to paſſe upon all.

26. 2. Eccleſiaſtical laws may be made and continued by any authority ſo long as that power laſts, and ſo long as the reaſon of the law does laſt: but it can be no longer a law then it hath influence from the remaining power who is to eſtabliſh it according to the remaining uſefulneſſe.

3. All

27. 3. All Eccleſiaſtical laws in the matter of meats and drinks and days muſt be wholly relative to religion; and the effect of graces and proper duties, and muſt not at all be impoſed with any regard to themſelves, but to the ends of their miniſtery, and muſt live and die according to the nature of Relative beings: but cannot be perpetual, but where neither the cauſe nor the ſubject alters.

28. 4. All Eccleſiaſtical laws muſt be impoſed with liberty: not with liberty of the ſubjects to obey or not to obey, but with the liberty of the whole Church, to change them or to continue them, to exact or to relax them, to bind or to looſe, as may beſt ſtand with prudence and charity, with the intereſts of vertue or the good of the ſubject.

29. 5. Eccleſiaſtical laws muſt ſerve religion, but muſt never pretend to be religion or a direct ſervice of God. It is true that all religious laws of our juſt ſuperiors rightly impoſed in order to any vertue are adopted into the ſociety of that vertue; as a law of faſting does alſo enjoyn a duty of temperance; a law of Chriſtian feſtivity, in order to our joy in God, and praiſing his Name, and paying him thanks, promotes all theſe graces, and therefore he that keeps that day to theſe purpoſes, beſides his obedience, does an act of all thoſe graces. Yet it is to be obſerved that the obſervation of theſe laws can never formally be reckoned to be actions of thoſe graces; they are but miniſteries and inſtruments, and they not neceſſary, but uſefull onely: and therefore he that does not obſerve that day, though it may be he ſins againſt obedience, yet he is not to be judg'd as if he were intemperate, or unthankfull, or unmindfull of God's benefits; becauſe though theſe appointments are made for the ſervices of theſe graces, yet theſe are not the adequate miniſteries of them, they may be done by other ways at other times, and they may at that time be omitted without any neglect of ſuch graces. If there be a juſt cauſe to omit the obſervation, then the omiſſion is neither diſobedience, nor intemperance, nor unthankfullneſſe: but if there be no juſt cauſe, it is diſobedience; and may be any of the other as it happens, but is not certainly ſo. But though in theſe reſpects to obey an Eccleſiaſtical law may be a doing an act of vertue together with the obedience, and ſo a ſerving of God; yet becauſe it is onely in regard of the concomitant act of vertue, which is ſerved by the law, if that law doe not ſerve that vertue, but by any cauſe be deſtitute of it's purpoſe, that external action which the law enjoyns is ſo far from being a ſervice of God, that if it be urg'd imperiouſly, or acted for it ſelf, and delighted in upon the Natural account, it enters into religion, with which it hath nothing to doe, and ſo paſſes into ſuperſtition.

30. 6. Eccleſiaſtical laws if by any means they be taught for doctrines and Commandements of God, they become unlawfull in the impoſition, though the actions of themſelves be lawfull; that is, they are unlawfull laws, and doe not bind the Conſcience, for they are ſuch things in which no man can have authority, for they are a direct deſtruction to Chriſtian liberty, which no man ought to take from us. If they once pretend to a neceſſity beſides the equal neceſſity of obedience, they doe not oblige the ſubjects of any government; but if they pretend to a neceſſity of obedience, they doe not oblige any Churches beſides that whoſe Governours have made the law.

RULE XVIII.

Eccleſiaſtical laws of Ceremonies and circumſtances of external obſervances doe not bind the conſcience beyond the caſes of Contempt and Scandal.

1. THat is they bind onely in publick, and not in private; they bind not for any thing that is in themſelves, but for ſomething that is better then themſelves; they bind, not for our own ſakes, but for their ſakes that look on: and therefore when no body looks on, when they have no end to ſerve, when they doe no good, when they ſignify nothing, they cannot bind at all; for whatſoever binds onely for this reaſon, does not bind at all when this reaſon is not. The Church of England commands that when the Prieſt ſays the Reſponſory after the Creed at Morning or Evening Prayer, he ſhall ſtand up: the purpoſe of it is, that the people who are concerned to anſwer may the better hear: but if the prayers be ſaid in private, none being by, or it may be two or three that kneel near him, it is ridiculous to ſuppoſe that the Prieſt ſins if he kneels on to the end of thoſe ejaculations. In ſome caſes he that officiates is bound to turn his face to the Weſt, or to the body of the Church; but if there be no body in the Church, but the Clerk at his ſide, why he ſhould doe ſo, there is no reaſon to be given, and therefore it cannot be ſuppoſed to be bound upon him by the law of the Church.

2. For it is highly conſiderable, that in theſe laws of Ceremonies it is otherwiſe then in laws which concern the matter and inſtances of Divine Commandements. Becauſe the laws of Common-wealths can change actions of themſelves indifferent into the order of vertue and vice, if they be of the ſame matter and naturally capable: as when Inceſt is defin'd to be a forbidden conjunction of perſons too near in bloud, the law by forbidding the marriage of Uncle and Neece for that reaſon, can make that to be inceſt: and killing can by the law be made murder when it is forbidden, or not to be murder when it is juſtly commanded. Thus if there be a law made that corn or gold-lace ſhall be ſold at a certain price, the law which is the meaſure of juſtice in contracts makes that price to be the inſtance of juſtice, and what exceeds it to be unjuſt, if it be a juſt law. Becauſe theſe actions lying next to the inſtances of the Divine Commandement, and plac'd there as outer guards to Gods Law, and being naturally the ſame actions, when the prohibition comes from a juſt authority, then it is made to be a ſin by the law, and that ſin by the nature and participation of the ſame reaſon. For he that kills his adulterous daughter where it is permitted, does doe the natural act of killing as much as he that kills his Father; but where there is no law againſt it, but by law ſhe is ſentenc'd to death, and that without ſolennities, there is no ἀνομία, and therefore no ἁμαρτία· it is not a ſin unleſſe it be the tranſgreſſion of a law. So that the natural capacity and the ſupervening law together make up the action to be ſuch a ſin. But now this thing can never be in Eccleſiaſtical laws of ceremonies and rules of order: for they are not in their matter and in their own nature like to religion or next to it; and nothing can be religion but that ſervice which God hath choſen of himſelf, and that which is naturally and internally ſo, as glorification of God, loving him, obeying him, praying to him, believing him, and ſuch other inward actions which are taught to us by our natural reaſon and our prime notices of God. But external actions and miniſteries are then capable of being made religion when God appoints them, and not elſe, becauſe God will be worſhipped externally as he is pleas'd to appoint, according to that ſaying of Origen, Nemo qui oculis animæ cernit, alio modò Deum colit quam ſicut ipſe docuit, That man is blind in his reaſon, that will worſhip God otherwiſe then he himſelf hath taught.

Contra Celſum lib. 7.

3. * This onely, The Church can adopt actions into religion which God hath made ready, and which he hath prepar'd and fitted for religion; ſuch as are free-will-offerings and Counſels Evangelical: for when any man does chuſe to doe any act which God hath recommended and not injoyn'd, this is religion; but this is onely in ſuch things which are real graces appointed by the Divine law, and the inſtance onely is left undetermin'd: and how far the Church can command any of theſe things, I ſhall afterwards inquire; but for the preſent, theſe things can paſs into religion, becauſe God hath ſo prepar'd them.

4. But 2dly, external obſervances can become religion, if they be the outward act of an inward grace; as giving money to the poor, worſhipping God with the body; that is, when they naturally expreſs what is conceived and acted within, not when they come from without: a commandement of man may make theſe actions to be obedience, but they are made religion by the grace within, or not at all. Thus faſting can be an act of religion, when it is naturally conſequent to penitential ſorrow, and the hatred of ſin: but when it is injoyn'd by men, then it is but an inſtrument, and may be ſeparate from all religion, and may be no act of repentance, and can be made to be religion by no man but by the nature of the thing.

5. But 3dly, Ceremonies and rituals and geſtures and manners of doing outward actions cannot be made to be any thing but obedience: they are neither fitted by God, as Counſels Evangelical are, nor yet by nature, as the outward actions of vertue are, to become religion; nay they are ſeparated from being religion by the word of God, by the coming of Chriſt, by his death upon the Croſs; and daies and meats and drinks, and carnal purities, and external obſervances are now both by God and by nature remov'd far from being any thing of the Chriſtian, that is, of the Spiritual religion.

Coloſſ. 2.

6. The conſequent of theſe things is this, When a law is made, it binds either by the natural goodneſs of the thing, or by the order and uſefulneſs of it's miniſtery to ſomething elſe, or onely by the authority. Ceremonies cannot be of the firſt ſort, but of the ſecond they may, and then they oblige only ſo long as they can miniſter to the end of their deſignation, but no longer. For if that be the onely reaſon of their obliging, then they oblige not when that reaſon is away. Now becauſe they are onely made for order and decency, both which are relative terms, and ſuppoſe an action done in public, there is no need, no uſe of them in private. But becauſe even after after the reason ceases, the authority hath reasons of it's own to be regarded, and things that are not binding by their absolute or relative nature, may yet bind by the authority and for the reverence of that, till there be opportunity to annul the law, therefore when the reason of the ceremony does cease, or is useless and operates not at all, we must yet regard the authority, that is, doe it honour, as Samuel did to Saul. If the thing it self be of an intrinsick goodness, though made necessary onely by the positive command, then it is to be done for it self, and in private as well as publick: * but if it be onely a relative ministery, then it hath no reason beyond that relation; and if that relation be publick, it binds onely in publick: * but if it be onely matter of obedience, and have no reason else either absolute or relative, then the law does not bind the Conscience, but even then we are bound so to comport our selves that the authority may not be despis'd nor offended; that is, she is not to be slighted or reproach'd, nor publickly disregarded; though for the obedience it self in this case there is no absolute obligation, but the not-obeying is to be conducted humbly, inoffensively, prudently and regardfully. The reason of these things is this, because the Church makes no absolute laws; she makes them for good ends, and beyond that she hath no authority: her legislative is wholly a ministery of grace and godliness, not of empire and dominion. For the difference is this, Civil laws oblige in publick and in private, for reason and for Empire, when the cause ceases, and when it remains, when the breach is scandalous, and when it is not scandalous: But the Canons of the Church oblige onely for their reason and religion, for edification and for charity, when the thing is useful to others or good in it self; but the authority it self being wholly for these purposes, is a ministery of religion, but hath in it nothing of Empire, and therefore does not oblige for it self and by it self, but for the doing good, and for the avoiding evil: and this is that which is meant by the cases of contempt and scandal.

These are the negative measures of ECCLESIASTICAL laws. The positive measures are these.

RULE XIX.

Ecclesiastical laws must be charitable and easy, and when they are not, they oblige not.

1. WHen Ecclesiastical laws were conducted and made by the Spiritual power, the Bishops, Rulers of Churches, before the Civil power was Christian, their laws were either Commandements of essential duty, or of that which was next to it and necessary for it, or else they were indicted to a voluntary people, and therefore to be presumed easy and gentle, charitable and useful, or it is not to be thought the people would have been willing long to bear them. But when the Civil power was the Ecclesiastical Ruler, and the Common-wealth became a Church, the Spiritual sword was put into a temporal scabbard, and the Canons Ecclesiastical became civil laws, though in their matter religious, and in their original they were Ecclesiastical. Now if the laws be established by the civil power, they must indeed be just and good; but yet if they be laws of burden, and contain a load that is ſupportable, they are to be obeyed. Quod quidem perquam durum eſt, ſed ita lex ſcripta eſt, ſaid Ulpian; the caſe is hard, but ſo the law is written: meaning that though it be hard, yet the law is to be obeyed ſo long as it is juſt. But when the Eccleſiaſtical law is indicted by the ſpiritual power, the civil power onely conſenting and eſtabliſhing the indicted Canon, that corroboration addes no other band to the Canon then that it be obeyed according to the intention of the ſpiritual power, onely ſo it becomes a law indeed, but it is a law onely as the Church can intend a law, or deſire it to be impos'd; that is, what the Church might reaſonably perſwade, and fitly enjoyn, that ſo much and no more, in that manner and no other, the Civil power does corroborate it. For the Eccleſiaſtical Canon put into the hands of the civil power and made into a law, is like the twig of an apple-tree grafted into the ſtock of a thorn; it changes not the nature of it, but is ſtill an apple: ſo is the Canon, ſtill it is but an injunction of the Church, though the Church be enabled temporally to chaſtiſe the rebellious; but ſtill the twig that is ſo ingrafted muſt retain it's own nature, and muſt be no ſowrer then if it grew upon it's own ſtock; it muſt be ſuch as is fit to be perſwaded, ſuch which men can be willing to, and eaſy under, and of which they ſhall have no cauſe to complain: for ſince the Church in theſe things hath no power but to exhort and to perſwade, and therefore can injoyn nothing but what can be reaſonably perſwaded; ſhe muſt not by the aid of the temporal power injoyn thoſe things which are cruel and vexatious, and ſuch to which no argument but fear can make the ſubject willing. The Church when ſhe hath temporal poſſeſſions, alwaies is a good Land-lady, and when ſhe makes judgments ſhe meddles not with bloud, but gives the gentleſt ſentences, and when ſhe is admitted to a legiſlative, ſhe enjoyns a ζυγὸς χρηστὸς an eaſy, a gentle yoke, and when ſhe does not, the ſubject is concerned to avoid the temporall evil threatned by the civil power; but not to give obedience to the intolerable law of the Church, as in that capacity: for unleſs the law of the Church be ſuch that good men may willingly obey it, it cannot be injoyned by the Church, and the Church ought not to deſire the civil power to doe it for her: For ſince ſhe hath no power to command in ſuch things where the Divine authority does not intervene, all the reſt is but perſwaſion; and he that hath power onely to perſwade, cannot be ſuppoſed to perſwade againſt our will: and therefore matters of intolerable burden are not the matter of Eccleſiaſtical laws, becauſe they certainly are againſt the will of all men, who can ſerve God and goe to heaven without them.

2. Not that it is permitted to any man as he pleaſe to obey or not to obey the Eccleſiaſtical laws; nor that the ſpiritual authority ſo depends upon the conſent of every ſubject, that he is at his choice whether he will keep it or no: but that he is to obey willingly; that is, that no more be impoſed then what he may be willing to, and then that he be not diſobedient, when if he were not peeviſh, he ought to be willing. For this is all that ſhare of Chriſtian liberty which under his juſt ſuperiors every ſingle ſubject can enjoy; he may not break the law when he pleaſe, but when he cannot keep it; not when he is not in the humour, but when he is not in capacity; not becauſe he will, but becauſe without great evil he cannot.

3. I ſhall give an inſtance in the Eccleſiaſtical laws of faſting, and by an inquiry into their obligation ſtate the ſenſe and intention of this Rule.

What

What persons are tied to the observation of Ecclesiastical Fasts, and in what cases.

4. To the solution of which question, first we are to consider to what end the Church enjoyns her Fast. For whoever is involved in that end is also concerned in the law, ordinarily and regularly. Thus if a Fast be onely indicted to suppress incontinence, they who have no temptation to it, or have a sufficient remedy by which they please God, are not bound by that law, but in the cases of scandal and contempt. Fasting-spittle kils a Serpent (saies Pierius;) but if a man have a rod in his hand that will doe it sooner, that law would be fantastical that should command him to stay till he could kill the snake with his fasting-spittle. * But if the Church intends many good ends in the Canon, any one is sufficient to tye the law upon the Conscience, because for that one good end it can be serviceable to the Soul: and indeed fasting is of that nature that it can be a ministery of repentance by the affliction, and it can be a help to prayer, by taking off the loads of flesh and a full stomach, and it can be aptly ministerial to contemplation; and if fasting were onely for mortification of lustful appetites, then a virgin might not safely fast in publick, lest she fall into the suspicion of incontinence, or be expos'd to the bolder sollicitations of the yong men. Now because every one is concerned in some one or more of these ends of fasting, all people are included within the circles of the law, unless by some other means they be exempted. Lib. 14. Hier.

5. But they are exempted from it who are sick and weak, spent with labour, or apt to be made sick, or hindred in their imployment: Nisi quem infirmitas impedierit, saies the Canon law; all are bound to keep fasting daies but such who are hindred by infirmity, C. quadragesimæ, de consecr. dist. 5. & cap. 2. § cum autem de observ. jejun.

Dura valetudo inciderit, seu tarda senectus,

any bodily infirmity, whether of age or sickness, weakness or disease. Concerning which, if the infirmity be evident, there is no question, for the law does except such persons in the very sanction, or publick and authentick interpretations, and common usages. Women with child, children and old persons, the sick and the traveller, the weary and the weak, the hard student and the hard labourer, the poor man and the beggar, these are persons which need not ask leave, for the law intends not to bind them. Now those that are but probably so, that is, not well, apt to be sick, suspected with child, not very weary, these also are within the power of having leave given them, that is, capable of dispensation; that is, it may be declared that the law intends not to bind them at all in such cases. So that upon this account none are bound but the lusty and the lazy, the strong and the unimployed.

6. Now in these things there is no other certaintie but what is set down in the laws of every Church respectively, save only this, that in all Churches where such laws are us'd, they are ever expounded by the measures of great Charitie and Remission, excepting in such places where they place Religion in external observances; and yet there also they pretend great gentleness when they are charg'd with want of it by their adversaries, as is to be seen in Albericus Pius his Lucubrations against Erasmus.

7. But I conſider that the laws of faſting are therefore very ſparingly to be impoſed, when there are ſo many cauſes of being excus'd; and not at all but upon great occaſions, and particular emergencies: and when they are, the injunction is to be ſo made, as feweſt may be excus'd, and none may deſire it but thoſe who cannot help it: and the evil of the contrary is very viſible and apparent in the fierce and decretory injunctions of the long Lenten faſt, the burden of which is ſo great, that they who doe not think it religion, or a law of God, or a part of the Divine worſhip, uſe all the arts they can to be eaſed of the load, coſening the law, and eaſing themſelves, and ſtudying a new Cookery, and deſtroying the end of the law by keeping the letter, and buying diſpenſations, and complaining of the burden, and being troubled when it comes, and glad when it is over. A law of faſting is very imprudent and very uncharitable when it becomes, like Rehoboam's thigh, too big and too heavy for all the people: and what good is done by ſuch faſting, that could not with more eaſe and more charity be acquired by other inſtruments or a better conduct of this? Mantuan complain'd with great ſorrow and great reaſon in this particular. The laws of religion ſhould be, like the yoke of Chriſt, light and eaſy, fitted to the infirmities and capacities of all men; for let them be never ſo eaſy and delightfull, we ſhall be too much tempted to neglect them, though the laws themſelves be no temptation to diſobedience.

8. This is certain, that in a law of ſo great burden in it ſelf, and ſo ſeverely impoſed, and ſo fiercely puniſhed, and ſo religiouſly accounted of, and ſo ſuperſtitiouſly conducted, the conſcience is ſo certainly made reſtleſſe by the ſcruples of the conſcientious perſons, the arts of the crafty, the ignorance of the over-buſy, and the witty nothings of the idly-imployed, that the good which accidentally may be brought to ſome by it cannot pay for the many evils which it regularly produces in others: and that law of faſting can never be ſo good as the peace which it diſturbs. For if you pretend your youth as a juſt excuſe from the law of Lent, you ſhall be told, that the Faſt conſiſts in the quality of the meat, and in the ſingleneſſe of the meal, and in the time of taking it; and that though you are excuſed from eating fiſh or pulſe, yet you muſt eat but once; or if you doe eat at night, yet you muſt not eat in the morning; or if you doe, yet you are to be adviſed how much can be called a meal. And then you are not ſure whether you are to faſt at the beginning, or not till the conſummation of your fourteenth year: and when that is out, if the underſtanding be ſo little as not to underſtand what and why and how, you faſt to no purpoſe; and if ſooner you doe underſtand, it may be you are obliged in conſcience, though not puniſhable by law. * If you be old, yet ſome old men are luſty and ſtrong; and the Church does not intend that the age alone, but that the infirmity ſhould excuſe: and becauſe this infirmity is diviſible, it is not every infirmity that will doe it; and it may be you are an eaſy and too gentle a judge in your own caſe; therefore you muſt ask; and who ſhall tell you? Cajetan and Navarre, Filliucius and Gregory Sayr, Diana and Azorius underſtand no phyſic; and they can tell you ſomething in general of the law, but nothing abſolutely in your caſe: if you will, be at the charge and goe to a Phyſician: for it may be if you live in the Country, you have a learned man within ten or twenty miles, or it may be fourty, and upon all occaſions you may know of him whether your caſe requires eaſe; or it may be it requires leave this day, but you cannot have your anſwer ſo ſoon, and the caſe will alter by to morrow; and Hippocrates ſaid, that ſenes facillimè ferunt jejunium, old men bear faſting better then yong men: and though Cardan hath upon that Aphoriſme ſpoken according to his uſual manner many ingenious things, yet whether you will put your Conſcience upon him or no is a material conſideration. * But then if you be ſick, you muſt know whether faſting can conſiſt with your condition: for not every ſickneſſe can excuſe you from the holy faſt of Lent; or if you may not eat fiſh, yet you may be oblig'd to the ſingle refection, or to the time. But that which is of material conſideration is, that though you be not well, yet it may be your faſting will doe you no great hurt, and if it be but little, it muſt not be ſtood upon; for faſting is intended to be an affliction of the body, and therefore you muſt not be too haſty to ſnatch at eaſe and liberty. But however, if you will inquire of learned men, you may have from the Phyſicians ſome twenty or thirty rules by which you may gueſſe when and in what diſeaſes you are excus'd from the quality of the diet, when you are diſpenſed in the time, when in the frequency, when you muſt exchange one for the other: and to this purpoſe you may inform your Conſcience by reading [a] Valleſius, Cardan, Hollerius, Zacutus Luſitanus, Paulus Zacchias, [b] Alphonſus à Fontech, [c] Cognatus, [d] Arnoldus de Villanova, [e] Petrus Hiſpanus and his Author Iſaac; and if you can find them agree, and that your caſe is deſcrib'd, and their rules be rightly applied, and the particulars be well weighed, and the judgement not byaſs'd by eaſe and fear and too great a care of your health, you might doe well, if it were not for one thing; and that is, that Phyſicians are not to be truſted, for they will ſpeak excellent reaſon for the ſecuring of your health, but they think they are not to anſwer concerning the ſtate of your ſoul; and therefore they leane too much upon the wrong hand for your ſatisfaction, eſpecially becauſe Lent falls in the ſpring æquinox, in which we are very apt to ſickneſſes. * But then if we pretend to be excus'd by reaſon of labour and travel, every man muſt judge for himſelf: and yet there are in this a great many things to be conſider'd; for it muſt be a conſiderable diminution of our ſtrength, and a great inanition of ſpirits that can diſpenſe with us in this ſo great a law: but how great that muſt be, if we be judges, we ſhall be too favourable; if others judge, they cannot tell; and if we fear to be too gentle to our ſelves, we may be too rigorous, and by the laws of faſting break the laws of charity. But then it may be our labour is to come, and it will be neceſſary that we lay in ſtowage beforehand, leſt we faint by the way. And it is a great labour for a man to hunt all day, or to manage the great horſe,

A little thing will weary a ſoft perſon, and a long ſport will tire a ſtrong man: and my not theſe put in their plea for a pleaſant or an early meal? for hungry men will plead hard. And the labour of the mind is alſo a great wearineſſe to the bones; and who ſhall tell me how long I muſt ſtudy before I may be allowed not to keep the punctualities of Lent? for the thinking man muſt be fed tenderly and furniſhed with finer ſpirits. But then who ſhall come into this licence is worth inquiring; whether not onely the hard Student, but the Preacher that ſpeaks long, and thinks little; whether School-Maſters, Advocates, Orators, Judges, for every one would be glad of a little liberty: and if the bodily labourer ſhall be excuſed, whether all trades that ſit long, and work eaſily, as Shoomakers, Tailers, Glovers, Book-binders may pretend to an exemption; for though Azorius is ſo kind as to except moſt of theſe, yet others doe not. And what ſhall the poor man doe? his rule is commonly to eat when he can get it; and if he be at a friends houſe muſt he refuſe to eat, becauſe it is not his time? or muſt he ſtarve, becauſe there is nothing but fleſh?

Unde fames homini vetitorum tanta ciborum eſt?

Certainly he can hardly be tied to the meaſures and rules of eating Eccleſiaſtically, that every day is in diſpute whether he ſhall or ſhall not have ſomething that he may eat naturally. But yet he is to inquire whether he be tied on thoſe days to faſt when he can be provided for: and it would alſo be known whether a poor man is not tied to refuſe fleſh and require fiſh where it can be had; and whether he is not bound firſt to ſpend the fragments of his fiſh-basket before his bits of fleſh, and keep them onely for neceſſity; and whether he may be ſecretly pleas'd that he hath that neceſſity put upon him that he hath fleſh but no fiſh. There are alſo ſome hundreds of queſtions more that might be conſider'd; ſome are pleaſant caſes and ſome are ſowre, ſome can be determined and ſome cannot. But the great caſe of Conſcience in this whole affaire is, What great good that is which this law of Lent thus conducted can effect, which can no other ways be effected, and which can be greater then the infinite numbers of ſin, and doubtings, and ſcruples, and fears, and troubles, and vexations, and ſickneſſes, and peeviſhneſſe, and murmur, and complaints, and laborious arts of excuſe, and cheating the law, and ſlavery, and tyranny, occaſion'd and effected by it.

9. For although faſting is not onely an excellent miniſtery to ſome parts of religion, but of health alſo,

Accipe nunc victûs tenuis quæ, quantaque ſecum
Afferat: imprimis, valeas bene——

yet all the world knows that long faſting is the moſt deſtructive thing in the world to our bodies, and breeds diſeaſes ſharper and more incurable then fullneſſe and intemperance; and therefore the Canon law * forbids a faſt of two or three days, and a faſt beyond our ſtrength. Therefore it is certain that the Church cannot command a long faſt: and therefore in the beginning of the cuſtome of Lent it was but a faſt of one day, or two at moſt, eating at night. And although this faſt was then a faſt of liberty, and permitted to every ones choice; yet it might be enjoyn'd in every Government, according to the fore-deſcribed meaſures. But that in ſtead of a faſt, the Church ſhould preſcribe a diet, an ill diet, not onely unpleaſant, but unwholeſome, and that with ſo much ſeverity, and with ſo much danger, and ſo many ſnares, is no exerciſe of that power which Chriſt hath given her, but of that power which is uſurp'd, ill gotten and worſe adminiſtred. It is againſt the law of charity, and therefore ought not to be a law of the Church;

* C. non dico. & c. non mediocriter. de conſecr. diſt. 5.

Church; that men be tied for forty days together to keep from their uſual diet, not to be temperate, but to be vex'd and rul'd, this I ſay is uncharitable, and therefore unlawfull.

Hoc hic quidem homines tam brevem vitam colunt,
Quum haſce herbas hujuſmodi in ſuam alvum congerunt,
Formidoloſas dictu, non eſu modo:
Quas herbas pecudes non edunt, homines edunt.

Pſeudol. A&t. 3. Scen. 2.

As the Cook in the Comedy complain'd, eating herbs and ill diet makes men to live ſuch ſhort lives. And what intereſt of religion is ſerv'd by eating fiſh and nettle pottage, is not obvious to him that hath tried it, or can conſider it:

Theſtylis hanc nimio pultem ſale fecit amaram;

Mantuan.

Death and ſickneſſe is in this pot. And I remember to have heard a Frier, none of the meaneſt of his Order, ſay, that he never kept Lent for a long time together, but at Eaſter he had a great fit of ſickneſſe: and therefore as the Canoniſts ſay that a future labour & wearineſſe may legitimate the breach of the ſtrict meaſures of the law as well as if it be actual & preſent; ſo may the fear of ſickneſſe as well take off the obligation as when it is preſent: and of this, every man that is not of an athletic health hath reaſon to be afraid.

10. But that which relates alſo very much to the law, though not ſo much to us, is this, that all this trouble is for little or no good: if there be any good in it, it is relative, and tranſient, and contingent, and inconſiderable, and without hazard otherwiſe to be acquired. For though fools and poor folks are ſometimes preſs'd with the evils of ſuch a change of diet, yet the witty and the rich can change all that law into the arts and inſtruments of pleaſure. For the greateſt feaſts and the greateſt Epicuriſmes uſe to be in fiſh. So he in the Comedy,

Vino & victu, piſcatu probo, electili
Vitam colitis;

Moſtell. A&t. 3. Scen. 2.

Wine and choice fiſh make muſic at the Table.

Nam in re præſenti, ex copia piſcaria

Caſina, A&t. 2. Scen. 8.

They are forbid no ſorts, no quantity, no delicacies of fiſh or wine. And if this be objected to them, they anſwer, that fiſh is leſſe pleaſant, leſſe nutritive then fleſh, and therefore wiſely choſen by the Church to be the entertainments of our Lenten table: but if you object, that fiſh is therefore not to be eaten becauſe it is unwholſome, breeds ill juices, and afflicts the body; * they anſwer, that we are miſtaken; that fiſh is a delicacy; that Alexander the great was ſo delighted with little fiſhes, that he would ſend them for preſents to his deareſt friends; that Suetonius tells the ſame of Auguſtus Cæſar; that Bullinger tells that the Rhodians eſteem'd them that lov'd and liv'd much upon fiſh to be gentlemen and well bred, and all others clowns and of a rude palate; that Julius Cæſar at one triumphal feaſt entertain'd his gueſts with 8000 lampreys; that the great feaſt which Metellus made, & which we find deſcrib'd in * Macrobius, was eſpecially made coſtly and delicious with the fiſh there preſented.

——quo pertinet ergo Proceros odiſſe lupos?

He therefore that objects againſt the ſeverity and affliction of the Lenten diet, knows not the arts of feaſting; and complains of the Church for a ſtep-mother, when ſhe is not onely kind, but fond alſo in making ſuch proviſions, viſions. But if fiſh be unwholeſome, then eat herbs, but at no hand fleſh.

For lions and wolves, tigres and bears eat fleſh; but God hath provided great variety of other things beſides fleſh. In ſome places milk is permitted, in all, herbs and fruits and broaths: and theſe are agreeable to a weak ſtomack; according to that of S. Paul, Qui infirmus eſt, olus manducat, He that is weak eateth herbs; it is the argument of Bruyerinus.

de Re cibar. lib. 8. cap. 1.

11. But I ſhall make a better uſe of it if I ſhall obſerve that S. Paul gives it as a note of infirmity, when Chriſtians upon pretences and little arguments ſhall not dare to eat fleſh, but in ſtead of them eat herbs; they are weak in faith that doe it, and doe not conſider that fleſh can as well be ſanctified by the word of God and prayer, as lettice and aſparagus: and that a little fleſh and courſe and common, will better ſerve the end of faſting, and that faſting better ſerve the end of religion, then variety of fiſh, and a belly fill'd with fruits and wind and ſuperſtition. All or any thing of this may be done in diſcipline, and with liberty: but becauſe it may be unfit for ſo very many, and for all at ſome time, and may produce much evil, and hath in it no more good then to give us cauſe to ſay that it may be us'd, it is a very unfit thing to become the matter of an Eccleſiaſtical law, a trouble and danger to the body, and a great ſnare to the conſcience, which it may intangle, but it can never cleanſe:

Horat. ubi ſupra.

———pinguem vitiis albumque nec Oſtrea,
Nec Scarus, aut poterit peregrina juvare Lagois.

To eat fiſh or herbs, are of ſo little uſe in religion, they are ſo trifling an exerciſe of the body by reſtraining the appetite, that beſides that all bodily exerciſe profiteth but little, this is ſo little of that, as it is conducted, and as it is even in the very permiſſions of the law, that it is not worth all this diſcourſe about it; onely to reſcue the conſcience from ſuch ſnares and little intanglements is of great concernment. * Faſting is very good to ſome purpoſes, at ſome times, and to ſome perſons: but laws regard that quod plerumque eſt, and therefore in the matter of a periodical and long-continued faſt cannot but be uncharitable and unreaſonable: and therefore when there is cauſe for ſuch injunctions, they are to be preſs'd with argument and exhortation, not by Empire and neceſſity. For ſuppoſing the law otherwiſe without objection, yet he that faſts againſt his will, does not ſerve God; and therefore externally to be forc'd to doe it, is not a lawfull exerciſe of an Eccleſiaſtical power.

12. The ſumme is this. If it be the faſt of one day, it may be indicted by our lawfull ſuperior, with the meaſures of prudence and charity, and according to the needs of the Church. * But if it be the faſt of many days together, it is a burden, and therefore not to be exacted, leſt it be uncharitable.

uncharitable. But if there be a law, the law ought to bend in all the flexures of reason and a probable necessity, and to prevail onely by the reason of the thing, not the force of a command. * But if it be no fast, but a change of diet, it is of so little profit, that it will not recompence the trouble, and will turn into superstition, and will more minister to evil then to good, and is not properly the matter of an Ecclesiastical law, and the Bishop hath no power to make a law in this matter: it is not for God, and it is not for religion, but for vanity, or Empire, or superstition.

13. This onely I am to adde in order to the determination of our conscience in the practice of this inquiry, That if there be a law made by the Civil power for the keeping Lent, then it is for civil regards, and the law is not for superstition, but therefore to be observed as other civil laws are, with the same equity and measures of obedience; of which I am to give further accounts in the Chapter of the Interpretation and diminution of humane laws. But if it be still an Ecclesiastical law, indicted and suggested by the spiritual power, and onely corroborated by the civil power, and for them efformed into a law, then it obliges the Conscience no otherwise then it did and ought to doe in the hands of the spiritual power; that is, onely when the law is for good, and not for evil, with Christian liberty, and not a snare, when it is fit to be perswaded and ought to be complied with, then and there it may be indicted, and is to be obeyed accordingly.

RULE XX.

Ecclesiastical laws must ever promote the service of God and the good of Souls; but must never put a snare or stumbling-block to Consciences.

1. THE holy Primitives in their laws and actions ever kept that saying of the Apostle in their eye and in their heart, πάντα πρὸς οἰκοδομὴν γινέσθω, Every word, every action must be πρὸς οἰκοδομὴν τῆς χρείας, for the use of edifying: Let all things be done for edification: and therefore much more must laws, which have a permanent causality and influence upon the actions of the Church; for therefore they are either a permanent good or evil. 1 Cor. 14. 26. Ephes. 4. 29.

2. When the Churches had hope of converting the Jews by gentleness and compliance in some outward rites, the Church made laws of combination and analogy, of continuation and correspondence in some observances. Thus the Apostles at the Council of Jerusalem indicted the abstinence from blood, as being infinitely offensive to the Jews, and apt to estrange their hearts from the whole religion of them that eat it. And therefore the law was made that it might cement the stones of the Spiritual building, and the Jews and Gentiles might make the two walls of the Church. But when the Jews refus'd to come in, and excepting the remnant onely (of which S. Paul speaks) which were saved, the rest grew to hate the Lord of life, then the Church consider'd that to use their liberty would be for the edification of the Church of the Gentiles; and then they remembred that Moses had given Vide ult. caput 2. libri.

given the Jews fleſh, but forbad them bloud, but Chriſt gave us both fleſh and bloud, and forbad neither; and therefore they return'd to that uſe of it that was moſt for charity and liberty, inſtruction and edification. * Upon the ſame account, though the Church was kind to the Jews, yet they would take care not to offend any of her children by retaining words that might abuſe them into a good opinion of their religion; and therefore at firſt they abſtain'd from the name of Prieſt, and Temple, as is to be obſerved in Juſtin Martyr, Ignatius and Minutius. * At the firſt the Chriſtians kept the Jewiſh Sabbath; but in the Council of Laodicea it was forbidden; and in the 70th Canon of that collection which goes under the name of the Apoſtles, which was publiſhed much about the ſame time, the Chriſtians are forbidden [neque jejunia cum Judæis exercere, nec feſtos dies agere, nec quæ in ipſorum celebritatibus Xenia mittuntur accipere] to keep the Jewiſh faſts, or feaſts, or to receive their preſents, viz. of unleavened cakes which upon thoſe daies they uſually ſent abroad. And the reaſon of the prohibition is, leſt Judaiſme ſhould be valued, and leſt Chriſtians be ſcandaliz'd at ſuch compliance, as Zonaras and Balſamo note upon that Canon of the Laodicean Council, but is more fully diſcourſed by Conſtantine upon the keeping of Eaſter, as Euſebius reports in his life.

Can. 29.

Lib. 3. cap. 17.

3. To this end all Laws and Canons muſt be made; not onely for that great reaſon, becauſe the end of the Commandement is charity, and of all Eccleſiaſtical government is the building up the Church in love; but becauſe the Church hath no power to make laws which are not for edification: and this the Apoſtle teſtifies twice in one Epiſtle uſing the ſame words; that the power and authority which the Lord had given to him, was for edification, not for deſtruction. * And this is not onely ſo to be underſtood, that if the Church makes laws which are not for edification, ſhe does amiſs; but that ſhe obliges not, her laws are null, and doe not bind the Conſcience. For it is otherwiſe here then in civil laws: right or wrong the civil conſtitutions bind the body or the ſoul; but becauſe the verification of the laws of the Church is in the hands of God, and he onely materially and effectively puniſhes the rebellious againſt this Government, it is certain he will doe onely according to the merit of the cauſe, and not verify a power which he hath forbidden. But in the civil Courts there is a puniſhment that is exterminating or afflictive, which can puniſh them whom God will finally abſolve. Therefore it is that when the Church does any thing beyond her commiſſion, ſhe does no way oblige the Conſcience, neither actively nor paſſively: the Church puniſhes no man temporally, and God will not either temporally or eternally afflict thoſe who doe not obey there where he hath given no man power to command. And this is greatly to be obſerved in all the caſes of Conſcience concerning Eccleſiaſtical laws. If we underſtand where the ſpiritual power can command, where ſhe can exhort and ought to prevail, we have found out all the meaſures of our obedience. But if ſhe goes beyond her commiſſion, ſhe hurts none but her ſelf; for ſhe hath nothing to doe with Bodies, and our Souls are in ſafe hands. And the caſe is much alike, in caſe the ſpiritual law be bound by the civil power: for the King when he makes laws of religion is tied up to the Evangelical meaſures; and if he prevaricates, he does indeed tie us to a paſſive obedience, but the conſcience is no otherwiſe bound; and he is to govern Chriſts Church by the ſame meaſures with which the Apoſtles did, and the Biſhops their ſucceſſors did and ought to doe before the civil power was Chriſtian.

Ephes. 4. 16.

2 Corin. 10. 8.
2 Cor. 13. 10.

Chriſtian. For he hath no more power over conſciences then they had; and therefore he ought not by the afflictions of the body to invade the ſoul: but if he does, ἔχῃ δυνάμιν, ἀλλὰ μὴ ἐξουσίαν, he hath onely power over bodies, but no authorityover the Conſcience. This being conſidered, the Rule hath effect in the following particulars.

4 1. This Rule is to be underſtood poſitively and affirmatively; that is, The Church in all her conſtitutions muſt take care that the Church be edified and built up in ſome grace or other. But not ſo, that whatſoever is for edification ſhe hath power to command. The meaſures and limits of her legiſlative power I have already deſcrib'd *; it muſt be within thoſe circles: and though other things without them may be uſeful, and fit for inſtruction, or to promote the intereſt of a vertue; yet Chriſt hath left them at liberty, and his Church hath no power to bind beyond his commiſſion. They can exhort and perſwade, and by conſent they can preſcribe; but to the making of a law there is ſomething elſe requir'd, beſides that it be apt to edify or to inſtruct. For (beſides that it muſt be of ſomething plac'd in her power) it muſt edify, and not deſtroy; it muſt build up, and not pull down; that is, it muſt build with all hands, and not pull down with one.

* Rule 1, 2, 3, 4, of this chapter.

5. I inſtance in the inſtitution of ſignificant ceremonies, that is, ſuch which are not matters of order and decency, but meerly for ſignification and the repreſentment of ſome truth or myſtery. Thoſe which are prudently choſen are in their own nature apt to inſtruct. Thus the uſe of pictures in the Greek and in the Lutheran Churches is ſo far uſeful, that it can convey a ſtory, and a great and a good example to the people that come thither, and ſo far they may be for edification. But becauſe theſe can alſo and doe too often degenerate into abuſe and invade religion, to make a law of theſe is not ſafe; and when that law does prevail to any evil that is not eaſily by other means cured, it does not prevail upon the Conſcience: and indeed to make a law for the uſe of them, is not directly within the commiſſion of the Eccleſiaſtical power.

6. But there is alſo more in it then thus. For although ſignificant ceremonies can be for edification to the Church in ſome degree, and in ſome perſons; yet it is to be conſidered whether the introducing of ſuch things does not deſtroy the Church, not onely in her Chriſtian liberty, but in the ſimplicity and purity and ſpirituality of her religion, by inſenſibly changing it into a ceremonial and external ſervice. To the Ceremonial law of the Jews nothing was to be added, and from it nothing was to be ſubtracted; and in Chriſtianity we have leſs reaſon to adde any thing of ceremony, excepting the circumſtances and advantages of the very miniſtery, as time and place, and veſſels and ornaments and neceſſary appendages. But when we ſpeak of rituals or ceremonies, that is, exterior actions or things beſides the inſtitution or command of Chriſt, either we intend them as a part of the Divine ſervice, and then they are unlawful and intolerable; or if onely for ſignification, that is ſo little a thing, of ſo inconſiderable uſe in the fulneſs and clarity of the revelations Evangelical, that beſides that it keeps Chriſtians ſtill in the ſtate of infancy and minority, and ſuppoſes them alwaies learning, and never coming to the knowledge of the truth, it ought not to ſtand againſt any danger or offence that can by them be brought to any wiſe and good Chriſtians.

7. In ſome ages of the Primitive Church, and in ſome Churches, they gave to perſons to be baptized milk and hony or a little wine (as we read in Tertullian and S. Hierom) to ſignify that thoſe Catechumens were babes in Chriſt; and in a rebus to recommend to them that ſaying of S. Peter, as new-born babes deſire the ſincere milk of the word. Now beſides that this was not uſual, to give hieroglyphics where they had plain precepts, and to give ſigns of things that were preſent and perceiv'd; it was of ſo very little uſe, that all Churches that I know of have laid it aſide. It was alſo a cuſtome anciently, when they brought the bread and wine to the altar or Communion-table, to preſent milk along with it; and this alſo did ſignify nutrition by the body and bloud of Chriſt. But the Councel of Bracara forbad it upon this reaſon, quia evidens exemplum Evangelicæ veritatis illud offerri non ſinit, becauſe Chriſt did no ſuch thing, and commanded no ſuch thing; and therefore nothing is to be added to thoſe ceremonies which Chriſt left. * And indeed if the Church might adde things or rituals of ſignification, then the walls might be cover'd with the figures of Doves, Sheep, Lambs, Serpents, Birds, and the Communion-table with Bread, Wine, Herbs, Tapers, Pigeons, Raiſins, Hony, Milk and Lambs, or whatever elſe the wit of man or the nature and ſenſe of the myſteries might invent or import. But concerning ſuch things as theſe, the judgment of Balſamon is this; Eos malè facere arbitror, qui in Eccleſia columbas emittunt pro Spiritûs ſancti adventu; & qui pro illa ſtella quæ novo modo apparuerat, & erat admirabilis, cereos accendunt; & qui arcanam & ſalutarem Domini, & Dei, & Servatoris noſtri Jeſu Chriſti generationem thoro ſtrato exprimunt; & quæ ſunt ſupra rationem & mentis cogitationem humanis adinventionibus deſcribunt. To let a Pigeon fly to ſignify the coming of the Holy Spirit; to light up candles to repreſent the Epiphany; to dreſs a bed to expreſs the ſecret and ineffable generation of the Saviour of the world; to which he might have added, to prepare the figure of the Crucifix, and to burie an image to deſcribe the great ſacrifice of the Croſs for the redemption of mankind; theſe are things to no purpoſe: not onely for the levity and theatrical gayeties and repreſentments unbefitting the gravity and purity and ſpirituality of Chriſtian religion; but alſo the manner of teaching theſe truths by ſymbolical things and actions is too low, too ſuſpicious, too dangerous to be mingled with the Divine liturgies. Chriſt may as he pleaſe conſign his own good things that he gives us; but he conſigns no good, and repreſents none, but what he alſo gives and effects in that miniſtration and under that ſign: but a ſymbolical rite of humane invention to ſignify what it does not effect, and then introduc'd into the ſolemn worſhip of God, is ſo like thoſe vain imaginations and repreſentments forbidden in the ſecond Commandement, that the very ſuſpicion is more againſt edification then their uſe can pretend to. But if any ſuch ritual or ceremony be introduc'd by cuſtome or by conſent, it ought to be us'd as men uſe their champignons; they boyl them in three or four waters, cleanſing them both by water and fire before they be us'd at all; much more before they be perſwaded into a law.

Cap. 1.

In Can. 82. Synod. 6. in Trullo.

8. 2. But when they can be innocently us'd, that is, when they can be made uſefull, and yet be innocent in themſelves, yet it is to be taken care of, that they may not onely by their abuſe, or by miſtake, but that by their number they be not troubleſome and inconvenient. This advice I learn from S. Auſtin, in whoſe time the Church had gone beyond her rule and beyond beyond her power in the introducing or permitting to be introduc'd very many significant ceremonies; every one of which he could not directly blame, but yet they were servile burdens, and intolerable besides, by their number and their load. [Etiamsi non intelligatur quomodo contra fidem sunt, tamen quoniam onerant religionem, & servilibus oneribus premunt quam Christus voluit paucissimis & manifestis celebrationum Sacramentis liberam esse; propterea faciunt ut tolerabilior sit conditio Judæorum, qui etiamsi tempus libertatis non agnoverunt, legalibus tamen sarcinis subjiciebantur, non humanis præsumptionibus] Although it is not to be understood how these things are directly against the faith, yet they burden religion, and load with a servile pressure her whom Christ left free and charg'd onely with the two Sacraments: therefore our case is worse then that of the Jews; for though they had not a time of liberty, yet they were charg'd onely with burdens that God impos'd, but not with the presumptions of man: which words are a severe condemnation of such laws and customes Ecclesiastical. And therefore there is reason to celebrate and honour the wisdome and prudence of the Church of England, which hath in all her offices retain'd but one ritual or ceremony that is not of Divine ordinance or Apostolical practice, and that is, the Cross in baptisme: which though it be a significant ceremony, and of no other use, yet as it is a compliance with the practice of all ancient Churches, * so it is very innocent in it self, and being one and alone is in no regard troublesome or afflictive to those that understand her power and her liberty and her reason. I said, she hath one onely ceremony of her own appointment; for the Ring in marriage is the symbol of a civil and a religious contract, it is a pledge and custome of the nation, not of the religion: and those other circumstances of her worship, are but determinations of time and place and manner of a duty; they serve to other purposes besides signification, they were not made for that, but for order & decency, for which there is an Apostolical precept, and a natural reason, and an evident necessity, or a great convenience. Now if besides these uses they can be construed to any good signification or instruction, that is so far from being a prejudice to them, that it is their advantage, their principal end being different, and warranted, and not destroy'd by their superinduc'd and accidental use. * In other things we are to remember that figures and shadows were for the Old Testament, but light and manifestation is in the New; and the Egyptians indeed did teach religion by Symbolical figures; and in the Eastern Empire their laws were written with characters and abbreviatures; and in the schools of Plato and Pythagoras they taught their scholars by numbers and figures; and Diodorus of Tarsus and Origen brought in an allegorical way of expounding the Scriptures, and almost wholly, but certainly too much left the literal and simple way of interpretation, and so doe the Perfectionists and some others at this day: but we that walk in the light of the Gospel, and rejoyce in that light, have received from Christ and his Apostles an easier way of teaching the people; and are not therefore to return to the elements and rituals of Jews and Pagan schools. Christ left no sign but two that did also effect as well as signify: and if they had onely signified, and done no other good, we have no reason to believe that they would have been appointed. But this thing is gone into so great inconvenience in the Church of Rome, that there are not onely so many ceremonies as doe fill a book in folio; but the reasons and significations of them are offered to us by Durandus, Durantus, Vicecomes and others: but it is certain that all the propositions and mysteries signified by them are very much ſooner learn'd then the meaning of thoſe ceremonies. But that thoſe rituals or circumſtances of Liturgy, the actions, geſtures, habits, and inſtruments of order and decency be alſo ſignificant, gives an advantage to the things themſelves, and makes their firſt intended miniſtery of ſome more uſefulneſs.

Epist. 119 cap. 19.

9. 3. Eccleſiaſtical laws are not then for edification when they give offence to the wiſe and to the good; to the lovers of peace and the obedient to government; that is, when there is in their nature ſo much real evil, or ſo much cauſe of jealouſy of which the law-givers cannot purge them, that the good and complying principles that are in the good ſubjects cannot be ſufficient to give them entertainment. But of this the law-givers are to be the Judges; and if they inſiſt upon them when there is cauſe enough to lay them aſide, they ſin againſt their Brethren, and they ſin againſt Chriſt. But the laws themſelves doe not bind, if the exceptions againſt them be juſt and reaſonable and ſufficient: which whether they be or no, the Church-Rulers ſhall judge at preſent, and God ſhall judge at laſt: and in the mean time there can be no other rule given, but that the ſuperiour and the inferiour endeavour by all waies of prudence and humility to ſatisfy one another. A peaceable mind, and willingneſs to learn, and a charitable expoſition, are the juſt diſpoſitions of the ſubjects duty; and the Governours are to take all the care of ſouls that can be ſuppoſed to be the duty of ſpiritual Fathers: and if theſe things be done, there will be no hatred, and no reproach, and no ſchiſme. But if the queſtion be who ſhall yield, the Governours certainly have authority, and the others ſay they have reaſon: the one ought to be pitied, and the other ought to be obeyed; but both ought to yield: onely the ſubject muſt yield outward obedience though otherwiſe it were not neceſſary, yet if it be lawful, it accidentally becomes ſo; and if it be not lawful, or if he thinks it is not, yet he muſt be careful he give no offence, but modeſtly, humbly and without reproach offer his reaſons againſt the law. But then the Governours alſo muſt yield: they muſt not conſider how much is poſſible for them, but how much is fit; they muſt meditate nothing of Empire, but much of charity; they muſt conſider which will doe moſt good to the ſouls to whom they doe relate; they muſt with meekneſs inſtruct the gainſayers, and with ſweetneſs endeavour to win them, and bear with the infirmities of the weak, if they can perceive the weakneſs to be innocent. But if a crime be mingled with it, and be diſcerned, it is matter of edification that ſuch criminals be diſcountenanc'd, and the Authority be immur'd and kept from contempt. But in theſe and the like accidents the Spirit of God muſt be invocated and implor'd and endear'd, that by his aides the Church may be ſafely and wiſely and charitably governed. Whoever wants wiſdome muſt ask it of God; and God will be eaſily intreated to doe good, and to give good things.

10. This onely is to be added, that according as the matter of the laws is of advantage, or neceſſity, or onely of convenience more or leſs, ſo are the Governours of Churches and Guides of Souls to be more or leſs eaſy in diſpenſing or annulling their laws: till then, neither the Rulers nor the ſubject can by any other means be excuſed from ſin but by a hearty inquiry, and a ſincere humble labour to doe their duty to each other according to the beſt of their underſtanding. For if this does not procure a juſt compliance, it will at leaſt preſerve peace and innocence: and though the firſt is beſt, becauſe becauſe it includes theſe, yet theſe are the next beſt.

11. 4. Eccleſiaſtical laws that encourage and adorn, and add degrees and moments and zeal to the ſervice of God, are good miniſteries of edification; and till by exceſſe or accident they convert into evil, are of themſelves fit to miniſter to religion.

Of Muſic in Churches.

Thus the uſe of Pſalmody or ſinging of Pſalms, becauſe it can ſtirre up the affections, and make religion pleaſe more faculties, is very apt for the edification of Churches. The uſe of Muſical inſtruments may alſo adde ſome little advantages to ſinging, but they are more apt to change religion into aire and fancies, and take off ſome of it's ſimplicity, and are not ſo fitted for edification. Ad diſciplinas aliquid artificiale organum non eſſe adhibendum, ſaid Ariſtotle as he is quoted by Aquinas, Artificial inſtruments are not fit to be applied to the uſe of diſciplines. That is, the muſic of inſtruments of it ſelf does not make a man wiſer, or inſtruct him in any thing. This is true, and therefore they are not of themſelves very good miniſteries of religion. But vocal muſic, being natural, and the action of a man with the circumſtance of pleaſure, if it come to inveſt religion is of great uſe, as all the experience of man can tell. Inſtruments may guide the voice, and ſo they may be us'd; but they are but a friends friend to religion, and can have no near relation to the ſervice of God. Juſtin Martyr asks the Queſtion why the Church uſes ſongs in her Liturgy, after the manner of the unwiſe and weak under the Law. Anſwers, ὁ τὸ ᾄσαι ἁπλῶς δέξι τοῖς νηπίοις ἁρμόδιον, ἀλλὰ τὸ μετὰ τῶν ἀψύχων ὀργάνων ᾄσαι, καὶ μετ' ὀρχήσεως καὶ κροτάλων, That meerly to ſing is not proper to weak and ignorant perſons, but to ſing with inanimate inſtruments, with dancings and with timbrels. Therefore in the Churches we doe not uſe hymns with ſuch organs or inſtruments. And S. Chryſoſtom ſaith that thoſe inſtruments were permitted to the Jews ob eorum imbecillitatem for their weakneſſe: and he addes, As the Jews did praiſe God by all the inſtruments of muſic, ſo we are commanded to praiſe him with all our members, our eyes, our tongues, our eares, our hands. The ſame thing is alſo affirm'd by Iſidore Peluſiot; Since God permitted ſacrifices and effuſions of bloud for their childiſhneſſe, it is no wonder that he did tolerate that muſic which is made by the harp and pſaltery. But then in relation to us, he expounds that Pſalm to ſignify not literally, but myſtically. By the ſound of the trumpet he underſtands the memory of the reſurrection; by pſaltery and harp, our tongue and mouth; by timbrel and dances, our body and mind; by every thing that hath breath,] every ſpirit: Angels and men are called upon to praiſe the Lord. But now upon this account we may eaſily perceive the difference of vocal from inſtrumental muſic in Churches; this being but typical of that, and permitted then when they knew not ſo well to uſe their voices and tongues to praiſe the Lord. And certainly the difference is very material, not onely becauſe we find theſe wiſe men ſaying that inſtruments were typical and permitted διὰ νηπιότητα for their tenderneſſe and infancy; but alſo becauſe by the voice and tongue we can properly and directly ſerve God, and as well by ſinging as ſaying, and better, if it be better; which can never be ſaid of inſtrumental muſic: which though I cannot condemn if it be us'd as a help to pſalmody, yet it muſt not be called ſo much as a circumſtance of the Divine ſervice, for that is all can be ſaid of vocal muſic. But of this the uſe is very great, and I will onely repreſent it in the words of Juſtin Martyr; ὑπολείπεται τὸ ᾄδεσθαι ἁπλῶς, ſimple and plain ſinging is left in Churches. For this ſtirres up the mind with a certain pleaſure unto an ardent deſire of that which is celebrated in the ſong: it appeaſes the deſires and affections of the fleſh; it drives away the evil thoughts of our enemies that are inviſible and ſecretly ariſe; it makes the mind irriguous and apt to bring forth holy and Divine fruits; it makes the Generous contenders in piety valiant and ſtrong in adverſity; and it brings a medicine and remedy to all the evil accidents of our life. S. Paul in his ſpiritual armoury calls this the Sword of the Spirit: for it is all of it the word of God which is celebrated, in the mind, in the ſong and in the verſe: it drives away evil ſpirits, and the pious mind is by the ſongs of the Church perfected in vertue.] The Eulogy is fair and large: but yet all wiſe and ſober perſons doe find fault when the Pſalmody which is recommended to us by the practice of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, does ſenſibly paſſe further into art then into religion, and ſerves pleaſure more then devotion; when it recedes from that native ſimplicity and gravity which ſerv'd the affections and holy aſpirations of ſo many ages of the Church; when it is ſo conducted that it ſhall not be for edification, that is, when it is ſo made accurate and curious that none can joyn in it but Muſicians, and they alſo are not ſo recitative, they doe not ſing and expreſſe the words ſo plainly that they which hear doe underſtand; for by this means the greateſt benefit and uſe of edification is loſt: as appears in thoſe words of S. Baſil, who when he had highly commended τῆς μελῳδίας πρέπον τοῖς δόγμασιν ἐγκαλλώπισμα the delight of melody mingled with heavenly myſteries, he addes, Διὰ τοῦτο τὰ ἐναρμόνια ταῦτα μέλη τῶν ψαλμῳδιῶν ὑπενόηται, For this cauſe were the tunes of harmonious Pſalms deviſed for us, that they which either are yong in years, or novices in inſtruction, might when they think they ſing, have their ſouls inſtructed in the truth. Ὦ τῆς σοφῆς ὑποθέσεως τοῦ διδασκάλου, ὁμοῦ τε ἅδειν ἡμᾶς καὶ τὰ λυσιτελῆ μανθάνειν μηχανωμένου, O the great wiſedome of our Heavenly maſter, which at the ſame time deſignes to have us pleas'd and inſtructed to perfection by the ſinging of Pſalms! But in this and all things like this, the rulers of Churches are to doe that which moſt promotes the end of their inſtitution. Salus populi ſuprema lex eſto, is a rule which in this affair hath no exception: the ſalvation of one ſoul is more then all the intereſts in the world beſides.

lib. 1. Ep. 457.

12. 5. Although Counſels Evangelical being obſerved are greatly for the glory of God and for the edification of the Church; yet it is not for edification that they be injoyn'd, and therefore make not the proper ſubject and matter of Eccleſiaſtical laws: and the reaſon is, all that wiſedome by which God was moved not to injoyn it, even becauſe all men cannot take it, and few men will; and the impoſition is not ζυγὸς χρηστὸς a gentle yoke, but is a perpetual ſnare. For here is the difference between things indifferent and Counſels Evangelical, though alike they be left under no command by God, yet for ſeveral reaſons: for things in themſelves indifferent are too little for the ſervice of God, and Counſels Evangelical are too great for our ſtrengths; and therefore God will not be worſhipped by thoſe, and he will not put any neceſſity upon theſe: but yet thoſe may be made matter of humane laws, becauſe they may become uſefull to many purpoſes; but Counſels cannot be made into laws, not becauſe the nature of the things themſelves will not bear the load of a Commandement, but becauſe becauſe our natures will not: and therefore they are to be advis'd, encourag'd, preached, practis'd, commended and rewarded; any thing but injoyn'd, or made into neceſſary duty. And indeed, when we conſider that Counſels of perfection are a direct worſhip of God when they are perform'd, and that God onely is to make laws of his own worſhip and direct religion, and that in theſe he would make no law, becauſe theſe ſhould not become neceſſary, but the inſtruments of a voluntary ſervice, that in theſe things we might ſhew our love, as in the matter of his laws we ſhew our obedience; the Church cannot have a power legiſlative in theſe, for ſhe is the mouth of Chriſt, to command what he commands, to exhort to what he exhorts: and as the Church cannot make that to be a part of the Divine worſhip which God hath not made ſo, and therefore things indifferent may become miniſteries and circumſtances of religion, but no parts of it; ſo neither can any thing be otherwiſe a Divine worſhip then God hath made it, and therefore man cannot make that to be a neceſſary worſhip which God hath not made ſo, but hath chuſingly and wiſely left to the choice of our will and love. And to this ſenſe was that ſaying of Athenagoras in his Apology for the Chriſtians, Deus ad ea quæ præter naturam ſunt neminem movet, God moves no man to things which are beſides his nature; that is, he urges no man to doe ſuch things which muſt ſuppoſe great violence to be done to nature.

13. But the great matter in this whole affaire is, that Counſels Evangelical when they are not left at liberty become a ſnare; not onely becauſe they are commonly great violations of our deſires, or great invaſions of our intereſt, and therefore fit onely to be undertaken by a very few and after a long experience of their ſtrength: but alſo becauſe though they be excellencies in themſelves, yet in ſome caſes and in ſome conjugations of circumſtances they doe deſtroy another duty; as giving all our goods to the poor hinders us from making proviſion for our relatives, a ſtate of cœlibate expoſes us to a perpetual uſtulation; and then either by our contrary ſtate of affairs, or by our unequal ſtrengths pull down that building which they intended to ſet up. Some Canoniſts ſay that the Church forbids a mutual congreſſion of married paires upon Feſtival days; upon which days the Jews thought it a ſpecial duty, but the heathens abſtain'd: but how if one be willing, and the other is not? he ſhall be put to diſpute between two duties, juſtice and religion, and ſhall be forc'd like him in the Satyr to ask pardon for doing of his duty;

Concubitu ſacris obſervandiſque diebus.

The Council of Eliberis commanded abſtinence from conjugal rights for three or four or ſeven days before the Communion. Pope Liberius commanded the ſame during the whole time of Lent; quia penè nihil valet jejunium quod conjugali opere polluitur, ſuppoſing the faſt is polluted by ſuch congreſſions: but becauſe this relied upon an heretical ſtock, that marriage is unclean, and ſcarce to be allowed to be holy, of it ſelf it ſeems unreaſonable: but when they commanded that thoſe which were married ſhould that day communicate, and they that did communicate ſhould that night abſtain, (but that they had no power to command any ſuch thing,) the law it ſelf laid a ſnare for ſouls, and if it could have chang'd the action into a ſin, would have ingag'd moſt married paires to become ſinners.

14. Upon the ſame account, but upon very much more reaſon, thoſe Churches which injoyn cœlibate to all their numerous Clergy doe unreaſonably and uncharitably; they have no power to make any ſuch law, and if they had, they ought not to doe it, upon the account of this Rule, becauſe they ought not to lay a ſtumbling-block and a ſtone of offence in their Brothers way.

Of the Marriages of Biſhops and Prieſts.

15. Now concerning this, I ſhall firſt conſider the purpoſe and influence of the Rule upon it. For if this be a ſtone of offence, if this law be directly and regularly a ſnare to conſciences, it is certain it is an ungodly law, and of no obligation to the ſubjects of any Church. Now this relying upon experience and being beſt proved by the event of things, will be ſufficiently cleared by the teſtimony of thoſe wiſe perſons who have obſerved the evil, and wiſh'd a remedy by annulling the law.

16. Æneas Sylvius, who was afterwards Pope Pius the ſecond, ſaid that the ſingle life of the Clergy was upon good reaſon at firſt introduc'd, but that for better reaſon it ought now to be let alone and taken off. And of the ſame mind was Panormitan; ſaying that we are taught by experience that from this law of cœlibate not continency but a contrary effect does follow: for the Prieſts doe not live ſpiritually, neither are they clean, but are polluted with unlawfull mixtures to their great ſin and ſhame, whereas it were chaſtity if it were a ſociety with their own wife. And indeed the ſcandal was ſo great, the ſtories ſo intolerable, their adulteries ſo frequent, their luſts ſo diſcovered, and the accidents ſo ridiculous, that the Clergy became the contempt and jeſt of buffoons and drunkards, and the pity and ſhame of wiſe and ſober men. And it was a ſtrange thing which in the hiſtory of the Council of Trent is told out of Zuinglius, that writing to the Cantons of the Suiſſes, he made mention of a law or edict made by the magiſtrates their predeceſſors, that every Prieſt ſhould be bound to have his proper Concubine, that he might not enſnare the chaſtity of honeſt women; adding, that though it ſeem'd a ridiculous decree, yet it could not be avoided, unleſſe the word Concubine were chang'd into Wife, and the permiſſion before given to unlawfull Concubinate might be given now to lawfull Marriage. And who pleaſe to ſee inſtances more then enough to verify the infinite ſcandals given by the unmarried Clergy generally, may be glutted with them in Henry Stephen's apology for Herodotus. * But if he be leſſe relied upon, as being a friend to the complaining ſide, the teſtimony of Caſſander will not ſo eaſily be rejected, ſaying, If ever there was a time for changing of an old cuſtome, certainly theſe times require it; where all the beſt and moſt religious Prieſts acknowledging their infirmity, and abhorring the turpitude of perpetual fornication, if publickly they dare not, yet privately they marry. And they that did not, did worſe: for things (ſaith he) are come to that paſſe, that ſcarce one in an hundred abſtains from the fellowſhip of women. And Alvarus Pelagius telling ſad ſtories of the inceſts, uncleanneſſe and fornications of the Prieſts and Friers, tells of their gluttony, their idleneſſe and eaſe, their pride and arrogancy, their receiving boys into their houſes and cloyſters, their converſation with Nunnes and ſecular women, that it is no wonder there is amongſt them ſo impure a Clergy, that ſo many good men have complained, and all have been aſhamed of it. And therefore upon upon this account we may consider the evils which the Church suffers by such a law which permits their Clergy to walk in the fire, and commands them not to be burn'd; or rather not that so much, but they forbid them the use of cold water: I say, we may consider the intolerable scandals, the infinite diminution of spiritual good, the great loss and hazard of souls, when fornicators and adulterers, paederasts and the impurest persons shall by their sermons and common talk dishonour marriage, and at the same time put their polluted hands to the dreadful mysteries, and their tongues to sing hymns to God, and to intercede for the people, who the night before have polluted the temples of the Holy Ghost, and defiled them unto the ground. But I had rather these things were read in the words of other men, and therefore I shall remit the Reader that would see heaps of such sad complaints to the Via Regia of Weicelius, to Andreas Fricius Modrevius de Matrimonio presbyterorum, and in his [a] Apology, [b] Albertus Pighius, [c] Dominicus Soto, the [d] Centum Gravamina Germaniæ, [e] John Gerson, [f] Polydore Virgil. Many more might be reckoned, but these are witnesses beyond exception; especially if we adde that the complaints were made by wise and grave men many ages together, and that their complaints were of an old canker in the Church, that could never be cured, because the spiritual Physitians did see, but would not take the cause away. For this thing we find complain'd of by S. [g] Bernard, Rupertus Tuitiensis his contemporary, who compares the Clergy of that age to the Nicolaitans, whom God hated for their uncleanness, by the author of the book de singularitate Clericorum attributed to S. Cyprian, by [h] Guilielmus Durandus in his book de modo concilii Generalis celebrandi, S. Hudelrichus Bishop of Ausburg, who wrote against the constrained single life of Priests to Pope Nicholas, [i] Robert Holkot, [k] Nicolaus de Clemangiis, [l] Petrus de Alliaco, [m] Tostatus, Platina in the life of Pope Marcellinus. The scandal must needs be notorious and intolerable when so many persons of the ingaged party, of the Roman Church, whence all this mischief came, durst so openly complain, and wish the annulling of the law of single life to the Clergy, or that the spirit of purity were given to all that minister to a pure religion, the religion of Jesus Christ. But the thing it self was it's own indication; it was a black cloud, and all good men abhorr'd it: for things came to that pass, that the Bishops Officials took annuities from all their parish Priests for licences to keep Concubines; and if they came to a continent person that told them he kept none, they replied, that yet he must pay, because he might if he would; as is reported by divers of their own, particularly by the Centum Gravamina, and by Espencæus in Epist. ad Titum, cap. 1. I end this with the words of Martinus Peresius, Multis piis visum est ut leges de cœlibatu tollerentur propter scandala, Many pious persons have thought it necessary that the law of Priests single life should be taken away by reason of the scandals which it brings. For S. Paul was so curious, even in this very instance, that when he had but commended the ease and advantages of the single life to all Christians in regard of the present necessity, and the affairs of religion under persecution, he presently claps in this caution, I speak not this to lay a snare before you, sed vestro commodo: If any of you find it for your ease or advantage, well and good, but at no hand let it be a snare.

17. 2. But that which next is considerable is, that this law is an intolerable burden. So said Paphnutius in the Nicene Council; he call'd it ὑπερβάλλειν τῆς ἀκριβείας an excess of exactness: and therefore when some Bishops ſhops would have had it made into a law, he advis'd the contrary; Nolite gravare jugum Eccleſiaſticorum, Lay not a load upon the Eccleſiaſtic ſtate; for marriage is honourable in all men and the bed undefiled: adding, that all cannot bear that inſtitution of life that is void of all affections; and as he ſuppos'd, no man ſhould be ſav'd in his chaſtity if husbands were depriv'd of their wives, but that ſuch ſociety was continence and chaſtity. So Gelaſius Cyzicenus tells the ſtory. And though Turrian the Jeſuite would fain make the world not believe it; yet he hath prevail'd nothing. For it is not onely related by Gelaſius, but by [a] Ruffinus, by Socrates, Sozomen, by Aurelius Caſſiodorus the [b] Author of the tripartite hiſtory, by [c] Suidas, [d] Nicephorus Calliſtus, and by [e] Gratian. And the Synod did obey the Counſel. And therefore the third Canon of that Council cannot be underſtood by any learned man to be a prohibition to the Clergy to marry: it forbids a Biſhop, a Prieſt or Deacon, συνείσακτον γυναῖκα ἔχειν, to have a woman introduc'd, unleſs ſhe be a Mother, a Siſter, or an Aunt, that is one of whom there can be no ſuſpicion. Mulierem extraneam, a woman that is not a domeſtic; ſo [f] Ruffinus, [g] Fulgentius Ferrandus, and the [h] fourth Council of Toledo expound the word συνείσακτον. For by that time the opinion of ſingle life had prevail'd both by right and by wrong; for in the three hundred years of danger and perſecution many that were under the croſs would not intangle themſelves with ſecular relations, but fight naked and expedite: but beſides this, the Nicolaitans and the Encratites and the Manichees and the Montaniſts and the Gnoſticks and the Priſcillianiſts had ſo diſgrac'd marriage, and pretended ſuch purities to be in ſingle life, that it was very eaſy in that conjunction of affairs to inſinuate it into the zeale and affections of ſome leſs-diſcerning perſons, who not being content to have marriage left at liberty as it was during the whole 300. years, would needs have it impoſed: not diſcerning in the mean time that amongſt thoſe who pretended to the purities of cœlibate, ſome would yet bring women into their houſes; ſo did the Hieracitæ, as Epiphanius reports of them, pretending they did not marry them, but made them houſe-keepers: they were their gallants, meer Platonics, or, as they call'd them, ſiſters; but they would kiſs and embrace tenderly, and ſometimes ſleep together, but ſtill would be thought Virgins, as we find in an epiſtle of S. Cyprian, where he commands ſuch perſons to be thruſt from the Communion of the faithful, unleſs they would either marry, or leave the communion of their women (for that gloſs had not yet invaded the perſwaſions of men which ſince hath prevail'd: Sacerdos amplectens mulierem, præſumitur benedicere, If a Prieſt imbrace a woman, it is to be preſum'd he onely gives her a bleſſing.) And the ſame S. Chryſoſtom tells of them in ſome homily he made againſt thoſe that brought in ſuch women. They were the companions of their ſingle life; ſo Budæus renders the word: but it was uſual amongſt the Chriſtians of thoſe ages, Virgins to bring in men, and Monks to bring in women: but theſe were condemn'd by the Council of Nice; who yet did not prevail, but that they who might have wives or husbands had rather have ſuch friends and companions, which nevertheleſs gave infinite ſcandal and reproach. S. Gregory Nazianzen ſpeaks of them with no good will or commendations at all,

He

He neither knew how to call them *, whether married or unmarried, or between both; but at no hand was that kind of life to be commended: but much less was it to be indured that men by new laws should be crush'd to death or danger under an intolerable burden. This was the sense of the Nicene Council. And the same thing was affirmed by Dionysius Bishop of Corinth to Pinytus Bishop of Gnossus, μὴ βαρὺ φορτίον ἐπάναγκες τὸ περὶ ἁγνείας τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς ἐπιτιθέναι, the heavy yoke of abstinence ought not to be imposed upon the Brethren. And of this the * Chancellor of Paris, a good man and a wise, discourses gravely. "Christ our most wise law-giver hath left "rituals or Judicials to their choice of whom he said, He that heareth you, "heareth me; but yet so that they should know they are set over others "for edification, not for destruction: and that they should judge according "to the law of God, which is the general rule for all the professors of Chri- "stian religion under Christ who is their General Abbat; not enlarging it, "not restraining it, or making it harder then Christ expressed it when he said "his yoke is easy and his burden light. For the Prelates of the Church have "not power to bind their subjects to any things which are not delivered in "the Evangelical law professed by all Christians; they have no other autho- "rity then Abbats have over their Monks, who, according to the doctrine "of S. Thomas and other Doctors, cannot command their Monks any other "thing then what they have professed in their Rule.] Now whether this be a burden or no will need no inquiry, when there is not in all the laws of God so much difficulty as in this very thing; insomuch that without a special gift of God, it is impossible. I need not to prove this tell the sad stories of some Saints who have fallen foully by the sollicitations of their own nature; or how that youth, in which age many enter into holy Orders, is a state of flames and danger; that S. Hierom complains of it in his own particular, Scitis lubricum adolescentiæ iter, in quo & ego lapsus sum, he lost his glory of a virgin body when he was young: but I consider that those persons who have undertaken it, and had eminent graces, and were persons of rare and exemplar sanctity, yet could not preserve their virgin without almost destroying their body. Evagrius the Priest us'd to goe into a well in a winters night, S. Bernard into a lake, to cool their burnings: S. Francis us'd to roll his naked body in snows, S. Omar in nettles, S. Benedict upon thorns, S. Martinian upon burning coals, to overthrow the strongest passion by the most violent pains. And were not that law intolerable that should command all Ecclesiastics to doe such things? They must doe these or worse: I speak of those who have not the gift of continence. For to say that all men have it, or may have it if they will labour and pray for it, is to speak against reason and * Scripture and experience. It is easier to give our bodies to be burn'd for religion, then to live innocently in the state of perpetual burning: and supposing those Saints now enumerated did by these violent remedies keep themselves from pollution, yet it is not certain that they took the better part when they chose ustulation before marriage, expressly against the Apostle, who not onely said, that it is better to marry then to fornicate, but, better to marry then to burn: and that these violences did cure their burning, is so false, that they doe suppose them afflicted with burnings, and that therefore they were constrain'd to use violent remedies; for those which men invent are infinitely worse then that which God hath appointed; so easy it was by marriage to cure what they found scarce possible to keep from the extremest mischiefs, but not possible to doe in all degrees, by mortifications. And therefore S. Hierom speaking of Virgins that that did not doe honour to their virginity by real continence, he advis'd them, ut aut nubant ſi ſe non poſſunt continere, aut contineant ſi nolunt nubere, that they would contain if they will not marry, or marry if they cannot contain: not onely if they cannot contain from outward acts of uncleanneſs, but even from the ſecret deſires of it, and from burnings. Quid enim prodeſt (ſaith he) corporis pudicitia animo conſtuprato? The chaſtity of the body is of no profit, if the deſires be burning and diſhoneſt.

So the burning is well deſcrib'd in the Comedy. Uri eſt illegitimo coitu aut fœdis cogitationibus ſe polluere, ſaid Alfonſus Virveſius, To burn, is to pollute our ſelf with unlawful mixtures, or with filthy thoughts; and theſe deſires are not to be cur'd by mortifications and corporal auſterities. Nella guerra d' amor chi fuge vince, ſaith the Italian proverb. There is no conteſting againſt this paſſion; even to diſpute againſt it is a temptation, even to faſt and to be hungry does enkindle the flame. Fames & ſitis exaſperat & incendit animos, ſaith Seneca, Hunger and thirſt make a man angry: and anger and luſt are fed by the ſame fuel,

A ſpare and temperate diet gives no extraordinary maintenance to the deſire, and therefore it was advis'd and practis'd in all ages: but there is enough of deſire in ordinary; even that which maintains health will keep up that natural deſire; and that which deſtroys health, deſtroys charity, and hinders us more in the ſervice of God then it can ſet forward. And S. Hierom ſaies that he had known them of both ſexes who have by too much abſtinence turn'd mad, and loſt their wits. They that from God's mercy have receiv'd ſtrengths to live ſingly and purely, may uſe it as it ſerves beſt for God's glory and the intereſt of their ſouls, and their own intermedial comforts. But it is to be conſidered, that it is not onely a gift of God that ſome men can contain, but it is a peculiar gift that they will: and it is obſerved by wiſe and good men, that this deſire hath or hath not reſpectively been inſpir'd by the ſpirit of God in ſeveral ages of the Church according to their preſent neceſſities; and when God gives the gift, then every thing wil help it forward. But in the preſent manners and circumſtances of the world, as there is no public neceſſity of it, ſo there is no great care taken to acquire it; for there where the unequal laws of men have brought a neceſſity upon their Clergy, it is with them as with thoſe of whom Epiphanius complains, Ut ne confundantur apud homines occultè ſcortantur, & ſub ſolitudinis aut continentiæ ſpecie libidinem exercent, They pretend purity in public, and fornicate in private. And it is certain, that ſuch courſes are no fit means to invite the ſpirit of purity to inveſt and adorn the Church. Neither is prayer a certain way of obtaining this gift, any more then of the gift of a healthful or a ſtrong body; for God requires it of none of us directly; if accidentally he does require it, he will give him wherewithall: but therefore the Apoſtle does not ſay, But if a man does not contain, let him pray, but let him marry. It is ſufficient that God hath given a remedy that is eaſy and infallible to all that love God; and it is beſt to uſe that remedy which is beſt, and was by the beſt Phyſician provided for all that need. Oportet compati & commetiri doctrinam pro virium qualitate, & hujuſmodi qui non poſſunt capere ſermonem de caſtitate, concedere nuptias, ſaid S. Cyril, Every ones ſtrength muſt be meaſured, and ſo fit our doctrines doctrines to their proportions, and to grant marriages to them who cannot receive the word of Continence. And therefore what S. Austin said of Widows may be exactly applied to Eccleſiaſtics, There are ſome that call them adulterous if they marry, and ſo pretend themſelves purer then the doctrine of the Apoſtle, who, if they would confeſs their name, mundanos potius ſe quam mundos vocarent, they would prove to be ſervants of intereſt rather then of purity. For they compel the Widows [the Eccleſiaſtics] to burnings, becauſe they ſuffer them not to marry. But we are not to eſteem them to be wiſer then the Apoſtle Paul, who ſaith, I had rather they ſhould marry then burn. Lib. de agone Chriſtian. cap. 31.

And like to this is that of S. Hierom, Si quis conſideret virginem ſuam, i. e. carnem ſuam, laſcivire & ebullire in libidinem, nec refrænare ſe poteſt, duplex illi incumbit neceſſitas, aut capienda conjugis, aut ruendi, He that conſiders his Virgin, that is, his fleſh, and obſerves it troubleſome and boyling into deſires, and cannot refrain himſelf, hath a double neceſſity upon him; either he muſt take a wife, or he muſt periſh. * And therefore they that pretend the gift of continence is in every mans power, ſhould doe well to give God thanks that they find it ſo in their own, but yet they ſhould alſo doe well to believe others who complain that they have it not. S. Bernard's wiſh was ſomething to the ſame purpoſe of charity and ſecurity. Utinam qui continere non valent, perfectionē temerariè profiteri, aut cœlibatui dare nomina vererentur; ſumptuoſa ſiquidem turris eſt, & verbum grande, quod non omnes capere poſſunt, I wiſh that they who cannot contain, would be afraid to profeſs perfection, and undertake ſingle life: for this is a coſtly tower, and a great word that all cannot receive. Contra Jovin. lib. 1. De converſ. ad Clericos cap. 29.

Æneas Sylvius having gotten a Lady with child, to his Father that was troubled at it he replies, in ſua poteſtate non fuiſſe ut vir non eſſet, he could not help it: and when Origen had reſolved to live continently, he found no courſe but one would doe it, even by making it impoſſible to be otherwiſe; and he was followed by many, particularly by the Valeſii: and Leontius, who was afterwards choſen Bp. of Antioch by the Arrians, having a woman in his houſe, one of the συνείσακτοι of which I ſpake before, being commanded to put her away, emaſculated himſelf that he might have leave to ſleep with her: but that uncharitable folly produc'd a good law againſt it. For what chaſtity is that, or what ſervice of God is it for a man to offer to God a ſingle life when he hath made himſelf naturally impotent? It is (that I may uſe S. Baſil's expreſſion) as if we ſhould commend a horſe for not hurting any man with horns. But I obſerve it for this purpoſe, to repreſent upon what terms the gift of continence was to be obtain'd by ſome who would fain, but by this act ſhewed plainly that they could not. Epiſt. 15. And therefore thoſe laws that command ſingle life to ſo many thouſands of Prieſts, Italians, Spaniards, Frenchmen, which are none of the moſt continent nations of Europe, are a ſnare to thoſe that cannot keep them, and a burden to them that would, and intolerable to both. So Origen complains of In Matth. tract. 24.

of ſome imperious and imprudent perſons who in his time would be commanding ſingle life and virginity; Non ſolum quæ docent non faciunt, ſed etiam crudeliter & ſine miſericordia injungunt aliis majora virtute ipſorum, non habentes rationem virium uniuſcujuſque, They not onely doe not what they teach, but cruelly and unmercifully injoyn to others things greater then their ſtrength, not regarding the meaſure of every one. For it is a burden bigger then the weight of all the laws of Jeſus Chriſt put together, except to ſuch perſons who are Eunuchs by nature, or have received a particular gift of God; of which they may make uſe as they finde other things concurring. For to be able to contain is one gift, and to be willing is another; and after all, that this can promote any end of religion is but accidental, and depends upon a ſpecial providence and Oeconomy of affairs. It may be uſeful in ſome times, and to ſome perſons, and to ſome purpoſes; but of it ſelf it is no act of religion, no ſervice of God: and that's the next conſideration.

18. 3. The law of cœlibate is an unreaſonable law, and beſides that it does very much miſchief to ſouls, it does no good at all. For if ſingle life have in it any greater purity or ſpirituality then chaſt marriages, yet even that ſingle life is more acceptable when it is choſen and voluntary; and if it be involuntary and conſtrain'd, it is not pleaſing to God: ſo that the law in this caſe does effect nothing but this, that they who are willing may looſe ſomething of the reward, or may be uncertain whether they doe or no; and they that are unwilling are conſtrained either to hypocriſy, which will bring them an evil reward, or to a burden and ſlavery which ſhall bring them none at all. But that which I intended is this,

19. 4. That all this ſtirre is to no purpoſe; for Virginity is not more holy then chaſt marriage, and the one does not more advance religion then the other directly, but by accident, and in ſome circumſtances, and as an inſtrument fitted for uſe in it's own time. For as S. Auſtin obſerves well, S. Paul does modeſtly dehort from marriage, not as from an evil, but as from a burden:] neither is his advice for all times, but for that preſent neceſſity; neither is it to the Clergy, but to all Chriſtians; neither is it for religion, but for convenience; neither was it from the Lord, but from himſelf; nothing of the Goſpel or ſpirituality, but a matter of prudence, and the exterior conduct of affairs. For Τίμιος ὁ γάμος, and κοίτη ἀμίαντος, marriage is honourable, it is ſo to all, and ſuch mixtures have in them nothing that defiles, and he that is perfect in his conſtitution, if he be alſo ſo much a Virgin as to have nothing that defiles, is a rare perſon, but it may be not to be found; but if he be, yet he does arrive but to that ſtate of things in which the married man is, even when he does actually uſe his greateſt liberty, he is ἀμίαντος undefiled. Which thing if the zelots in ſome of the firſt ages of the Church had rightly obſerved, they would not have been ſo fierce for ſingle life upon the account of heretical principles. For they did it becauſe they ſuppos'd marriage to be a pollution: and if they did not expreſsly condemn it upon that ſtock, yet they ſecretly ſuſpected it, as not being confident of the truth of the Apoſtles words, but ſuffering themſelves to be a little abus'd by heretical ſermons, though they did not openly joyn in their communions and profeſſions. The Council of Gangra notes ſuch perſons as theſe, that refus'd the communion from the hands of a married Prieſt; but in the fourth chapter pronounces anathema againſt them:

them: and S. Ignatius ſaies that they who call the ſociety of married pairs corruption, and pollution, have the Devil that great Apoſtate dwelling in them. For what ſtate of life can be purer then that which is undefiled? and from whence ſhall we take the meaſures of purity but from the fountains of our Saviour, from the holy Scriptures, the ſprings of ſalvation? But to this the firſt ages of the Church gave apparent witneſs. Perfecti Chriſtiani edunt, bibunt, contrahunt Matrimonium, ſaid Clemens Alexandrinus, Perfect Chriſtians eat and drink and make marriages: and therefore the τελείωσις ἱερατικὴ, the perfect ſtate of Orders is not at all impugned or diminiſhed by marriage. Sozomen tells of Biſhop Spiridion, ἐγένετο γὰρ ἔτι ἄγροικος, γαμετῇ τε καὶ παῖδας ἔχων, ἀλλ' ὁ παρὰ τοῦτο τὰ θεῖα χείρων, He was a plain man, he had wife and children, but not at all the worſe, not at all hindred in Divine things. The ſame alſo is ſaid of Gregory Bp. of Nazianzum the Father of S. Gregory the Divine, and S. Baſil, Etſi matrimonio ſe vinxit, ita tamen in eo vixit ut nihil propterea ad perfectam virtutem ac Philoſophiam conſequendam impediretur. He comported himſelf ſo in the ſtate of marriage, that he was not at all hindred for obtaining the perfection of vertue and [Chriſtian] philoſophy: and indeed what ſhould hinder him? for marriage does not. Matrimonium non ſolum nihil nobis obſtat ad philoſophandum Deo, ſi voluerimus eſſe ſobrii, ſed & magnam adfert conſolationem: comprimit enim inſanum naturæ impetum, nec turbari ſinit quaſi mare, ſed efficit ut ſcapha feliciter in portum appellet; & ideo Deus conſolationem hanc tribuit humano generi, For if men will be ſober, marriage is not onely no hindrance to Chriſtian philoſophy, but alſo brings great aids and comfort. For it repreſſes the mad violences of nature, and cauſes that we be not troubled like the enraged ſea, but makes the veſſel arrive ſafely to her port; and therefore God hath given this comfort to mankind.

10. For although it be true that, as S. Paul ſaies, the Married cares for the things of the world, the Unmarried for the things of the Lord; He, how he may pleaſe his wife, This, how he may be holy both in body and in ſpirit; yet this is ſo far from diſparaging holy Marriage, or making it leſs conſiſtent with the dignity and offices eccleſiaſtical, that in the world there is not a greater argument to the contrary. For conſider where every ones trouble, and where their danger lies. The Married hath more neceſſities and more affairs in the world, and relations to look after: which if he well provides for according to his power, he hath indeed ſuffered ſome ſecular trouble; but he hath done his duty, & he is ſafe. But the unmarried is alone, & without thoſe relations; & therefore they may if they will let the things of the world alone, and mind the preſent imployment, which then was the miniſteries and attendancies Evangelical. But though they have leſs care of the things of this world; yet their care which lies in another ſcene is a good care indeed, but it is very great and tender, and hath in it very great danger.

——pœnæque graves in cælibe vita. Auſon.

The Unmarried takes care how ſhe may be holy or clean in body and ſpirit. And this is a care not onely of greater concernment then that of ſecular ſupplies, but to moſt perſons of extreme difficulty and danger. For it is to no purpoſe to be Unmarried, unleſs they remain pure in body and in ſpirit, that is, be free from carnal deſires as well as unclean actions: and how great a care is requir'd to this, I need not ſay, becauſe all men that have tried it know: but this care the Married need not know any thing of; for they have by God a remedy provided for them, and they are in the holy ſtate of marriage, without that care, holy both in body and mind; ſo that it is eaſy to ſay where the advantage lies. The one takes care to avoid want, the other to avoid damnation. The one hath troubles of this world, the other hath dangers of the other. The hardeſt province which the married man hath is how to pleaſe his wife; but his affairs are ſo well order'd, that he hath not ſuch difficulties to pleaſe God as the other hath: which thing was long ſince obſerved by S. Gregory Nazianzen, that indeed ſingle life is higher and better (if it be pure and undefiled) but it is more difficult and more dangerous, and Marriage, which looks not ſo ſplendidly, is yet much more ſafe.] But this compariſon is true between perſons married, and the unmarried that have the gift of continence; for even that gift does not exempt them from great dangers and great labours. But if there be any burning, if there be a fire within, it is ill dwelling in the houſe where there is no chimny; for that the ſmoak will fill every corner of the dwelling, and at leaſt make a perpetual trouble. But between the married, and the unmarried that hath not the gift of continence, which is far the greateſt part of mankind, there is no compariſon at all. And therefore though in reſpect to that conjunction of affairs, to the beginnings of a perſecuted religion, in which many of them were to live an ambulatory life, and ſuffer the ſpoiling of their goods, and be thruſt out of their houſes, the Apoſtle had great reaſon to take care leſt by the greatneſs and ſuperfetations of trouble they ſhould be tempted to forſake, and be vext out of their religion: yet abſtracting from that conſideration, the married eſtate is much more ſecure for the ſtate of ſouls, & propter eam quæ in nuptiis eſt animi tranquillitatem (as S. Gregory Nazianzen affirms) and for that peace of mind which is in chaſt marriages, and is not in the ſtate of ſingle life with them who are perpetually fighting with a dangerous enemy, who is not alwaies reſiſted, and if he be, is not alwaies put to the worſt. And therefore it was rightly obſerved of S. Clemens Alexandr. As [ſingle life, or] Continence, ſo Marriage alſo hath proper gifts and miniſteries which pertain unto the Lord: but at no hand ought it to be admitted that marriage does hinder the ſervice of the Lord; it ſets it forward very much, but hinders nothing; it may be burdenſome to thoſe who are to travel and paſs from country to country, but to them who fix in a place, and who attend the miniſteries of one people, it is no hindrance; and then to the direct ſervice of God in our perſonal piety and ſpiritual ſafety it is a very great advantage: concerning which who pleaſe may read S. Gregory concerning his mother Nonna, and the Epiſtles of Paulinus * concerning Amanda the wife of Aper, who were to their husbands admirable advantages both in the affairs of the world and of religion. Sanctiſſimus Samuel filios genuit: non tamen juſtitiæ ſuæ merita minuit. Zacharias ſacerdos vir juſtus in ſenectute ſua genuit filium. Quâ ergo ratione accuſatur, quod minimè obeſſe probatur? ſo S. Auſtin. To which adde the inſtance of S. Chryſoſtome upon thoſe words of Iſai, [I ſaw the Lord,] Quis iſta loquitur? Iſaias ille ſpectator cæleſtium Seraphim, qui cum conjuge commercium habuit, nec tamen extinxit gratiam. Samuel the moſt holy Prophet, and Zechary that juſt Prieſt, and Iſaiah that Seer who ſaw the celeſtial Seraphim, were not hindred from their greateſt graces, favours and perfections by the ſtate and offices of marriage. The event of this conſideration I repreſent in the words of the ſame excellent Doctor, Quamvis nuptiæ plurimum difficultatis in ſe habeant, ita tamen aſſumi poſſunt ut perfectiori vitæ impedimento non ſint, Though marriage have in it very much difficulty (in reſpect of domeſtic cares) yet it may be ſo ſo undertaken that it may be no impediment to a life of perfection. For even in reſpect of ſecular cares and intrigues of buſineſs the ſingle life, which ſeems in this to have advantage, is not alwaies found ſo innocent and diſintangled, and yet ſometimes even in this very regard a married man hath or may have advantages and eaſe and liberty: Videmus virgines de ſeculo cogitare, & Matrimonio junctos Dominicis ſtudere operibus, ſaid S. Ambroſe, Men of ſingle lives take care for the world, and we ſee them that are married ſtudy the works of the Lord. And if it were otherwiſe, yet a law to command ſingle life were very imprudent; unleſs they could ſecure that they who have no wives ſhall have no children. But as Lipſius ſaid of the Roman Senate, who forbad their ſouldiers to marry, à Junone arcebant eos, non à Venere, Romanæ leges, the Roman laws forbad Juno to them, not Venus, for Contubernii militibus ſemper jus, the ſouldiers alwaies might have women, but no wives; ſo it is amongſt the Roman Prelates too much: but unleſs this alſo were ſo denied them, that they could have no children, or that they who have no children ſhall not be ſollicitous to raiſe a poor family, or to increaſe a great, the law were very unreaſonable as to this very pretence. For that things are otherwiſe there where ſingle life is injoyn'd is too apparent, and it is complain'd of by [a] Alvarus Pelagius 300 years agoe, and by Platina and [c] Bonaventure, and it is notorious in all the Popes; divers particulars of which in the inſtance of Sixtus quintus are to be ſeen in the excellent [d] Thuanus. I end this conſideration with the excellent words of [e] Salvian, Novum prorſus eſt converſionis genus: licita non faciunt, illicita committunt. Temperant à conjugio, & non temperant à rapina. Quid agis ſtulta perſuaſio? peccata interdixit Deus, non matrimonia. This is a new and a ſtrange kind of converſion. They will not doe lawful things, but they commit unlawful: they abſtain from marriage, but not from rapine. O ye fools, why are ye ſo perſwaded? God hath forbidden ſins, not marriages.

11. Although theſe conſiderations are a ſufficient explication of this inſtance of the Rule, and verify the firſt intention, that ſingle life ought not by a law to be injoyn'd to any one order of men; yet becauſe the inſtance is of great concernment beyond the limits of this Rule, I adde that the Apoſtles and the firſt ages of the Church not onely forbad that the Clergy ſhould put away their wives, but left it indifferent for any man, or any order of men to marry: and therefore that it ought not now to be done by the preſent guides of Churches, who have leſſe reaſon ſo to doe; and if they had a greater reaſon, yet they have a leſſe authority. But Chriſt and his Apoſtles left it free. Of this beſides the matter and evidence of fact, there being no law of Chriſt or Canon of the Apoſtles to reſtrain it, but a plain ſuppoſition of liberty, and intimation of the thing done in the Epiſtles to Timothy and Titus, there needs no other teſtimony but that of Gratian. Copula ſacerdotalis, vel conſanguineorum, nec legali, nec Evangelicâ, nec Apoſtolicâ authoritate prohibetur, Neither the Old Teſtament nor the New, neither Chriſt nor his Apoſtles have forbidden the marriage of Prieſts. To which agrees that of Panormitan; Continentia non eſt de ſubſtantia Ordinis, nec de jure Divino, To contain from marriage is not of Divine appointment, nor neceſſary to them that are in holy Orders. The ſame alſo is affirm'd by Antoninus, as who pleaſe may ſee in ſumma, part. 3. tit. 1. c. 21.

22. Now then nothing remains to be conſidered but the practice of the Church, which how far it can oblige, I have already diſcours'd: but ſuppoſe it might in other caſes, yet for the reaſons above deſcrib'd it ought to be altered in this; for if ſuch a law may not bind, much leſſe can the practice; and yet if the practice might, here was no Catholick practice. For as for the whole Greek Church, the practice of that is drawn into a compendium by Pope Stephen. Aliter ſe Orientalium traditio habet Eccleſiarum, aliter hujus S. R. Eccleſiæ: Nam illarum Sacerdotes, Diaconi & Subdiaconi matrimonio copulantur. The tradition of the Eaſtern Churches is otherwiſe then that of the Roman Church: For their Prieſts and Deacons and Subdeacons are joyned in marriage. I ſhall therefore adde no more to this confeſſion but the Canon of the Council of Ancyra, which orders that if Deacons in their ordination will profeſſe that they cannot contain, and that they intend to marry, they may. But if then they profeſſe otherwiſe, and doe againſt their profeſſion, they muſt ceaſe from their Miniſtery. And the practice is to this day, that the Greek and all the Eaſtern Prieſts, are if they pleaſe, married men, and moſt of them actually are ſo: though in the Eaſtern Churches they always did exhort their Clergy to continence, yet they left it to their liberty, and they always took it.

23. In the Latine Church, from the time of Pope Siricius, and the ſecond Council of Arles, which Binius makes about the ſame time, at the end of the fourth Age after Chriſt, there were ſome canons provincial injoyning ſingle life to the Clergy; but the practice was ever againſt the Canon: and as for the firſt 400. years or thereabouts, all had liberty to be married if they pleas'd, ſo even afterwards they would take it, as they ſaw cauſe. This we find in S. Hierom, who to Jovinian, objecting the marriage of Samuel, anſwers, that this was no prejudice to the honour of the virgin-ſtate, quaſi non hodie quoque plurimi Sacerdotes habeant Matrimonia, & Apoſtolus deſcribat Epiſcopum unius uxoris virum;] for the Apoſtle deſcribes a Biſhop the husband of one wife, and even at this day moſt Prieſts are married. S. Hierom did not contend that all Prieſts ought to be virgins; but that if they that could contain, would, it were much better. But by this, the matter of fact againſt the law was evident. S. Ambroſe tells that in moſt remote or private Churches the Prieſts did uſe marriage: In pleriſque abditioribus locis, cum miniſterium gererent vel etiam ſacerdotium, filios ſuſceperunt. The clerical marriages were in his time almoſt univerſal: and therefore many endeavoured to perſuade ſingle life as much as they could, and from arguments they came to affirmations, and ſo to laws by little and little; but did not prevail. For when Petrus Damiani was ſent from Rome into France to perſuade the Prieſts to put away their wives, they defended themſelves with the Canon of the Council of Tribur in Germany, and with the words of S. Paul, To avoid fornication, let every man have his wife; to which the Legate knew not what to anſwer. And when in the year 1074 Pope Gregory the ſeventh ſent fierce letters to Germany about the ſame affair, the Arch-Biſhop of Mentz, to whoſe conduct the buſineſſe was committed, did publiſh the letters, but durſt not verify them; and neither by fair means nor by foul could cauſe the Prieſts to put away their wives. And in England till the year 1100 it was not prohibited to the Clergy to marry, ſaith Henry of Huntingdon: but then Anſelme endeavour'd to put the Popes letters in execution; and 25 yeares after the Cardinal of Crema was ſent over to the ſame purpoſe: but becauſe he was taken in bed with an harlot, he he got nothing but ſhame and money, and ſo went away. But at laſt, after the attempts * & preſſures and tyranny and arts of an hundred and thirty years continuance (for it began in 970, and was not finiſhed till An. Dom. 1100, as † Polydor Virgil computes it) the Clergy was driven from their chaſt marriages, & they took themſelves to Concubines, whom they could change or multiply, and they found themſelves undiſturbed in that; and ſo they reſted, till God being long provok'd by their impureſt ſervices, awakened Chriſtian Princes and Prieſts into liberty and holineſſe and reformation. For amongſt the Canons which are called Apoſtolical, the ſixth ſeverely forbids Biſhops or Prieſts upon pretence of religion to put away their wives,] according to the words of Chriſt, What God hath joyned, let no man put aſunder; and the words of the Apoſtle, Defraud not one another, unleſſe it be by conſent, and for a time. And therefore the Church of Rome, which makes orders to diſſolve marriage, and commands Prieſts which before were married to depart from their wives, ſpeaks and does againſt the practice of the Ancient Churches, and againſt the decrees of Councils, and the Canons of the Apoſtles, and the expreſſe laws of Jeſus Chriſt. I end this with the ſaying of thoſe in Mantuan,

Tutius eſſe volunt quâ lex Divina ſinebat

Quorum vita fuit melior cum conjuge, quam nunc

The old primitives and holy Biſhops and Prieſts in the firſt ages liv'd better with their wives, then now-a-days they doe without them; and therefore it were better to tread in their footſteps, and to walk in that way to which we are pointed by the law of God.

24 One thing I am to adde which is of material conſideration. For every one obſerves in the ſtory of the Church, that even then when they did permit the Biſhops and Prieſts to live with their wives and to get children, yet the Church did even then forbid Biſhops or Prieſts to marry after their Ordination; and therefore many ſuppoſe that we might at leaſt comply ſo far with the Catholick Church, according as it is ſet down in the conſtitutions Apoſtolical attributed to S. Clement, Non licere autem iis, ſi poſt ordinationem ſine uxore fuerint, ad nuptias tranſire: vel ſi uxores habuerint, cum aliis "conjungi; but they muſt be content with her whom they had at the time of "their ordination; but after orders they muſt not marry: and Paphnutius in the Nicene Council, ſaid that they did not doe it, and left it as ſuppos'd that it ought not. Of this I doe not know any one that hath given a reaſon, or conſidered it apart to any purpoſe; and therefore it will not be uſeleſſe or unpleaſant if I give a ſhort account of it.

lib. 6. conſt. Apoſt. cap. 17.

25. 1. Therefore the Primitive Church choſe her Prieſts and Biſhops commonly of great age, of known vertue and holineſſe. They were deſigned to a publick and dangerous imployment, for ſome whole ages they were under perſecution, and the way of the croſſe was a great deletery to fleſh and bloud; and therefore they might the rather require it of them whom in theſe diſpoſitions they found fit to be taken into an imployment which would require a whole man, all his time and all his affections. Now if we conſider that the married Prieſts and Biſhops were commanded to retain their wives, and the unmarried had been tried to be of a known and experienc'd continence, they might with much reaſon and great advantages require that they ſhould ſo remain; that is, they might ask their conſent, and might truſt their promiſe: for here was liberty, and but little danger. The Prieſts were few, and the unmarried much fewer, and their age commonly ſuch as was paſt danger, and the publick affairs of the Church requir'd it, and the men were willing; and then all was right.

26. 2. The Greek Church, and generally the Churches of the Eaſt, did by Cuſtome and tradition oblige their Prieſts to ſingle life, if in that ſtate they were ordain'd, becauſe they took care that if they could not contain they ſhould take a wife before their Orders, immediately if they pleas'd, and then enter into the Prieſthood; as appears frequently in the Greek laws and Canons, and particularly in the third Novel conſtitution of the Emperor Leo the ſixth. So that this was but a circumſtance of law, introduc'd for that which they apprehended to be decent: and in matters of decency, opinion is the onely meaſure. But if they might marry immediately before their ordination and live with their wives, then it is evident they did not believe that either the offices or the ſtate of marriage were againſt the offices and ſtate of Prieſthood. And this is affirm'd by Cajetan, Nec ordo in quantum ordo, nec ordo in quantum ſacer, eſt impeditivus Matrimonii, Neither the order nor the appendant holineſſe, that is, neither the office nor it's decency, are impeded by holy marriages.] And therefore he addes [that it can never be prov'd by reaſon or by authority, that if a Prieſt does contract marriage, he does abſolutely ſin; becauſe the Prieſthood does not diſſolve the marriage, whether contracted after or before; ſtando tantum in iis quæ habemus à Chriſto & Apoſtolis, that is, if we keep our ſelves within the limits of Chriſts Commandements, and the doctrine Apoſtolical.] And that's well enough; for if any Church or all Churches did otherwiſe, the Cuſtome was not good for many reaſons: it did diſhonour to marriage, it made it to be ſecretly ſuſpected of ſome uncleanneſſe, it gave too much countenance to heretics who diſparag'd it, it made a ſnare to thoſe who promiſed continence and found it difficult or impoſſible, and at laſt it came to an intolerable miſchief in the Church of Rome, it brought in divorces, which God hates; for they teach that Orders does diſſolve Marriage, and that which Chriſt onely permitted in the caſe of adultery, they command in the caſe of ordination.

in quodlib. contr. Lutherum.

27. 3. But becauſe there are ſome perſuaſions that will not be mov'd unleſſe they be ſhewn ſome precedents and practices of the Primitive Church, and will always ſuſpect it to be ill for the ſuperior Clergy to marry after ordination, unleſſe you can tell them that ſome good men did ſo before them, for they rely more upon example then upon rule; therefore I ſhall repreſent that although the ancient Canons and practices did generally injoyne their Clergy not to marry after Orders, (before orders they might) yet this thing did not prevail, but Deacons, Prieſts and Biſhops, good men and orderly, did after ordination uſe their liberty, as they found it neceſſary or expedient. This I have already remark'd in the caſe of Deacons, who are permitted by the Council of Ancyra to marry after ordination, if at their ordination they will not profeſſe continence. But Biſhops and Prieſts did ſo too: which is plainly gathered from thoſe words of S. Athanaſius to Dracontius, who refus'd to be made Biſhop becauſe he impertinently thought it was not ſo ſpiritual a ſtate as that of Monks, ſince he ſaw the Biſhops married men and full of ſecular affairs: S. Athanaſius anſwer'd him, that he might might be Biſhop for all that, and keep on his way as he was before: for if that did hinder him, he let him know, that all Biſhops did not enter into the married eſtate, nor all Monks abſtain. Multi quoque ex Epiſcopis Matrimonia non inierunt; Monachi contrà liberorum patres facti ſunt, Many Biſhops did not contract marriages. Now if none did, his anſwer to Dracontius had been more full, and would not have been omitted; but therefore it is manifeſt that in his time ſome did. But Caſſiodore gives an inſtance in a Biſhop and Martyr that took a wife but a little before his Martyrdome, Eupſychius of Cæſarea in Cappadocia. In illo tempore ferunt Martyrio vitam finiviſſe Eupſychium Cæſareenſem, ductâ nuper uxore, cum adhuc quaſi ſponſus eſſe videretur. He was firſt a Prieſt in Cæſarea, but afterwards he was a Biſhop; and ſo he is called by S. Athanaſius, who mentions Sylveſter and Protogenes Biſhops of Dacia, and Leontius and Eupſychius Biſhops of Cappadocia, of which Cæſarea was the Metropolis. This Eupſychius having newly married a wife, while he was yet but as it were a bridegroom, gave up his life in Martyrdome for Chriſt. But this was no news in the Greek Church; For Pope Stephen having affirm'd that the Greek Prieſts, Deacons and Subdeacons are joyn'd in marriage, the gloſs ſaies, Multi ex hac litera dixerunt quod Orientales poſſunt contrahere in ſacris Ordinibus, Many from theſe words have affirmed that the Eaſterlings can marry in holy Orders. And it is alſo added by the gloſſe upon the ſame diſtinction, that the Greeks in their ordinations doe promiſe continence neither explicitly nor tacitly: and if that be true, there is no peradventure but very many of them marry after their conſecrations. But becauſe the Latin lawyers and Canoniſts are none of the beſt hiſtorians, we may better inform our ſelves in this particular from the Greeks themſelves: amongſt whom we find that for almoſt two hundred years together after the Synod in Trullo, the Greek Prieſts had after their Ordination two years time for probation whether they could bear the yoke of ſingle life, and if they could not, they had leave to marry. For although the Canons in Trullo had permitted them onely to ſtay with the wives they had married before Orders, and commanded that they ſhould take none after; yet the Canon prevail'd not, but the contrary cuſtome of two years probation laſted till the time of the Emperor Leo the ſixth, as appears in his third Novel conſtitution before cited. The words are theſe, Conſuetudo quæ in præſenti obtinet, iis qui in Matrimonio conjungi in animo eſt concedit, ut antequam Uxorem duxerint, Sacerdotes fieri poſſint, & deinde biennium ad perficiendam voluntatem jungi Matrimonio volenti præſtituit. They took their Orders firſt, and then had two years time to conſider whether they would marry or no. Now this being the cuſtome of the whole Greek Church, in which the Biſhops becauſe of the ordinations were engaged, it is evident it was not illegal or irregular, but an approved cuſtome of the Church; though before the end of two hundred years after the Synod in Trullo it was decreed againſt by an Imperial law. What became of it afterwards I have had no opportunity to inquire; but I find contrary relations by ſeveral perſons. That which I moſt rely upon is the relation of Eraſmus, who in his Apology againſt the Pariſians ſaies that in Venice he ſaw a Greek Prieſt marry a wife: and in the hiſtory of Johannes Magnus I find theſe words, Wilhelmi Cardinalis prima cura & intentio fuit revocare Sueços & Gothos à ſchiſmate Græcorum in quod Presbyteri & Sacerdotes ductis publicè uxoribus conſenſiſſe videbantur, Cardinal William endeavoured to recover the Suedes and Goths from the ſchiſm of the Greeks, to which they ſeem'd to adhere when their Prieſts and Biſhops did marry wives publicly. By which it appears the Greeks did ſo, ſince the others by ſo doing complied with them. And the Metropolitan of Ruſſia in Sigiſmundus Baro cals it a great error and ſin in the Roman Church, that they reject the Prieſts who marry wives according to the laws. But the matter is not great; for the Church might doe what they ſaw cauſe for.

28. But in the Latine Church it will be harder to find examples of Prieſts marrying after Orders. Not but that there were very many that did; but that they durſt not be known to doe it. But yet ſome notices we have even of this alſo. For Pope Innocentius the ſecond obſerv'd that every where Biſhops and Prieſts, and the Religious profeſſed did marry wives after they had purpos'd the contrary, and by a Decretal reſtrains it. And Ivo Biſhop of Chartres tels of a Prelate that had two harlots; but (as it ſhould ſeem) being weary of that life, he prepar'd Matrimonial Tables for a third: and he tels alſo of a Canon in the Church at Paris who did actually contract marriage, and the Biſhop held it rate and firm, that it was good and could not be diſſolv'd: and we find that Æneas Sylvius being conſulted by a Prieſt that was in the ſnare, he advis'd him actually to take a wife and marry. For what ſhould hinder? The law of the Church was an evil law, made by an authority violent and uſurp'd, inſufficient as to that charge, it was not a law of God, it was againſt the rights and againſt the neceſſities of nature, it was unnatural and unreaſonable, it was not for edification of the Church, it was no advantage to ſpiritual life: it is a law that is therefore againſt public honeſty becauſe it did openly and ſecretly introduce diſhoneſty; it had nothing of the requiſites of a good law, it had no conſideration of humane frailty nor of humane comforts, it was neither neceſſary nor profitable nor innocent, neither fitted to time nor place nor perſon; it was not accepted by them that could not bear it, it was complain'd of by them that could; it was never admitted in the Eaſt, it was fought againſt and declaim'd and rail'd at in the Weſt, and at laſt is laid aſide in the Churches (eſpecially) of the North, as the moſt intolerable and moſt unreaſonable tyranny in the world; for it was not to be endur'd, that upon the pretence of an unſeaſonable perfection, ſo much impurity ſhould be brought into the Church, and ſo many ſouls thruſt down to hell. And therefore when the Latine Prieſts ſaw themſelves ſo horribly inſnar'd, they did ſecretly corrode the net, which openly they durſt not tear in pieces. And the caſe is clear. Dominicus à Soto obſerving that the Church did not for a long time permit Prieſts to marry after Orders, argues thus. The Church admitted married men to be Prieſts, but did not admit Prieſts to be married men, meaning afterwards: which thing (ſaith he) relies upon no other reaſon but this, Becauſe they ſuppos'd the uſe of the marriage-bed to be inconſiſtent with the office and dignity of a Prieſt or Biſhop. For if they who were Biſhops and Prieſts might uſe marriage, what hinders them but that they might after Orders enter upon marriage?] That's his argument. To which I reply, That it is true, the Church, which was æmula continentiæ, deſirous to promote continence, did ſet it forwards where ſhe thought ſhe might with ſafety, and therefore injoyn'd her Prieſts, which anciently could not be ordain'd till they were almoſt 40. years of age, to remain in that ſtate in which their ordination found them: though even this was a ſnare alſo, and could not be obſerved, and was not (as I have proved) yet this was not becauſe they diſapproved the conjugal ſociety; for beſides beſides that the Scripture gives it a title of honour, and calls it purity; it was alſo declar'd to be chaſtity in the Nicene Council, who did therefore leave married Prieſts & Biſhops to the uſe of it: and they who ſpake againſt the uſe of marriage in Prieſts and refus'd to pray with married Prieſts, were anathematiz'd in the Council of Gangra. And it is evident that thoſe who were admitted in the ſtate of marriage to holy Orders did παιδοποιεῖν beget children. S. Gregory the Divine tels it of his Father, Gregory Nazianzen,

Πατὴρ σε λίσεθ', υἱέων ὦ φίλτατε,
Πατὴρ ὁ πρεσβὺς τὸν νέον·
Οὔπω τοσοῦτον ἐκμεμέτρηκας βίον
Ὅσῳ δι' ἥλθε θυσιῶν ἐμοὶ χρόνος.

Carm. de ſua vita.

That he ſaid he had been in holy Orders longer then the age of his ſon, and yet he had alſo a yonger ſon then this Gregory; for Cæſarius was his yonger brother. Baronius contends fiercely againſt this inſtance to convince the ſon of a Poetical fiction, or an hyperbole, or ſome other civil word for a lie. But let it be as it was; yet the thing it ſelf was infinitely evident: for as Fabianus ſaid, Biſhops and Prieſts did for a thouſand years together in the Church live with their wives, nullâ lege prohibente, no law forbidding it, that is, no law in force; and the Council of C P. decreed, Si quis præſumpſerit contra Apoſtolicos Canones aliquos Presbyterorum & Diaconorum privare à contactu & communione legalis uxoris ſuæ, deponatur. It is againſt the Canons Apoſtolical to forbid a Prieſt or Deacon the contact and ſociety of his lawful wife; and he that ſhall preſume to doe it, let him be depos'd. Now then the argument of Dominicus à Soto is very good. If Biſhops and Prieſts might uſe marriage, what hinders them from contracting marriage? There is no undecency in the thing, therefore no inconſiſtency with Orders. Since therefore it is certain that the married Biſhops and Prieſts not onely in the Greek Church, but even in the Latine, in Germany, in France, in England, where they kept their wives in deſpite of the Pope for a long time, did retain the liberties and ſocieties of marriage; there can be nothing in the thing that can make it unfit for them to contract marriages, to whom it is fit to uſe them.

Habetur 1. Diſt. 3. c. Quoniam.

29. There is but one thing more which I think fit to be conſidered in this affaire, and that is, that there is a pretence of a vow of Continence annexed to holy Orders; and that therefore it is not lawful for Biſhops and Prieſts to marry, when they have vowed the contrary. * This indeed concerns them who have made ſuch a vow; but not them that have not. But who made it neceſſary that perſons to be ordain'd ſhould make ſuch a vow? even they onely that made laws againſt the Clergies marriage; and becauſe they durſt not truſt the laws which they made, they took order that men ſhould become a law unto themſelves, that they might be inſnar'd to purpoſe. This vow was onely introduc'd in the Latine Church, and injoyn'd to all her Clergy. Injoyn'd, I ſay, againſt the nature of a vow, which if it be not voluntary, is no vow; which includes deſire in its very name and nature. But Orders doe not include this vow in their nature, and it were intolerable that men ſhould be forc'd from their wives againſt both their wills: that's a perſecution, not an ordination, and it is ſo far from being for the advantage of the Church, that it is expreſsly againſt a Commandement of God, that what he hath joyn'd, any man ſhould ſeparate: and yet we find many in the primitive Churches by force made Prieſts and Biſhops againſt their wills.

S. Auguſtin

S. Auguſtin was taken at Tagaſta and made Prieſt whether he would or no, but he was not married; but another good man was. Pinianus, the husband of Melania, was ordain'd againſt his will and the tears of his wife. Paulinianus, the brother of S. Hierom, was firſt made Deacon by Epiphanius, and then made Prieſt, and they were forc'd to ſtop his mouth that he might not deny it. And can it be thought that theſe men did in this violence make a vow of ſingle life? or can theſe be fitting circumſtances for a vow? But I ſhall not inſiſt upon the particulars of this: becauſe if they ſhould make ſuch a vow, yet if they found it to be a ſnare, and impoſſible to be kept, they had not onely leave, but a neceſſity to break it. If the vow was conſtrain'd and prov'd impoſſible, it was the leſs ſin in the taking, and none in the breach of it. But if it was voluntary, it was raſh, unleſs they had been ſure the thing had been in their power; and then if it proves not to be ſo, the fault is not in the breach but in the undertaking. Quod ſi perſeverare

If the adultery of the wife makes the husbands vow and promiſe to be void; much more may his own adultery or fornication make void his vow of ſingle life. If for the diſhonour of his houſe, and the introduction of baſtards into his temporal poſſeſſions, he is abſolved from his vows of wedlock which God certainly did approve and appoint; much more may his vow be null when there is danger or ruine to his ſoul. A man may lawfully live with an adulterous wife; and yet he may chuſe, and his vow does not oblige him: but he cannot ſafely live with burnings, he cannot lawfully abide in fornication and uncleanneſs. For Who can dwell with the everlaſting burning?

It were not unſeaſonable to conſider the Eccleſiaſtical law againſt the ſecond marriages of Prieſts, or the ordaining them who have married the ſecond time. But this alſo relying upon the humor of men, who will be more pure then God, and more righteous then the law of Chriſt, and more wiſe then the Apoſtle, it may be determin'd by the ſame conſiderations. The law is a ſnare, * it is in an incompetent matter, * it is a reſtraint of that liberty which Chriſt hath left, * it cannot be fitted to time and place, and yet remain a law; becauſe there are ſo many neceſſities to be ſerved, and ſo many favourable caſes to be conſider'd, that the exceptions may be more then the Rule. * It may alſo be conſidered that to make ſecond marriages a cauſe of irregularity, or incapacity of receiving holy Orders, is nothing but a ſecret accuſation and an open reproach to marriage; * that it

Of Eccleſiaſtical Laws of Faith, or Articles of confeſſion.

Rule XXI.

The Catholic Church is a witneſſe of Faith, and a record of all neceſſary truths; but not the Miſtreſſe and Ruler of our Creed; that is, cannot make any laws of Faith.

1. IN our inquiries of faith we doe not run to the Catholic Church deſiring her to judge our queſtions; for ſhe can never meet together; and ſhe is too great a body to doe ſingle acts and make particular ſentences: but to her we run for conduct, by inquiring what ſhe believes, what ſhe hath receiv'd from Chriſt and his Apoſtles. So that the Authority of the Catholic Church is reſolved into Catholic tradition. Whatſoever can be made to appear to have been by the Apoſtles taught, & conſigned to the Church, that is a law of faith. But of this I have already given accounts*. The Catholic Church, taking in the Apoſtolical, that is, the Church of all ages, is a witneſſe

* lib. 2. Chap. 3. Rule 14.

witneſſe beyond exception. For if ſhe have the Spirit of God, if ſhe love truth, and if ſhe doe not conſent to deceive her ſelf, ſhe cannot be deceiv'd in giving teſtimony concerning matter of fact and actual tradition: or if ſhe could, yet we are excuſed in following that teſtimony, becauſe we have no better, we have no other. Better then our beſt, and better then all we have, we cannot be oblig'd to uſe: but therefore we have the juſtice and the goodneſſe, our own neceſſity and the veracity of God for our ſecurity, that this is a ſure way for us to walk in. But then when this is reduc'd to practice in matters of belief, it will come to this onely, That ſhe bears witneſſe to the Scriptures, that they are the word of God; but beyond what is contain'd in Scripture, ſhe hath no article of faith.

2. The conſequent of this which I have largely prov'd and explicated in the place above cited, is, that all her Sermons and all her explications of doctrines muſt be by that meaſure. If it be agreeable to Scripture, it is that which ſhe hath received: but if ſhe hath not received it, ſhe cannot make a doctrine, nor deliver a propoſition with authority, nor oblige the conſcience.

3. But this Rule if it be underſtood of the Catholic Church of this or any one preſent age, will not ſignify ſo much: for unleſſe the Tradition be delivered in a conſtant ſucceſſion from the Apoſtles, the Church is not a certain witneſſe, but makes her ſelf a Judge of truth; which ſhe can never doe, but by relating to the Scriptures, by ſhewing there it is, in the Code which ſhe hath received. But when any doubt does ariſe concerning any matter of belief, the Catholic Church hath no ſolemn Court of judicature or place of reſort where a ſingle perſon may goe for determination. And if a queſtion be between Church and Church, as between Rome and England, the queſtion is, which is the Catholic Church; for indeed neither of them is: and there is no ſuch thing then as a Catholic Church to determine the queſtion: as when the head and the belly, the mouth and the armes fell out, the whole body could not be judge of the controverſy; but if they had had a rule, thither they might goe to be guided. And if it be asked, who ſhall expound the rule, there is no other anſwer to be given, but to deſire men to be good and humble, to pray to God, and without partiality to deſire truth; and then every man will be able to anſwer his own queſtion. For if the Rule be hard, it is hard to them that are not willing and ſoft and compliant; but not to the gentle and the humble, to them that follow God in ſimplicity and whitherſoever he will lead them.

4. But it is to be conſidered that the Church is a Net that hath in it fiſhes good and bad, it is a field of corn and tares; and but that the Apoſtles were guided by an infallible ſpirit, there could have been no certainty: but then after them there was no more to be look'd for; what they left we were to uſe, but to look for no more. For the Catholic Church never was ſince the Apoſtles time without error. By Catholic Church, I doe not mean the right believing part of the Church, (for in queſtions of faith the diſpute was which was the right believing part) but I mean all that profeſſe the faith of Chriſt, who when they are divided will never allow the oppoſite party to be their Judge: and therefore it cannot be ſuppos'd that God ſhould appoint one to be the Judge, who muſt always be ſuppos'd a party, and will never be accepted by the other, unleſſe he had given infallibility to that one part, and we had all known it. To the Apoſtles he did, and they were the fountains of tradition: but when they were gone, the onely way that was left was to ſee what they left, and to that every part was to conform; but neither part was Judge, except onely for themſelves: and in this every part ought to be truſted, becauſe they onely had the biggeſt concern to take care that they be not deceived. No man or company of men was charged with them; every Government was charg'd with it's own care and conduct.

5. But I ſhall not inſiſt upon this, becauſe it can be of no uſe in the conduct of conſcience. Becauſe if ever there be a diſpute in the Church, there is no Catholic Church to which we can goe: and if we call that the Catholic Church which is the greater part, that may deceive us; for in the days of Elias almoſt all Iſrael had corrupted himſelf, and in the time of the Arrians almoſt all the world was Arrian; and at this day a very great part of the Catholic Church is ſtain'd with the horrible errors and follies of Popery: and beſides our notices are ſo little and narrow of the belief of Chriſtendome, our entercourſes ſo ſmall, our relations ſo falſe, our informations ſo partial, that it is not poſſible for us to know what is the belief of the major part. It is not known at this day by the Doctors of the Roman Church what is the practice of the Greek Churches in the Marriage of their Prieſts, nor what is their doctrine of Purgatory, nor of the proceſſion of the holy Ghoſt, as appears in their diſputes & contrary narratives of theſe particulars. We cannot tell in England at this day whether the Lutheran Churches have right Ordinations and perfect ſucceſſion of Biſhops in their Churches. I have endeavoured very much to inform my ſelf in the particular, and am not yet arrived to any certain notice of it. This therefore, to appeal to the ſenſe of the major part of the Church in a queſtion, will ſignify nothing at all as to our conſcience.

6. Eſpecially if to this we adde, that the Churches have got a trick of Empire and impoſing their ſometimes falſe, and always unneceſſary articles upon all of their communion; and then the faith of the Church will depend upon the opinion of the chief and principals: and then their belief will be like a rumour ſpread from a few mouths into the ears of millions, who, though they all tell the ſame ſtory, yet are no more credible for their multitude then the firſt reporters were for their authority. Nay in moſt places men dare not ſpeak what they think, and dare not believe what they find dangerous, and dare not inquire into what they dare not disbelieve; ſo that if you had been at Trent and ask'd the Fathers, it would have ſignified nothing: for whatever their belief was, they were born down by the Congregations, and the Congregations by the Legates, and the Legates by the Pope; and that's the Catholic Church.

7. It remains therefore that we are from the Catholic Church to expect no other determination of our queſtions, but by conveying to us notice of the doctrines Apoſtolical. And this is often and largely diſcours'd and taught by [a] S. Irenæus, by S. Clement [b] in Euſebius, by [c] Tertullian, by [d] Origen, [e] S. Cyprian, [f] S. Athanaſius, [g] S. Baſil, [h] Epiphanius, [i] S. Hierom, [k] S. Auſtin, and [l] Vincentius Lirinenſis: what they could derive from the fountains Apoſtolical by a clear chanel and conduit, that was firſt, and that was true, and and that was in the rule, and that was the meaſure of faith. And therefore when in the Council of Epheſus the Epiſtle of Capreolus the Biſhop of Carthage was read for the eſtabliſhment of antiquity, and the reproof of the new doctrines, all the Biſhops cried out, Hæ omnium voces ſunt, hæc omnes dicimus, hoc omnium votum eſt. This was the voice of them all, they all ſaid the ſame thing: and what was that which they all affirm'd, niſi ut quod erat antiquitus traditum, teneretur? quod adinventum nuper, explo-deretur? ſaith Vincentius, that what is ancient and at firſt deliver'd, that ſhould be held; that which is lately invented ſhould be exploded. For the Church cannot determine queſtions by way of judgment and authority, but by way of atteſtation, and as a witneſſe onely of the doctrine Apoſtolical. There is nothing elſe neceſſary, and nothing elſe is practicable.

RULE XXII.

The Decrees of General Councils are of great uſe in the Conduct of Conſcience, but not the proper meaſure, or laſt determination of matters of belief.

1. BEfore * conſidered Councils as they had acquir'd an accidental authority by the veneration of their age, and their advantage of having been held in the elder ages of the Church: Now I conſider them in their own proper and immediate pretence. I then conſider'd them in order to Government, but now in order to faith: for Councils Eccleſiaſtical have pretended to a power over the conſcience, ſo as to require both the obedience of the will, and the obedience of the underſtanding. Concerning which I am to ſay, that Nothing can oblige to Divine faith but a Divine authority: to which Councils can no more pretend for being General, then for being Provincial; and to which great aſſemblies have no other title or pretence of promiſe then the private congregations of the faithfull, who though but two or three, yet ſhall be aſſiſted by the Divine preſence. But General Councils are ſo wholly of humane inſtitution, that though by the dictate of right reaſon and natural wiſedome they are to be conven'd; yet to make them a formal judicatory, and to give them a legiſlative power or a dominion and magiſtery in faith, there are ſo many conditions requir'd both to their indiction and convention, to their conſtitution and integrity, to their conduct and proceeding, to their concluſion and determination, that men are not to this day agreed about any one of them; and therefore they cannot be a legal judicatory obliging any but them that doe conſent, and ſo oblige themſelves. * Rule 14.

2. But yet they are of great uſe for inquiry and conſultation: and therefore Euſebius ſpeaking of Conſtantine the Emperour, ſays of him, Concilium generale tanquam Dei exercitum inſtruens, in unum locum coegit. A General Council is God's army; and being a repreſentative of the Church in the ſame degree as it is General and rightly called, and rightly order'd, and rightly proceeding, it partakes of the Churches appellation; it is acies lib. 3. de vita Conſtant. c. 6.

ordinata, terrible as an army with banners. Let them be as many as it happens, in the multitude of Counſellors there is ſafety; that is, they are more likely to underſtand truth then ſingle perſons, for they are not ſo ſoon prejudic'd and corrupted: as a river is harder to be poyſon'd or to be turn'd aſide, then a pail of water or a diſh-full; but if it be, it is ſo much the worſe. But if they proceed rightly they are excellent helps, and ſome of them have done great good to the Church, and ſome have done great miſchief; and which have, and which have not, we are to inquire by other inſtruments: ſo that we are to judge concerning them, and then they are to be guides to us; that is, we conſider which are fitteſt to be followed, of which we judge by General and extrinſic conſiderations, and then we follow them in the particular inquiry; that is, we follow them becauſe we think they followed the Apoſtles, and were faithfull witneſſes of their doctrine. Which indeed is an excellent benefit which we may receive by the firſt and moſt Ancient Councils, which were near the fountains: they could trace all the new pretences up to their original, they diſcuſſed the doctrines in their provinces, they heard what any one could ſay, they carried it to the General aſſembly, they compared it with the tradition and doctrine of other Churches, and all together were able very well to tell how the Apoſtles had taught the Churches of their foundation. And becauſe the four firſt General Councils did, or are ſuppos'd to have done ſo, therefore they have acquir'd a great, but an accidental authority, and are accepted by the moſt part of Chriſtendome, and made into humane laws of faith, and the meaſures of hereſy. Such uſe as this the conſcience can make of the Ancient Councils; but beyond this or ſome ſuch good uſe as this the conſcience is at no hand oblig'd to follow their determinations as the ſentence of a competent judge, but as of an authentick witneſſe, when it can appear or be credible that it can be ſo, and is ſo. And this was the very thing that S. Athanaſius affirm'd of the Nicene Council, Siquidem Nicæna Synodus non temere habita eſt, ut quæ habeat graviſſimos uſus & legitimam rationem. The Nicene Synod was of great uſe. They met about the queſtion of Eaſter and the Arian hereſy. Sed in negotio Paſchatis non abhorruerunt ab iſtiuſmodi appendice. Ibi enim placuit ut adderetur, Viſum eſt ut omnes obtemperarent. De Fide verò non ſcripſerunt, Viſum eſt; ſed ad iſtum modum, Credit Catholica Eccleſia: & ſtatim confeſſio ipſa credendi adjuncta eſt, ut oſtenderent eam non eſſe novam ſententiam, ſed Apoſtolicam, & quæ ipſi ſcripſiſſent non eſſe ſua inventa, ſed Apoſtolorum documenta. But in the matter of Eaſter, becauſe it was a ritual, and the circumſtance of time and the unity of order, they decreed, that every one ſhould obey. But in the matter of Faith they did not write ſo, that they appointed every one to obey, but in this manner, The Catholick Church believes: and then they adjoyn'd the confeſſion of Faith, to ſhew that the doctrine was not new, but that it was Apoſtolical, it was that which they wrote, but nothing of a later birth. To any other purpoſe neither the Council of Nice nor the Council of Ariminum is of any uſe or authority: ſave onely it is the ſentence of ſo many men, and is to be received according to the credibility of the men, or the reaſonableneſſe of the article.

de Synod.

3. But then let it be conſidered, to what the authority of a Council will amount according to the ſentence of moſt men. The Doctors of the Church of Rome (a few onely excepted) ſay that a Council, if it be not confirmed by the Pope, hath no authority. Upon this account, if they ſay true, every Council is fallible, and therefore no rule or guide of faith: for unleſſe unleſſe it can be deceiv'd, why ſhould it be ſubmitted to the judgment of the Pope? and if it can be deceived, it cannot bind, becauſe it cannot ſecure the conſcience. But the others that are not of the Roman party ſay, a Council is then not deceiv'd, when it delivers the doctrine of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and ſpeaks conſonantly to Scriptures: and if a ſingle Doctor does ſo, he is to be believ'd. What then? wheres the difference? This onely is it, That it is more likely a Council ſhall find out the truth, and report the tradition; and if we be to chuſe our faith by gueſſe and probability, a Council is better then a ſingle Doctor, by ſo much as there are many more then one Doctor in it. But this will onely ſerve the turn till men are willing or at leiſure to inquire: this onely excepted; becauſe few men can judge, and moſt men are rul'd by others, all ſuch perſons can have nothing better to rule and determine them then a General Council: but then it is an argument of reaſon, and not of authority; it is not becauſe they are bound, but becauſe it is moſt reaſonable in their circumſtances.

4. I ſhould here have conſidered of what authority the writings of the Fathers are to the interpretation of Scripture and the conduct of conſcience: but becauſe I find onely the ſame uſe of them as of other learned men in all ages of the Church, ſave onely in thoſe things where they are witneſſes of the Apoſtolical doctrines, to which they beſt can give teſtimony who are the moſt Ancient, and becauſe themſelves diſclaim any authority in matters of faith, and call to be tried by the word of God; I had rather this thing ſhould be read in others then in my ſelf: becauſe it is matter of envy and reproach to tell why they cannot be relied upon; and to adde more reputation to that authority which they have acquir'd by many intervening cauſes, by reaſon, and by unreaſonableneſſe, would be matter of danger, and ſometimes the cauſes of error, and very often of a deceitfull confidence. But who pleaſe may ſee this uncertainly diſputed, and never concluded to any certainty, by * Cajetan on one ſide, and Melchior Canus on the other. He may alſo conſider the ſaying of the † Biſhop of Bitonto, that he preferr'd the ſentence of one Pope before a thouſand Hieroms, and a thouſand Auguſtines & Gregories; and that every ſide declines their arbitration when they ſpeak againſt them: by which it appears that no ſide ſuppoſes themſelves to be bound in conſcience to follow them.

5. But the beſt uſe of them is that which the Church of England hath deſcrib'd in one of her ancient Canons, that her Biſhops and Prieſts ſhould teach nothing niſi quod ex doctrina Veteris & Novi Teſtamenti veteres Patres & Eccleſiæ Epiſcopi collegerint, but what the Fathers & ancient Biſhops of the Church have gathered out of the doctrine of the Old and New Teſtament: which Canon gives a very good anſwer to this inquiry if we ſhould enter into it. For it declares that the Fathers are ſo far to be followed as they follow Scripture, and that their writings are of great uſe for the reproof of new doctrines: and certainly if Preachers were confin'd to this meaſure, poſſibly we might miſſe ſome truths which now it may be we find; but it is certain we ſhould eſcape very many errors. For the reſt, I refer my reader to the Archbp. of Spalato de rep. Eccleſ. lib. 7. c. 6. to Rivet's Prolegomena to his Criticus Sacer, to Daniel Toſſanus his Synopſis de legendis Patribus, to Gregory de Valentia his analyſis fidei, to Biſhop Morton his Catholick Apology, and to D Whittaker de Script. authoritate. In this whole affair the conſcience is at liberty, and therefore I am here to inquire no further.

Rule XXIII.

Subſcription to articles and formes of confeſſion in any particular Church, is wholly of Political conſideration.

1. When forms of confeſſion are made, & public articles eſtabliſhed, it is of great concernment not onely to the reputation of the Government, but to the unity and peace of that Chriſtian community, that they be not publicly oppos'd. To this purpoſe we find ſo many ſubſcriptions to the Decrees of Councils, by Princes and Prelates and Prieſts and Deacons, by Prefects of Cities and Governours of Countries; it was an inſtrument of unity and peace, a declaration of their conſent, and at no hand to be reprov'd, unleſſe it be in a falſe article, or with tyranny to conſciences, or to maintain a faction. But that which the Government looks after is, that no new Religions be introduc'd to the public diſturbance; of which the Romans were ſo impatient, that they put to death a Noble Lady, Pomponia Græcina, utpote novæ cujuſdam religionis ream, ſaith Tacitus, as being guilty of a new religion. Now to prevent this, Subſcription is invented, that is, an atteſtation of our conſent; which if it be requir'd by the ſupreme authority, it may be exacted in order to peace and unity: and Tacitus tells that Apudius Murena was degraded from the dignity of a Senator becauſe he refus'd to ſubſcribe to the laws of Auguſtus. This is the ſame caſe, for ſubſcription ſerves no other end but that which is neceſſary in Government. We find in Polydore Virgil that the Ancient Kings of England at their inauguration, Silicem tenebant juraturi per Jovem, ſe religionem & ritus Patrios retenturos, hæc verba loquentes, Si ſciens fallo, tunc me Dieſpiter ſalvâ urbe arcéque bonis omnibus ejiciat; They ſwore by Jupiter that they would keep the religion and their Country rites, and curs'd themſelves if they did not. This was more then Eccleſiaſtical ſubſcription: for that bound them to it for ever; this onely gives witneſſe of our preſent conſent, but according to it's deſigne and purpoſe, for the future it binds us onely to the conſervation of peace and unity.

lib. 3. cap. 7.

de Rerum inventor. l. 4. cap. 12.

2. For though it may be very fitting to ſubſcribe a confeſſion of articles, yet it may be very unfit that we ſwear always to be of the ſame mind; for that is either a profeſſion of infallibility in the authority, or in the article, or elſe a direct ſhutting our heart againſt all further clarity and manifeſtations of the truths of God. And therefore ſubſcription ought to be ſo intended, that he who hath ſubſcrib'd may not perceive himſelf taken in a ſnare: but yet he that ſubſcribes muſt doe it to thoſe purpoſes and in that ſenſe and ſignification of things which the ſupreme power intends in his commanding it; that is, at leaſt, that he who ſubſcribes does actually approve the articles over-written; that he does at that time believe them to be ſuch as it is ſaid they are; true, if they onely ſay they are true, uſefull, if they pretend to uſefulneſſe, neceſſary, if it be affirm'd that they are neceſſary. For if the ſubſcriber believes not this, he by hypocriſy ſerves the ends of public peace and his own preferment.

But

3. But this whole affair is to be conducted with ſome warineſſe, leſt there come more evil by it then there can come good. And therefore although when articles are fram'd, the Sons of the Church ought to ſubſcribe them for public peace, in caſe they doe heartily approve them; yet ſuch articles ought not to be made and impos'd, unleſſe they of themſelves be neceſſary, and plain by a Divine Commandement. And this was the advice of Melanchthon. Ut ſit igitur diſcordiarum finis, rectè facit poteſtas obligans homines ut obtemperent, quando alioqui parere eſt neceſſe, The ſupreme power may then command men to ſubſcribe to ſuch articles, which it is neceſſary that they ſhould believe. But if God have not commanded us to believe them, no humane power can command us to profeſſe them. in Epiſt. & Conſiliis theologicis.

4. Beyond what is neceſſary or very uſefull, unleſſe peace be concerned in the publication of the article and it's eſtabliſhment, it is but weakly and impertinently concerned in the ſubſcription. For if the peace of the Church be ſafe without the article, how can it be concern'd in the conſent to it and profeſſion of it, excepting onely by an accidental and a neceſſity ſuperinduc'd by themſelves and their own imprudent forwardneſſe, or itch of Empire over conſciences? If an article be conteſted publicly, and is grown into parties and factions, and theſe factions cannot be appeaſed without deciſion of the queſtion, then the conformity is as uſefull to peace as the ſentence and determination was; and then there is nothing elſe to be conſidered, but that the article be true, or believ'd to be ſo. But to them that are ſo perſwaded, it is neceſſary they obey, if they be requir'd to ſubſcribe; and the ſupreme power hath authority to require it, becauſe it is one of their greateſt duties, to govern and to rule in peace. But theſe things can ſeldome happen thus without our own fault: but when they doe, there is inconvenience on all ſides; but that which is leaſt muſt be choſen.

5. When articles are eſtabliſhed without neceſſity, ſubſcription muſt be requir'd without tyranny and imperiouſneſſe. That is, it muſt be left to the liberty of the ſubject to profeſſe or not to profeſſe that doctrine. The reaſon is plain. In things not certain in themſelves no man can give a law to the conſcience, becauſe all ſuch laws muſt clearly be Divine Commandements: but if the conſcience cannot be bound to the article, and the profeſſion ſerves no neceſſary end of the Common-wealth, then God does not bind, and man cannot: and therefore to bring evil upon men that doe not believe the article, and dare not profeſſe to believe what they doe not, is injuſtice and oppreſſion, it is a law of iniquity; and therefore it is not obligatory to conſcience, and no humane authority is ſufficient for the ſanction and impoſition. Socrates was wont to ſay, Sacramentum oblatum duabus de cauſis fide firmandum: vel ut teipſum à turpi ſuſpicione liberes, vel ut amicos ex magnis periculis eripias. When you are requir'd to give faith and ſecurity by a ſacrament, oath or ſubſcription, there are two caſes in which you muſt not refuſe: when thou thy ſelf art ſuſpected, and canſt no otherwiſe purge thy ſelf; and when any of thy relations is in danger, that is, when it is for good to thy ſelf or thy friends. But when there is no neceſſity of faith, and no public need to be ſerved, the cauſes that beſides theſe injoyn ſubſcription are fond perſuaſions, and indiſcreet zeal, and uſurped Empire over conſciences: in which caſes the Eccleſiaſtic ſtate hath no power to give Commandements; and if the Civil ſtate does, they oblige to ſuffering calamity, apud Stobæum

but not to any other conformity, and then it is a direct ſtate of perſecution.

6. Upon the account of this Rule it hath been of late inquir'd, whether it can be lawfull for any man to ſubſcribe what he does not believe to be true, giving his hand to public peace, and keeping his conſcience for God.

7. But to this the anſwer is eaſy, if ſubſcription does ſignify approbation; for in that caſe it is hypocriſy, and a denying to confeſſe with the mouth, what we believe with the heart. But if ſubſcription were no more then the office of the Clerk of the Signet or of a Council, who in form of law is to ſigne all the acts of Council, then the conſideration were different. For he that is a public officer, and interpoſes the ſignature of the Court, not as the account of his own opinion, but as a formality of the Court, all the world looks upon it as none of his perſonal act, but as a ſolennity of law, or an atteſtation of the act of the Council. But in ſubſcription to articles of confeſſion, or cenſure of Propoſitions as heretical, every Eccleſiaſtic that ſubſcribes does it for himſelf, and not for the Court. Lubens & ex animo ſubſcripſi: that's our form in the Church of England. Conſentiens ſubſcripſi: ſo it was in the ancient Councils, as S. Auſtin reports; I conſent to the thing, My mind goes along with it. But in this caſe the whole affair is put to iſſue in this one particular, which I touch'd upon before. If the intention of the Superior be to require our aſſent to be teſtified by ſubſcription, he that ſubſcribes does profeſſe his aſſent, and whatever he thinks himſelf, it is the intention of the impoſer that qualifies the ſubſcription. S. Auſtin tels of a Senator that upon his parol went to treat for his ranſome or exchange, and promiſed to return to them again in caſe he could not effect it. But he going from the army pretended to have forgot ſomething, and came back preſently, and then departed. But telling his ſtory to the Roman Senate, and pretending himſelf quit of his promiſe becauſe he went back preſently, they drave him out of the Senate; becauſe they regarded not what he had in his head, but that which the enemy intended when they made him ſwear to return.

8. But the effect of theſe conſiderations will be this, That no particular Church ought with rigor to require ſubſcriptions to articles which are not evidently true, and neceſſary to be profeſs'd; becauſe in the diviſion of hearts that is in the world, it is certain that ſome good men may diſſent, and then either they ſhall be afflicted, or be tempted to hypocriſy: of either of which if Eccleſiaſtic laws be guilty, they are not for edification, they are neither juſt nor pious, and therefore oblige not.

9. But if for temporal regards the ſupreme power doe require ſubſcription, thoſe temporal regards muſt be complied with, ſo that the ſpiritual intereſt of ſouls and truth be ſecur'd. And therefore the next good thing to the not impoſing uncertain and unneceſſary articles is, that great regard be had, and great eaſe be done to wiſe and peaceable diſſenters.

10. And at laſt, in ſuch caſes, let the articles be made with as great latitude of ſenſe as they can; and ſo that ſubſcriptions be made to the form of words, let the ſubſcribers underſtand them in what ſenſe they pleaſe which the truth of God will ſuffer, and the words can be capable of. This is the last remedy, but it is the worst; it hath in it something of craft, but very little of ingenuity; and if it can serve the ends of peace, or of external charity, or of a phantastic concord, yet it cannot serve the ends of truth and holinesse, and Christian simplicity.

CHAP. Vth.

Of Laws Domestic: or the power which Fathers of Families have to bind the Consciences of their Relatives.

RULE I.

Children are bound to obey the laws and Commandements of their Parents in all things domestical, and in all actions personal relating to the family, or done within it.

1. THE word of the Commandement is כבד, which signifies to be or to make weighty; but in Piel it signifies to honour; that is, Honour your Parents, and doe not lightly account of them: But in Levit. 19. 3. the word is יראו fear thy Mother and thy Father. They signify the same event of things, for a reverential fear is honour, and they both imply obedience. And there are three great endearments of this which make it necessary, and make it as absolute as it can be. The one is that our Parents are to us in the place of God:

Νόμιζε σαυτῷ τοὺς γονεῖς εἶναι θεούς said the Greek Comedy, Suppose your Parents to be to you as Gods. Hæc enim paternitas est nobis Sacramentum & imago Divinæ paternitatis, ut discat cor humanum in eo principio quod videt, quid debeat illi principio à quo est, & quod non videt. For the Fathers power is a Sacrament and image of the Divine Paternity, that a man may learn by the principle of his Being which he sees, what he owes to the principle of his Being which he sees not: and Plato saies there is no image by which we can worship God so well as our Fathers, our Grandfathers and our Mothers. And therefore it is impiety to dishonour or disobey our Parents, and it is piety when we pay our duty to them. The same word signifies religion to God, which expresses this duty. Parentes not amare, impietas est; non agnoscere, insaniæ. For as there are two great crimes which we commit properly against God, Impiety or Irreligion, and Atheisme: so there are these two crimes against our Parents. He that does not honour and revere them is impious or irreligious; and he that will not acknowledge them is Atheistical, that is, like the Atheists, he denies the principle of his Being. And therefore upon that of Virgil,

Huc Pater O Lenæe veni——

Hugo de S. Victore lib. 1. de Sacram. c. 7.

lib. 2. de Legib.

Seneca l. 3. de Benef. c. 1.

in lib. 1. Georg. Servius

Servius obſerves that the Heathens called all their Gods by the name of Fathers: and an injury done to our Father is ſaid to be done to God, according to that of Menander,

Ὁ λοιδορῶν τ πατέρα, δυσφημεῖ λόγῳ,
Τῶι εἰς τὸ θεῖον ὢν μελετᾷ βλασφημίαν.

* In verbis per tctam vitam parentes venerari maximè decet, levium enim volatiliumque verborum gravissima imminet pœna. Plato l. 4. de repub.

He that reviles and ſpeaks evil of his Father *, does blaſpheme God; for Θεοὶ μέγιστοι τοῖς φερῶσιν οἱ γονεῖς.

God is the Great Father of the world, and therefore he hath by the greateſt religion immur'd the Fathers honour.

Et Jovis imperium & chari præcepta parentis, Edocet....

Next to God is our duty to our Father.

2. 2. The ſecond endearment of our duty, obedience and regard to parents, is gratitude; which here hath the greateſt obligation, and is to this purpoſe remark'd by all laws and by all wiſe men of the World.

Omnis in Aſcanio chari ſtat cura Parentis.

All their love and all their care is for their dear boy. The child is a part of his parents, a tender part, but under cuſtody and a guard; and the ſtate of deſcent and ſucceſſion from parents to children is called Suitas in the law: and there is ſo much of a Father in his child, that if a Father and a Son be partners in a crime, and refuſe to confeſſe it before torments, the law commands the Son firſt to be tormented; Charles the ſecond, the Emperor, did ſo; as knowing that the Father will confeſſe rather then endure to ſee his ſon tormented: and when the Father does confeſſe upon the torment of his ſon, the Father is ſaid to be confeſſus in tormentis, ſaid Baldus, he confeſſed in his own torments. And as long as the Son is in priſon, the Father is not accounted free in law: and the Fathers ſins are then puniſh'd, when the child is made ſick, or unfortunate. So that the government of children is no otherwiſe then as a mans will governs his own hand & foot; over which, always ſuppoſing him to abide within the limits and inclinations of nature, that is, to love and cheriſh them, and in no ſenſe to hate them, in all other he hath an intire power of command.

l. 1. in fi. C. ſi rect. provi. in 2. lcc.

3. 3. The third endearment of childrens obedience is the power of bleſſing and curſing which God hath given to Parents, and which himſelf by his providence and great Oeconomy will verify. The Fathers bleſſing eſtabliſheth the houſes of children, but the curſe of the Mother rooteth out foundations, ſaith Ben-Sirach. And S. Paul exhorting children to obey their parents, ſaies it is the firſt Commandement with promiſe, that is, the firſt to which any ſpecial promiſe is annexed, the promiſe of longævity in the land of promiſe. Benedictio merces obedientiæ eſt, ſaith Elias Cretenſis, The Fathers bleſſing is the reward of the ſons obedience. But it is obſervable that the original word in the fifth Commandement is of active ſignification, Honour thy Father and thy Mother that they may prolong thy days upon the Earth; that is, ſaith Paulus Fagius, thy parents are Gods miniſters and inſtruments, the chanels and conveyances of the Divine bleſſing: for God hears the prayers of Fathers and Mothers bleſſing their obedient children, or curſing their diſobedience; inſomuch that Ezekiel reckons their diſobedience to their parents to be to the Jewes the cauſe of their baniſhment from their own Country. Suidas tells that Leontius the Biſhop of Tripolis in Lydia ſeeing his onely ſon of an ill nature and apt to miſchief, prayed to God that his ſon might die yong, leſt he ſhould fall into impiety: and God heard the Fathers prayer.

Δειναί τοι κ᾽ γαῖαν ἐρινύες εἰσὶ τοκήων, Orpheus.

The curſes of parents are grievous upon the earth. And this was obſerved among the Heathens in the ſad examples of the children of OEdipus, Amintor and Theſeus, who grew miſerable upon their Fathers curſes; and therefore Telemachus was afraid to caſt his Mother out of Ulyſſes houſe, leſt ſhe ſhould curſe him. And this was it that brought ſervitude or ſlavery into the world; God having in one of the fountains of mankind, in the great Patriarch of the world, conſign'd a ſad example that for ever children ſhould be afraid to diſhonour their parents, and diſcover their nakedneſſe, or reveal their turpitude, their follies and diſhonours. Plato lib. 11. de Leg.

4. To theſe I need not adde their natural neceſſity, their diſability to help themſelves, their obnoxiouſneſſe to every evil, their defenceleſſe condition, the miſeries and calamities and infirmities by their want of wiſedome, all which at firſt doe infinitely endeare obedience, and make it neceſſary: but I remember that this very thing was of great value amongſt the Ancients, and they did uſe to tell this fable to their children to teach them to obey their parents. "An old Lion, amongſt other precepts that he gave his "ſon, charg'd him that he ſhould never fight with a Man, becauſe if he "was not too ſtrong, he would at leaſt be too crafty. The young Lion "heard him, but regarded him not, but therefore as ſoon as ever he was "full grown, haſtens abroad to ſeek a man to be his enemy. He came into "a field, and ſaw a yoke of oxen ſtanding ready furniſh'd to plow, and ask-"ing them if they were men, they ſaid, No, but that a man had put thoſe "yokes upon them. He left them and went aſide, and eſpying a horſe "bridled and tied to a tree, ask'd if he were a man. He was anſwer'd, No, "but a man had bridled him, and would by and by come to ride him, for a "man was his Maſter. At laſt he finds a man cleaving wood, and ask'd "him: and finding him to be ſo, told him he muſt then prepare to fight "with him. The man told him, With all his heart, but firſt deſired him to "help to draw the wedge out of that tree, and then he would. The yong "Lion thruſts in his paws, and a little opens the tree till the wedge fell out, "and the tree clos'd upon his feet by it's returning violence. The man "ſeeing the lion faſtned, and the lion ſeeing himſelf entrap'd, the man "cried out to his Neighbours to come to his help; and the lion to eſcape "his danger tore his feet from the tree, and left his nailes and bloud be-"hind him, and returning with ſhame and ſmart to his old Father ſaid to "him, Mi Pater, ſi paruiſſem monitis tuis ungulas non amiſiſſem, I had not "loſt my nailes if I had obeyed my Fathers commandement. For the commandements of parents being for the good of their children, he cannot be proſperous that will not obey his Father. That was their meaning.

5. But concerning the duty it ſelf there is no queſtion; nothing is plainer, nothing is eaſier: but concerning the limits and adminiſtration of this power there is very great difficulty; the Scripture ſpeaking either indefinitely or univerſally, either of which does equally need a limit and ſpecification. Children, obey your parents in all things, ſaith S. Paul: and if that all were abſolutely all, there were no difficulty in the underſtanding it; but infinitely difficult it would be to obſerve it, and reconcile it with our other duties and juſt intereſts. And juſt ſo is that law which by the conſent of all the world is repreſented as univerſally, Liberi quacunque in re parentibus dicto audientes ſunto; and he in the Comedy, Pater adſum, Impera quodvis, neque tibi ero in mora, Here am I my Father, Command me any thing, neither will I reſiſt. But this any thing and this every thing, is but any thing and every thing of a certain kind; which if we can eſtabliſh upon certain meaſures, we have one great line more for the conduct of conſcience. The Divines and Lawyers reduce the iſſues of this relation to three heads, 1. Reverence, 2. Animadverſion, 3. Piety.

Trinum. Act. 3.

Of Reverence to Parents.

6. And firſt it is certain whatever can be ſignified by honour and fear and reverence is the duty of children; that is, ſo far as to think honourably of them, to ſpeak well of them, to conceal their faults, to excuſe them to others, to comport themſelves with reverence and great regard before them.

Βέλτιστε γονεῖς πρὸ παντὸς ἐν τιμαῖς ἔχειν,

Above all things have your parents in honour: and this is to be expreſs'd according as the parents ſhall require, and according to the cuſtomes of the nation and the moſt pious and obedient in it; for vultu quoque lædi pietatem, was an old rule, A child may be rude and undutifull in his very looks; and he deſerves to be puniſhed with blindneſſe, qui parentum vultus torvo viſu deſpexerit, & elatis oculis læſerit pietatem, ſaith S. Hierom, who by proud looks and ſcornfull eyes is impious to his parents. But this duty is well deſcrib'd by Theophilus to Autolycus, Sanctum & laudabile cenſetur, non ſolùm apud Deum ſed & apud homines, videlicet ut in ſimplicitate & abſque omni malitia ſubjiciamur parentibus. Children muſt be ſubject to their parents without all malice or perverſeneſſe, and in all ſimplicity, that is, ingenuity of words and manners. And when Ptolemy asked one of the 72 tranſlators of the Bible how a ſon ſhould pay due thankfulneſſe to his parents, he was anſwer'd, Si nullâ re illos triſtitiâ affeceris, If you grieve them in nothing. That's the ſureſt meaſure.

7. The next thing that is alſo certain in this is, that all the good Counſels and precepts of holineſſe and wiſedome which the parents give, it is neceſſary the children ſhould obſerve; and beſides that the not obſerving them is a ſin againſt the ſpecial Commandements, it is alſo a ſin of diſobedience, and a rebellion againſt the Fathers authority. So the Father in the Comedy urges his authority,

But

8. But we find amongſt the Ancients ſome little inſtances of this honour and reverence beſides obedience ſpecified. The Ancients would not without leave goe from the preſence of their Father: ſo he in the Comedy, ibid.

Egon' Patri ſurripere poſſim quidquam tam cauto ſeni?
Atque adeo ſi facere poſſem, pietas prohibet.

That is, whatever was a ſingle injury if done to a ſtranger, was double if committed againſt their parents: for as to doe good to them was piety as well as charity, it was religion and juſtice too; ſo to doe any evil to them is to doe them diſhonour, and expreſſely againſt the fifth Commandement. Theſe are the firſt general meaſures, and the indication of very many particulars. Prov. 28. 24.

9. But there is one great meaſure more, and that is, that ſpecification of the duties of this Commandement which we find in the laws of Nations and the conſent of all wiſe men, and particularly of thoſe with whom we doe converſe, and by whom we are governed. For our parents have a double power over us, one by the law of Nature, and the other by the Civil law; that is, there are ſome duties which children doe owe to their parents, which are primely and indiſpenſably neceſſary, others which are ſpecifications and inſtances of a general duty, but ſuch which may ſuffer increaſe and diminution, but are neceſſary by virtue of a Divine Commandement when they are bound upon us by the laws of our Country; becauſe theſe are of the nature of thoſe things whoſe natures can be chang'd by becoming laws, and are reduc'd under the Category of their proper vertues. The particulars I ſhall draw out of the laws of Nations, from the Civil and Canon laws, reducing them to diſtinct rules ſhall deſcribe their ſeveral obligations of the conſcience: and they relate to the other two parts of parental power, ſignified by Caſtigation and Piety.

Of Caſtigation, or the Coercitive power of Parents.

Rule II.

Fathers have a power to chaſtiſe their offending children, but not a power of life and death.

1. IN the laws of Romulus and Numa, Fathers had a power three times to ſell their children, and a power to put them to death in certain caſes: and they attribute much of the proſperity of their city to this permiſſion, nothing being a better inſtrument to make good citizens, then by making them good ſons: it being very unlikely that ever he ſhould command well abroad, that knows not well how to obey at home.

Quicunque patrem timet ac reveretur,
Hic in bonum civem evadet proculdubio, ſaid Timocles, He that fears and obeys his Father, without peradventure as he is a good man, ſo he will make a good citizen *. And therefore it was obſerved by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus that amongſt the Greeks, Contumacy, Impiety and Parricide were very common; and he gives this reaſon, becauſe Charondas, Pittacus and Solon did by their laws give the Fathers no great power over their children. But I ſaid that the Romans did, and thoſe great examples of Titus Manlius, C. Flaminius, C. Caſſius, who put their ſons to death, were indeed very ſevere, but did imprint great terrors upon all the Roman youth. Bodinus thinks this to be a natural and unalterable power; and Ærodius ſuppoſes that God would not have commanded Abraham to kill his ſon, but that it was a part of his ordinary and inherent power; and when Judah commanded his daughter in law Thamar to be brought forth and burn'd for her adultery, it gave indication that he by his ſupreme paternal power in the family had power of life and death. And of this there is no queſtion in the heads of families, where the Father is a Patriarch, the fountain of his nation, or of his ſociety, and under the command of no ſuperior: for the paternal power is the fountain of the Royal; and Abimelech was nothing but the King my Father.

* Si quis inofficioſus fuerit in parentes, communium Magiſtratuum ſit incapax. Xenoph. l. 2. de diſſ. & juſt. Socrat.

2. But when families were multiplied, though Fathers were fitter to be truſted with the ſevereſt power then any other ſort of intereſted perſons, yet becauſe this might fall into diſorder, God was pleas'd in the law of Moſes ſo to order this affair, that the Fathers power ſhould not be diminiſhed, & yet the execution of it and the declaration of the ſentence ſhould be truſted to the Judge. For if a Father found his ſon ſtubborn, rebellious, diſobedient, a glutton or a drunkard, all which are perſonal crimes, and againſt the private authority and counſel of the Father, the Father and the Mother might delate him to the Judge, and without further proof but their own teſtimony he was to be ſton'd to death. Drunkenneſſe & gluttony were in no other caſes capital in the law of Moſes, but when joyn'd with rebellion or diſobedience to their parents. And like to this proceeding in Moſes law was the proceſſe in the Perſian Monarchy. For Ælian tells that when

Rhaco the Mardian brought Cartomes his ſon with his hands bound behind him to Artaxerxes, deſiring that the Prince would command him to be ſlain, becauſe he was impudent, he was naught, he was a villain; the Perſian King ask'd him if he could find in his heart to ſee his ſon die with violence: The Father replied, I have in my garden a goodly lettice, fat and wanton and full of leaves. When I find any of them luxuriant, proud and exorbitant, though it be a part of the body I cut it off; and ſo I doe to whatſoever is bitter and ſuperfluous, and my lettice is the ſweeter for it, it does not bewail the loſſe of it's bad leaves, but thrives the better. Think the ſame of me, O King; for though he be par'd away that hurts my family, that gives ill example to his Brothers, my ſtock will be the more thriving, florid and fruitfull in all good things.] By this inſtance we perceive that when Fathers had not power to put to death their rebellious children, they could require it of the Prince, who was to proceed ſummarily and meerly upon the Fathers inſtance. And we find in the French Annals that Stephen Boſtée the Preſident of Paris impal'd a yong fellow becauſe his Mother ſaid that ſhe could by no arts or labour keep him from being a thief.

3. But this went off very much in the manners of men; and children were by other means reſtrain'd ordinarily, before things were brought to that extremity; and in the Civil law parents were forbidden to kill their children, and this law hath prevail'd in all Chriſtendome, excepting that a man is in ſome places permitted to kill his daughter if he ſees her in unchaſt Embraces. But in ſtead of theſe great exceſſes of power, there is left to Chriſtian parents nothing but a decent caſtigation in the leſſer and ſingle faults, and diſinheriſon in caſe of great and perſevering. That children are to ſubmit to the animadverſions and chaſtiſements of their Fathers is the voice of nature, and of all Nations, of Scripture and right Reaſon. So S. Paul, We have had Fathers of our fleſh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: and Ben-Sirach teaches us, In opere & ſermone & omni patientia honora Patrem tuum, Honour thy Father in thy work and in thy word, and in all patience, ſo the Vulgar Latin reads it; that is, ſuffer what he impoſes upon you: and this was it which the yong Greek that Plutarch ſpeaks of had learn'd in Zeno's ſchool, Didici Patris iram ferre; I have learn'd (ſaith he) patiently to bear my Fathers anger. The authority is plain; the meaſures of it are onely, that it be done for amendment; that is, that it be diſcipline, not anger and revenge, and that it be done with charity and moderation, which is ſignified by S. Paul, Parents, provoke not your children to wrath; which precept he repeats, μὴ ἐρεθίζετε, μὴ παροργίζετε, give them no opprobrious words, no contumelious and provoking language, and therefore much leſſe any cruel and undecent caſtigations.

A Maſter governs by fear, & a Father by love, & both by their authority: but the gentle way is the Fathers method; but if he will uſe the ſevere, he hath authority to doe it, and right or wrong he muſt be ſuffered, till the evil be inſufferable, and then he may decline it, but ever with reverence to his Fathers honour; for indeed againſt a Fathers tyranny there is no aid, no remedy, no interceſſion, but by an appeal to the common Father, the chief of all the tribes and all the families. This onely I am to adde, That as Fathers have not a power of life and death over their children; ſo neither are they lightly to uſe that power which they have, and is next to this, that is, that I may uſe S. Ambroſe his expreſſion, ne læſa pietas Patris ulciſcatur ſe exhæredatione vel abdicatione contumacis generis, a power of diſinheriſon is not to be us'd for every great offence, much leſſe for a little. Pater, niſi magnæ & multæ injuriæ patientiam evicerint, niſi plus eſt quod timet quam quod damnat, non facile accedit ad decretorium ſtylum, ſaid Seneca, A Father will not eaſily proceed to an exterminating ſentence, unleſſe great and many injuries have quite overcome his patience. Nor then neither, unleſſe he fear worſe things then thoſe which he already blames. For, as Quintilian obſerv'd well, this power was not given to Fathers but when their ſons are incorrigible. Fulmen iſtud Patrum adverſus ferociam adoleſcentiæ datum eſt, adverſus filios qui peccare plus poſſunt. If they will ſin yet more, and will not be corrected, then they may unwillingly uſe this thunderbolt. It is like the ſentence of excommunication, never to be us'd but when nothing elſe will cure the man, and nothing at all will make the miſchief tolerable: that is, a ſon may not be diſinherited, but when he may be hated, which may never be, ſine cauſis multis, magnis & neceſſariis (as Cicero affirms) The cauſes muſt be great and many, and intolerable, and without remedy. But of theſe things becauſe the Fathers are judges, they muſt judge according to the permiſſions of law, and the analogies of Chriſtian prudence and charity; for if they doe amiſſe, the Child is miſerable by the Fathers paſſion, and the Father by his own.

Of Piety to Parents.

Rule III.

A Father hath power over the goods and perſons of his Children, ſo as to be maintain'd by them.

1. The Lawyers define the Paternal power to be jus moribus legibuſque conſtitutum, quo Patri in filium bonaque ipſius plenum jus olim tributum fuit; a full right upon his ſon and his ſons goods introduc'd by laws and cuſtomes. Now this full right is alterable by the Civil law of any nation: that is, whereas amongſt the Romans whatſoever the ſon acquir'd, he acquir'd it not for himſelf, but for his Father; this may determine ſooner or laſt longer, according to the appointments of law, for the heir ſo long as he is a child differs nothing from a ſervant, and therefore if the law pleaſe, may be us'd accordingly; and when the law hath ſo appointed, the Conſcience is bound by it.

Sebaſt. Monticul. de Patria poteſt.

2. But that which is not alterable by laws is that which is the natural and neceſſary duty, that parents be maintain'd by their children if they need it: for this is in the Commandement, this is a part of the honour that is due to them. For ſo our Bleſſed Saviour remarks the ἀντίθεσις: the Phariſees that taught the children to cry Corban, it is a gift, and therefore out of it the

the parents muſt not be profited, he calls it a not honouring the Father and Mother; and the double honour which S. Paul commands to be given to the Elders that rule well is inſtanc'd in the matter of maintenance. And this the Heathens had. So Hierocles, γονέας τιμήσωμεν ὑπερβαλλόντως, σώματος ὑπηρεσίαν καὶ χρημάτων χορηγίαν ὑπέχοντες ὅτι μάλιστα προθυμοτάτως, Let us greatly honour our parents, affording them the miniſtery of our bodies and the uſe of our wealth moſt chearfully. But this Cicero limits to the neceſſaria vitæ præſidia, quæ debentur his maxime, the neceſſary aides of life; that is, what is for their ſupport, to keep them from need and ſhame, according to the quality of the parent and ability of the child: ſo that this be firſt reſpected, and then that, ſaith Bartolus. To this purpoſe is that of S. Ambroſe, If the contumely of the Father and the reproaching or vilifying of the Mother be puniſh'd ſo ſeverely, what ſhall their ſtarving or their beggery be? This the Romans did reſent ſo deeply, that they made a law that if a ſon that was emancipated or quitted from his Fathers government did deny aliment to his indigent Father, he was to be reduc'd under his Fathers power, and ſo to abide for ever. But by this inſtance it is apparent that this is no part of the Fathers power, but is an office of the ſons piety. For between the Father & the ſon there is a threefold chord or tie, as I have already obſerved, the band of Reverence, of Caſtigation, and Piety; the two firſt are the Fathers authority, this laſt gives the Father properly no right, but obliges the ſon directly. But then this is to be added, that this obligation is onely confirm'd by the Civil laws, but it is immediately tied upon him by the Natural: for a ſon is bound to keep his Father from ſtarving though he be a Bandito, or an Out-law, that is, though he have loſt all civil rights, becauſe no Civil power can prejudice a Divine Commandement. Plutarch tells that by Solon's law the ſon was not bound to give his Father aliment, if his Father caus'd him to learn no trade, or taught him nothing whereby he might get his living. Indeed if the Father neither did give him whereon to live, nor teach him whereby he might get it himſelf, the ſon is the leſſe oblig'd; but yet ſufficiently for this, becauſe it is by a law of Nature that he is oblig'd, and all ſuch obligations are before ſuch conditions can intervene. Πῶς ἂν ὁ γεννηθεὶς ἀντιγεννῆσαι δύναιτο τὸν σωίσαντα, ſaid Ariſtotle. Something elſe is to be conſidered beſides the advantages of education: the Father was the principle of his Being, and in that he can never be requited in kind, and therefore let him be paid by duty.

In Luc. 18.

3. But if the caſe be ſuch as divides the duty, and the money cannot be divided, what ſhall then be done? Marco Tomaſo a tradesman in Venice had a Father and a Son, both lame, both in great neceſſity. The Father loſt all his goods to the Turks, and the ſon had rowed in the Gallies till all his ſtrength and health was gone: but the poor Cutler (for Tomaſo was no more) was not able to relieve them both: what ſhall he doe? The caſe here is hard. But love deſcends, and aſcends not: therefore Tomaſo's bowels yern upon his ſon; and he cannot have that tenderneſſe for his Father, and he were unnatural if he ſhould let his ſon periſh. It is true, but therefore he ought not to neglect his Father and feed his ſon, becauſe his ſon does not, cannot love him ſo well as his Father does; and therefore he is obliged by gratitude to his Father, and by tenderneſſe to his ſon; to this there is more natural inclination, but to the other there is more natural duty. And therefore the Lawyers ſay that amor deſcendit, non aſcendit, is to be underſtood quoad ordinem dilectionis, non quoad effectum obligationis. Love does deſcend, but it ſhould not in ſome caſes. And therefore when the law gives leave that a Son may by his Father be ſold to keep the Father from ſtarving, it ſhews plainly that the Father is in caſes of neceſſity to be preferred.

4. And this indeed by the help of the Civil laws brings this rule to an inſtance of Paternal power; for a Father in this law hath a right over his ſon, and can deliver him to labour and ſervice for the neceſſary ſupport of his helpleſſe Father. This we find done frequently, Metamorph. 8.

——Et tandem demiſſa in viſcera cenſu
Filia reſtabat non iſto digna parente:
Hanc quoque vendit inops.

And Euſebius tells it was done in the time of Maximianus the Emperor; and the Prophet Jeremy brings in the people complaining in a time of famine, Our ſons and our daughters are too many, let us take corn for their price, that we may eat and live. But this being onely in the caſe of extreme neceſſity is not to be drawn to any thing elſe, for this power is onely juſt when it is unavoidable: and therefore it is permitted in laws, which doe therefore ſo comply with the neceſſity, and endeavour to find a remedy, or to make it tolerable, that in ſuch caſes the judges, if there be a conteſt in the particular, are tied to proceed ſummarily: and if a ſon ſhould pretend cauſes of excuſe from giving aliment to his Father, during the whole conteſtation, and till the proof be made, the Son is tied to maintain his Father in the interval; ſo carefull are the laws to ſecure the performance of this duty, for the omiſſion of which all the world hath obſerved great marks of the Divine diſpleaſure, expreſſed in judgments, and particularly of immature deaths; ſo Iliad. 4.

Homer obſerves of Semoiſius

——— οὐδὲ τοκεῦσι
Θρεπτὰ φίλοις ἀπέδωκε, μινυνθαδίην δ' οἱ αἰὼν,

He refus'd to nouriſh his loving parents, and therefore he liv'd but a ſhort life.

5. One particular more is to be added, and that is, if an indigent Father have a rich Father living and a rich Son, although both are oblig'd to nouriſh him, yet it is in the Fathers power to burden the Son and to excuſe the Grandfather; that is, the power which the Father hath over the Son can require this duty: The Grandfather is equally oblig'd, but the Son hath no power over him, the law hath. For as for the thing it ſelf there is no other difference in it. But if the rich Father refuſes he is worſe then an Infidel, if the rich Son refuſes he is impious; the firſt is unnatural, and the ſecond is ungodly; the firſt is a heathen, and the other is no Chriſtian; the Grandfather hath no bowels, and the Grandchild no gratitude; the firſt hath no humanity, and the other no Religion; ſo that it is an even lay between them which is the worſt: but the neceſſitous Father may put the duty actually upon the Son by reaſon of his Paternal power, that is, he may ſo order it, that if the Son refuſes he is not onely uncharitable, but undutifull alſo, he commits two great ſins; whereas the refuſing Grandfather commits but one, though that alſo be enough to bring him an extreme damnation.

RULE IV.

The Fathers power does not extend to matter of Religion, and perſuaſions of Faith.

1. IN the law of the XII Tables it was written, Sacra privata perpetua manento, that the private Religion of a family ſhould not be alter'd: which Cicero expounds to mean that all thoſe to whom the care of the Father of the family did appertain were tied to the celebration of the ſame rites; and the lawyers ſay, that Filii ſunt in ſacris parentum dum ſunt in eorum poteſtate, Children are within the holy rites of their parents while they are in their power. And indeed this is very true in the Court of Conſcience ſo long as their underſtanding is in their Fathers power; but that is of all things firſt emancipated: when a Son can chuſe for himſelf, when he is capable of malice and perverſeneſſe, when he is judicable by external and public laws, then he is emancipated and ſet free, ſo as he can chuſe his religion, and for that the Father hath no other power over him but perſuaſion and inſtruction. For it is very obſervable that as it was ſaid of the law of Moſes, it was a ſchool-maſter to bring us unto Chriſt, ſo it is true of the Imperium domeſticum, the Fathers government, it is a pedagogy to bring us to the obedience of the laws both of God and Man: the Fathers commands are exacted before the laws of God or Princes doe require obedience; becauſe the Government of children is like the Government of the ſick and the mad-men, it is a protection of them from harm, and an inſtitution of them to obedience of God and of Kings; and therefore the Father is to rule the Underſtanding of his child, till it be fit to be rul'd by the laws of God; that is, the child muſt believe and learn, that he may chuſe and obey; for ſo we ſee it in the baptiſing infants, the Fathers and Suſceptors firſt chuſe the childs religion, and then teach it him, and then he muſt chuſe it himſelf. For the Fathers authority to the underſtanding of the child is but like a falſe arch or temporary ſupporter, put under the building till it can ſtand alone: and it onely hath this advantage, that the Father hath the prerogative of education, the priority of poſſeſſion, which how great it is all the experience of the world can tell. But that this is part of the Paternal power is evident, becauſe no child is to be baptized without his Fathers will. A Turk, a Jew, a Heathen can reckon their children in Sacris Parentum *, they have power, a natural and proper power to breed up their children in what religion they pleaſe, but not to keep them in it; for then when they can chuſe they are under no power of man, God onely is the Lord of the underſtanding: and therefore it is no diſobedience if a Son changes his Fathers religion, or refuſes to follow his Fathers change, for he cannot be injur'd in that where he hath no right and no authority.

Alciat. lib. 1. Præterm. in verb. ſacra.

* Panormit. In cap. 2. de converſ. infid. & Baldus in l. item in poteſtate. ff. de ju. perſon.

2. But this is ſo to be underſtood that the religion of the Son muſt at no hand prejudice the Fathers Civil rights, ſo that he muſt not quit his Fathers houſe, if he be under his Fathers power, and by the laws of his country be oblig'd under that government. Vigoreus in his Sermon of S. Martin, tells that S. Martin being but a Catechumen and yet unbaptiz'd did ſtill abide abide with his Father and Mother though they were heathens, and he nevertheleſſe did all the offices of a Chriſtian. And there is in this great duty, becauſe one right muſt not deſtroy another; and a man may be of what religion he pleaſe without doing wrong to any man, for a man cannot be hindred in his perſuaſion, for though he dies, he is of that religion; but no good religion does warrant the Son to doe wrong to his Fathers legal rights. And therefore Marius Victor obſerves of Abraham, Tit. 3. Comment. in Geneſin.

Verum mente Deum venerans, Gentilia Sacra
Averſatus erat———————

He was a great hater of his Fathers idolatry and the impious rites of his family, yet he did not leave his Fathers houſe till after his Fathers death.

Linqueret ut ſedes patrias, terramque nocentem
Pollutamque domum, niſi poſtquam morte parentis
Juſſa ſequi jam poſſe Dei ſine fraude licebat.

He might doe it juſtly when he had no juſt power over him to reſtrain him by the cords of another juſtice and a differing duty.

3. There is onely this variety to be added, that when either of the parents is Chriſtian, and the other Infidel, the Son is to be reckon'd to the believing parent: the effect whereof can be this, that he or ſhe that believes hath a right to educate the children in Chriſtianity without injury to the other, and the Church may baptize the children againſt the will of the unbeliever: and the reaſon of this is, the prerogative of God, and of Chriſt who is head of the Church, and the Soveraign of all the world; for if the child is ſanctified and made holy by the believing parent, then it may be brought to Chriſt; that ſanctification of it is Chriſts ſeizure of it, it is his right, becauſe he hath made a Covenant with the parents for themſelves and for their children.

4. This is practis'd in the Countries of the Roman Communion to evil purpoſes; and if the Father be a heretic in their account, they teach their children to diſobey their parents, and ſuppoſe hereſy to deſtroy the Fathers right of power and government. Between Chriſtian and Chriſtian there is no difference as to matter of Civil rights; no law allows that: but between Heathen and Chriſtian, ſo far as the ſoul is concern'd, the right of Chriſt is indubitable; for we are ſure Chriſtianity is the true religion: but amongſt the Sects of Chriſtians the caſe is wholly differing, for they may both have enough to ſecure the ſouls of pious perſons, and yet may both be deceiv'd in their queſtion, and unneceſſary article.

RULE V.

The Fathers power over the children can remit an injury done to them, without their leave or conſent.

1. THe reaſon of this depends upon the former conſiderations, and is to have it's underſtanding accordingly. So long as the Son is within the Civil power of the Father, ſo long as he lives in his houſe, is ſubject to his command, is nouriſh'd by his Fathers charge, hath no diſtinct rights of his own, he is in his Fathers poſſeſſion, and to be reckon'd by his meaſures, and therefore cannot have any actions of injury for his own amendment.

2. But this is to be limited onely to the effects of law and external Courts and trials of right, or external actions of injury. For although a Son cannot repeat what the Father hath legally acquitted, yet if it be a perſonal action, in which charity and peace are concerned, the injurious perſon is bound in conſcience to ask the Son forgiveneſſe, upon the account of S. Paul's words, Follow peace with all men and holineſſe, and, for as much as is poſſible live peaceably with all men; which no man can be ſaid to doe who hath done wrong to a perſon, to whom he will not doe right. For beſides the relation and the communication of it's effect between Father and Son, the Son is a perſon too, and in perſonal actions hath an intereſt naturally and unalterably, which no fiction of law, no ſuppoſition of caſe can take off. So that all the legal and external obligation the Father may remit; but in the perſonal there is ſomething of proper concernment.

3. This is alſo to be limited to an entercourſe with extraneous perſons, and is not true in actions between the Son and a conjunct perſon to him. As if the injury be done by a wife, or a ſpouſe, or a freed man, or a perſon endeared and oblig'd by the Son, the Father cannot remit any ſuch injury. The reaſon is, becauſe although by the force of the Civil or Municipal laws the Son be ſuppos'd to be ſtill in the Fathers power, yet in ſuch things he hath ſome peculiarity, and is as to thoſe things free and in his own power. If the Sons wife commit adultery, the Father cannot forgive it, though the Son be under his Fathers power by law; becauſe as to all perſonal actions the Son hath a perſonal right, and ſuch things have great dependance upon the law of God and Nature, and theſe things to ſome great purpoſes doe not at all communicate with the Civil laws.

4. Laſtly, this Rule is ſo to be underſtood and practis'd, that it be no prejudice to the juſt intereſts of any other: and therefore a Father cannot ſo forgive an injury done to his Son, that he ſhall be tied not to witneſſe it in public, when he is requir'd by the Civil power; for it may concern the Common-wealth that the Criminal be puniſh'd, when it may become the Father to pardon his and his Sons ſhare. He may remit all with which he hath to doe, but not that which may paſſe into the Exchequer. But in ſuch ſuch caſes the Judge may inquire, but the Son without the Fathers leave may be no voluntary accuſer.

Rule VI.

A Fathers authority cannot abide after his death, but the Sons piety to his Father muſt, and may paſſe upon him ſome indirect obligations.

1. THe Son after his Fathers death is as much lord of his perſon and his eſtate as his Father was: and therefore although all the actions which the living Father did, which by law or the nature of the thing have a permanent effect, ſtill doe abide as they were left; yet thoſe things which are of an alterable nature, and to be adminiſtred by new Counſels, and to be determin'd by emergencies and proper circumſtances, or are directly ſubject to Empire, or are perſonal concernments, theſe are in the power of the Son after his Fathers death. A Father cannot by his power command a Son to marry a perſon whom the Father does, but the Son does not love: He cannot command the Son by a juſt and a ſufficient authority never to be a Prieſt, or Biſhop, or a Magiſtrate: for in thoſe things in which his own meer intereſt is concerned, his own underſtanding muſt be his guide, and his will his Ruler, for he alone does lie at ſtake whether it be good or bad; and it is not reaſonable that he ſhould govern who neither gets, nor looſes, nor knows.

2. But though the Fathers authority be extinct, yet his memory is not, and there is piety towards the dead, and to parents much more; and of this lib. 10. the Heathens gave ſome worthy examples. Herodotus tells that the Iſſionides, a people of Scythia, did uſe to embalm their Fathers head, and then to cover it with gold, and uſe it for a Divine image, and pay to it the veneration of a yearly ſacrifice. This they intended for an honour to their dead Father: but in this there were no ſignes of obedience. Nearer to this de Anima c. 57. was that which Tertullian tells of the Naſamones, that they took their oracles at the graves of their Fathers, as ſuppoſing the ſouls of their Progenitors to have ſome right or care to conduct their children. But it was a lib. 16. c. 5. pretty ſtory that Ælian ſaies the Brachmanes tell of a certain King of the Indians that had many Sons, who being all of them (the yongeſt onely excepted) immorigerous and rebellious, at laſt drove their Father and Mother from their Kingdome; and they with their yongeſt Son wandring in ſtrange places were quickly conſumed with age and wearineſſe and inconvenience. The yong Son ſeeing his parents dead, burnt their bodies, and ſtriking his head with a ſword, put the aſhes into the wound, by that act of piety giving his parents the moſt honourable ſepulture, but with it alſo emblematically repreſenting that his parents even after death had power upon his head, and that his head ought to be ſubmitted to them. And it was well; if piety goes before, whatever duteouſneſſe or obſervance comes afterwards it cannot eaſily be amiſſe.

Piety

3. Piety ſometimes does more then Authority can. Plus poteſt patria poteſtas in liberos quam lex, legióve, aut ſumma Dictatura, ſay the lawyers; A Father or a Mother can prevail, when a Conſul or a Prince cannot. Cum Martius Coriolanus pergebat infeſto agmine adverſus Patriam, quis illi arma ſuccuſſit è manibus niſi una Veturia? ſaith the Roman ſtory. Coriolanus took up armes in rage againſt his Country; and no authority could diſarme him but his piety to his Mother Veturia. Now this principle is a good one; but it hath no limits of it ſelf, but onely what we give to it our ſelves by prudence, and neceſſity, and the nature of the things that are to be done. But in things that are pious and prudent, or that are innocent and indifferent, a dying Fathers deſire, or a living Fathers counſel ought to be eſteemed ſacred: and though they make no law, yet they paſſe an indirect obligation; that is, if they be transgreſſed without reaſon, they cannot be transgreſſed without impiety. It is certain, God is pleas'd with this obedience of piety, as is apparent in the caſe of the Rechabites; and ſuch actions are exemplar in a family, and make the name of Father venerable and ſacred; and ſometimes the neglect of a dying Fathers charge hath met with a ſad event; and a petulant diſobedience hath been a rebellion againſt the greateſt reaſon, which ſometimes is the greater by how much it ought the more to be conceal'd. Philotimus of Athens having obſerv'd his Son given to amours and wandring fancies, upon his death-bed charg'd him by all that was Sacred and Prophane, that however he did reſolve to pleaſe his fancy and ſatisfy his impotent deſires, he ſhould be ſure not to court or to fall in love with Pagnium. Philotimus dies, and Philodectes his Son having quickly dried up his teares which were caus'd by the ſmoke of the funeral pile, hath a great curioſity to viſit this pretty Greek that his Father had ſo forbidden to him. He ſees her, likes her, courts her and lies with her; and in the firſt night of their congreſſe, ſhe being over-pleas'd, told him that ſhe infinitely preferr'd his kindneſſe before the dull embraces of his Father Philotimus which had ſo often tir'd her. Upon this the yong man ſtarts and trembles, and finds his ſin and ſhame, the rewards of an impious diſobedience. His want of piety to his dead Father made him inceſtuous in his mixtures and impious in his luſts. And Pauſanias telling of a Father who meeting his Son in Charon's boat did then attempt to ſtrangle him, to revenge his impiety and diſobedience, by this does repreſent what their ſentence was concerning the reſentment of rebellion of Sons and their undecent ſtubbornneſſe even after death. lib. 10.

4. And this is of ſo much the greater regard, if the Father charges it upon the Son upon his bleſſing, and with great imprecations: for then unleſſe the Father be evidently a light or trifling perſon, there is to be ſuppoſed ſome great reaſon for the impoſition, and then nothing can warrant the laying it aſide, but a great neceſſity, or a very great, good, and certain reaſon to the contrary; that is, ſuch a cauſe as may make the contrary effect to be infinitely unlike any image of impiety or diſregard. But of this parents alſo muſt be very cautious, and not to put a load of duty upon a trifle that ought not to bear it. For he is fooliſh that upon his bleſſing will command his Son to make much of his Sparrow or his Monkey; and that Son is prodigal of his Fathers bleſſing, that will venture it all to pleaſe his humor, and his itch of liberty.

Rule VII.

Neither the Father's authority, nor the Sonnes piety can oblige them to doe an action againſt the laws of God, or of the Father's and our juſt Superior.

1. THis Rule although it ſeems to contain in it nothing but what is ordinary and confeſſed, becauſe God is rather to be obeyed then Man, and amongſt men the ſupreme rather then the ſuperior; yet I have here deſcrib'd it, becauſe the explication of it will not onely contain one great meaſure of our duty and conduct of conſcience, but it will give the full general proportion of the Fathers power and the Sons piety, and alſo very much endear the obedience and piety of children.

2. When Bias had diſcourſed well and wiſely that God was preſent in every place, he ſoon after argued weakly; If God dwels in all places, his preſence makes all places holy, for it is his preſence that hallows a Temple, and then there can be no ſuch thing as ſacrilege; for a thief that robs a Temple cannot carry it out of a Temple, but by carrying it into another.
lib. 2. cap. 7. And upon ſuch a trick as this ſome in A. Gellius did argue that we were not to obey our parents. For either they command that which is good, or that which is not good: If of it ſelf it be good, then for it's own ſake we are to doe it, not for their command; but if it be not good, then though they doe command it, it is not to be done at all. For theſe men ſuppoſed, there is neceſſity and holineſſe in every lawfull action, as the other did ſuppoſe there was holineſſe in every place of Gods abode. But this Sophiſtry is quickly diſcover'd. For beſides that every thing is not neceſſary to be done becauſe it is good, but many are left to our choice to doe or not to doe them, there are many things alſo which are not good in themſelves, but onely become ſo when they are commanded. In both theſe caſes the authority of our parents is competent. For if they be in themſelves good but not neceſſary, by the command of our parents they are made neceſſary and paſſe into a law. But if they be not good of themſelves, but when they are commanded become good, then alſo they become neceſſary. A. Gellius inſtances, in militiam ire, rus colere, honores capeſcere, cauſas defendere, uxorem ducere, uti juſſum proficiſci, accerſitum venire, to goe into the country or to ſtay in the city, to live at court or to live in your farm, to take up armes or to be a merchant, to marry a wife, and to come when you are called, and to work in the vineyard, theſe things of themſelves are inno-
Idem ibid. cent and harmleſſe, but not neceſſary of themſelves; propterea in ejuſmodi omnium rerum generibus patri parendum eſſe, In all things of this nature we are to obey our Father. But adde this alſo, that if it be of it ſelf a duty, and of that nature that it ought to be done ſive imperet Pater, ſive non imperet, whether his Father command or no, yet even here alſo the Fathers command is of great authority and great effect; for it addes a new law to the old commandement, and therefore the diſobedience is guilty of a new ſinne.

3. But in things dishoneſt and impious the Father hath no authority to give a commandement; and if he does, the children are bound not to obey. If the Father commands the Son to marry a wife, to plead a cauſe for the guilty, obſequendum eſt; there is no more to be ſaid, the Father muſt be obeyed. But if he command the Son to marry a harlot, an impudent woman, a drunkard, or to be an advocate for Catiline or Clodius, for Ravillac or Guido Faux, he is not to be obeyed, quoniam accedente aliquo turpitudinis numero, deſinunt eſſe per ſeſe hæc media & indifferentia, When any turpitude is mingled with the action, it is no longer indifferent, or ſubject to command. And therefore we find Acrotatus commended among the ancients becauſe when his parents had requir'd of him to doe an unjuſt thing, he anſwer'd, I know that you are willing I ſhould doe that which is juſt, for ſo you taught me to doe. I will doe therefore that which you deſire I ſhould, but what you bid me I will not doe. A. Gell. ibid

4. And yet if a Father commands an unjuſt thing, his Authority is not wholly nothing. For firſt, though it muſt not be obeyed, yet it muſt not be diſhonour'd, nor yet rejected but with great regard. Quædam eſſe parendum, quædam non obſequendum, ſaid ſome in A. Gellius. Sed ea tamen quæ obſequi non oportet, leniter & verecunde, ac ſine deteſtatione nimia, ſine opprobratione acerba reprehenſionis declinanda ſenſim, & relinquenda eſſe dicunt, quam reſpuenda. What is not fit to be obeyed, muſt be declin'd and avoided rather then rail'd at and rejected with reproach. Etiam in bona cauſa filii apud parentes debet humilis eſſe oratio, ſaid Salvian. When a Son denies his Father he muſt doe it with the language of obedience. Such as was the anſwer of Ageſilaus to his Father when he would have had him to give judgement againſt the laws, A te, Pater, à puero didici parêre legibus, quamobrem nunc quoque tibi obtempero, cavens nequid faciam præter leges, Thou haſt from my childhood, O Father, taught me to obſerve the laws; therefore even now alſo I obey your command, becauſe I take care not to break them. For whatſoever the command be, yet the authority is venerable; if the command be unholy, yet the perſon is ſacred. Liberto & filio ſemper honeſta & ſancta perſona Patris & Patroni videri debet, ſaid Ulpian, The perſon of a Father is always honeſt and venerable to the Son, and ſo is that of a Patron to his freed man. Plutarch. lib. de Vitioſ. verecund.

5. 2. Though the command is not to be obeyed in things diſhoneſt, yet that then alſo the Fathers authority hath in it ſome regard appears by this, that if a Son tranſgreſſes the law by the command of his Father, his puniſhment is ſomething the more eaſy upon that account, though the offence be great, l. fin. de bon. damn. But if the offence be little, he is wholly excus'd ſaith the law, l. liberorum. §. fin. & ſeq. de his qui no. infam. Thus if a Son by the command of his Father marries a widow within the year of mourning, he does not incurre infamy by the law, ſay the Doctors. Velle enim non creditur qui obſequitur Imperio Patris vel Domini, ſaith the law; and Venia dignus eſt qui obtemperavit, ſaith Ulpian: If he did obey the command of his Father, he is to be pardon'd, it was not his own will; that is, not his abſolutely, but in a certain regard, and in a degree of diminution.

6. 3. The Fathers authority hath this effect alſo upon children, that if the Father does wrong, the Son muſt bear it as long as it can be born: and therefore the Son may not goe to law with the Father, and complain of him to the Judge, without leave from both their Superiors. For if by any means the Son can make the Father leſſe then he is, it will deſtroy all duty, and diſpark the incloſure which Nature and the laws have made with fear and reverence. But this hath a double conſideration, the one in Religion, and the other in Laws.

7. 1. In Religion we are to conſider not onely what is lawfull in the preciſe queſtion, but what is to be done in the whole complication and practice of it. For if the Supreme can give leave in ſome caſe for a Son to complain of his Father to a Judge, then in ſome caſes it may be lawfull to doe it, that is, in thoſe caſes in which the law hath ſpecified and reſtrain'd the Paternal power, in thoſe things which the laws call exceſſes and injuries, and which indeed in themſelves are cruel and intolerable. For in ſuch caſes the laws are a guard and defence to the oppreſſed Son; concerning whom although it is ſuppos'd that the Father takes ſufficient care to keep him harmleſſe, yet if the Father does not, the law does: and the law does indeed allow the greateſt power to Fathers, becauſe it preſumes it will be for the childs good; but becauſe there are ſome perſons whom no preſumption can meaſure, who are wicked beyond all the uſual temptations and infirmities of mankind, therefore even in extraordinary caſes there muſt be ſome proviſion; and therefore it is not to be ſuppoſed that it ſhall for ever be unlawfull for Sons to complain of their Fathers to the Prince. But what thoſe caſes are we can be taught by nothing but by the laws themſelves, and by our own natural neceſſities. We muſt cry out when we cannot forbear, and we muſt throw off the burden under which we cannot ſtand; onely we muſt not throw it off as a wild horſe does his load, and kick it with our feet, but we muſt lay it as gently down as we can. Thus if a Father refuſes to give alimony to his Son who cannot be otherwiſe provided for, the aid of the Prince or any ſuperior that can rightly give us remedy may be implor'd. If a Father beats his child till he lame or diſmember him, or endanger his life, the Son can be remedied, and without breach of duty can implore it. So long as a child is in his Fathers houſe, and under his Fathers power, theſe are the onely cauſes in which he can be allowed legally to complain: becauſe in all other things he is intirely under his Fathers power. But when he is emancipated, and quit from his direct authority, which the Lawyers ſignify by the power of Caſtigation, then the Son hath diſtinct rights, and in them becauſe he can be injured, there are more cauſes of difference. To this therefore the anſwer is,

8. That in matters of contract, in little injuſtices, in any thing that is tolerable, in ſuch things the ſuffering of which can conſiſt with charity to our ſelves and piety to our relatives, if a Son does conteſt with his Father at law, it may be it is no proper act of diſobedience, and there is nothing of rebellion in it againſt his juſt authority; but there is alſo as little of piety; eſpecially if we conſider that ſuch conteſts at law are extremely ſeldome manag'd with ordinary charity, and never without the greateſt reproach on one ſide, and ſcandal on both: and if the Son can ſecure that on his own part, yet whether that ſeeming undutifulneſſe, and more then ſeeming want of pious and loving regard, may not exaſperate the Father into angry curſings and evil thoughts, is a conſideration of religion which ought to be taken care of by all that would be Innocent. There is not one of a thouſand ſand that goes to law at all but he runs into ſo many temptations that it is very hard for him to doe right and to doe nothing that is wrong: but not one in ten thouſand can juſtify his cauſe and his perſon too, if he goes to law with a Father. And he will for no cauſe ſuffer wrong at any mans hands that will take no wrong of his Father; and he that does ſo, will give but an ill account of his Chriſtianity.

9. 2. And theſe things appear the more by reaſon of the open diſlikes which the Law profeſſes againſt ſuch proceedings. For look at this thing in Law, and we find that the laws expreſſe the Sons obedience in univerſal termes; Omnibus quæ Pater imperat parendum, Sons muſt be obedient to their Parents in all things. Now if the diſpute be betwixt our obedience to God or to our parents, it is an ill caſe; we know whom we are to obey, but the diſpute it ſelf is not good; and the very making a queſtion of either is a diſadvantage to the honour of both: and therefore the Law, which never ſuppoſes a queſtion to be between God and our Father, does not think it fit to make this to be any exception to her indefinite termes; and therefore Tiberius ſaid it without a limitation, Filium non poſſe detrectare juſſa Patris; and Turnus againſt Tarquin ſaid ſummarily and clearly, Nullam breviorem eſſe cognitionem quam quæ inter Patrem & Filium, pauciſque verbis tranſigi poſſe; Ni pareat Patri, habendum infortunium, Between a Father and a Son the proceeding is ſhort, and the caſe quickly ſumm'd up; Either let the Son obey, or let him be puniſh'd. And the law accounts it a diminution of ſuch ſupreme authorities, to have exceptions and reſervations expreſs'd in the firſt proviſions of the law; and the very making God and the Father to be the oppoſite and compar'd perſons in the queſtion, is to leſſen them both. In comparatione perſonarum ineſt læſio & injuria, ſay the Lawyers; There is ſome wrong done when you compare two Eminencies. Therefore in this caſe, if ever any ſuch thing does happen, without diſpute we know what we are to doe: but it is not good that the laws ſhould take public notice of it beforehand. * But if the queſtion be between the Father and the Son, the law is ſo great an enemy to all ſuch queſtions, right or wrong, that the law judges for the perſon of the Father, even when it does not like the cauſe. It does ſo in the caſe of all Superiors in ſome degree, and therefore much more in the caſe of Fathers. Jus quod deprimitur, aufertur; if you leſſen the authority, you take it away; and then you doe injury, though by doing of right. When Accia Variola queſtion'd her Fathers Teſtament, becauſe he had left immoderate Legacies to her Mother in law, the Fathers of rich families were preſent in great numbers, and the Sons of thoſe families attended for the ſentence in great and anxious expectations, looking which intereſt ſhould get the advantage. But the Judges very wiſely left the caſe undetermin'd, becauſe it was hard on the Fathers ſide; but they were reſolved never to leave a precedent in which the children ſhould be in any thing ſuperior to their Fathers: or that as Death and Love chang'd their quivers, ſo old age ſhould be reckon'd as void of Counſel, and wiſedome and prudence ſhould be the portion of yong men.

Rule VIII.

It is not lawfull for Children to enter into any laſting Courſe of life againſt the will or approbation of their Parents.

1. THis Rule contains two great Caſes. The firſt is concerning the ſtates of Religion; the other is concerning the ſtates of Civil life.

2. 1. It is not lawfull for children to take them any religious vows, or enter into any of thoſe which are called ſtates of Religion, viz. to take upon them the ſtate of ſingle life, to be Prieſts, Monks, Friers, Hermits, or any thing of the like nature, without the conſent of their Parents.

3. Thomas Aquinas entred into the Dominican Order, and became a Frier without the conſent of his parents: and that unjuſtifiable action begat a more unjuſtifiable doctrine, Poſt annos pubertatis poſſe liberos ſe voto religionis obligare, abſque voluntate parentum, That after 14 years of age or the firſt ripeneſſe, it is lawfull for children to take upon them the vows of Religion, whether their parents be willing or unwilling. And after his time it grew into a common doctrine and frequent practice; and if a Monk could perſuade a yong heir, or a pregnant youth into their cloyſters, they pretended to ſerve God, though certainly they ſerv'd themſelves, and diſſerv'd a family. The ground they went upon was, the pretence of the great ſanctity of the ſtate Monaſtical; that it was for God and for religion; that to ſerve God no man that can chuſe hath need to ask leave; that if the Father be ſuperior, yet God is the ſupreme; that it is Corban; that if the yong man or maiden be given to God, he is given to him that hath more right to him or her then his parents; that religion in all things is to be preferr'd; and that although the parents have a right over the bodies of their children, yet of their ſouls they are themſelves to diſpoſe, becauſe theirs is the biggeſt intereſt and concern: and whereas God hath commanded to Honour our Father and Mother, we know that God is our Father, and the Church is our Mother; and what does accrue to theſe, is no diminution to the others right.

2. 2æ. qu. 88. art. 9.

4. Againſt all theſe fair pretences it is ſufficient to oppoſe this one truth, That Religion and Piety cannot of themſelves croſſe each other, but may very well ſtand together, and nothing is better then to doe a neceſſary duty. And there needs not much conſideration to tell which is better, to make our love to God and our love to our Parents, and our duty to them both to ſtand together, or to fight one with another. God intends the firſt, that is certain, for he is not the author of diviſion, nor hath he made one good contrary to another. For if one be ſet up againſt another they are both ſpoiled. For that duty that goes away is loſt; and that duty which thruſt it away hath done evil, and therefore is not good. If therefore it be poſſible to doe our duty to our parents and to love God greatly at the ſame time, there needs no more to be ſaid in this affair, but that we are to remember member that a man may greatly ſerve God, and yet never be a Frier or a Prieſt; and that allowing or ſuppoſing that theſe are great advantages, or rather engagements of duty, yet it is certain that no ſtate of perfection can be ſet forward by doing evil; and he enters ill into the ſtate of perfection that paſſes into it by the door of Undutifulneſſe.

5. Now then, we are certain of this, that Parents have the firſt right, and the firſt poſſeſſion, and that to diſpoſſeſſe any one of his rights againſt his will is great injuſtice, and therefore that no end can ſanctify it; and that it would be a ſtrange religion which teaches impiety for pious conſiderations: and therefore without further inquiry, it follows that a Son may not upon any pretences of a religious manner and circumſtances of life ſubduct himſelf from his Fathers power, and put himſelf under other governments with which his Father ſhall have nothing to doe. A Son hath no power over himſelf, for he belongs to and is under the power of another; & therefore if he does ſubduct himſelf, he is undutifull, and impious, & unjuſt, and does not Honour his Father and his Mother. But he that does perſuade the Son from his Fathers houſe into a Monaſtery, is reus Plagii, he is a Man-ſtealer. Qui Patri eripit filium, educatori alumnum, Domino ſervum, Deo efficit impium, educatori ingratum, Domino nequam, ſaid Tertullian, He that debauches a Son, a Pupil, or a Servant, and ſnatches them from their Father, their Guardian, or their Lord, makes them impious, ingratefull and vile. And becauſe this was done by ſome upon pretence of piety, the Council of Gangra forbad it upon a curſe. Quicunque filii à parentibus prætextu Divini cultûs abſcedunt, nec debitam reverentiam impendunt illis.... anathema ſint. Pretence of the Divine ſervice is no good warranty for diſobedience to parents; and they who ſo neglect their Fathers bleſſing, will meet with the curſe of their Mother. And this Canon was cited and renewed in the ſixth Council of Conſtantinople. * The Council of Tribur forbids expreſſely a yong maiden before twelve years of age to enter into a Monaſtery without the conſent of her Guardian. Gratian citing this Decree, addes ſomething of his own; for it is not known whence he had it, except from the degenerous and corrupt practices of his own times. Si vero in fortiori ætate adoleſcens vel adoleſcentula ſervire Deo elegerit, non eſt poteſtas parentibus prohibendi, If the yong man or maiden be of greater age, the parents have no power to forbid him: which is a clauſe which is not to be found in the Codes of Councils, in any editions old or new. But when Monaſtical life had reputation and ſecular advantages upon religious pretences, then the advocates and promoters of it were willing by right and wrong to ſet it forward. But the corruption is plain, and apparently againſt the doctrine and practices of the Fathers of the Church.

Can. 16.

6. S. [a] Ambroſe and S. [b] Auſtin ſay that a Father or Mother ought not to hinder a ſon or daughter from entring to a Monaſtery. But then, things were ſo ordered that the entry thither was not a perpetual bond, but a going thither as to a Chriſtian School, a place for inſtitution and holy practice, and from thence they might return when they would, they might ſerve God and their Parents too: the profeſſion of a Monk was then nothing elſe but priſcæ liberaque vitæ ac pure Chriſtianæ meditatio, a meditation and inſtitution of a Chriſtian life according to the rate of the Primitive ſimplicity, liberty and devotion. But beſides this, though they exhort parents not to hinder their children, yet they affirm that they have power to doe it, and they may if they will; as appears amply in S. Auſtin's Epiſtle to Ecdicia, and in his 233. Epiſtle to Benenatus. But moſt plainly and dogmatically it is affirm'd by S. Baſil, liberos non eſſe recipiendos in Monaſteriis, niſi à parentibus ſuis offerantur, Children are not to be receiv'd into Monaſteries unleſſe their parents preſent them: and when S. Gregory Nazianzen had againſt his Fathers commandement run into a Monaſtery, he began to bethink himſelf what he had done, and found that without impiety he could not be contumacious againſt his Father, and therefore left his ſolitude and return'd home. Et hoc facio (ſaith he) juſſu Dei magis quam hominum metu. Itaque, O pater, dicto jam audienti præbo benedictionem. This he did in obedience to God, and not for the fear of men; and therefore upon the account of his obedience and return, he begg'd his Fathers bleſſing. But beſides this, there were two remarkable examples which abundantly conclude this duty. * The one was of Heliodorus, who together with S. Hierom had undertaken a Monaſtical life by vow; but finding that by Piety and Nature he was to regard his onely ſiſter and her ſon, he return'd to her houſe, and took upon him the habit of the Clergy, and left that of Monks. Againſt him S. Hierom, who was then a yong man, newly come from the Univerſity and the ſchools of Rhetoric, ſtorms very much, and ſaies ſome things which when he was older and wiſer he changes and revokes, as appears in his Epiſtle to Nepotian, where he imputes his former ſayings to his juvenile years and learning. Now though Heliodorus had no parents when he undertook a Monaſtical life, and therefore had his liberty; yet it is therefore certain he believ'd he ought not to have done it without the conſent of parents if they had been living, becauſe he did ſuppoſe a leſſe Piety, even to his Siſter and his Nephew, to be a ſufficient reaſon for him to leave his ſolitude and ſhew Piety at home. * But the other inſtance is more material. Stagirius was made a Monk, not againſt his Fathers commandement, but againſt his Counſel. The Father was very unwilling, but durſt not expreſſely forbid it, upon ſome ſcruples which were put into his head by the humors which were then beginning. But becauſe he had neglected his Fathers Counſel, and caus'd trouble to him, Stagirius was vexed with the Devil, and S. Chryſoſtome took great pains to comfort him. But afterwards the manners of men grew worſe, and all religion was incloſed in a Friers habit, and it grew to be eſteemed excellent to enter into a Monaſtery, and whatſoever did hinder it was to be deſpis'd, or us'd like a temptation; and the Orders of Religion grew potent and prevail'd over private intereſts and private religion, and by degrees it enter'd into unſufferable miſchiefs and impiety. It was ſometimes reſtrain'd by good laws, ſo that it could not grow ſo faſt, Charles the Great made a law concerning it: De pueris verò ſine voluntate parentum ut tonſurentur, vel puellæ velentur, modis omnibus inhibitum eſt, Boys muſt not be ſhorn nor maidens vail'd without the conſent of their parents. And to the tranſgreſſors of this law a fine was impos'd, the ſame with that which was appointed in the Salic law *; which did equally forbid them to be ſlain and to be ſhorn. For by religious pretences not to doe kindneſſe to their parents our Bleſſed Saviour called hypocriſy in the Phariſees; and therefore upon the like pretences to doe them wrong, to take their right from them, to diſpoſſeſſe them of their deareſt pledges, muſt needs be ſo much the worſe. It is that which our Bleſſed Saviour calls Hypocriſy, and diſhonouring our parents: It is that which the Church does call an anathema, which the Laws call plagium, or manſtealing: It is homicide in the account of the Imperial laws: and S. Bernard calls in quæſt. fuſe explic. q. 15.

[b] Epiſt. 109, 110.

S. Aug. Epiſt. ad Boniface. Comit.

lib. 5. cap. 95.

* tit. de iis qui pueros vel puellas occiderint, vel totonderint.

calls them wolves that doe it, in his firſt Epiſtle, which, as the ſtory runs, was not written without a Miracle.

7. The other great caſe is in the Marriage of their Children, concerning which the ſentence is ready and acknowledged in the greateſt part of it.

2. It is unlawfull for Children to marry without and againſt the conſent of their Parents.

That ſuch marriages are not licitæ is confeſs'd on all hands; that is, the ſon or daughter ſin againſt God and the laws, by marrying againſt his Fathers Commandement.

Adeóne impotenti animo eſſe, ut præter civium Terent.
Morem atque legem, & ſui voluntatem patris,
Tamen hanc habere ſtudeat, cum ſummo probro?

ſaid he in the Comedy. It is diſhonourable, and a ſhame to take a wife againſt the will of his Father; it is againſt the manners and the laws of all Republics. But whether they be legitimæ or no is a great queſtion; that is, whether they be wholly invalid and null in law, or in caſe they be valid, whether or no they ſuffer any diminution, and what it is.

8. Amongſt the Ancients, and for a long time in the Civil law, ſuch marriages were eſteem'd illegitimate, and no better then a meer Concubinate. So Ovid intimates in the marriage of Pyramus and Thisbe;

——Tedæ quoque jure coiſſent,
Sed vetuere patres——

If the parents had not forbidden, the marriage had been legitimate; but therefore not then when they are forbidden: and therefore as inceſtuous marriages were not onely Impious but Null, they are not onely ſinfull in the entry, but all the way; ſo are theſe, alike evil in all the progreſſion, though as yet they have not a proper name in law, as the other have. But Apulcius is more expreſſe; Impares nuptiæ, & præterea in villa ſine teſtibus & Patre non conſentiente factæ, legitimæ non poſſunt videri, ac per hoc ſpurius iſte naſcetur. Unequal marriages, clandeſtine, and made without the Fathers conſent can never ſeem legitimate, and therefore the children that are born will be illegitimate. And Muſæus obſerves in the marriage of Leander, that it was ominous and unlucky upon this reaſon, becauſe lib. 6. de Aſino aureo.

Οὐχ ὑμήναιον ἄεισε πατὴρ καὶ πότνια μήτηρ,

The Father and the Mother did not ſing the Hymenæal or Marriage ſong. The ſame thing was obſerv'd alſo by the Chriſtians; for when Tertullian is recounting the auſpicious ſignes and cauſes of a bleſſed marriage, he puts this in, Unde ſufficiam ad enarrandam felicitatem ejus Matrimonii quod Eccleſia conciliat, & confirmat oblatio, & obſignatum Angeli renunciant, Pater rato habet? That marriage will be very proſperous which is bleſſed by the Church, made ſolemn by publication and the rituals of religion, and eſtabliſh'd by the conſent of the Father. For without it it is not onely inauſpi- ad Uxorem.

cious and unlucky, but illegal, unfirm and inſufficient. Nam nec in terris filii ſine conſenſu Patrum ritè & jure nubent, ſaith he. For he liv'd in a time when the law pronounc'd ſuch marriages illegal, and the children baſtards. For as ſome contracts are invalid unleſſe the ſolemnity of the law be obſerved, and Teſtaments are ineffective without ſuch a number of witneſſes; ſo the law requires the conſent of Parents to make the eſpouſals to be a legal and valid contract. Non videri juſtum filium qui ex eo Matrimonio natus eſt cui Pater non conſenſit, ſaid Paulus the Lawyer: and this went ſo farre, that if a daughter were expos'd by her Father like a child of the people, and no care of her education or alimony taken, yet before the time of Conſtantine, that daughter might not marry without the leave even of that unnatural Father. And amongſt the children of Abraham this was ſo ſacredly obſerved, that even there where by the event of things we perceive that the marriage was deſign'd by God, yet it was not to be acted but by the Fathers willingneſſe; as appears in the caſes of Iſaac and Rebecca, Sampſon and his wife at Timnath. Thus Agar took a wife for her ſon Iſhmael, and Jacob went into Meſopotamia for a wife by the conſent of his Father and Mother; and Sichem ask'd of his Father Hemor that he would get him the daughter of Jacob to wife. And the words of the Law were directed to the Father, not to the Son; Non accipies Uxorem filiis tuis de filiabus eorum, & filiam tuam non dabis filio ejus: and in the New Teſtament, He that giveth his Virgin in marriage doth well: ſtill it is the Parent that hath the right and the power; it is the Parent that can make the contract; he is the perſon ſuppos'd onely competent in law.

9. And indeed by theſe inſtances and the perpetual practice and perſuaſion of the old world we cannot ſuppoſe it to be leſſe then a Natural law, or a natural reaſon, of great effect, or of great neceſſity. When the daughter of Cyaxarus was ask'd whom ſhe would marry, ſhe anſwer'd, Cyrus; for when they were children together he had delighted her with pretty ſongs and converſation: And when ſhe was offer'd to him with a royal robe, Jewels and a crown of gold, and all Media for her dowry, Cyrus anſwer'd, Et genus & puellam & dotalia laudo, I like the Lady, her dowry and her family, but I muſt have theſe agree with the mind of my Father and my Mother, and then I will marry her. For (as Panægyris in Plautus told his ſiſter) in Patris poteſtate eſſe ſitum liberorum matrimonium, quibus faciendum hac in parte ſit quod Patres imperant, Childrens marriage is in the power of their Father, and they muſt doe what their Father commands: and Simo would not allow Pamphilus to call him Father, when he diſobey'd him in this particular,

Pamphilus

Pamphilus offer'd to quit Glycerium if his Father pleas'd, and yet he had been contracted to her, and had a Son by her. Certain it is, theſe contracts were to all purpoſes invalid by the Civil law both of the Greeks and Romans. Nuptias conſiſtere non poſſe niſi conſentiant omnes, hoc eſt, qui coeunt, quorumque in poteſtate ſunt, ſaith the Law, Inſt. de Nuptiis. ff. de ritu nuptiarum. And in the Jus Græco-Romanum there is an expreſſe Canon, Qui in aliena poteſtate ſunt eorum pacta nihil habent firmi: propterea quæ citra voluntatem nuptiæ fiunt eorum penes quos poteſtas eſt, pro ſcortationibus habentur. This is peremptory. Such marriages are fornications, and therefore the children are Baſtards. And of this Juſtinian gives this account, Juſtas nuptias inter ſe contrahunt qui ſecundum præcepta legum coeunt, Thoſe marriages are true which are confederated according to the precepts of laws, when the contractors are of fitting age, whether they be the chief, or the ſons of families. Onely if they be ſons of families, they muſt have their conſent in whoſe power they are. Nam hoc fieri debere, & civilis & naturalis ratio ſuadet, in tantum ut juſſus parentum præcedere debeat. For that this ought to be done, that the Fathers conſent muſt be before the marriage, not onely is concluded by civil or political reaſon, but alſo by the natural.

in reſpons. Matrimon. Matth. Monachi.

10. Thus it was in the Natural and in the Civil law; and at firſt, and for a long time after, it was no otherwiſe in the Canon law. To this purpoſe is that famous Decree of Pope Euariſtus; Aliter legitimum non ſit conjugium niſi ab iis qui ſuper ipſam fœminam dominationem habere videntur, & à quibus cuſtoditur, uxor petatur, & à parentibus & propinquioribus ſponſetur, & legibus dotetur. Euariſtus had enumerated a great many things which were fit (as he thought) and much for the honeſty and decency, the bleſſing and proſperity of the marriage; as attending to ſolemn prayers for two or three days, oblations and bridemen, and ſome other things which are now out of uſe: he proceeds to that which was eſſentiall to the contract, the conſent of parents; and aliter legitimum non ſit, it cannot otherwiſe be legitimate: and he addes, aliter verò præſumpta non conjugia, ſed adulteria, vel contubernia, vel ſtupra aut fornicationes potius quam legitima conjugia eſſe non dubitatur, Marriages without the conſent of parents are adulteries and raviſhments, fornications and concubinate, any thing rather then marriages. To this accords that Canon of S. Baſil, Puellis quæ præter Patris ſententiam fornicatores ſecutæ ſunt reconciliatis parentibus videtur res remedium accipere: ſed non protinus ad communionem reſtituentur, ſed triennio punientur. If Fathers will pardon their daughters that without their leave run after wanton perſons, their crime as to him ſeems to be taken off; yet let them be put for three years into the ſtation of Penitents. Upon this Canon Theodorus Balſamon ſaies, that by [Puellis] or Girles, S. Baſil "means thoſe that are under their Fathers power: and that if any ſuch "give themſelves up to their lovers without their Fathers conſent and are "diſhonour'd, although they to themſelves ſeem to be married, yet ſuch "marriages are not valid, they cannot ſtand: and for this there is no remedy "but being reconcil'd to their Fathers. But S. Baſil is alſo as expreſſe himſelf in his text as Balſamon in his Commentary, for in his 40.[h] Canon he "ſaies that marriages without the conſent of them in whoſe power they "are, are fornications and not marriages. And therefore the Council of Carthage requires that when the bridegroom and his bride are to be bleſſed by the Prieſt, that is, ſolemnly married, they ſhould be preſented to the Prieſt by their parents or their deputies; which thing is carefully to this day day obſerved in the Church of England. For according to the ſaying of S. Leo, Paterno arbitrio fœminæ viris junctæ carent culpâ ; If maidens be joyn'd to their Husbands by the conſent of their parents, there is then nothing but innocence, no body hath cauſe to complain. But that's not all. For Gratian expounding theſe words, ſaies that from hence [datur intelligi quod Paternus conſenſus deſideratur in nuptiis, nec ſine eo legitimæ nuptiæ habeantur] we are given to underſtand that the Fathers conſent is requir'd, and without it the marriages are not to be accounted legitimate : and for it he quotes the words of Euariſtus before mention'd. But the Council of Aquiſgrane did not onely ſeparate ſuch marriages when the maiden was ſtoln away without her parents leave, but would not allow that ever after they ſhould be man and wife, as we find in Burchard ; and the ſame was verified in the Council of Melda, which for it's warrant quotes a ſynodal definition of S. Gregory to the ſame purpoſe.

11. The Church was indeed very ſevere againſt ſuch undutifull proceedings and rebellions againſt the ſupreme natural power ; and therefore the Council in Paris & divers others did anathematize them that ſo married, & even when they were reconcil'd to their parents did impoſe on them ſevere penances. But becauſe when things were once come to that paſſe, Fathers perceived that the reputation of their children was loſt, and that it was not eaſy to get other honeſt Matches for their children, and eſpecially when Marriage began to be called a Sacrament, and ſome ſcruples were by the Clergy caſt into this affair, and becauſe men were willing to make the beſt of a bad Market ; the Fathers gave over making uſe of this power given them by the laws, and thought the public penances were caſtigation ſufficient. But then according to the nature of all good laws and manners running down the hill, this thing never left running till children had leave to deſpiſe their parents, and marry where and when they pleas'd; and though it was ſaid to be a fault, yet factum valet, fieri non debuit, it was decreed in the Council of Trent to be valid and effectual.

Ibid. Vide etiam Concil. Pariſ. 36. q. 2. 27. q. 2. nullus.

12. But now this ſentence which indeed relies upon ſome reaſon and very great authority, and is wiſe and fit to prevent much evil in families, is yet very ſevere, and ought to receive ſome allay ; which when I have repreſented upon the general conſideration, I ſhall endeavour to give it a right underſtanding, and deſcribe the truth that lies between the two extremes, and was yet never affirm'd and deſcrib'd by any one that I know of, but is determinable by a juſt weighing of all that which very many wiſe men have ſaid, being put together.

13. Firſt therefore I conſider what Quintilian ſaid: "If it be lawfull at any "time for a ſon to doe an action otherwiſe unreprovable without the con- "ſent of parents, certainly liberty is in nothing ſo neceſſary as in marriage. Ego eligam cum qua victurus ſum, ego comitem laborum, ſollicitudinum, curarum ipſe perpendam. Quis enim amare alieno animo poteſt ? It is fit that I ſhould chuſe her or him with whom I muſt always live, the partner of my joys and ſorrows, the companion of my cares, the Father or the Mother of my own children : for it is impoſſible that a man ſhould love with any affections but his own. And if Pamphilus can love none but Glycerium, it will be hard for Simo, whoſe fires are extinct by age, to command his ſon to burn and pine away without remedy and pitty. It was better which Pauſanias tells tells of Danaus, that he gave his daughters leave to chuſe their husbands; and Herodotus tells that Callias the Athenian was much commended by the Greeks becauſe he permitted to his daughters to chuſe what husbands, not he, but themſelves lik'd beſt. in Erato, l. 6.

lib. 3. in Laconic.

14. But the caſe is to be determin'd by theſe three Propoſitions.

1. When ſons or daughters are of competent years and have the uſe of reaſon, they can naturally contract marriages; that is, there is nothing naturally requir'd but that they can conſent, and be of a marriageable ſtrength. Sufficiat ſolus conſenſus illorum de quorum, quarumque conjunctionibus agitur, ſaid Clement the third, Conſent alone makes marriage; that is, it makes a marriage naturally valid, if it be done by thoſe perſons who naturally can conſent. c. tuæ. de Sponſ. extr.

For that the conſent of parents is not eſſentially neceſſary to the validity of the contract naturally, appears in many inſtances. 1. Becauſe children can contract when their parents are dead. 2. Becauſe if their Father be dead, and their Mother living, the ſon that is of years of diſcretion is not under his Mothers power as to that, but that upon great and good reaſon he may marry by his own choice. 3. A ſon may marry at the command of a Prince, when it is for the public good, though his Father at the ſame time regard nothing but his private. 4. If a Father ſay nothing to hinder it, though he be ſecretly unwilling, or owns the unwillingneſſe, but behaves himſelf negatively as to any cooperation, yet the ſon may marry: which demonſtrates that the Fathers conſent is no active principle, ingredient into the marriage, but a privative or a negative onely; that is, he can forbid it, and ſo hinder it, but it is not therefore naturally invalid; that is, he can legally prevent it, but not naturally annul it. 5. If the marriage of the ſon be not onely of regard and advantage to the ſon, but ſo far from doing injury to the Father, that it does him honour; the laws declare that ſuch a marriage is valid, though the Father out of humor diſagree. And therefore when the law ſaiês that the ſon cannot contract marriage but with his Fathers conſent, the Doctors limit it amongſt other caſes to this eſpecially, quando filius duceret uxorem turpem & indignam, when the ſon marries diſhonorably; for then (ſay Bartolus and Decius) there is injury done to the Father: ſo that the prohibition lying for this reaſon, when the caſe is contrary to the reaſon, the extraordinary effect muſt be contrary to the ordinary law. vide Aſcanium Clement. Ametin. de patria poteſt. cap. 6. effect. 6.

6. Whatever the law decrees in deteſtation of childrens diſobedience, yet the marriage though to ſome civil effects it is null'd, yet that it is naturally valid appears in this, becauſe the ſon that is born of that marriage is the Grandfathers own, and if the Father die before the Grandfather, the Grandchild muſt inherit. So that the puniſhment is but perſonally on the Son, and is not a perfect invalidating of the marriage. l. Divi fratres. ff. de jure patron.

And this very caſe was determin'd in the Parliament of Harlay in behalf of Marguerite de Neſdes her children, the Nephews of her husbands Father, in the year 1584. 7. If the Father be unreaſonable, and offers to his ſon or daughter an ugly, a deform'd, a vitious or a baſe perſon, and gives him no other choice, and the ſon cannot contain and live a ſingle life, by the conſent of all men the ſon may refuſe, and he cannot but chuſe another. 8. The ſame is the caſe, if the Father be negligent; then by the law a ſon ſooner and a maiden after 25. years of age can chuſe for her ſelf. l. Filius 25. ff. de ritu Nuptiarum.

* An ſedere oportuit domi virginem tam grandem? ſaid Phalaris. Πᾶσι γὰρ ἀνθρώποις ἀίχιστον δέδοχται, ἢ νὴ Δία ἔξω παρὰ τὴς φύσεως χρόνους ἐνεγκοῦσα. For it is intolerable that a maid ſhould be ſuffer'd to paſſe the l. 3. §. Emancipatus. ff. de cont. tab. *Phalar. Epiſt. 143.

cap. 9. flower of her age at home. And when the Gemara Sanhedrin had ſaid [Doe not proſtitute thy daughter, to make her a harlot] Rabbi Eliezer ſaid this was ſpoken to him that marries his daughter to an old man. R. Akiba ſaies, it was meant of him qui domi retinet filiam nubilem, that keeps his daughter at home too long. Which two laſt caſes relying upon the ſame reaſon produce the ſame effect, That the Fathers conſent, though highly to be requir'd, yet is not eſſentially neceſſary; it may be a valid marriage without it. 9. And this is true alſo in caſe of Emancipation *, or quitting the Son from the Fathers power; he is ſui juris, and can marry where he will, and yet he owes to his Father all the obedience to which by the law of Nature he was obliged. 10. If a Son marries without his Fathers conſent, the law ſaies it is void; but yet it is not ſo void, but that the Fathers approbation makes it valid without marrying again: which could not be if it were naturally invalid, but therefore it is both naturally and Eccleſiaſtically good. Quod enim ab initio malè factum eſt, parentum poſtea conſenſus reparare videtur, ſaid Balſamon: it was ill done at firſt, and the Fathers conſent repairs the dammage; but if it was invalid and null at firſt, nothing can make it alive upon the firſt ſtock. Quod enim ab initio non valuit, progreſſu temporis valere non debet, ſaith the law. 11. Servants or ſlaves in the Civil law were as much in the power of their lords as ſons in the power of their Fathers; as much I ſay, though not for ſo many reaſons; and yet the marriage of ſervants was valid in law though contracted without the conſent of their Lords; as Pope Alexander the third wrote in a decretal Epiſtle to the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury: and therefore that the marriage of ſons and daughters may be ſo too, that is, not to be diſſolved, not to be declar'd null in conſcience, I can find no reaſon to the contrary. 12. We find in Scripture that Eſau's marriages were valid and went on, though contracted againſt the intereſt of that family, the pleaſure of the parents and, as Lyra ſaies, without their conſent. It is true indeed that the Jeruſalem Thargum ſaies that they were a grief to Iſaac and Rebecca becauſe they were undutifull, and proud, and idolatrous, refuſing to be taught by their Husbands Father or Mother. But when I conſider that it is not onely affirmed by Rebecca that they were an affliction to her, but obſerv'd at the very firſt taking of them in, that they were a grief to both of them, and that Eſau afterwards to gratify his Father did marry his Coſen german, the daughter of his Uncle Iſhmael; the opinion of Lyra ſeems moſt probable, and that Iſaac and Rebecca did not conſent, and were not pleas'd with thoſe firſt marriages. But if this ſhould fail, there are arguments enough beſides to evince that naturally ſuch marriages are valid, though at no hand they ought to be done.

Gen. 26. 35.

15. But what then ſhall we ſay to all the former diſcourſe, which prov'd that thoſe marriages were illegitimate, and the conjunctions no better then concubinate? Does all that heap of things, and ſayings of wiſe men, and laws Eccleſiaſtical and Civil and Natural, effect nothing? or doe they prevail intirely? That they effect ſomething their own ſtrength does evidence; that they doe not prevail to effect a natural nullity in marriage, the contrary arguments deſcrib'd in the former Number doe ſufficiently prove. What then is the concluſion?

16. From hence we may learn it. 2. Although the marriage is naturally valid, yet that natural validity can have this effect onely, that it can for ever bind bind the conſcience of the engaged parties to faith and mutual love, and to cohabitation when it is not hindred; and it is, even when it is moſt of all forbidden, yet potentially legitimate, that is, it wants no features and lineaments, nor life, but it wants ſolennity and publication; that is, it is like an Embryo in his Mothers womb, there it muſt ſtay till the law gives it name and birth. * For it is to be conſidered, that although the yong folks can contract even againſt their parents will, yet they can be hindred from poſſeſſion: Not onely becauſe natural rights can be impeded in their uſe and challenge by the Supreme Civil power; but becauſe there is in marriage ſomething that is wholly in the power of the Civil law. For in marriage there are three things, Unity, and Society, and Myſtery. This laſt is not of preſent conſideration, becauſe it is wholly of ſpiritual nature, and therefore of Eccleſiaſtical cogniſance. But of the other two, the firſt is in the power of the Contractors, the latter is in the power of the Common-wealth. From union of minds, and obligation of mutual duties and affections, and perpetuity of relations they cannot be kept by their diſſenting parents, or by the Civil law. But from being a ſociety, from beginning a legal family, from rights of ſucceſſion, from reckoning deſcents in their line, and from cohabitation they can be kept by that power which is the Supreme in the eſtabliſhment and conduct of all ſocieties. And the conſequent of this will be, not onely that ſuch perſons ſhall looſe all civil benefits and profits of inheritance, that is, all that can come from Society, but even their very Unity will be diſparag'd, ſo as it ſhall be eſteem'd no better then fornication; not that it is ſo before God, or is againſt the vertue of Chaſtity, but that it is ſo in the Civil account, and is againſt the laws of Marriage. It is in this as it is in the caſe of Raptus or Raviſhment. In the Civil law, he that takes away a mans daughter without the conſent of her parents rapuiſſe dicitur is a Raviſher: but it is not ſo in the Canon law, it is not ſo in Nature or Conſcience. Raptus ibi dicitur admitti ubi nihil ante de nuptiis dicitur: If there was no treaty of marriage, it is a rape; but if the man was ſecretly betrothed, to carry her away and lye with her is no rape, licèt parentes reclamarent, although the parents were againſt it, ſaid Pope Lucius the third. Now to call this a rape, and to puniſh it as if it were, is in the power of law: juſt as the ſtealing of a knife out of a Church, or a Chalice out of the Clercs houſe, may by law be called Sacrilege; and then it is ſo to all the purpoſes of law; though before God it may not differ from ſimple theft. So for yong lovers to lye together before publication is by the Canon law called Antenuptialis fornicatio, and is puniſhed as if it were ſo indeed: and yet though it be evil in the eye of men, and upon that account is ſo in it ſelf, yet in the eyes of God it is not fornication; God himſelf having expreſſely called a Betrothed woman by the name of wife, and puniſh'd her falſhood to her husband before marriage with the ſame evil as adultery. And thus it is in the preſent inquiry: Marriage of perſons in minority is naturally invalid, becauſe they are naturally unable to make a contract for their good, they underſtand it not; but if they be of good years, though under their Fathers power, they are naturally able, but politically unable, and therefore are inevitably engag'd in an evil condition, and they have ſinn'd, and it is a miracle if they doe not ſin again, and abide in it upon this account. For the marriage is good within doors, but it is not good abroad: they are both oblig'd, and yet cannot pay their obligation: this marriage is not good in law, and yet they cannot chuſe another in conſcience: it was by their own fault, and therefore they muſt bear their own burden: they are guilty of fornication, but it is not a ſin againſt the ſeventh Commandement: they have not diſhonour'd their own bodies between themſelves, but they have diſhonour'd them before all the world beſides. And as coveteouſneſſe is idolatry, and rebellion is witchcraft, ſo this diſobedience is unchaſtity, it is uncleanneſſe againſt the fifth Commandement: and therefore it is no legal marriage, but unlawfull at firſt, and remains ſo all the way, till a legal remedy be found out. For this thing is rightly ſtated by Paulus the Lawyer: Matrimonia hæc jure non contrahi, ſed tamen contracta non ſolvi, Such marriages ought not to be made, but being made they cannot be diſſolved. And he gives an excellent reaſon for it; contemplationem enim publicæ utilitatis privatorum commodis anteferri. It is of public concern that marriages naturally valid be not reſcinded; but it is but of private emolument that the Father ſhould be pleas'd in his daughter in law: and therefore although the * Law of God and man doe their ſeveral ſhares for the ſecuring of every intereſt and concern, yet that regard which is greateſt and more public is to be preferred. Now for the underſtanding of the full effect of this, and for the verification of it, it is to be conſider'd, that laws are called Perfect, or Imperfect. A perfect law is that which either in it ſelf or by the Magiſtrate reſcinds whatſoever was done againſt her preſcript. l. Non dubium, C. de legib. The imperfect law is that which does not indeed reſcind the thing, but inflicts a puniſhment upon the tranſgreſſors: ſuch as was the lex Furia Teſtamentaria, and ſuch as is the law concerning theſe forbidden marriages againſt their Fathers will; the Marriage muſt ſtand, and the married muſt lie under the puniſhment *: they in the civil law were reckon'd as Concubines, and their Children baſtards, and there was neither dowry nor marriage allowed. And upon this account, all thoſe ſayings which I brought in the former numbers † are true: the marriages were then civilly null, that is, in eſtimation of law and to all intents and purpoſes of law were outlawed, and made uncapable of civil benefits and advantages; but the law could not make them naturally null: and in the Law of Moſes, although a maiden that had been humbled was to become the wife of him that did it, and to have her dowry accordingly, if her Father pleas'd, and he might chuſe whether he would or no; yet there is no footſtep or ſigne, that if he had betrothed himſelf to her, and lyen with her, that then ſhe was not his wife, or that her diſſenting Father could make it null. Indeed divorces were ſo eaſily granted then, that even in this caſe they had a remedy at hand: but we are tied up by ſtricter and more holy bands; and ſince Chriſt reduc'd it to the firſt inſtitution, and that it was made to repreſent the union of the Church unto him, it is not ſo eaſy to untie this knot. So much as is in the power of law, ſo much is fit to be done for the ſecuring the Fathers authority and his rights according to the intereſts of religion and the public: but the laws themſelves have a limit; and though they can verify all their own acts, yet they cannot annul the Act of God: Quæ Deus conjunxit, nemo ſeparet. Conjunction of marriages is by a law of God and Nature, and to it nothing is requir'd but a natural capacity and an explicit conſent, and therefore this no man can ſeparate. But yet,

C. cum cauſam. de rapt. extra.

17. 3. The Father hath over his children a double power; a natural power and a political. His Natural power is intire, abſolute, and unlimited, except where the Law of God or of Nations does intervene; but then it laſts but till the children are able to underſtand and chuſe, and ſhift for themſelves. For there are ſome natural and perſonal rights relating to duty, to the perpetuating tuating the kind, to defending and providing for themſelves, which are not to be taken from us, unleſſe they be as well or better ſupplied otherwhere; for ſome can, and ſome cannot. The deſires relating to marriage have in them ſo much natural neceſſity, and ſo much relation to perſonal duties, that either they muſt be in our own powers, or elſe our ſalvation muſt depend on other men. Neſcis noſtri arbitris eſſe Matrimonia? Affectus noſtri nobis non ſervunt. Non poteſt efficere Imperio ut vel amem quam velis, vel oderim. Matrimonium vere tum perpetuum eſt, ſi mutuâ voluntate jungitur. Cum ergo quæram mihi uxor, ſocia thori, vitæ conſors, in omne ſeculum mihi eligenda eſt. "My wife is to dwell with me for ever, the half of my ſelf, "my laſting joy or my laſting ſorrow, and if I doe not love her we cannot "live comfortably, and to love I cannot be commanded, for my affections "are not at my own command, much leſſe at anothers: and therefore the conduct of this belongs to my ſelfe, and to none elſe, for ſo much of the intereſt as the union and conjunction comes to; and in this I am no mans ſubject, when I am a man my ſelf. Quintilian. declam. 306.

18. But the Father hath a political power. Patria poteſtas eſt jus quoddam quod habent qui ſunt de Imperio Romano in liberos Naturales & legitimos, ſay the Lowyers. The paternal power is deſin'd by the meaſures of the Roman law; and ſo it is in all Countries by their own meaſures. Now in moſt Countries, eſpecially of old, the Father had ſo much power given to him over his children that they were a part of his poſſeſſions; they acquir'd what they did acquire for their Father, not for themſelves; they might be pawn'd, they might be ſold three times for their Fathers profit; they muſt laſt and abide under this power till they were diſmiſſed or emancipated by their Father. Now whatſoever rights were conſequent to theſe powers were ſo wholly to be diſpoſ'd of by the Fathers, that whatſoever actions of the ſons did deſtroy thoſe rights were ſo far, and in relation to thoſe rights, null and invalid. When therefore the Father had by the Civil law a power over the perſon of his ſon, ſo as to have the profit of his labours, the iſſues of his marriage, his children to ſucceed, the ſons wife to be partner of his goods and his holy rites, and to perpetuate his family, he had by the Civil law power to diſpoſe of him ſo far as concern'd theſe things, but no further. And therefore the Father had power to diſinherit the ſon that married without his Fathers leave; and all the Emperors and all the Lawyers till the time of Conſtantine did allow it: but then it felt variety and change, and it was limited to the caſe of the ſons marrying diſhonourably.

19. The reſult of theſe three Propoſitions is this, That every Commonwealth hath power to extend or to ſtrengthen the Fathers political power, & to give ſentences and judgements upon the actions that relate to ſuch power: and if the law does declare the children of marriages againſt the parents will to be baſtards, they are ſo; and the Son not to ſucceed in his Fathers eſtate, it muſt be ſo; and the marriage to be a concubinate, it muſt be accounted ſo; and the copulation to be inceſtuous, it muſt be called diſhonourable, and may be puniſhed as if it were ſo: and this muſt laſt ſo long till the ſon be by the ſame law declar'd not to be under his Fathers power as to that particular; and when it is ſo, he can then chuſe for himſelf without fraud or detriment; though even then alſo he hath upon him two bands, Reverence and Piety, from which the ſon can never be emanci-

their own burden: they are guilty of fornication, but it is not a ſin againſt the ſeventh Commandement: they have not diſhonour'd their own bodies between themſelves, but they have diſhonour'd them before all the world beſides. And as covetouſneſſe is idolatry, and rebellion is witchcraft, ſo this diſobedience is unchaſtity, it is uncleanneſſe againſt the fifth Commandement: and therefore it is no legal marriage, but unlawfull at firſt, and remains ſo all the way, till a legal remedy be found out. For this thing is rightly ſtated by Paulus the Lawyer: Matrimonia hæc jure non contrahi, ſed tamen contracta non ſolvi, Such marriages ought not to be made, but being made they cannot be diſſolved. And he gives an excellent reaſon for it; contemplationem enim publicæ utilitatis privatorum commodis anteferri. It is of public concern that marriages naturally valid be not reſcinded; but it is but of private emolument that the Father ſhould be pleas'd in his daughter in law: and therefore although the * Law of God and man doe their ſeveral ſhares for the ſecuring of every intereſt and concern, yet that regard which is greateſt and more public is to be preferred. Now for the underſtanding of the full effect of this, and for the verification of it, it is to be conſider'd, that laws are called Perfect, or Imperfect. A perfect law is that which either in it ſelf or by the Magiſtrate reſcinds whatſoever was done againſt her preſcript. l. Non dubium, C. de legib. The imperfect law is that which does not indeed reſcind the thing, but inflicts a puniſhment upon the tranſgreſſors: ſuch as was the lex Furia Teſtamentaria, and ſuch as is the law concerning theſe forbidden marriages againſt their Fathers will; the Marriage muſt ſtand, and the married muſt lie under the puniſhment *: they in the civil law were reckon'd as Concubines, and their Children baſtards, and there was neither dowry nor marriage allowed. And upon this account, all thoſe ſayings which I brought in the former numbers † are true: the marriages were then civilly null, that is, in eſtimation of law and to all intents and purpoſes of law were outlawed, and made uncapable of civil benefits and advantages; but the law could not make them naturally null: and in the Law of Moſes, although a maiden that had been humbled was to become the wife of him that did it, and to have her dowry accordingly, if her Father pleas'd, and he might chuſe whether he would or no; yet there is no footſtep or ſigne, that if he had betrothed himſelf to her, and lyen with her, that then ſhe was not his wife, or that her diſſenting Father could make it null. Indeed divorces were ſo eaſily granted then, that even in this caſe they had a remedy at hand: but we are tied up by ſtricter and more holy bands; and ſince Chriſt reduc'd it to the firſt inſtitution, and that it was made to repreſent the union of the Church unto him, it is not ſo eaſy to untie this knot. So much as is in the power of law, ſo much is fit to be done for the ſecuring the Fathers authority and his rights according to the intereſts of religion and the public: but the laws themſelves have a limit; and though they can verify all their own acts, yet they cannot annul the Act of God: Quæ Deus conjunxit, nemo ſeparet. Conjunction of marriages is by a law of God and Nature, and to it nothing is requir'd but a natural capacity and an explicit conſent, and therefore this no man can ſeparate. But yet,

17. 3. The Father hath over his children a double power; a natural power and a political. His Natural power is intire, abſolute, and unlimited, except where the Law of God or of Nations does intervene; but then it laſts but till the children are able to underſtand and chuſe, and ſhift for themſelves. For there are ſome natural and perſonal rights relating to duty, to the perpetuating

tuating the kind, to defending and providing for themſelves, which are not to be taken from us, unleſſe they be as well or better ſupplied otherwhere; for ſome can, and ſome cannot. The deſires relating to marriage have in them ſo much natural neceſſity, and ſo much relation to perſonal duties, that either they muſt be in our own powers, or elſe our ſalvation muſt depend on other men. Neſcis noſtri arbitrii eſſe Matrimonia? Affectus noſtri nobis non ſerviunt. Non potes efficere Imperio ut vel amem quam velis, vel oderim. Matrimonium vero tum perpetuum eſt, ſi mutuâ voluntate jungitur. Cum ergo quæratur mihi uxor, ſocia thori, vitæ conſors, in omne ſeculum mihi eligenda eſt. "My wife is to dwell with me for ever, the half of my ſelf, "my laſting joy or my laſting ſorrow, and if I doe not love her we cannot "live comfortably, and to love I cannot be commanded, for my affections "are not at my own command, much leſſe at anothers: and therefore the conduct of this belongs to my ſelfe, and to none elſe, for ſo much of the intereſt as the union and conjunction comes to; and in this I am no mans ſubject, when I am a man my ſelf. Quintilian. declam. 376.

18. But the Father hath a political power. Patria poteſtas eſt jus quoddam quod habent qui ſunt de Imperio Romano in liberos Naturales & legitimos, ſay the Lawyers. The paternal power is defin'd by the meaſures of the Roman law; and ſo it is in all Countries by their own meaſures. Now in moſt Countries, eſpecially of old, the Father had ſo much power given to him over his children that they were a part of his poſſeſſions; they acquir'd what they did acquire for their Father, not for themſelves; they might be pawn'd, they might be ſold three times for their Fathers profit; they muſt laſt and abide under this power till they were diſmiſſed or emancipated by their Father. Now whatſoever rights were conſequent to theſe powers were ſo wholly to be diſpos'd of by the Fathers, that whatſoever actions of the ſons did deſtroy thoſe rights were ſo far, and in relation to thoſe rights, null and invalid. When therefore the Father had by the Civil law a power over the perſon of his ſon, ſo as to have the profit of his labours, the iſſues of his marriage, his children to ſucceed, the ſons wife to be partner of his goods and his holy rites, and to perpetuate his family, he had by the Civil law power to diſpoſe of him ſo far as concern'd theſe things, but no further. And therefore the Father had power to diſinherit the ſon that married without his Fathers leave; and all the Emperors and all the Lawyers till the time of Conſtantine did allow it: but then it felt variety and change, and it was limited to the caſe of the ſons marrying diſhonourably. i. jus autem poteſtatis. Inſt. de poteſt. Patr. & l. nam in civium. & l. item in poteſtate. ff. de his qui ſunt ſui & alieni juris.

19. The reſult of theſe three Propoſitions is this, That every Commonwealth hath power to extend or to ſtreighten the Fathers political power, & to give ſentences and judgements upon the actions that relate to ſuch power: and if the law does declare the children of marriages againſt the parents will to be baſtards, they are ſo; and the Son not to ſucceed in his Fathers eſtate, it muſt be ſo; and the marriage to be a concubinate, it muſt be accounted ſo; and the conjunction to be uncleanneſſe, it muſt be called diſhonourable, and may be puniſhed as if it were ſo: and this muſt laſt ſo long till the ſon be by the ſame law declar'd not to be under his Fathers power as to that particular; and when it is ſo, he can then chuſe for himſelf without fraud or detriment; though even then alſo he hath upon him two bands, Reverence and Piety, from which the ſon can never be emancipated as long as he lives, and as long as he can be obliged to be a thankfull perſon, ever remembring what the old Sibyll ſaid, that they deſerve damnation who leave their parents in their old age, who ſpeak words againſt them, who doe not pay their thankfull duty for their alimony and education, and who refuſe to obey them, viz. according to the laws, and according to the exigence of reverence and piety which muſt be for ever.

Of exemption from the power of Fathers.

20. For by this means we ſhall the ſhorteſt and trueſt anſwer the inquiry, when a Son is free from his Fathers power, and how long he is τῆς πατρονομίας ἀνάγκαις ὑποκείμενος, as Demoſthenes his expreſſion is, ſubject to the neceſsity of the Fathers laws. I anſwer that, in thoſe things which are parts of natural power and relate to perſonal duties, the Father hath always a power of Counſel, which muſt be regarded by the ties and analogies of reverence and piety, and the reaſons of the things themſelves. But in thoſe powers which the law hath given him, he is to abide in them as long as the law permits; for in this there is no other meaſure but the law. But in theſe and all other things whatſoever, when by nature and the laws we are quit from the Empire of the Father, and that power which is called Caſtigation, or the power of command and coercion, we are ſtill tied to fear him with a reverential fear, and to obey him with the readineſſe of piety in all things where Reverence and Piety are to have regard and prevail, that is, where-ever it is poſſible and reaſonable to obey. Quæ prærogativa ex beneficentia acquiritur perpetuo durat, ſaid Ariſtotle, The authority that is acquir'd by bounty is perpetual.

in Encomio.

21. And therefore even Marriage it ſelf does not quit the children from their duty: Not onely by force of Civil laws, in which ſenſe the ſons wife was in the Fathers power as well as the ſon himſelf till he was emancipated; but I mean it in reſpect of reverence and pious regards, and natural duty, and humble obſervation. For Nomen Patris grande Myſterium eſt, & nomen Matris arcana Reverentia, ſaid Origen; there is Reverence, and there is myſtery, and all ſacredneſſe in the Names of Father and Mother; and that dignity laſts for ever. The Ancients tell that when Danaus, who had given liberty to his fifty daughters to marry according to their own liking, was compelled to give them to the fifty Grandchildren of Ægiſthus, he gave to each of them a ſword, and commanded them to kill their huſbands the firſt night before their congreſſe: and they thought themſelves, though married, oblig'd to obey their Father, and all did ſo but Hypermneſtra, who for her diſobedience was queſtion'd upon her life, and was by the equally-divided ſentences of the Judges acquitted. The like ſtory to this is told by Chalcondylas, that a daughter of a Florentine Phyſician being by the public requeſt and neceſſity of the Town given to Lantiſlaus an amorous Prince, who to get her beſieged the Town, her Father gave her a poy-

Homil. 11. in Levit.

ſon'd handkerchief which he commanded her to uſe upon the Prince; and ſhe did ſo, and upon her ſelf, and both died. Theſe indeed were exceſſes of power and obedience: but I noted them to ſhew that the ſenſe of the world is to ſuppoſe children oblig'd to their parents even when they are in the power of a husband, or in neceſſitude and conjunction with a wife. And this is extended alſo to daughters that are Widows, if they be in minority, that is under 25 years; for ſo it was in the Roman law; or, if under any other number of years which the law calls minority in any Government. Ἡλάττων τῶν εἴκοσι πέντε ἐτῶν αὐτεξουσία, μέλλουσα δ' ευπερογαμεῖν, γνώμῃ τοῦ πατρὸς γαμείσθω, If ſhe will marry again, let her marry by the conſent of her Father. In Baſilico.

22. 2. If a Son be a Magiſtrate, the Magiſtrate is exempted, but not the Son. That is, in thoſe things which concern his office and dignity the Father hath nothing to doe with him: but in things Oeconomical the Fathers power ſtands, and his perſon is capable of the ſame regards as formerly; of all the ſame, Salvo honore Magiſtratus. But yet the reverence of ſuch a Son to a Father ought to be no otherwiſe exacted then by the meaſures of prudence and cuſtome, and the common uſages of the place. When Fabius Maximus came to his Son who was then Conſul, and ſate upon his horſe, otherwiſe then he ought, his Son ſent the Lictors to him to call him to deſcend and come to him: and the old Man gladly obeyed, and told him, Non ego Imperium tuum, mi Fili, contempſi, I did not deſpiſe thy authority, but I tried if you knew how to be a Conſul: nec ignoro quid Patriæ veneratione debeatur; verum publica inſtituta privatâ pietate potiora judico, I know what veneration is due to a Father; but the private regard muſt give place to the public laws. And yet even in things of public nature, if a Father be wiſe, his Counſel ought to have ſome force beſides the reaſon. When the Tribunes of the people, who ſometime had Conſular dignity, contended which of them ſhould goe to the Warre againſt the Lavicani (for they all would fain have gone, but none would ſtay at home to take care of the city) Quintus Servilius commanded his Son to ſtay, and doe his duty at home; and he did ſo, for it was for the public intereſt that one ſhould, and the power of his Father determin'd him when they all refus'd at firſt. Vale. Max. l. 2. c. 2.

23. 3. If a Son enters into holy Orders, it does not quit him from his duty and obedience to his Father, unleſſe the law declare it ſo; that is, in ſuch things wherein the Fathers political power did conſiſt. And we find in that collection of Canons which is called Apoſtolical, it is decreed that if a ſervant take on him holy Orders againſt the will of his lord, there was a redhibition allowed; he was to return to his ſervice, till he was freed by his lord. The caſe is the ſame in Princes and in Fathers. Cap. 81.

There are four little Queres more for the finiſhing this Rule; the anſwers to which will be ſhort, becauſe they depend upon the former diſcourſes.

24. 1. Whether if the Grandfather be alive, and the Son be in his power, it be ſufficient to legitimate the marriage of the Nephew if the Grandfather conſent, though the Father be not ask'd.

25. To this the Lawyers anſwer with a diſtinction: If the Nephew marry a wife, the conſent of the Son muſt be ask'd; but if the Niece marry, l. oratione 16. §. 1. ff. de ritu nuptiar. l. 3. D. eod.

ry, the conſent of the Grandfather is ſufficient: and ſo it is if the Nephew marry in the ſame family, that is, the Niece by another ſon. The reaſon of the laſt is, becauſe the Fathers are ſuppos'd willing to doe advantage to their own family, and therefore it may be ſufficient that he who is in actual poſſeſſion of the Government ſhould explicitly conſent, and the other implicitely. But why to the marriage of the Niece the Grandfathers conſent ſhould be enough, but to the Nephew's marriage the Fathers conſent alſo be requir'd, the reaſon that is pretended is onely this, Becauſe no man ought to have his heir provided for him againſt his will, of which there is no danger in the marriage of a daughter. But in ſhort, though this was thus in the Civil law of the Romans, and was no more reaſonable then we ſee; yet now that it is a caſe of Conſcience I am to anſwer otherwiſe. For it is againſt Natural and Divine reaſon and laws that the Father ſhould in either of the caſes be neglected, who ought rather to be preferred, as he that is moſt and longeſt like to be concerned in the good and evil of the marriage.

26. 2. Whether if the parents have conſented and authoris'd the treaty of marriage till the affections of the children are irrevocably ingag'd, and afterwards retract that conſent, the children are bound to obey their parents, and quit their loves.

27. de clandeſt. Matrim. impreſſ. Pariſ. 1556. This I find in an elegant caſe related by Gentian Hervet in his oration to the Council. Damoiſelle Vitrou was eſpouſed to a Cavalier by her parents; but when he would have married her and carried her home to his friends, her parents, I know not upon what account, chang'd their minds and refus'd to let her goe. But the Souldier carries her away by force and marries her and lies with her, but us'd her ill; of which ſhe being quickly weary, flies into a Monaſtery; and that ſhe might not be drawn thence and forc'd to return under her bondage, ſhe pretends that he was not her husband by law, becauſe he forc'd her from her Fathers houſe againſt the will of her parents. To this it was anſwered in behalf of the husband, that ſhe who was eſpouſed legally, might be carried away by the ſpouſe lawfully, according to that of Gregory, and Euſebius, Si quis virginem aut viduam furatus fuerit, niſi fuerit à ſe deſponſata, anathema ſit. If ſhe was not eſpouſed, it is Plagium & raptus, a rape and ſtealth; but if ſhe was, it was no fraud to him. Now if this was no raviſhment, as it is plain, becauſe ſhe was eſpouſed, and ſhe was willing, though her parents were not, then ſhe was his wife, ſaies the Law; and if ſo, then the revocation or diſſent of the Father hindred not but that ſhe might proceed thither where ſhe was ingag'd. Now this caſe went farre indeed: But if it be not gone ſo farre, yet if it be gone thither from whence they cannot honeſtly or decently recede, the Fathers diſſent ought not to be a prejudice to the conſummation: for it began from an honeſt and a competent cauſe, it was a fire kindled from the Sun, and it proceeds to that which is honeſt in it ſelf; and therefore there is no evil done. But if the parties are unengag'd, or be indifferent, or can well retire, the firſt liberty did not let them looſe from duty, but that they are to abide there where they were, unleſſe (I ſay) by that firſt leave they are paſs'd beyond a fair return. For the affections and the great content of children is not to be plaid with, as with a tennis-ball; and it is in this as in his children, if he have begotten the affection unto life, he muſt maintain it at his own charge.

3. Whether

28. 3. Whether Mothers have the ſame authority over their children as the Fathers have.

To this I anſwer, that in the Civil law ſons were not in their Mothers power, but in their Fathers: Appellare de nuptiis debui Patrem; and Euſtathius upon Homer, Χρήσιμον ἦ ἐις τέλημα πατρικὸν ὅτι γάμῳ τὲ, ὡς αὐτὸς ἐέδνωσαιτο θυγατέρα. He that gives the dowry, it is fit that by his will the marriage be contracted. This is well enough, that the Father ſhould doe it: but it becomes the piety of children to endeavour that their Mother be pleaſed; for to her alſo there is the ſame natural relation, obligation and minority, and in all things they are equal, abating the privilege of the ſex; and therefore though the ſame duty is owing to them both, yet their authority is ſeverally expreſs'd, which to my ſenſe is well intimated by Euſtathius: ἐκ ἐξουσία πατρὸς, ἐ μητρὸς πειθὼ, ἀδ' εἰ τὴν Ἀφροδίτην ἀγάγωνται, Not the power of my Father, nor the perſuaſion of my Mother, ſhould make me marry even Venus her ſelf. Where the Mother is allowed onely the power of perſuaſion. But that alſo implies all her power, onely that is the moſt proper way for her exerciſe of it. And it is the moſt forcible. Fuſſum erat, quodque eſt potentiſſimum Imperandi genus, rogabat, qui jubere poterat, ſaid Auſonius. Οἷς γὰ ἂν ἐξῇ πράττειν ὅ, τι ἂν ἐθέλωσι σὺν βίᾳ, ὅπου δεόμενοι δυσωπεῖν, καὶ πείθειν ἀρχοῦσιν, ſaid Julian the Emperor. For they that can if they pleaſe compel, ought moſt of all to prevail when they counſel and intreat. But however things were in the law of the Romans, yet by the laws of nature Mothers, who have ſo great an affection to their children, and ſo great an intereſt in the good and evil reſpectively of their Son in law's or their Daughters manners, muſt with duty & tenderneſſe be regarded like the Fathers. Ὁ δὲ τὸν τῆ φύσεως νόμον ἐποιεῖτο θεραπεύων τὸ πρέπον Θεοβουλῷ, καὶ τὸν ἀνεπίληπτον τῇ μητρὶ γάμον Ῥεβέκκαν προσέταξε τῷ υἱῷ, ſaid S. Cyril of Alexandria: Conſonantly to the law of Nature he commanded his ſon to abſtain from ſuch marriages as were diſpleaſing to his Mother. Iſaac did ſo to Jacob. And to this purpoſe Catullus elegantly preſſes this obligation.

At tu ne pugna cum tali conjuge, virgo.

Virginitas non tota tua eſt: ex parte parentum eſt.
Tertia pars Matri data, pars data tertia Patri,
Tertia ſola tua eſt.——

Her Father and her Mother and her ſelf had in her ſelf equal ſhare.

29. But if the Father be dead, then the queſtion is greater, becauſe if the Mother have any power, ſhe hath it alone: when her Husband liv'd ſhe had power as the Moon hath light by the aſpect of the Sun; but now that her light is extinguiſh'd, hath ſhe any natural and proper power of her own? To this S. Auſtin anſwers clearly, Fortaſſis enim quæ nunc non apparet, apparebit & Mater, cujus voluntatem in tradenda filia omnibus ut arbitror Natura præponit: niſi eadem puella in ea jam ætate fuerit, ut jure licentiore ſibi eligat ipſa quod velit. From which words of S. Auſtin it is plain, that in the diſpoſing of her daughter in marriage by the voice of Nature the Mother hath a power; and this is rather, and more, and longer then in the diſpoſal of her ſon. The reaſon of both is the ſame, becauſe by the advantage of the ſex and breeding, the ſon will be fit to govern in the family; and at the ſame time the daughter hath the weakneſſes of feminine ſpirit upon upon her as much as the Mother, and more by reaſon of her tender age and want of experience. To which may be added, that if the Father be dead, the eſtate is deſcended upon the Son, and then he is put by law under the power of Tutors and Guardians, and then is to marry, εἰ ἐπλούτησεν ὁ πατὴρ, γνώμῃ τῶν συγγενῶν, ſaies the law, by the conſent of his Kindred and Guardians; that is, if he be not come to maturity: but if he be, the rule is, Filius quidem pubes nullius expectat arbitrium, filia verò Matris & propinquorum, A ſon that is of a marriageable age if his Father be dead is wholly in his own power, but a daughter is under the power of her Mother. And yet this alſo laſts no longer but to a certain age, which is determin'd by the laws of every Nation reſpectively. And yet both the Son and the Daughter are to ſhew piety to their Mother, and not to grieve her. Pulchre Deo obtemperat qui triſtis eſt Parenti, for he does ill ſerve God, that brings ſorrow to his parent. And therefore the Ancient laws of the Romans were ever favourable to that part of the marriage which the Mother choſe. Poſtulatu andito Matris Tutorumque, Magiſtratus ſecundum parentis arbitrium dant jus Nuptiarum, ſaies Livy. But the Wiſigoths by their law were more kind to the Mothers intereſt, for Patre mortuo utriuſque ſexus filiorum conjunctio in Matris poteſtate conſiſtat; Both ſon and daughter if their Father was dead were in the power of their Mother, and were to marry by her appointment and counſel. And therefore Simeon Metaphraſtes commends Abraham for taking a wife at the command of his parents, μίαν τῶν ἐντολῶν ἡγούμενος τοῦτο εἰδώς, τῷ πατρὶ καὶ μητρὶ πείθεσθαι, as knowing it to be one of the Divine Commandements to obey his Father and his Mother. But theſe things were varied by laws and particular conſiderations. That which is of univerſal truth is this onely, That in their natural minority children are equally under the power of their Mother, as of their Father when he was alive; but when they can chuſe, they are ſooner quit from the Caſtigation or legal coercitive powers of their Mother, then of their Father if he had liv'd. And this relies upon the practice and conſent of all the world, and hath this reaſon, becauſe women are not by laws ſuppos'd very fit to govern laſting intereſts. But laſtly, they are never quit from their reverence and duty, piety and greateſt and kindeſt regards: but the Mothers diſſenting does not annul the marriage of her ſons that are of age; and it is ſo far from that, that their not complying with their Mother in this affair is onely then a ſin when it is done with unregarding circumſtances, or hath not in it a great weight of reaſon. But every child ſhould doe well to remember their obligation to their Mothers; and as S. Chryſoſtom ſaid in his own caſe, when he had a mind to enter into a Monaſtery his Mother recalled him, or rather the voice of God crying, Fili colito Anthuſam, Son remember thy Mother Anthuſa, and grieve her not as long as ſhe lives. For Nomen Matris, arcana reverentia, There is a ſecret veneration due to the very Name of a Mother.

30. 4. Although a Fathers authority is ſuch that againſt it a Son may not marry; yet whether or no is the power of the parents ſuch that they can compel a ſon or a daughter to marry whom or when they will?

31. To this I anſwer, that in the matters of marriage eſpecially, and proportionably to the probable event of things in other laſting ſtates of life, that of Ariſtotle is very true, Ἡ μὲν οὖν παρικὴ πεῖσαξις οὐκ ἔχει τὸ ἰσχυὸν οὐδὲ τὸ ἀναγκαῖον, The Fathers authority hath in it no neceſsity, no conſtraint

Which

Which Heliodorus Pruſæenſis thus paraphraſes, The commandements of Fathers to their children τοῖς ἰσχνοῖς οὐχ οὕτω μεγάλως ἔχειν ὥστε βιάζεσθαι, have not in them ſuch force that they can compel their children. And therefore Pamphilus in the Comedy complains paſſionately, and yet reaſonably, > Proh Deûm atque hominum fidem! quid eſt, ſi non hæc contumelia'ſt? Andria, Act. 1. Scen. 5.

> Uxorem decrêrat ſeſe dare mihi hodie: nonne oportuit
> Præſciſſe me ante? nonne priùs communicatum oportuit?

Upon which place Donatus ſaid well, quia nuptiarum non omnis poteſtas in Patre eſt, All the intire power of marriages is not in the Fathers. It may not be done againſt their wills, but neither is their will alone ſufficient. The Fathers have a negative, but the children muſt alſo like. Conſtat enim circa nuptias eſſe filiis liberam voluntatem: ideo ſervatâ ratione pietatis communicatum oportuit, ſaid Eugraphius. For it is certain they have the power of choice, and therefore in piety the Father ought to have acquainted the Son with it. And the ſame alſo is the caſe of the daughter, ſhe is not to be forc'd to marry againſt her inclination and affections. Euſtathius upon that of Homer, ᾧ πατὴρ κέλεται, καὶ ἀνδάνει αὐτῇ, ſaies πρὸς ἀκρίβειαν ἐρρέθη πολιτικῶν, it was ſpoken according to the exacteſt political meaſures, that the Father ſhould chuſe an husband for his daughter Penelope, and yet that his daughter ſhould like the yong Prince Ulyſſes; ὁ γὰρ δυλικῶς ὁ πατὴρ τῇ θυγατρὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα κελεύσει, ἀλλ' αἱρήσεται καὶ αὐτή. For there is difference between a ſervant and a child; the Father may chuſe for his daughter, ſo that at the ſame time ſhe may chuſe for her ſelf: and therefore (ſaies he) when Homer ſaid δοίη δ' ᾧ κ' ἐθέλῃ, he ſaies it in reſpect of the Father, that he may give her to whom he pleaſe; but when he ſaies καὶ ὅς κεν τῇ Πηνελόπῃ χαρίεσσα δόξαι, he ſaies it in reſpect of the Daughter, that the man whom the Father chuſes muſt be gracious in her eyes: ἐναργὲς παρὰ Ρωμαίοις ἄκυρον γυναῖκα κατηγυᾶσθαι ἀνδρί, ſaid Priſcus, It is impious to marry a daughter againſt her will. ad 'Οδυσ. β. in Eclogis legationum.

32. But this is to be underſtood with ſome reſtraint. For if a Father may chuſe, and the daughter may chuſe too, how if it happens that they fancy ſeveral perſons? ſhall the Fathers authority, or the daughters liking prevail? both cannot prevail at once: but the queſtion is, which ſhall, and when, and how long, or in what caſes. To this I anſwer that if the matter be indifferent, or the perſon be fit, the Father ought to prevail. Patris quippe juſſa non potuiſſe filium detrectare, A ſon may not refuſe his Fathers commandement. For the Fathers authority is certainly a very great thing; ἄρχων ὁ πατὴρ ἐστι τῷ παιδὶ καὶ δεσπότης ἐξ αὐτῆς τῆς φύσεως, A Father is by Nature to his child both a Lord and a Prince: and therefore Theophilus calls the Paternal power ἀρχὴν ἐξουσίαν, which is the title of the Royal Majeſty: and though the old name for diſobedience in the Scripture is Witchcraft, yet Ennodius would fain have found a new name for this kind of it. Non invenio quâ novum facinoris genus explicem novitate ſermonum, quibus fuit Sacrilegium non parere. It is Sacrilege at leaſt not to obey our parents. Now although this be ſpoken generally and indefinitely, yet it muſt have it's effect in ſuch commandements which have no great reaſon againſt them: and therefore if a Father offers a wife to a ſon, or a husband to a daughter, ſuch as a wiſe or a good man may offer without folly and injury, the child is not to diſpute at all, but to obey, if the Father urges and inſiſts upon the precept. Tacit. Annal. 3. Manuel Palæolog. orat. 7. ad §. 1. de his qui ſui vel alien. jur. Decam. 10.

But

33. But there are ſome caſes in which the Father ought not to urge the children. 1. If the children be not capable or able for marriage, if it be deſtructive of their health, or againſt his nature; and this excuſe was allowed amongſt the Romans even where the Paternal power was at the higheſt. Solent qui coguntur à Patribus ut Uxores ducant, illa dicere, Non ſumus etiam nunc apti nuptiis. It is not fit to require them to marry that hate, or are unable to doe the offices of that ſtate. 2. If the Father offer to his child a diſhoneſt or filthy perſon, unequal, or unfit; that is, when it is notoriouſly or ſcandalouſly ſo: when the perſon is intolerably and irreconcileably diſpleaſing, then the command is tyranny. The Son is bound to obey his Father commanding him to marry; Sed enim ſi imperet uxorem ducere infamem, propudioſam, criminoſam, non ſcilicet parendum, ſaid A. Gellius; But not if he offers to his child an infamous, a diſhoneſt perſon. And ſo the law provides in behalf of the daughter, that ſhe ought not to be compelled to marry an infamous man; l. ſed quæ Patris, ff. de Sponſal. and ſo Harmenopulus renders it, πότε ὃ μόνον ἀντιλέγειν δύναται [ὑπεξουσία *] ὅτε τοῖς τρόποις ἀνάξιον καὶ αἰσχρὸν ἀυτῇ μνηστεύεται, She that is under her Fathers power can then onely refuſe her Fathers command, when he chuſes for her a man that is unworthy in his manners, and a filthy perſon: and indeed in this caſe ſhe hath leave to refuſe the moſt Imperious command of an angry Father. Son and daughter in this have equal right: οὐδὲ νῦν γεγαμηκεν, ἀλλὰ καταναγκαζόμενος καὶ βιαζόμενος ἠρνήσατο: ſo Lucian. Though his Father would have compell'd and forc'd him to marry a wife, yet he refus'd it: and he might lawfully, when he offer'd him a ſtrumpet.

34. But there is another ſort of perſons which are called Turpes filthy or hatefull; and that is, ſuch as are deformed and intolerably ugly. Μόνους γοῦν τοὺς μὴ καλοὺς ὀνομάζομεν αἰσχρούς, ſaith Lucian, We call them filthy that are not fair or comely. But in this ſenſe, if the Father offers a husband to his daughter, ſhe hath not liberty to diſſent, but onely to petition for liberty: for beauty is not the praiſe of a man, and he may be a worthy perſon, though of an ill ſhape, and his wit and manners may be better then his countenance. And there is no exception in this, but that if the daughter hath us'd all means ſhe can to endure him, and cannot obtain it, ſhe can onely then refuſe when ſhe can be ſure that with him ſhe can never doe her duty; of which becauſe ſhe cannot be ſure beforehand, becauſe his worthineſſe may overcome the aire and follies of her fancy, therefore the unhandſomeneſſe of a man is not alone a ſufficient cauſe for a daughter to refuſe her Fathers earneſt commands. But yet in this caſe though a Father have authority, yet a good Father will never uſe it, when it is very much againſt his Daughter, unleſſe it be alſo very much more for her good. But a Son hath in this ſome more liberty, becauſe he is to be the head of a family, and he is more eaſily tempted, and can ſooner be drawn aſide to wander, and beauty or comelineſſe is the proper praiſe of a woman; comelineſſe and good humor, forma uxoria, and a meek and quiet ſpirit are her beſt dreſſings, and all that ſhe can be good for in her ſelf; and therefore the uglineſſe of a woman will ſooner paſſe into an incapacity of perſon, then it can doe in a man. But in theſe caſes, as children ſhould not be too forward to diſpute the limits of their Fathers power, leſt they miſtake their own leave or their Fathers authority; ſo Fathers alſo ſhould remember what the Lawyers ſay, Patria poteſtas in pietate debet, non in atrocitate conſiſtere, The Fathers power conſiſts not in the ſurlieſt part of Empire, but in the ſunſhine ſide, in the gentleſt and warmeſt part. Quis enim non magis filiorum ſalutem quam ſuam curat? ſaith Tertullian. He is an ill Father that will not take more care for the good of his child, then his own humor. l. D. Adrianus. ff. ad legem Pompeian. de parric. Adverſ. Marcion.

35. The like is to be ſaid in caſe the Father offers to his child a perſon of a condition much inferior. For though this difference is introduc'd principally by pride and vanity in all the laſt ages of the world, and Nobility is not the reward of vertue, but the adornment of fortune, or the effect of Princes humors, unleſſe it be in ſome rare caſes; yet now that it is in the humors and manners of men, it is to be regarded, and a Diamond is really of ſo much value as men will give for it: and therefore a ſon or daughter may juſtly refuſe to marry a perſon whoſe conjunction will be very diſhonourable and ſhamefull: but at little differences children muſt not ſtart. If the Nobility marries into the family of a Merchant, the difference is not ſo great, but that portion makes up the want of great extraction. For a huſband or a wife may be γενναῖος ἐκ βαλαντίου, Noble by their wealth, ſo the Greek proverb means: and old Ennius tranſlating of Euripides his Hecuba, makes wealth to be Nobility, Hæc ita etſi perversè dicas, facile Achivos flexeris.

Nam cum opulenti loquuntur pariter atque ignobiles, Eadem dicta, eademque oratio æqua, non æque valet.

apud A. Gell. lib. 11. c. 4.

When the rich and the ignoble ſpeak the ſame things, the rich man ſhall prevail when the ignoble ſhall not.

——κεῖνο δ' ἰσχύει μέγα
Πλοῦτος, λαβών τι τοῦτον εὐγλωσσὸς ἀνήρ.

Eurip. in Archelao.

Wealth makes nobility. And therefore in ſuch caſes, if the ſons or daughters refuſe the command of their Father, it is to be accounted rebellion and diſobedience. But this whole inquiry is well ſumm'd up in thoſe excellent words of Heliodorus, Εἰ μὲν γὰρ ἔδει τὸ τῆς ἀρχῆς ἀποχρήσασθαι νόμῳ, πάντως ἐξήρκει μοι τὸ βούλεσθαι. Βιάζεσθαι γὰρ οἷς ἔξον, τὸ πωδάνεσθαι ἄμεινον. Εἰ δὲ γάμος τὸ γινόμενον, τὸ παρ' ἀμφοτέρων βούλημα σωνδύειν ἀναγκαῖον. If the Fathers will uſe the utmoſt power of law, it is enough for them to ſay, It is their will. And it is to no purpoſe to ask, where they have power to compel. But when there is a marriage to be contracted, it is fit that they both conſent.

There are ſome inquiries relating to the title of this Chapter, which would be ſeaſonable enough here to be conſidered, concerning the powers of Husbands over their Wives: But becauſe the Matrimonial queſtions and caſes of Conſcience are very Material and very Numerous, and of all things have been moſt injur'd by evil and imperfect principles and worſe conduct; I thought it better to leave this to fall into the heap of Matrimonial caſes, which I deſign in a book by it ſelf, if God ſhall give me opportunity, and fit me with circumſtances accordingly.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Interpretation, Diminution and Abrogation of Humane lawes.

THERE are ſeven ways of the changing of humane laws ſo, that the obligation of Conſcience is alſo changed: 1. Equity, 2. Judicial interpretation, 3. A contrary, or a ceaſing reaſon, 4. Diſpenſation, 5. Commutation, 6. Contrary Cuſtome, 7. Direct revocation or abrogation. Of theſe I am to give account in this Chapter, that the Conſcience having already ſeen her obligation, may alſo diſcern when ſhe enters into liberty.

§. 1. Of Equity.

Rule I.

When the letter of the law is burdenſome and unjuſt, the meaning and charity of the law does onely oblige the Conſcience.

1. Scire leges non eſt verba earum tenere, ſed vim ac poteſtatem; quia prior atque potentior eſt quam vox mens dicentis, ſay the Lawyers, The mind of the law-giver is more to be regarded then his words. For words change, and things change; and our expreſſions ſometimes the more literal they are, the more obſcure they are, becauſe there are more words then things, and the circumſtances and appendages are the beſt commentary.

Leges perquam egregia res ſunt; ſed is qui legibus utitur
Nimium exacte, videtur eſſe Sycophanta, ſaid Menander.

It is not the office of a Judge or Prince, but of a Sycophant, to be exact in the uſe of his laws: but there is abatement and allay to the words by the purpoſe of him that ſpake them. For Nullam rem neque legibus, neque ſcripturâ ullâ, denique ne in ſermone quidem quotidiano atque Imperiis domeſticis recte poſſe adminiſtrari, ſi unuſquiſque velit verba ſpectare, & non ad voluntatem ejus qui verba habuerit accedere, For nothing can be rightly adminiſtred either in lawes, or common talk, in public or domeſtic Governments, if we regard the words more then the mind of him that ſpake them. There are ſome tacite exceptions in all laws that would not be tyrannical. Quædam etiamſi nulla ſignificatione legis comprehenſa ſint, naturâ tamen excipiuntur, ſaith Quintilian; Natural reaſon excepts ſome things which are not excepted in the law. And it was counted a fierce and cruel piece of importune juſtice in Baſilius Macedo the Emperor: when a ſtagge faſtned faſtned his horn in the Princes belt and toſs'd him up with very much danger, one of his guard with a faucheon cut the Princes girdle and reſcued him from his ſad calamity; but he caus'd the poor man to be put to death, becauſe by the law it was capital to draw a ſword upon the Prince. The law could never intend to make it death to ſave the Princes life. Here was a neceſſity in this caſe; and if it had been like a fault, yet here it had been excuſable; for neceſſity excuſes whatever it compels to.

2. Now this happens in the matter of penal laws principally; for thoſe equities which are alleviations of duty, I ſhall conſider under the other heads: but in penalties it is not onely the charity but the juſtice of the law, that the ſubject ſhould neither be ſhared by an unwary or obſcure letter, nor oppreſs'd by an unequal puniſhment.

Quid triſtes querimoniæ,
Si non ſupplicio culpa reciditur? Horat. l. 3. od. 24.

Laws intend not to cut away the life or to pare away the goods of the ſubject, but to cut off his crimes, to reſtrain him from that which the law would not have him to doe. This in propriety of ſpeaking is juſtice: but equity although it ſignifies all that reaſonableneſſe by which the burden of laws is alleviated, and ſo will comprehend the ſix firſt heads; yet here I mean it in the particular ſenſe, that is, the eaſing of puniſhments, and the giving gentle ſentences; not by remiſſion of what is juſtly incurred, for that is Clemency, but by declaring the delated perſon not to be involved in the curſe of the law, or not ſo deeply; not to puniſh any man more then the law compells us; that's equity. And to this many rules in the law doe miniſter.

3. 1. Non debet aliquis conſiderare verba, ſed voluntatem, cum non intentio verbis, ſed verba intentioni debeant deſervire, ſaid the law. Which is thus to be underſtood; not that we are blindly to aime at ſome ſecret purpoſe of the law-giver, for the intention of man is to be judg'd by his words, and not the words by his intention. But the meaning is, that if ſome words be obſcure, they are to be made intelligible by others. Incivile enim eſſe niſi totâ lege perſpectâ unâ aliquâ ejus particulâ propoſitâ judicare, ſaies the law. We muſt in diſcerning the ſenſe of the law take in all together, the antecedents and the conſequences; and if darkneſſe be over all the face of the law, then the intention is to be judg'd by circumſtances, by the matter and the occaſion, by the ſtory and by uſe. Intelligentia dictorum ex cauſis dicendi aſſumenda eſt, ſaid S. Hilary. By the cauſes of the law we may judge of the intention of the law-giver. Cap. in his. de verb. ſignif. l. 4. ff. de legib. lib. 4. de Trinit.

4. 2. When the firſt ſenſe of the words inferres any abſurdity, contradiction, injuſtice, or unreaſonableneſſe, the mind of the law-giver is to be ſuppos'd to be otherwiſe, and the words are not to be adhered unto. In ambigua voce legis ea potius accipienda eſt ſignificatio quæ vitio caret, præſertim cum voluntas legis ex hoc colligi poſſit. The laws are ſuppos'd to be good, and therefore no evil can come from them, and if there does, that was not their mind; for, as Cicero ſaid rarely well, Verba reperta ſunt, non quæ impedirent, ſed quæ indicarent voluntatem, Words were not invented to obſcure, but to declare the will, and therefore not the words but the will is to prevail; for if we could otherwiſe certainly and eaſily underſtand the Princes l. 19. ff. de legibus. Orat. pro Cæcin.

will, we ſhould never uſe words. When Leo Iſaurus was in expectation of the Greek Empire, he dealt with two Aſtrologers that were Jews: they promis'd that the ſumme of affairs would fall into his hands, and he promiſed them to grant them any one petition they ſhould ask. When he had obtained his deſires, they deſir'd him that all the images of Saints might be demoliſhed: he granted their requeſt, but put them to death who put it in execution. This was againſt that mind of the promiſe which the Prince had or ought to have had, and he did not keep his promiſe though he kept his word; for it is not to be ſuppoſed that he promis'd or intended to reward them with a miſchief. So it is in laws, if an evil be conſequent to the obſervation of the letter, the intention is then wholly to be regarded; for fraudem legi facit, qui ſalvis verbis legis, mentem ejus circumvenit, ſaith the law, The law is then abus'd, when you keep the words of the law and prevaricate in the ſenſe and meaning.

5. 3. If the intention be gathered by circumſtances, by comparing of laws, by the matter and by appendages, and yet but obſcurely, the obſcure words are rather to be choſen then the obſcure intention. The reaſon is, becauſe words are the firſt and principal ſigne of the intention, and therefore ever to be preferred, and we are to ſeek no other, but when by accident theſe are hindred to ſignify: when the intention and the words doe differ, by what means ſoever the intention can rightly be found out, that muſt be ſtood to. Ex lege eſſe tam quod eſt ex ſententia legis, quam quod ex verbis; for that is law which is ſignified by the words, or by the cauſes and matter and circumſtances. But when in reſpect of the obſcurity on all hands the caſe is indifferent, we muſt ſtand to the words; for there is equity in that, that what is firſt in every kind, ſhould be preferr'd and be the meaſure of the reſt.

l. Nominis. ff. de verb. ſignif.

6. 4. Adde to this, that unleſſe it be manifeſt that the words doe not repreſent the intention of the law-giver, the conſcience of the ſubject is to obey the words of the law: ſo the law it ſelf ſaies expreſſely, Non aliter à ſignificatione verborum ejus recedi, quam cum manifeſtum eſt aliud ipſum ſenſiſſe. For if this rule were not our meaſure, every witty Advocate might turn laws to what purpoſe he pleaſe, and every ſubject would take liberty to ſerve his Prince not by the Princes law, but by his own gloſſes; and then our Conſcience could have no meaſure of duty, and therefore no ground of peace.

l. non aliter. ff. de legat.

7. 5. When there is and ought to be a little deflexion from the natural or Grammatical ſenſe, and this deflexion is evident and perceiv'd, we muſt ſtand to that ſenſe without any further deflexion, as ſtrictly as to the firſt natural ſenſe. That is, when a word in law ſignifies many things by proportion and analogy, but one is the principal, we muſt ſtand to that principal. As if a law ſaies, He that ſteals a Chalice from a Church, let him die the death; the word death muſt ſignify naturally, for the ſeparation of ſoul and body. But if by any other indication it appear not to ſignify in the firſt natural ſenſe, then it muſt ſignify in that ſenſe that ſtands next to it; it muſt ſtand, as the Logicians ſay, pro famoſiori analogato, and therefore muſt ſignify a Civil death, that is, baniſhment, or the diminution of his head by loſſe of liberty, according to the uſage of the laws. And when it is ſaid, The ſon muſt inherit, it is meant, not the natural but the legitimate;

or if not this, yet not the adopted but the natural, not the yongeſt but the eldeſt.

8. 6. If words us'd in law have a civil ſignification, by parity, by extenſion, by fiction of law, it is then to be followed and choſen, and the natural to be left, when the circumſtances, the matter and the appendages doe enforce it, elſe not: but yet the legal ſenſe of a word though it prevails not againſt the natural, yet it muſt prevail in the common ſenſe of law, againſt the ſenſe of privilege and exception. Among the Romans they who had three children had a right not to be ſent to the warres. But if by the common uſe and ſignification of the law, the word [children] had ſignified Nephews, or adopted children, although this ſenſe could not have prejudic'd the firſt and natural ſenſe of the word; yet when the Emperor gave the ſame privilege to them that had children in no ſenſe, but to ſuch as made three books, children of the brain, the ſecond ſenſe could not prevail againſt the firſt, yet it might againſt the laſt.

9. 7. Words that are of civil or legal ſignification muſt not ſignify according to Grammar, but according to Law. Suſpenſion muſt not ſignify hanging of the man, but a temporary laying aſide his office or emolument: and Sacrament muſt not in Theology ſignify an oath, but a religious ceremony of Chriſts inſtitution. For whatſoever is a word of art muſt be underſtood by the meaſures of that art; and therefore if it be a law-term, though that word be us'd alſo in common among the people, yet not this ſenſe but that is to be followed in the underſtanding of the law *. But if the law hath no propriety of uſe or interpretation in the word, but takes it up from the common uſages of the Country, not the beſt lawyers, but the beſt Maſters of language are the beſt interpreters. To which this is to be added, that if a word in law be taken from the common uſe, and this uſe change, and the law abide, the word in the law muſt abide the ſame as does the law, and muſt not change with the common uſe: and in this caſe, not the beſt Lawyers, nor the beſt Grammarians, but the beſt Hiſtorians are the beſt meaſures of our Conſcience. The word Cenſeo in the law of the Romans at firſt did ſignify to appoint, afterwards to eſtimate, and then to cenſure, and at laſt to counſel or to ſuppoſe. Now when the word cenſere is uſed l. ult. ff. de ſuis & legit. hæred. it muſt not be expounded by Cicero in his oration pro Cluentio, where it ſtands for liquet, for in this law it ſtands for conſulere: and therefore in ſuch caſes we are to inquire what the word ſignified when the law was made, for the word in the old uſe is not the meaſure of the preſent uſe; neither if it were clear what it meant in the ancient laws, could that be the meaſure of expounding contracts or humane acts or obligations at preſent; nor yet can that word in that old law receive an interpretation by the difference which it hath got by time.

10. But it may be ſome of theſe rules will be but ſeldome uſefull to our caſes of conſcience; poſſibly they may often: but then to reduce theſe things to the intentions of the preſent Rule, and to become a meaſure of practice, there are three great rules which are the beſt and moſt general meaſures of finding out the meaning of the words of laws in order to equity and conſcience, when the Grammar or the common uſe of the words themſelves is not ſufficient.

11. 1. That is the meaning of the words of the law that does the work of the law. And this is the firſt rule of equity. For it is but conſcience to ſuppoſe that he that makes a contract does it bonâ fide, and he that makes a Will would have it executed, and he that leaves a Legacy would have it doe good, & he that appoints a guardian would have one that ſhould be fit for the imployment, that the thing in hand may not periſh and come to nothing. And therefore Braſidas did cavil, not treat like a Prince, when having agreed with the Greeks that he would quit his claim to the Bœotian fields, he afterwards told them that thoſe were not the Bœotian fields but his own where he encamp'd his army. Which thing if it had been true, they all had treated about nothing. And when the laws of Sicily forbad their prieſts to reſign their Benefices to their ſons, the two prieſts of Panormo that agreed together interchangeably to reſign their's to the ſon of each other, did keep the words of the Canon well enough; but they took a courſe that the law ſhould not acquire it's end, and therefore they ſinn'd againſt it's meaning. And this Rule is of great uſe in all doubtfull and amphibological expreſſions, according to that rule in the law, Quoties idem ſermo duas ſententias exprimit, ea potiſſimum excipiatur quæ rei gerendæ aptior eſt. Thus in the diſcerning contracts and other entercourſes, the ſubſtance of the thing and the preſent imployment is more to be conſidered then any improper or æquivocal expreſſion, or quirk in the words of the law or entercourſe. Antonio Caſulano a poor Piemontane having a ſad vintage & harveſt one year by reaſon of the early rains running from the hills before he had gather'd his fruits, comes and complains to his landlord Signior Vitaldo, and tells him his ſad condition, and how unable he was to pay his rent. Vitaldo pitying his poor tenant, told him he would never exact any thing of his tenants that were ruin'd by the hand of heaven, and therefore for his rent he bid him be at reſt and let it alone. Caſulano makes his leg and thanks his lord, and goes home. But the next year he had ſo brave a harveſt and ſo full a vintage, that it was greater then two years before. He comes and brings this years rent: but Vitaldo asks him where was the rent of the former year. The tenant ſaies it was forgiven him. Here then is the queſtion, what was meant by, let it alone, and he would not exact his rent of his diſabled tenants; that is, while they were not able he would forbear them: for there all the entercouſe was about forbearing the rent, and he never thought to ask his lord to forgive it him. But this ſenſe of the words was rei gerendæ aptior, it was agreeable to both their intereſts in conjunction, and therefore Caſulano is bound in conſcience to pay his rent. So the Lawyers ſay, Si ambigua ſit intentio ſeu actio, quod utilius ſit actori accipiendum eſt. The landlord is to have the advantage of the ambiguity; for beſides that he knew his own meaning beſt, the right was his, and no man is to be preſum'd to part with his right againſt his will. And thus it is in the law, as well as in Contracts, Amphiboliæ enim omnis in his erit quæſtio: aliquando uter ſit ſecundum naturam magis ſermo; ſemper utrum ſit æquius, utrum is qui ſic ſcripſit ac dixit, ſic voluerit. So Quintilian draws into a compendium all the rules of expounding doubtfull words. Firſt, ſee whether it be agreeable to the thing in hand, for no man is willing his own act ſhould periſh: for this ſometimes will doe it; but if it will not, then equity muſt intervene: but if by any other way we know the mind of the law-giver, that is of all things to be preferred. For though the caſe be hard, yet if it was the mind of the law-giver and be not unjuſt, it muſt ſtand. Quod quidem perquam durum eſt, ſed ita lex ſcripta eſt, It is hard, but ſo the law is written.

written. That is, if the mind of the law-giver be certain and clear, no equity is to intervene; but when the mind is not known, equity is the beſt meaning. But of this by and by. This is of great uſe in Religion as well as in juſtice. For when God gives a command and uſes myſtical expreſſions, metaphors, ritual or typical repreſentments, or ſignifies his pleaſure by the outſide and cruſt of ſervices, though this is not to be deſpis'd or omitted, yet the ſpiritual and moral ſenſe and internal ſervice is the principal, that is rei gerendæ aptior, more to God's purpoſes, and more to ours. When God commands us to repent, and to ſerve him, he that asks the queſtion, when God would have us to repent, whether it will not ſerve the turn if we repent at all, if we repent upon our death-bed, becauſe the words of the commandement doe indifferently ſignify any time; here we are rightly determin'd by this Rule, That was God's meaning which does God's work, that without which the work would periſh, and God would not be ſerv'd: for God's intention being that we ſhould glorify him by a free obedience, and ſerve him in a holy life, that which makes God to looſe his purpoſe, cannot be the meaning of his words. Thus when God commands us to come into his Courts, to fall down upon our knees before his footſtool; it muſt mean that we muſt worſhip God with the loweſt adoration of our ſouls, with the proſtration of our mind: for the body without the mind being nothing, unleſſe this commandement for bodily worſhip be expounded to ſignify the worſhip of the ſpirit, God is injur'd, his intention is defeated: and therefore the law hath taken care of this. Impropriè verba regulariter non accipiuntur, niſi aliter actus vel periret, vel eluſorius redderetur, Words are not to be taken improperly, unleſſe the proper acception of it does elude the purpoſe of the law-giver, and makes his law vain. Thus the very Gentiles underſtood the mind of God: when he commanded men to offer ſacrifices and oblations to him, his meaning was, they ſhould kill their luſts, and ſacrifice themſelves to God. To this purpoſe are thoſe excellent words of Menander,

He that offers to God the ſacrifices of bulls and goats, or of any other beaſt, gold or rich garments, Ivory or precious ſtones, and thinks by this means to reconcile God to him, is deceiv'd, and is a fool. When God commanded theſe things he intended to be underſtood to other purpoſes.

For the ſacrificer muſt be a ſpiritual man, dead unto ſin and living unto righteouſneſſe; he muſt be chaſt and charitable, juſt and true, a deſpiſer of the world, and muſt not deſire ſo much as another mans pin; and he muſt be the ſame in private as in public, walking ever as in the preſence of God. This is an excellent ſumme of religion, and the beſt interpreter of the ſpiritual ſenſe of Moſes law, next to the Sermons of the Goſpel: but without this the work of God had periſhed, and religion it ſelf had been eluſory. And this is a ſufficient warrant for a ſenſe beyond the letter of a Commandement.

12. 2. In all laws and obligations of conſcience by contract, when any doubt ariſes, we are to conſider what is moſt likely and what is moſt uſual, and reſt upon that. In contrahendo quod agitur pro cauto habendum, ſaies the law. We muſt ſuppoſe that the contractor did intend that ſenſe that is the warieſt, becauſe that is the moſt likely; nothing being ſo reaſonable as to think the man intended that which all the world does, that is, to buy cheap and to ſell dear. If this will not doe it, then we muſt run to the cuſtome of the country; becauſe the things and manners of cuſtome, though they were not in the contract, yet veniunt in bonæ fidei judiciis, they are to be of weight in judgements, as being a reaſonable deciſion of queſtions and obſcurities. But if nothing of all this will doe, then comes in the principal rule of equity and remiſſions: Semper in obſcuris quod minimum eſt ſequimur, In all things of burden the leaſt is to be choſen. This is of uſe in Contracts, in Teſtaments, and in infliction of puniſhments.

13. * In Contracts. He that promiſes to give a man an hundred or two hundred pound, cannot be challeng'd nor oblig'd but for a hundred. In ſummis ſemper quod minus eſt promitti videtur. The reaſon is, becauſe when two things of burden are expreſſed, he that promiſed muſt ſo far be his own judge as to determine himſelf in the event, when he did not in the ſtipulation; and therefore it is to be preſum'd that he would be bound but to the leſſe. For as in the Canon law, when a Biſhop had obtain'd leave to reſign or quit his litle Biſhopric, of his ſuperior, it is not granted that he ſhall be tranſlated to another in the grant of ceſſion; and the reaſon given in the law is this, Nam ſi circa tranſlationem idem fieri voluiſſet, quod de ceſſione dixerat, & de tranſlatione poterat expreſsiſſe, Becauſe he that granted a ceſſion, could as eaſily have ſaid tranſlation if he had ſo intended: ſo here alſo it is preſum'd that he intended to give the leaſt, becauſe if he had intended the biggeſt, he might as eaſily have ſaid ſo, as to have nam'd a leſſe; and if he intended the greater, he may perform it yet if he pleaſe. Thus if Titius promiſe to pay his debt within a year or two, Caius cannot by virtue of that promiſe force him to pay it till the two years be out.

cap. 2. §. ſed neque. de tranſlat. Epiſc.

14. * In Teſtaments alſo the caſe is the ſame. Mævius makes his Will; and leaves Lucius his heir of all, but gives his ſiſter as much as one of his ſons. The heir is tied to pay his Aunt but ſo much as that ſon hath whoſe portion is the leaſt. Thus when Regulus left to his wife Quintilla the field that was next to the Campus Martius, the Prætor underſtanding that he had two fields next to the Campus Martius, gave her the leaſt of the two: the reaſon is, becauſe the Father is ſuppos'd to put upon the Heir that burden which is the lighter.

l. cum ſervus, §. ſcio. ff. de legat. & l. unum ex familia, §. item tuam. ff. eod.

15. But this holds not in all caſes: the rule is the ſame, and eaſe and remiſſion is to be done, and the gentler ſentence is to be followed, and the leaſt burden to be impos'd, and the ſmalleſt legacy to be pai'd and receiv'd, or the moſt advantageous ſenſe of favour is to be purſued: but all the difficulty will be to whom the eaſe or the advantage is to be done; for ſometimes one,

one, and ſometimes another is to have the benefit of the Chancery. 1. For the heir is to be favour'd againſt the Legatées, unleſſe God and religion be the Legatée, for the Church is to be favour'd againſt the heir. And therefore Scævola ſaid, that if a Roman in his Teſtament appointed an image to be ſet up in a Temple in which there were marble and braſſe and ſilver ſtatues, the legacy was to be performed in the moſt coſtly material; idque favore Dei & religionis, ſaies the law; becauſe in doubts it is fit that God ſhould have the preeminence, and it is alſo to be preſumed that the Teſtator intended to give the beſt unto the beſt. Let the inſtance be chang'd and it is a good meaſure for conſcience in the cauſes and queſtions of Chriſtians. 2. The heir or the Donor is to be eas'd and to be underſtood in the leaſt ſenſe, unleſſe that leaſt ſenſe makes the gift unprofitable and good for nothing. Aruns dying left a ſervant to his Brother for a legacy. Canidius who was the heir offers to give to his Uncle his man Spinax, who was the verieſt rogue in all the Empire. But his Uncle anſwered, My Brother did not intend to give me a miſchief. Then he offers him Lentillus who was little better then a fool. To this his Uncle anſwer'd, My Brother did not intend to give me nothing. And at laſt the Uncle demanded Aretius, who was his Brothers Phyſician: but that Canidius refus'd, and he might very well; but he gave him Merula that was a very good Baker, and both were indifferently pleas'd: but ſuch a one that was not the beſt, and yet was good for ſomething, was due by juſtice. 3. Cauſes of repetition are to be favour'd more then cauſes of gain. He that deſires but to ſave himſelf, or to get his own, is to have the advantage of him that if he prevails gets gain: and the reaſon is, becauſe it is better to ſave a main ſtake, then to get an acceſſion; it is better to have one preſerved then another increaſed: and it is more to be preſumed that he who demands reſtitution ſeeks but his own, then that the others gain is juſtly his. 4. He that buyes in doubts of conſcience and law, is to be preferr'd before him that ſells, and the interpretation ought to be on the behalf of the firſt. The reaſon of this is, becauſe he that ſells cannot ſo eaſily be deceiv'd as he that buyes, for every man is juſtly preſum'd to know the price of his own goods, and be cunning in his own trade. 5. For dowries and 6. for liberty and 7. poſſeſſion ſentences are to be given in the favourable ſenſe, becauſe the caſes themſelves are full of charity and mercy; and they that complain in theſe caſes are commonly the oppreſſed party.

16. * This Rule alſo is intended and that principally in puniſhments and penal ſentences of law. Where if the law be obſcure, it is on all hands confeſs'd, that the ſenſe of equity is an excellent interpretation and declares the mind of the law-giver: and it is alſo true that if ſeveral penalties be expreſſed in the law, ordinarily the judge is to impoſe the leaſt; and the reaſon is, becauſe he does at once the actions of two vertues; it is juſtice and it is charity at the ſame time. I ſay ordinarily, for ſometimes there are great examples to be made, and in them there is very often *Aliquid iniqui, nothing of equity, but ſomething that was very hard: and the Hebrew Kings (ſay the Rabbins) had a power of cauſing the malefactor to hang all day and all night upon the accurſed tree; though the law was more gentle, and commanded the body to be taken down before the Sun ſet; but if the public neceſſity requir'd it, the Jewiſh Doctors ſay that their Kings had power.

17. But the great difficulty is, when the words of the law are expreſſe, and name the puniſhment, whether or no can there be any remiſſion by equity or interpretation? Titius being cited to appear in Court, came not, and was fin'd: but he came immediately. The queſtion is, whether he ought in conſcience to be relieved. It is certain that in law the ſentence againſt him is juſt; for let the cauſe be never ſo odious, the law muſt be underſtood according to the propriety of the words, unleſſe the intention of the law-giver can otherwiſe be certainly known. But if by any ways he can be relieved, he ought to be, if there be evident equity on his ſide. But becauſe this equity is againſt the ſolennity of law, it muſt be introduc'd as ſolemnly, that is, by a law, or a ſolemn decree according to the diſpoſition of law. But this latter part is matter of prudence more then of conſcience; and concerning this conflict of law and equity Cicero hath ſpoken excellent things, as who pleaſe may ſee in his Oration pro Cæcina and in his lib. 2. Vet. Rhet. But for the practice of it both in law and conſcience it is an excellent rule of law, Capienda eſt occaſio quæ præbet benignius reſponſum; An occaſion muſt not be forc'd againſt law, but if any can be found it muſt be us'd in the behalf of equity. And therefore Celſus, Marcellus and Ulpian are noted with a fair memory for being ſtudious of equity in the ſentences of law: and for this very thing Cicero commends Servius: but Scævola, Paulus, Julianus and the Sabiniani and ſome others were more propenſe to rigor and ſubtilty, and were leſſe belov'd.

Titus Manlius was to blame in putting his ſon to death for a glorious victory gotten by a little offence. But all good laws were ever deſirous of eaſy interpretation when the matter it ſelf was a burden: and it was well ſaid of Gattinara to the Emperor Charles the 5th, Chi vuole troppo abbracciare, va à pericolo di non ſtrignere coſa alcuna, He that ſtrains the cord too hard, breaks it and can bind nothing. Periculoſum eſt prægrave Imperium: & difficile eſt continere quod capere non poſſis, ſaid Curtius*. He that fills his hand too full, lets goe more then he ſhould. There is a meaſure in laws, which muſt not take in every thing, but let ſome things paſſe gently; for a government that is too heavy is dangerous: and therefore without all peradventure when the puniſhments are general, the leaſt ſpecial ought to be taken. Thus Gentlemen are not to be puniſh'd with the puniſhment of ſlaves and vagabonds. If bodily puniſhment by law be commanded, ſcourging is to be underſtood, or ſuch as is in uſe in the nation, and not the cutting off a member, or putting to death, ſay the Greek lawyers. And there is no exception to this, but this onely, That this is to be underſtood in lighter offences, not in greater; for in theſe it may be of as much concernment to juſtice that the ſeverer part be taken, as it is to charity that lighter offences ſhould carry the lighter load. And therefore the S. C. Syllanianum decreed that if a ſlave had kill'd his lord, all the ſlaves in the houſe ſhould die for it. It was a hard and a ſevere law; but it was a great crime, and by great examples the lives of maſters were to be ſecur'd: and to this purpoſe C. Caſſius the Lawyer defended it with great reaſon, as is to be ſeen in his oration in Tacitus.

18. 3. In matters of favour and matters of piety, the ſenſe of the law is to be extended by interpretation. Things odious and correctory are called ſtricta in the law, and that which is favourable is called res ampla; becauſe cauſe as the matter of that is to be made as little as it may be, ſo the matter of this may be enlarged. Thus if any thing be done in the favour of the children, the adoptive and the naturall are included, when it is not to the prejudice of the legitimate. And that which is made legitimate is to be reckoned as that which is ſo of it ſelf; and he that is naturaliz'd is to be reckon'd as a Native; and a freed man, as he that was born free; and the privileges granted to a city are to be extended to the ſuburbs. But this Rule is to be eſtimated as the former, there being the ſame reaſon of Contraries, ſave onely that there is in the matters of favour ſomething of particular conſideration. For although it is by the former meaſures ſet down who are the perſons, and which are the cauſes to be favour'd and eas'd; yet thoſe perſons are not in all caſes to receive the advantage; that is they are in all caſes which the words of the law can bear, except that by that favour the whole proceſſe be evacuated, or the thing be loſt. Therefore although the guilty perſon is favour'd in all the methods and ſolennities of law, where the law can proceed; yet where the favour would hinder the proceeding, the accuſer and not the guilty perſon is to receive it. For the accuſer hath the advantage of taking his oath in law, which the guilty perſon hath not; becauſe the law ſuppoſes he will deny the fact, right or wrong. And thus we are alſo to proceed in our private entercourſes of juſtice and charity, we are rather to believe the accuſer ſwearing, then the accuſed. But if the accuſation be not ſworn, or if the guilty perſon be brought into judgement upon ſuſpicion onely, and a public fame, we are rather to believe the accuſed ſwearing his innocence, then the voice of fame, or uncertain accuſers.

RULE II.

When the power that made the law does interpret the law, the interpretation is authentical, and obliges the Conſcience as much as the law; and can releaſe the bond of Conſcience ſo far as the interpretation extends, as much as if the law were abrogated.

1. WHen the law is interpreted by the Emperor, ratam & indubitatam habendam eſſe ſay the Lawyers. The reaſon is plain and eaſy. The law is nothing but the ſolemn and declar'd will of the law-giver; and he that ſpeaks, beſt knows his own mind; and he that can take away the law, can alter it; and he that can cut off the hands, may certainly pare the nails: and ſince the legiſlative power never dies, and from this power the law hath it's perpetual force, and can live no longer then he pleaſe, by what method of law ſoever he ſignify his mind, whether it be by declaring the meaning of the law, or by abating the rigor of it, or diſpenſing in the caſe, or enlarging the favour, or reſtraining the ſeverity; it is all one as to the event and obligation of conſcience. The interpretation is to the law, as the Echo to the voice; it comes from the ſame principle; and though it ſpeaks leſſe, yet it ſpeaks oftner, and it ſpeaks enough, ſo much as is then to be the meaſure of the Conſcience in good and evil.

2. For when the law-giver does interpret his law, he does not take off the obligation of the law, but declares that in ſuch a caſe it was not intended to oblige. Tacitus tells of a Roman Knight who having ſworn to his wife that he would never be divorc'd from her, was by Tiberius diſpens'd with when he had taken her in the unchaſt embraces of his ſon in law. The Emperor then declar'd that the Knight had onely oblig'd himſelf not to be divorc'd, unleſſe a great cauſe ſhould intervene. Thus we find that P. Lucius * the 3d did abſolve thoſe from their oath that ſware they would not ſpeak to their Father or Mother, Brother or Siſter, or ſhew them any kindneſſe: but this abſolution quitted them not from the ſin of a raſh & impious oath, but declar'd that they were not bound to keep it. Abſolvit, i. e. abſolutum oſtendit, as Pope Nicholas did in the Caſe of the Arch-biſhop of Triers, he declar'd him to be at liberty; and the Gloſſe derives a warranty for this uſe of the word out of the Prophet Iſaiah.

* c. cum quidam. §. illi vero de jure.

c. authoritatem. 15. q. 6. Gloſſ. magn. verb. abſolvimus.

3. It was ill ſaid of Brutus, that a Prince might not be more ſevere, nor yet more gentle then the law. For there are many things quæ naturâ videntur honeſta eſſe, temporibus ſunt inhoneſta, ſaith Cicero, which at firſt ſanction of the law and in their own Nature are honeſt, but in the change of times and by new relations become unjuſt and intolerable: and therefore the Civil law allows to Princes a power juvare, ſupplere, corrigere, to help, to ſupply, to correct the laws. For thoſe are but precarious Princes who when they ſee a caſe that needs a remedy, cannot command it, but like the Tribunes of Rome, when they offer'd to intercede and interpoſe between Fabius and the ſentence of Papyrius the Dictator by which Fabius was condemned, could effect nothing till they went upon their knees in his behalf. But it is worſe that the laws of a nation ſhould bind the Prince as Jupiter in Homer was bound by the laws of Fate, ſo that he could not help his ſon Sarpedon, but ſate weeping like a chidden girle. But of this I have already given ſufficient accounts. The Supreme power is Dominus legum, Canon animatus in terris, lex animata, fons juſtitiæ, ſupra jus diſpenſare potens, as Innocentius ſaid of himſelf; and therefore of this there can be no queſtion. Inter æquitatem juſque interpoſitam interpretationem nobis ſolis & oportet, & licet inſpicere, ſaith the Emperor, C. de leg. & conſt. Princ. The Prince alone hath power to intervene between equity and ſtrict law by his interpretation. This is now to be reduc'd to practice.

Firſt this power muſt be adminiſtred with nobleneſſe & ingenuity; not fraudulently, or to oppreſſe any one, which Cicero calls calumniam, & nimis callidam, ſed malitioſam juris interpretationem, a crafty and malicious commentary. Such as was that act of Solyman, who after he had ſworn never to take from Ibrahim Baſſa his life, kill'd him when he was aſleep, becauſe Taliſman the Prieſt declar'd that ſleep is death. Thus the Triumviri in Rome having a mind to kill a boy, which by the force of law they could not doe, they gave him the Toga Virilis, and forc'd him to be a man in eſtimation of law, that by law they might oppreſſe him: and Mithridates King of Armenia thought himſelf ſecure when Radamiſtus the ſon of Pharaſmanes the Iberian King had promis'd he would neither ſtab nor poyſon him; but the yong Tyrant interpreted his promiſe maliciouſly, when he oppreſſed him with pillows and featherbeds: and all Europe hates the memory of the Arch-biſhop of Mentz, who having promis'd to Atto Adel a Palatine of Franconia that he ſhould ſafely return out of his Caſtle, did indeed perform the letter of his word; but pretending kindneſſe as well as juſtice, when he had brought him forth of the Caſtle, paſſionately invited him to break-faſt, and then killed him when he reentred. The power of Princes to give ſenſes to their laws muſt be to doe juſtice and to give eaſe to the pitiable and oppreſſed.

5. 2ly, This power is not to be adminiſtred but upon grave & juſt cauſes: for to be eaſy and forward in bending the laws by unneceſſary interpretations is but a diminution of juſtice, and a looſeneſſe in government; as was well obſerv'd by Livy, ſpeaking of thoſe brave ages in which the Romane honeſty and juſtice was the beginning of the greateſt Empire of the world, Sed nondum hæc quæ nunc tenet ſeculum negligentia Divum venerat, nec interpretando ſibi quiſque jusjurandum & leges aptas faciebat, ſed ſuos potius mores ad ea accommodabat, The neglect of the Gods and the laws was not gone ſo farre as to bend the laws to the manners of men, but men meaſur'd their manners by the laws: and then no man can deny to a Prince leave to derogate from his laws by ſuch interpretations. Licet enim Regi in civitate cui regnat, jubere aliquid quod neque ante illum quiſquam, neque ipſe unquam juſſerat, ſaith S. Auſtin; A King in his own dominions may command that which neither any man before him, or himſelf before that time commanded: meaning that although he muſt govern by his laws, yet when there is a favourable caſe, he may give a new ſenſe to them, that he may doe his old duty by new meaſures. Thus Solomon abſolved Abiathar from the ſentence of death which by law he had incurred, becauſe he had formerly done worthily to the intereſts of his Father David. Thus when Cato Cenſor had turned L. Quinctius Flaminius out of the Senate, the Majeſty of the Roman people reſtor'd him; and though they had no cauſe to doe it, yet they had power. Now this power though it may be done by interpretation, yet when it is adminiſtred by the Prince it is moſt commonly by way of pardon, abſolute power and prerogative. Thus Princes can reſtore a man in bloud. Fas eſt cuivis Principi maculoſas notas vitiatæ opinionis abſtergere. So Antony the Emperor reſtored Julianus Licinianus whom Ulpian the Preſident had baniſhed. When a law determins that under ſuch an age a perſon ſhall be uncapable of being the General of an army, the Supreme power can declare the meaning of the law to be, unleſſe a great excellency of courage and maturity of judgement ſupply the want of years: in which very caſe Scipio Africanus ſaid wiſely, when he deſir'd to be imployed in the Punic warre, ſe ſat annorum habiturum ſi populus Romanus voluerit, he ſhould quickly be old enough if the Roman people pleaſed. Thus Tiberius put Nero into the Senate at fifteen years of age, and ſo did Auguſtus the like to Tiberius and his Brother; and the people declar'd or diſpens'd the law in Pompey's caſe, and allowed him a Triumph before he had been Conſul or Prætor.

6. But to this there is not much to be ſaid; for he that can make a New law, may by interpretation change the Old into a New; that is, any interpretation of his is valid, if it be juſt, naturally juſt, though it be not according to the Grammar or firſt intention of the Civil or Municipal law: quia

l. ult. C. de legib. ſi leges condere ſoli Imperatori conceſſum eſt, etiam leges interpretari ſolo dignum imperio eſſe oportet. He that can doe the greater can doe the leſſe; and he that hath power of cutting off the head, can diſpoſe of the tongue as he pleaſe, ſo that if it will not ſpeak what he would have it, he can take a courſe it ſhall ſpeak nothing againſt him. But the caſe is otherwiſe in Judges.

7. For the interpretation of laws made by Judges is matter of fidelity and wiſe diſpenſation, but nothing of Empire and power; and it is a good probable warranty of Conſcience, but no final determination in caſe any cauſe of doubt happens to oppoſe it. And this was well obſerved by Ci- pro Ligario. *cero: Nemo apud Judices ita ſolet cauſam agere; Ignoſcite Judices, Lapſus eſt, Non putavi, Si unquam poſthac. Gunther. lib. 4. A quo ſæpe rei, nullo licet ære redempti,

For what is wanting in the proviſions of law he can make up by the fulneſſe of his power: and if there be no injury to any, let there be what favour or indulgence he pleaſe, his interpretation is good law, and can bring peace to the conſcience in the particular. According to this is that of the
l. ult. ff. qui ſatisd. cog. Lawyers, Qui jurato promiſit judicio ſiſti, non videtur pejeraſſe, ſi ex conceſſa cauſa hoc deſeruit, He that hath ſworn to appear in judgement, is not perjur'd if he have leave given him not to appear: meaning, from him that can interpret the law, or diſpenſe, declare the man not bound, or give leave to break it. But when the Judges interpret a law, they either expound it by cuſtomes of the Court or Country, or elſe by learning and wiſe conjectures. Interpretations by prevailing and allowed cuſtomes are good law and ſure meaſures of action according to the doctrine of cuſtomes; of which in part I have given account, and ſhall yet adde ſomething in the 6. §. of this Chapter, and therefore I ſhall adde nothing here. But if the Judges interpretation be onely doctrinal, it is ſufficient to us that it is not introductive of a law, and it cannot of it ſelf be a reſolution of conſcience; but is to be
lib. 1. Chap. 4. made uſe of according to the doctrine of probabilities. This onely is to be added, that if the authoriz'd Judges doe conſent, and by a delegation of power, or the cuſtomes of the Nation, or the diſpoſition of the law the ſentence does paſſe in rem judicatam into a legal ſentence, then it obliges as a law; for it is a warranted interpretation and declares the ſenſe of the law, and conſequently does bind the Conſcience.

§. 3. A contrary or ceasing reason.

RULE III.

A law made for a particular reason, when the reason wholly ceases, does no longer oblige the Conscience.

1. THe title of this §. implies a distinction of reasons considerable in this particular. For sometimes it happens that onely one reason dies, and there is no other change, but that the efficient cause of the law, from whence it had it's being, is dead. But sometimes it is more then so; for not onely the reason of the law is gone, but a nettle is risen up in the place of it, and that which was once profitable is become intolerable, and that which was just is now dishoneſt, and that which was righteous will not be righteous still, but against the public interest. * Now when a contrary reason does arise there is no peradventure but the law ceases: and this is to be extended not onely to the case of injustice or impossibility, but of trouble or of uselesnesse; that is, if the contrary reason makes things so that the law could not justly have been impos'd, or if it had been de facto impos'd, it could not oblige the conscience, then the conscience is restor'd to liberty and disobligation. * But then this case must be manifest: for if it be doubtfull, the law retains her power; for it is in possession, and the justice of it is presum'd.

2. But if the reason of the law ceases onely, and no more, there is some more difficulty, for it may be the will of the Prince does not cease, and he intends the law should last for the support of his authority; and that will be reason enough to keep up a law that once was good and now hath no harm in it: and there ought to be a great reason that shall change a custome, though it be good for nothing; and where there was a law, a custome will easily be suppos'd, especially if the law was usefull and reasonable, as we suppose in the present case. And if the law did prevail unto a custome, and that it be not safe to change a custome, then though the proper reason of the law be ceas'd, there is another reason arisen in the place of it that will be enough to bind the conscience to obedience. For the stating of this question, it is still necessary that we yet first distinguish, and then define.

3. 1. Some laws have in them a natural rectitude or usefulnesse in order to moral ends, by reason of the subject matter of the law, or by reason that the instance of the law is made an instrument of vertue by the appointment of law. 2. Others have onely an acquir'd rectitude, and an extrinsic end; that is, it was by the law-giver commanded in order to a certain purpose, and beyond that purpose it serves for nothing. Thus when a Prince imposes a tribute upon a Country for the building of certain bridges, when the work is done, the tribute is of no public emolument. But if he imposes a faſt upon Wedneſdays and Fridays for ſix moneths to obtain of God to remove the plague from a City or a Country, though the plague be gone before the end of four months, yet the faſt may ſerve many other good ends.

4. Another diſtinction to be conſidered is concerning the ceſſation of the reaſon of the law, whether the reaſon be intrinſecal or extrinſecal. For ſometimes the reaſon ceaſes univerſally. Sometimes it remains as to the generality, but is alter'd in the particular caſes. So if a Superior commands that none of his ſubjects ſhall enter into ſuch a family where there are many fair women amorous and young, leſt ſuch a converſation ſhould tempt them to wantonneſſe; the general reaſon of the law remains, although Alexis be an Eunuch, and old Palæmon have a dead palſy upon him and cannot be warm'd by ſuch fires. The reaſon ceaſes in the particular, but abides ſtill in the general.

5. A third thing is alſo to be obſerved, which hath in it ſome difference of caſe. Sometimes there are many parts of a law, and ſometimes it is uniform and hath in it but one duty. That which hath parts and is a combination of particulars may ceaſe in one or more of them, and the reſt abide in their full uſefulneſſe and advantage. And theſe and all the former may be uſeleſſe, or their reaſon may ceaſe for a time, and be interrupted, and a while after return: and in all theſe the reaſon may ceaſe negatively, or contrarily; that is, the firſt cauſe may ceaſe, or another quite contrary may come.

According to theſe diſtinctions, the caſes and the anſwers are ſeveral.

6. 1. If there be two ends in the law, an extrinſecal and an intrinſecal; though the extrinſecal be wholly and generally ceas'd, yet the law obliges for it's intrinſic reaſon, that is, when it commands an act of it ſelf honeſt and vertuous. Thus if a Prelate, or a Prince, commands women in Churches to ſit apart, and to wear vailes that they may not be occaſion of quarrels and duels amongſt yong Gentlemen; if it happen that the Duelling of Gallants be out of faſhion, and that it be counted diſhonourable to fight a duell, then that end of the law ceaſes; and yet becauſe it is of it ſelf honeſt that women ſhould have a vail on their head for modeſty ſake, and becauſe of the Angels, this law is not to ceaſe, but to ſtand as well upon one leg, as it did before upon two. But this can onely be when Divine and humane laws are complicated, or at leaſt when humane laws are mixt with a matter of perfection and Counſel Evangelical, or of ſome worthineſſe, which collaterally induces an obligation diſtinct from the humane law.

7. 2. If a law be appointed for an extrinſecal end, when that reaſon ceaſes univerſally, though there be an inherent and remaining worthineſſe in the action, and an aptneſſe to miniſter to a moral end, yet that law binds not unleſſe that moral end was alſo intended by the law-giver. For that which was no ingredient into the conſtitution of the law, can have no power to ſupport the law, for it hath nothing to doe with the law; it never help'd to make it, and therefore by it cannot be a law, unleſſe by the legiſlative power it be made anew. So that ſuch actions which can be good for ſomething of their own, and are not good at all for the end of the law-giver, can onely be lawfull to be done, but they are not neceſſary. Therefore fore when a law is made that every Thurſday the ſubjects ſhould goe to Church to Morning prayer, that they might in the public offices pray for the life of the Prince, if the Prince be dead that law obliges not; for although going to Morning prayer is of it ſelf good, yet if the Prince had no conſideration of that good, but of his own, that good entred not into the law, and had no cauſality in it, and therefore was no part of the duty of the ſubject in relation to that law.

8. 3. If the action commanded by law be in it ſelf indifferent, when the reaſon of the law ceaſes extrinſecally, the whole obligation is taken away, becauſe the act is good for nothing in it ſelf, and good for nothing to the Common-wealth, and therefore cannot be a law. Thus there was an oath fram'd in the Univerſities that no Profeſſor ſhould teach Logic publicly any where but there, meaning that it ſhould not be taught in Stamford, whether the Scholars made ſo long a receſſe that it had almoſt grown into an Univerſity. But when the danger of that was over, the oath was needleſſe, and could not oblige, and ought not to have been impos'd. In Spain a law was made that no man ſhould cut any timber-trees: in a few years the province grew ſo full of wood that the reaſon and fear of the law was over; and it was more likely to paſſe into inconvenience by abundance then by ſcarcity, and therefore then it was lawfull for any man to cut ſome of his own. So if a law were made for ten years to forbid hunting of wild beaſts, that ſome royal game which was almoſt deſtroyed might be preſerved for the Prince, if in five years the wolves and lions were grown ſo numerous that there were more danger then game, the law were no longer obligatory. For as Modeſtinus ſaid well, Nulla ratio aut juris benignitas patitur, ut quæ ſalubriter pro hominum commodis ſtatuta ſunt, nos duriore interpretatione contra ipſorum commodum producamus ad ſeveritatem; It is againſt reaſon that what the law decreed for the good of men, ſhould be ſeverely and rigorouſly expounded to their damage. And this is to be underſtood to be true though the reaſon of the law ceaſes onely negatively; that is, though the act doe ſtill remain indifferent, and there be no reaſon to the contrary. To which this is to be added, that when the reaſon of a law commanding an action otherwiſe indifferent does ceaſe univerſally, the very Negative ceaſing paſſes into the contrary of it ſelf: not that it does ſo in the matter of the action, for the action is ſtill indifferent and harmleſſe, but that it does ſo in the power of legiſlation: it does not ſo to the ſubject, but it does ſo to the Prince; that is, the ſubject may ſtill doe it without ſin, but without ſin the Prince cannot command it to be done, when it is to no purpoſe. Thus we find in the Legends of the Roman later Saints that ſome fooliſh Priors and Superiors of Convents would exerciſe the obedience of their Monks by commanding them to ſcrape a pibble, to fill a bottomleſſe tub, and ſuch ridiculous inſtances; which were ſo wholly to no purpoſe, that though the Monk might ſuffer himſelf to be made a fool of, yet he was not tied to it in virtue of his obedience, and the Prior did ſin in commanding it. This ought to be obſerv'd ſtrictly, becauſe although it looks like a ſubtilty, yet it is of uſe in the conduct of this Rule of conſcience, and hath not been at all obſerv'd exactly.

9. 4. When the intrinſecal reaſon of a law does ceaſe univerſally, the negative ceaſing of the reaſon paſſes into a contrary; and if the action be not neceſſary, it is not lawfull. For actions which have in them an internal rectitude have it ſo always, unleſſe the caſe be wholly chang'd, and then it is become very evil. To reſtore that which is depoſited with us is commanded becauſe of the natural juſtice that is in the action; but when the reaſon of this ceaſes, that is, that it is not juſt to doe it, it is unjuſt, or uncharitable: and therefore if you reſtore to a mad-man his ſword to kill an innocent, you are unjuſt to innocence, and but æquivocally juſt to madneſſe and folly.

10. 5. When a law hath many parts, and is a conjugation of duties for ſeveral reaſons, when one of the parts of the law does looſe the reaſon of it wholly, though it be tied in the ſame bundle, and by the ſame tie, yet that part is ſlackened and obliges not, though included in a law which does oblige. The reaſon of this is the ſame with the former; onely this is to be added, that in this caſe it is not one law, but a conjugation of laws; it is not a ſingle ſtarre, but like a conſtellation, and particularly as the Pleiades, where one of the ſeven hath almoſt no light or viſibility, though knit in the ſame confederation with thoſe which half the world doe at one time ſee. * And the ſame alſo is the caſe in the ſuſpenſion of a law, that is when the reaſon ceaſes univerſally and wholly, but not for ever: while the reaſon is abſent, the conſcience is not tied to attend; but when it returns to verify the law, the duty returns to bind the conſcience. But in this there is no difficulty.

These are the meaſures of conſcience when the reaſon of a law ceaſes wholly and univerſally, that is, as to the public intereſt; but that which is more difficult, is when the reaſon of the law remains in the general, but it fails in ſome particular caſes, and to particular perſons: and what then is our duty, or our liberty?

11. The reaſon of the difficulty is, becauſe laws are not to regard particulars, but that quod plerumque accidit, ſaith Theophraſtus; and therefore the private damage is ſupplied by the public emolument: and the particular pretences are not to be regarded, though they be juſt, leſt others make excuſes, and the whole band of diſcipline and laws be broken. Satius erat à paucis juſtam excuſationem non accipi, quam ab omnibus aliquam tentari, ſaid Seneca; It is better to reject the juſt exception of a few, then to encourage the unjuſt pretenſions of all. And therefore ſubjects ſhould for the public intereſt ſit quietly under their own burden. For lex nulla ſatis commoda eſt; id modo quæritur, ſi majori parti & in ſumma prodeſt, ſaid Cato. It is a juſt law if it does good to the generality and in the ſumme of affairs. And therefore if Cajus or Titius be pinch'd in the yoke, they may endure it well, when they conſider the public profit.

12. But this were very true onely in caſe there were no other remedy; but our inquiry here being onely a queſtion of conſcience, which is to be judged by him that commands juſtly in general, and will doe no injuſtice in particular, and can govern all things without ſuffering them to intangle each other, the caſe will prove eaſy enough: for if God does not require obedience to the laws, when the reaſon of the law ceaſes in particular, of them I ſay in whoſe particular caſe the reaſon ceaſes, it is all that is look'd for. Now for this the concluſions are plain.

1. If

13. 1. If the extrinſic reaſon of the law ceaſes in a particular caſe onely negatively, that is, ſo as no evil, grievous burden, ſin, or danger be incumbent upon his perſon, the law retains her obligation and is to be obeyed; becauſe in that caſe, although there be no reaſon in the ſubject matter, yet there is reaſon enough in the reverence of the law, and in a conformity to the public manners of the Nation. Thus when the law forbids a citizen to bear armes in the night becauſe of frequent murders that have been done or are apt to be done by armed night-walkers; he that knows himſelf a peaceable man and that is reſolv'd to offend no body is not bound by the reaſon of that law in his own particular, but he is bound by the law as long as the public is bound whereof he is a part: for if he have no reaſon to the contrary, but onely there is no reaſon for it in his caſe, it is reaſon enough that there is a law in the caſe, which is uſefull to the public, and of great intereſt as to the communities of men. And therefore he that diſobeys in theſe circumſtances cannot be excus'd from contempt of the law: becauſe though his obedience be cauſeleſſe, yet ſo is his diſobedience, and this cannot be innocent, though that can; eſpecially becauſe though the obedience be cauſeleſſe in his own particular in relation to that matter, yet it hath cauſe enough in it in relation to example and the veneration of the laws.

14. 2. If the reaſon of the law ceaſes contrarily, that is, turns into miſchief; then though it ceaſes onely in a particular, in that particular the ſubject whoſe caſe it is, is free (from the law I mean, but not free to obey it.) Whatever we have vowed to religion or the Temple we are bound to perform: but if in the interval of the ſolution my Father or my neareſt relative, or any to whom I am bound to ſhew piety, be fallen into want, or needs my miniſtery, I am bound to doe this firſt, and let that alone till both can be done: and the reaſon is, becauſe I could not bind my ſelf by vow to omit any duty to which I am naturally oblig'd: and therefore though the law that commands payment of vows be juſt, yet it muſt be always with exception of preceding obligations; ſo that if it be certainly a ſin which is conſequent to the obedience of any law, it is certainly no ſin to diſobey it.

15. 3. If the general reaſon of the law remaining, in ſome particular caſes it ceaſes contrarily, but not ſo as to introduce a ſin, but a great evil, or ſuch a one which the law would not have commanded, and the law-giver is ſuppoſed not to have intended, the law does not oblige the conſcience of the ſubject in that caſe. For here is the proper place for equity. In the former caſe it is duty not to obey the law. Either then there is no equity but what is neceſſary and unavoidable; or if there can be any ſhewn or us'd by prudence and great probability, and in mercy, it follows that then it is to be us'd when the yoke pinches the perſon, though it does not invade the Conſcience. And it is not to be ſuppos'd that a ſuperior would have his laws burdenſome to any one beyond the public neceſſity; it being as certainly in his duty to be willing to eaſe ſingle perſons in their private burdens, as to provide for the common intereſt in their great and little political advantages. Τό, τι γὰρ ἐπιεικὲς δίκαιόν τινός ἐστι καὶ βέλτιόν ἐστι δίκαιον, Equity is as much law as the law it ſelf, it is as juſt as juſtice, onely that it is a better juſtice, ſaith Ariſtotle: it is not δίκαιον νόμιμον the legal juſtice, but ἐπανόρθωμα νομίμου δικαίου, a rectification and an amendment of it. Ethic. l. 5. c. 10.

Plaut. Stich. Impetrare oportet, quia æquum poſtulat, ſaid he in the Comedy; It is fit that you prevail, you ask reaſon & equity. That's bonum jus; it is juſtice & mercy in a knot. Thus if a Church commands ſuch ceremonies to be us'd, ſuch orders, ſuch prayers, they are to be obſerv'd when they may; but if I fall into the hands of an enemy to that manner of worſhip, who will kill or afflict me greatly for uſing it, I am in that caſe diſoblig'd. For though this caſe be not excepted in the law, yet it is ſupplied by the equity and correction of the law: ὀρθῶς ἔχει, ἢ παραλείπει ὁ νομοθέτης καὶ ἡμάρτεν ἁπλῶς εἰπών, ἐπανορθοῦν τὸ ἐλλειφθὲν, it is fit that when the law-giver hath commanded abſolutely and indefinitely, he ſhould in caſes of particular evil make proviſion and correct what was amiſſe or omitted by the law. For εἰ ἤδει ἐνομοθέτησεν ἄν, ubi ſupra. ſaies Ariſtotle; if he had known of it before he would have provided for it before-hand: and becauſe he did not, ὁ καὶ νομοθέτης ἔτως ἂν εἴποι ἐκεῖ παρὼν, if the law-giver were preſent, he would uſe equity and give leave to the grieved ſubject to eaſe himſelf. And therefore ſince it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe that if it had been thought of, this very caſe would have been provided for in the law; and if the law-giver were preſent he would declare the law in that caſe not to oblige; it follows undeniably, that the law binds not any man to a great inconvenience in his own perſon, though otherwiſe, and as to the public, it be a juſt and a good law, of a remaining reaſon and a remaining obligation. In order to this conſideration, that is uſefull which hath been already ſaid in the firſt Chapter of this book, in the ſecond and third Rules.

16. 4. If the reaſon of the law ceaſes in a particular, ſo that without ſin it may be obeyed, and without any great and intolerable evil to the obedient, yet ſometimes the law does not intend to oblige in the particular caſe, even when there is a little inconvenience, or but a probable reaſon to the contrary; and this is in things of ſmall concernment. I ſhould inſtance in rituals and little circumſtances of Eccleſiaſtical Offices and forms of worſhip, in the punctualities of Rubrics, in the order of Collects, in the number of prayers, and fulneſſe of the Office upon a reaſonable cauſe or inducement to the omiſſion or alteration: for theſe things are ſo little, and ſo fit to be intruſted to the conduct of thoſe ſober, obedient and grave perſons, who are thought fit to be truſted with the cure of ſouls; and theſe things are always of ſo little concernment, and ſo apt to yield to any wiſe mans reaſons and ſudden occaſions and accidents, and little and great cauſes, that theſe were the fitteſt inſtances of this rule, if Superiors, for want of great manifeſtations of their power, would not make too much of little things. But the purpoſe and declar'd intention of all juſt laws and juſt governments is in theſe things to give the largeſt interpretation to perſons of a peaceable mind and an obedient ſpirit, that ſuch circumſtances of miniſteries may not paſſe into a ſolemn religion, and the zeal of good men, their caution and their curioſity, may not be ſpent in that which does not profit. But the meaſures of practice in this particular muſt be taken from the manner and circumſtances of the government, and the uſual diſpoſition of the law. In many caſes an equity may be preſum'd; but if it be explicitely denyed, it muſt not be us'd.

Queſtion.

17. But upon the inſtance of theſe particular rules it is to be inquir'd, whether in theſe caſes the ſubject is ſo quitted from the obligation of the law, that without further leave he may uſe his liberty, or muſt he require it of his Superior?

18. To this I anſwer, that if the caſe be evident, the ſubject may uſe his liberty: for if he ſhould be tied to goe to his Superior, it is either to ask of him that the law ſhould not bind him, or that he may declare that the law in his caſe does not bind, or to promulgate and publiſh the law in that particular. Not to ask leave that the law ſhall not bind, for of it ſelf it ceaſes, and it was never intended to bind againſt equity and reaſon. Not for declaration, becauſe the caſe is here ſuppos'd to be evident. Nor yet laſtly for promulgation, becauſe that is onely neceſſary in the ſanction and revocation of laws which depend upon the will of the Prince; whereas in this caſe the law ceaſes by natural juſtice and the nature of the thing, and the reaſons of equity.

19. 2. But if the caſe be doubtfull, and it is not evident whether the particular caſe ought to be excepted in the general law, then we are to conſider whether it be a doubt of fear onely or a doubt of reaſon, that is, whether it be nothing but an unjuſt fear, or relies upon juſt grounds; for ſome men may eaſily perceive in themſelves a diffidence in any thing, not that they have reaſon to cauſe their fear, but becauſe they dare not truſt the greateſt reaſon that they either have or hear. If it be onely a doubt of fear, then it is to be conducted by the rules given concerning a ſcrupulous Conſcience: Vide lib. 1. cap. 5. & 6. If it be a fear of reaſon, we are to manage it by the meaſures of a doubting Conſcience. But if he ſuppoſes upon probable inducements that he is not obliged, then according to the nature of the probability we are to proceed. For if he believes it as probable that ſuch a caſe ought not to be comprehended in the law, as ſuppoſing it to be a ſin that in his caſe would be commanded, or too great a burden impos'd, and ſo to be beyond the power of the law-giver, then the ſubject may of himſelf be free, without recourſe to his ſuperior. The reaſon is, becauſe to avoid a ſin, or to doe a great charity to our ſelves, a probable reaſon is a ſufficient inducement, provided a more probable reaſon be not oppos'd againſt it, we being commanded, to avoid all appearance of evil. Now if this opinion be the more probable that by obeying the letter of the law in my caſe I ſhould ſin, it muſt needs appear to be an evil to doe it, and not to obey the law in this caſe does not appear to be an evil, as being the leſſe probable: for if the opinions be equally probable, then the conſcience is in doubt, and is to proceed by meaſures fitted to a doubting conſcience: but when I ſay there is a greater probability and a leſſe, the greater muſt carry it; and therefore the law is not to be obeyed, it being here ſuppos'd to be the more probable opinion that the obedience would produce a ſin. So alſo in the caſe of a great burden or intolerable preſſure, the preſumption is for eaſe; and the law-giver is to be ſuppoſed good and gentle and reaſonable; and beſides, it is ſuppoſed as the more probable opinion that the law-giver hath not power to make a law or to oblige to ſo much inconvenience, and then the caſe is the ſame.

* But if he believes it as probable that to oblige in the preſent caſe was not in his will, but it is certain that it was in his power, then the caſe is ſo that the ſubject may without injuſtice or violence obey it; and therefore ought not to uſe his liberty by his own opinion, but by recourſe to his ſuperior that hath power to declare the intention of the law.

20. In the firſt caſe if it be eaſy and convenient to goe to the Superior, or that there is time enough and all things fitted, it were the ſurer way to require his ſentence. But if there be not time, and the action urges by haſtineſſe, or neceſſity, or preſent opportunity, the liberty is as preſent as his need. But in the ſecond caſe, (which is oftentimes harder to know then the firſt, it being more difficult to pronounce definitively concerning the will of the law-giver which is free, then concerning his power which is not free,) when it is onely probable that the law-giver is willing, it is not ſafe to venture upon the not-obeying, without recourſe to the Superior. Becauſe our innocence depending wholly upon his will, and there being no ſin in keeping the law, we may ſafely doe this; but we cannot ſafely diſobey without being more aſſured of his leave: and therefore if it be opportune and eaſy to have recourſe to our competent Superior, it is worth our paines to goe and inquire; if it be not opportune, it is worth our ſtay till it be; for the ſecuring our duty and the peace of conſcience are intereſts much greater then the uſing of an unneceſſary liberty.

21. 3. But in theſe caſes of uncertainty, when we are not confident of a juſt liberty by the force of reaſon and the nature of the thing, we may juſtly preſume that the Superior does not intend to oblige in all thoſe caſes in which he uſually and of courſe diſpenſes; that is, when his diſpenſation is not of ſpecial favour, but of ordinary conceſſion; becauſe as in the firſt caſe it is ſuppos'd a gift, ſo in this latter it is ſuppos'd a juſtice. For example, A law is made to keep ſo many faſting-days. Mævius is a hard ſtudent, and feels himſelf ſomething ill after faſting, and believes it will not be for his health; but yet things are ſo with him, that he can obey the law without great or apparent miſchief, but yet he probably believes that the law-giver would not have him bound in this caſe. If he perceives that they that have recourſe to the Superior in leſſe needs then his, are ordinarily diſpenſed with, then he hath reaſon enough not to goe to his Superior; for it is already declar'd that he does not intend to bind in his and the like caſes. This is evident, and the beſt meaſure that I know in ſuch caſes. It is the ſureſt, and the largeſt, and the eaſieſt.

22. 4. When the recourſe to a Superior for declaration of the caſe hath in it great difficulty or inconvenience, though the cauſe of exception from the law be not very great, yet if together with the inconvenience of addreſſe to the Superior it make up an unequal burden, and ſo that the particular caſe ſeem very probable to be excepted, and that in it the legiſlator did not intend to bind; it is ſufficient to conſult with wiſe men and good, and by their advice and anſwers, as by extrinſecal cauſes of probability, or by any other juſt and probable cauſe of determination, to uſe our liberty, or to obey. The reaſon of this is plain neceſſity. Becauſe we have no other way of proceeding, but either we muſt in this, as in almoſt all the other caſes of our life, be content with the way which to us ſeems the more probable; or elſe if we were tied to make it ſecure, our lives and conditions would would be burdenſome and intolerable, and the whole proceſſe would be a ſnare and torment to a conſcience: the Superior, who is to be conſulted, it may be, not being within 40 miles of us; or when we come, it may be he is of difficult acceſſe, or otherwiſe imployed, and it will be impoſſible for many to be heard by him, if all in the like caſes were bound to conſult him; or it may be when we goe, we ſhall not be admitted, or if we be, it may be we ſhall not be eas'd unleſſe we carry along with us the rewards of Divination in our hands, and we are poor; or it may be the matter requires haſt, and cannot ſtay the leiſure of the Oracle; and beſides all this, the greateſt part of the actions of our lives are not ſo well conducted as to be determin'd by the conſultation of a wiſe man, but we doe them of our own head, and it may be of our own heart, without conſideration: and therefore it is a prudent courſe to proceed this way: and he that in ſuch caſes ties the conſciences to proceed more then prudently, and thinks that prudence is not a ſufficient warrant, does not conſider the condition of humane nature, nor the neceſſities of a mans life, nor the circumſtances of his condition, nor the danger of an unquiet and a reſtleſſe conſcience.

23. Upon occaſion of this ſubject, viz. the alteration of humane laws by the interpretation and equity of reaſon, it is very ſeaſonable, and very uſefull to conſcience, to inquire whether by the ſimilitude of reaſon the law may not as well receive advantage and extenſion, as well as the ſubject can receive liberty and eaſe. That is,

Queſtion.

Whether the obligation of the law does extend it ſelf to all caſes that have the ſame or an equal reaſon, though the caſe be not comprehended directly in the law.

To this the anſwer is by ſeveral Propoſitions.

24. 1. In laws declarative of natural right or obligation, the obligation extends to all things of equal reaſon, though they be not comprehended under the law. Thus becauſe we are bound by the laws to pay honour and gratitude to our parents for their nouriſhing of us and giving us education, the ſame duty is to be extended to thoſe perſons who took care of us when our parents were dead, or that took us in when we were expoſed; and children are to pay a proportionable regard even to their Nurſes; and Moſes was for ever oblig'd to Pharaohs daughter, becauſe ſhe reſcued him from drowning, and became as a Mother to him. And the reaſon of this is, becauſe in theſe things there is a natural rectitude, and a juſt proportion between the reaſon and the event; the reaſon of the thing is the cauſe why it was commanded. But in laws diſpoſitive or introductive of a new obligation there is ſome difference. Therefore,

25. 2. In odious caſes, and eſpecially in penal laws, the extenſion of the reaſon does neither extend the obligation nor the puniſhment; according to that gloſſe in the Canon law, In pœnis non arguimus ad ſimilia, quia pœnæ non excedunt proprium caſum. Puniſhments and odious burdens muſt not exceed the very caſe ſet down in the law: for if in the caſes ſet down the Judges are to give the gentleſt meaſure, it is not to be ſuppos'd that they can be be more ſevere then the letter of the law, which it ſelf requires an abatement and allay when it is capable: and as it is with Judges in the puniſhments appointed by law, ſo it is with all the ſubjects in the obligation of the law. For in both theſe caſes, it is to be preſum'd that the mind of the law-giver was not to oblige or to puniſh more and in more caſes; for ſi voluiſſet, expreßiſſet, is a good preſumption in theſe things, he could as eaſily have ſpoken that as this, if he had intended both alike; and he would, becauſe he knows that in odious things every one is willing to take the eaſieſt part: and therefore that is a good warranty to preſume of the mind of the law-giver; eſpecially ſince the apportioning ſuch a puniſhment to ſuch a fact hath in it no natural neceſſity, but depends upon the will of the law-giver, and therefore is not to be extended by a participation of the reaſon, but by a declaration of the will.

26. 3. When there is a defect in the law, and the public neceſſity or utility requires a ſupply, it may be ſupplied, and the obligation and the judgements even in matters of burden can be extended by the ſimilitude and parity of reaſon; for in this ſenſe it is true which the lawyers ſay, Caſus ſimilis expreſſo non cenſetur omiſſus. If it was omitted onely in the law, by the imperfection of it's ſanction, or want of conſideration, the Commonwealth muſt not ſuffer detriment, and therefore is to be help'd by the parity of reaſon. But then it is to be obſerv'd, that this is not wholly for the force and conſequence of the reaſon of the law, but for the neceſſity and profit of the republic, and therefore the ſupply is to be made by juriſdiction rather then by interpretation: ſo ſaith the law, Is qui juriſdictioni præeſt, ad ſimilia procedere, atque ita jus dicere debet, The Præfect that hath juriſdiction muſt doe right by proceeding to the like caſes: ſo that the juriſdiction and power is the ſufficient and indeed the adequate efficient of this ſupply; onely by the ſimilitude of reaſon he that hath juriſdiction can take occaſion to doe right. Quando lex in uno diſponit, bonam eſſe occaſionem cætera quæ tendunt ad eandem utilitatem vel interpretatione vel certâ juriſdictione ſupplendi; The Law having made proviſion in one caſe, it is a good occaſion to ſupply other caſes which tend to the ſame advantage; but this ſupply is to be made either by interpretation, if it can, or if it cannot, then by certain juriſdiction and authority. So that here are three things to be conſidered in this extenſion of obligation. The one is, that the law be defective and need ſupply. The ſecond is, that the ſupply be for the ſame utility and advantage which is in the expreſſed caſe of the law. And the third is, that if it cannot be by interpretation, that is, if it cannot be done by force of ſomething contained in the law, but that there be a very defect in the law, it be done by the force of authority: for the ſimilitude of reaſon is not enough, and therefore either the ſupreme, or a juriſdiction delegate with this power in ſpecial, is neceſſary. But where there is ſuch a power, the way of doing it is procedendo de ſimilibus ad ſimilia, the occaſion of ſupply muſt be taken from the ſimilitude of the reaſon. But this I ſay is to be done either in caſes of public neceſſity, or great equity and queſtions of favour. In other caſes there are yet more reſtraints.

27. 4. A ſimilitude of reaſon (except in the caſes now expreſſed) does not extend the law to caſes not comprehended in the words and firſt meaning of the law. For ratio legis non eſt lex, ſed quod ratione conſtituitur, ſay the Lawyers, Every thing that is reaſonable is not preſently a law, but that is the law which for that reaſon is decreed. And when a thing is propounded to a Prince, it is in the body politic as in the body natural, though the Underſtanding propound a thing as reaſonable, the Will ſtil hath power to chuſe or to reject it; and there may be reaſon for the thing in one regard, and reaſon againſt it in another; and if the reaſon in both caſes onely be alike, they are alſo unlike. Omne ſimile eſt etiam diſſimile. For Titius contracts friendſhip with Callinicus becauſe their Fathers were fellow-Souldiers in the Parthian warre, and they lov'd well: but Titius refuſes to contract the ſame league with Catulus, although the like reaſon was for him, his Father having been in the ſame legion in the ſame warre: but Catulus was an ill-natur'd man, and not fit to be entertain'd into ſuch ſocieties.

18. 5. The Conſcience is not bound to a greater duty then is expreſs'd in the words and firſt meaning of the law by the proportion and communication of the reaſon, unleſſe the reaſon be not onely alike, but be abſolutely the ſame in both caſes; and not onely ſo, but that the reaſon was adequate to the law, that is, was the reaſon which actually and alone did procure the ſanction of the law. When Cæſar took in a town in Gallia Narbonenſis, he deſtroyed the walls, and commanded they ſhould not build any more walls: they conſented, but caſt up a great trench of earth; and he came and fir'd their Town, becauſe although a trench of earth was not in the words of the contract or prohibition, yet becauſe Cæſar forbad the rebuilding of the walls for no other reaſon but becauſe he would not have it fortified, the law againſt walls was to be extended to trenches alſo for the identity of an adequate reaſon. To the ſame purpoſe is that of Quintilian, Cædes videtur ſignificare ſanguinem & ferrum: ſi quis alio genere homo fuerit occiſus, ad illam legem revertemur. A law againſt murder does commonly ſignify ſhedding of his bloud; but if a man have his neck broken, or be ſmother'd with pillows, or ſtrangled with a bow-ſtring, he ſhall be avenged by the ſame law that forbad he ſhould be killed with a knife or dagger: for it was not the inſtrument or the manner which the law regarded, but it wholly intended to ſecure the lives of the ſubjects. in declam. Paſtris.

19. 6. Now this identity of reaſon muſt be clear and evident, or elſe it effects nothing; for in matters of doubt the preſumption is for liberty and freedome. But it commonly is beſt judg'd by one or more of theſe following caſes. 1. The relative and the correlative are to be judg'd by the ſame reaſon when the reaſon of the law does equally concern them, though onely one be named in the proviſion of the law. If the husband muſt love the wife, the wife muſt love the husband, though ſhe were not nam'd in the law. For here they are equal. But in ſuperior and inferior the reaſon cannot be equal, but therefore is onely to be extended to the proportion of the reaſon. A Son muſt maintain his Father that is fallen into poverty, and ſo muſt a Father a Son: but they are not tied to equal obedience; to equal duty they are, but not to equal ſignifications and inſtances of it. A husband muſt be true to his wives bed, and ſo muſt ſhe to his; but ſhe may not be admitted to an equal liberty of divorce as he is: the reaſon is, becauſe the duty is equal, but the power is unequal; and therefore the conſequents of this muſt differ, though the conſequents of the other be the ſame. 2. The identity of the reaſon is then ſufficient for the extenſion of the law when one thing is contain'd under another, a particular under a general, an imperfect under a perfect, a part under the whole.

3. When the caſes are made alike by the effort of other laws. 4. When the law ſpecifies but one caſe for example ſake, the reſt alſo of the ſame nature and effect are comprehended. 5. When the caſes are radicated in the ſame principle, and are equally concerned.

30. 7. What is here ſaid concerning caſes and actions is alſo to be underſtood not onely of perſons, which cannot be ſeperated from the conſideration of actions which are always perſonal, but of places and times, when the analogy and force of the reaſon or the words require it. Onely each of theſe is to obſerve their proper caution. * Places are equally included in the meaning of the law, though they be not expreſs'd in the words of the law, if they be within the juriſdiction of the law-giver, that is, within the capacity of the law*. * But the caution concerning time is this, That although in laws declarative there is no difference of time, becauſe there the preſent law is not the meaſure of our duty, but ſuppoſes the duty limited and preſcrib'd before (nihil enim nunc dat, ſed datum ſignificat, ſaith the law in this caſe;) yet laws conſtitutive or introductive of a new right or obligation never of themſelves regard or can be extended to what is paſt, becauſe this is not in our power, and is not capable of Counſel or Authority; but they can onely be extended to the future: but the allay is this, for this is to be underſtood onely in precepts and prohibitions, but not in matters of indulgence and favour; for in this it is quite contrary: what the law hath forbidden in time paſt or preſent, and what ſhe hath or doth command is to be extended to the future; but Cum lex in præteritum quid indulget, in futurum vetat, When the law gives a pardon for what is paſt, and this pardon relies upon a proper reaſon, there is no leave given for the future to doe ſo though the ſame reaſon ſhall occurre; for the pardon of what went before is a prohibition of what is to come hereafter.

* See Chapter 1. Rule 8. of this book.

l. hæredes. § 1. ff. de Teſtam.

31. 8. When a law is made to take away an evil, it is to be underſtood alſo, and to be extended to all caſes of prevention, and from an actual evil paſſes on to a probability. When Antiochus agreed that Ptolemy ſhould not bring an army into Syria, he did not onely intend to remove the preſent hoſtility that he fear'd, but he intended alſo that he ſhould not bring any at all, though for paſſage onely through his Country; becauſe if his army were at all in Syria, he was in danger of ſuffering what by his treaty he deſir'd to prevent.

32. 9. Whatſoever is ſaid in laws is alſo true in promiſes and contracts: for theſe are laws to the contractors and intereſted perſons, and to be meaſur'd by the ſame proportions. For when the adequate reaſon of a promiſe or contract is evidently extended to another inſtance though not nam'd in the contract, it muſt be perform'd and ſuppos'd as included in the ſtipulation, and ſo ſtill in ſucceeding and new-ariſing inſtances; and the ſtate of things is not changed ſo long as that adequate reaſon remains for which the obligation was firſt contracted, though the thing be varied in a thouſand other circumſtances and accidents. But of this I ſhall have better opportunity to ſpeak in the laſt book.

33. I onely adde this one thing, That there is great caution to be us'd in determining our caſes of Conſcience by the meaſures of the reaſon of a law. For Non omnium quæ à Majoribus conſtituta ſunt ratio reddi poteſt, ſaid Julian.

Julian. It will be hard to find out what was the reason of the laws made by our forefathers; and unlesse the reason be expressed in the law, our conjectures are very often so wild and far amisse, that they will be very ill measures of conscience or obedience. Et ideo rationes eorum quæ constituuntur inquiri non oportet, alioquin multa ex iis quæ certa sunt subvertentur. We must obey the law, and never inquire after the reason, unlesse the law of it self declares it: it is not good to examine, for by this means many clear laws are made obscure and intricate. Delicata est illa obedientia quæ causas quærit. The law-giver is mov'd to the sanction of the law by the reason of the thing, but the sanction of the law is to be the onely reason of our obedience. ff. de leg.

RULE IV.

The Legislator hath authority to dispense in his own laws for any cause that himself prudently shall judge to be reasonable, so that no distinct interest be prejudic'd or injur'd.

1. Dispensation differs from interpretation of laws, because this does declare the law in certain cases not to bind; but dispensation supposes the law in actual obligation, not onely in general, but in this case, and to this person; and it is but like the old man in the fable his laying aside his burden of sticks, which he is bound to carry with him to his long home unlesse some friendly person come to help him. But Dispensation differs from diminution of laws by a ceasing or a contrary reason, because the law ceases of it self in this case, but in dispensation wholly by the will of the Prince. And lastly it differs from equity, because equity is law, melior lex, but dispensation is a remission of the law; and the cases of equity are such as by justice must be eas'd, but in dispensations there is nothing but benignity and favour. So that Dispensation is a voluntary act of the Princes grace and favour, releasing to any single person or community of men the obligation of the law, others at the same time remaining bound, not onely in other cases, but in the same and in the like. For although the same and the like cases of equity doe procure remission to all alike, yet in dispensations it is not so. One may be eased, and another not eas'd in the very same case. And the not understanding or not considering this great and material difference hath caus'd so great errors both in the understanding and in the ministeries of dispensation.

2. For if we use the word improperly, Dispensation can signify a declaration made by the superior that the subject in certain cases is not oblig'd, that the law-giver did not intend it: but this is interpretation of laws, or a declaration of the equitable part of the law, and is not properly an act of authority, but of doctrine and wisedome; save onely that that doctrine and that wisedome shall be esteemed authentical, and a warranty in doubt-full caſes: but if the ſubject did know the meaning of the law, as in moſt caſes he may, his conſcience is of it ſelf and by the intention of the law at liberty without any ſuch declaration; for that liberty is from an intrinſic cauſe, that is, from the natural equity and reaſonableneſſe of the caſe, and therefore claims nothing but what the law intends and ought to intend in its very ſanction. Now in theſe caſes to require diſpenſation, is to ask more then is needfull; it is as if one ſhould deſire his friend to untie his girdle when his cloths hang looſe about him: he needs it not; but that the wiſdome and charity of the law is made an artifice to get mony, and to put the ſubject to ſcruples and trouble that he may get his eaſe.

3. But when Diſpenſation ſignifies properly, it means an act of mere grace and favour, proceeding from an extrinſic cauſe; that is, not the nature of the thing, or the merit of the cauſe, but either the merit of the perſon, or ſome degrees of reaſonableneſſe in the thing; which not being of it ſelf enough to procure the favour of the law, is of it ſelf enough to make a man capable of the favour of the Prince; and if this be authority enough, that is reaſon enough. For ſince diſpenſation is an act of mere juriſdiction, and not of doctrine or skill and wiſedome and law, that is, it is not declarative of ſomething already in being, but effective of a leave which is neither unreaſonable nor yet due, ſo that it is not an act of juſtice, but of mercy and favour upon a fair and worthy occaſion; it muſt follow that the reaſon and cauſes of diſpenſation muſt be ſuch as are not neceſſary: but probable and fit to move a Prince they muſt be, leſt he doe an unreaſonable act.

4. All thoſe diſputes therefore amongſt the Civil and Canon Lawyers and the Divines, Whether the Prince ſins in diſpenſing without juſt cauſe, or the ſubject in deſiring it or uſing it without juſt cauſe; Whether if the cauſe be not that which they are pleas'd to call juſt, the diſpenſation be valid, and very many more, are inquiries relying upon weak grounds, and tending to no real purpoſe. For ſince the cauſe need not be neceſſary, but probable, it will be very hard if the Prince can find out no probable reaſon for what he does, and harder yet to imagine that he ſhould doe it at all, if he have not ſo much as a probable reaſon why he does it; and ſince the reaſon of diſpenſation is extrinſic to the cauſe or matter in hand very often, or elſe is but occaſion'd by the matter in hand, as moſt commonly it is in wiſe and good governments, it will be impoſſible but that the Prince will have reaſon enough to doe an act of kindneſſe in his own affairs and matters of his own diſpoſing: the Princes will being enough to ſatisfy us, and any good reaſon within or without being ſufficient for him if it does move and determine his will, the conſequent will be, that the Conſcience ought to be at reſt, without curious inquiry into the cauſe, if it have a diſpenſation from a juſt and competent authority.

5. And indeed it is not eaſy that the Prince can be reprov'd for the inſufficiency of the cauſe of diſpenſation: for a diſpenſation is not neceſſary to the conſcience at all, when the cauſe it ſelf is great and ſufficient for equity; but then it is neceſſary for the avoiding of ſcandal or civil puniſhments in ſome caſes, that there be a declaration of liberty & equity: but to diſpenſe is onely then proper and a fitting miniſtery 1. when the law is ſtill uſefull and reaſonable to one or more good purpoſes, but accidentally becomes comes an impediment of a greater good; or 2ly, when it is doubtfull whether the cauſe of equity and legal remiſſion without asking leave be ſufficient, for in this caſe, if the ſuperior diſpenſes, he ſupplies by favour what is wanting in the merit of the cauſe, and makes the conſcience ſure when the queſtion it ſelf was not ſure; or 3ly, to reward a vertue, or the ſervice of a worthy perſon, or to doe honour or favour, mercy and benignity upon the occaſion of any reaſonable conſideration. Theſe being all the cauſes of proper diſpenſations, it will be hard that every thing of this ſhould be wanting, or that what moves a prudent Prince to doe it, ſhould by the ſubject not be thought ſufficient, eſpecially ſince no man is judge of it but he that does it: and therefore he that ſaies the diſpenſation was for an inſufficient cauſe, hath no ſufficient cauſe to ſay it; it may be evil in the manner, or in the exceſſe, or in the event, but not in the moving cauſe, becauſe a little cauſe is ſufficient, and therefore a little cauſe cannot ſuffice to blame it. Nullius ſenſus eſſe præſumitur qui ſenſum vincat principalem. The ſubjects opinion can never overcome the opinion of the Prince in thoſe things where the Prince is Judge. l. fin. C. de legib.

6. There is onely this to be added, That he that diſpenſes with a law to particular perſons be carefull that it be in a matter wholly in his own power, and make no intrenchment upon religion ſo much as collaterally, ſo far as he can perceive, nor yet that any man be injur'd by it. And therefore if a Prince diſpenſes with any one in the matter of tribute, he muſt abate it from his own rights, and not lay it upon others, to their conſiderable and heavy preſſure. If it be inconſiderable, no man is to complain, but to indulge ſo much to the Princes reaſon and to the man whom the King will honour; but if it be conſiderable and great, the Prince ought not to do it, but upon ſuch a reaſon which may repay the private burden by the public advantage: and the reaſon of this is not, becauſe the Supreme power cannot diſpenſe with his own laws without great cauſe, but becauſe he cannot diſpenſe with other mens rights. And therefore when by the laws of Chriſtendome the Tiths were given to the Curates of ſouls of all the fruits ariſing in their pariſhes, it was unjuſtly done of the Pope to exempt the lands of the Ciſtertians and ſome other Orders from paying that due to the Pariſh Prieſt: for though he that hath a juſt power may uſe it for the benefit of his ſubjects, yet he may not uſe the rights of others and give away that which is none of his own, to eaſe one and burden another. In caſes of public neceſſity this may be done, but not for pleaſure, or a little reaſon. And therefore diſpenſations muſt be ſparingly granted, becauſe if they be eaſy and frequent, they will oppreſſe by their very numbers. Diſpenſationum modus nulli ſapientum diſplicuit, ſaid the Canon law. That which is but ſeldome and in ſmall things, or in little degrees, will be of no evil effect, and that which may greatly profit one or two will be no burden to a Common-wealth; but if it be often done, and to many, it may be of evil conſequent, and therefore ought not to be done, but upon a cauſe ſo weighty, that the good effect of the cauſe may prevail above the preſſure of the diſpenſation: for though this may be favour to one or to a few, yet it is juſtice to all. But if the diſpenſations be in matters of government, or cenſures, or favours and meer graces, where ſome are benefited and no man is injur'd, as in taking off irregularities, perſonal burdens which return to no mans ſhoulders, in giving graces beyond the uſual meaſures of laws, diſpenſations in time, in ſolennities of law, giving what by law could not be claimed; in theſe and the like the 1. q. 7.

Prince as he hath ſupreme power, ſo his good will being mov'd by any reaſonable inducement is warrant enough for him that gives it, and for him that uſes it.

Rule V.

The ſame power that can diſpenſe, can alſo commute a duty; and as in the firſt it eaſes, ſo in the latter it binds the Conſcience.

1. Commutation is nothing but a kind, or rather a particular manner of diſpenſation; and therefore hath in it no particular conſideration differing from the former, but onely ſuch prudential advices as are uſefull to the miniſtery and conduct of it.

2. For Commutation is a changing of the burden of the law into an act of, it may be, a greater uſefulneſſe but a leſſe trouble. Thus when a public penance is enjoyn'd to a lapſed perſon, who by a public ſhame would be hardned or oppreſſed, the Church ſometimes diſpenſes in the obligation, and changes it into almes, ut ſolvat in ære, quod non luit in corpore, that the fruit of his labours may goe for the ſin of his ſoul, and an expenſive almes may be taken in recompence of his exteriour humiliation.

3. 1. But this muſt be done ſo as may be no diminution to religion, or to adde confidence to the vices of great perſons, who ſpend much more in the purchaſes of their luſt then in the redemption of their ſhame, and therefore think they eſcape with their ſin, when they enjoy it at a price.

4. 2. It muſt be done never but upon conſiderations of piety and great regard; not becauſe the ſinner is powerfull or rich: for though in matters of commutative juſtice neither the rich man is to be regarded for his riches, nor the poor man for his poverty; yet in matters criminal and of diſtributive juſtice the rich man is leſſe to be eaſed, when the indulgence makes the crime more popular and imitable by the greatneſſe of the evil example; but he is more to be eaſed, when the puniſhment will by reaſon of his greatneſſe of honour be too unequal a diminution to him, and cauſe a contempt greater then the intention of the law.

5. 3. The commutation of the puniſhment impoſed by law muſt at no hand be done at a ſet price before-hand, or taxed in penitentiary tables, and be a matter of courſe, or indifferent diſpenſation: for when men know the worſt of the evil, which they fear, to be very tolerable and eaſy, it is an invitation, and does tempt to the ſin. But therefore this muſt be done by particular diſpenſation; not eaſily, not to all, not to many, not at all for the price, but to relieve the needs of him who is in danger of being ſwallowed by too great a ſorrow.

4. Commu-

6. 4. Commutations are not to be impos'd but when the diſpenſation is ſomething of eaſe in a law of burden; for then to change it into a leſſe burden is a diſpenſation by a commutation of which it is properly capable. Thus when abſtinence from fleſh is enjoyn'd by a law, it may be upon good ground diſpens'd withall and chang'd into an abſtinence from wine or ſtrong drink, or ſociety, or into almes. But when laws are made which contain in them no burden, but are in order to ſome end of perſonal or publick advantage, ſome end of vertue, or caution, or defence, then either the diſpenſation (when it is reaſonable to be requir'd) muſt be without commutation; or if it be not, the commutation muſt be made into ſomething that ſhall contribute to the end intended in the law. Thus if any one hath reaſon to deſire to be diſpenſed with in the publication or trine denunciation of an intended marriage, it is not reaſonable, nor according to the intention and wiſedome of the law, to change that law into a taxe of money, though for almes and religion; but it may be done by commanding them to abſtain from mutual congreſſe till the ſecret marriage can prudently be made public; becauſe this commutation does in ſome degree ſecure the end of the law, and makes ſome amends for want of publication of the bannes. If a Deacon have reaſon to deſire to receive the Order of Prieſthood from one that is not his own Dioceſan, the Biſhop that diſpenſes with him cannot prudently or juſtly require of him to give a ſumme of money for the reparation of a Church, becauſe that, though it be a good work, yet it is not in the ſame matter, nor does it cooperate toward the wiſe end of the law: but he does well, if he enjoyns him to procure and carry along with him greater teſtimonials of his converſation and worthineſſe, and that he publiſh his intention to all his own neighbourhood, that they may, if they ſee cauſe, object againſt him; and he may not be promoted by a clancular ordination.

7. 5. I might adde here, that in commutations the pretences of charity and almes and religion muſt not be the cover of avaritious practices and deſignes; but that this, although it be uſefull in reſpect of the corrupted manners of men, yet it is nothing to the explication of this Rule.

RULE VI.

A Cuſtome can interpret a law, but can never abrogate it without the conſent of the Supreme power.

1. THe doctrine of Cuſtomes both in divine laws and in humane, I have already explicated, ſo far as concerns their poſitive power, and the power of binding the Conſcience to obedience and complying. That which now is to be inquir'd is concerning their power to diſoblige and ſet at liberty: and even this alſo may very well be eſtimated by thoſe poſitive meaſures, and hath in it not very much of ſpecial conſideration, ſave this onely, that there is very great reason of dissenting from the commonly-received doctrine of the power of customes in this very particular.

2. For although by the consent of all the world custome can introduce a law, according to that saying of Tertullian, Consuetudo in rebus civilibus pro lege suscipitur, cum deficit lex, When there is no law, it is supplied by custome; and this is so far to be extended, that if the custome be reasonable, and antecedent to a law, it shall remain after the making of a law in that very matter, nisi expressè caveatur in ipsa, unless the law does expressely cancell it by particular caution: yet when a law is established and is good, the force of custome is not sufficient of it self to annul it, and to cancel the obligation of Conscience.

c. 1. de constitut. in 6.

3. A custome can interpret a law. Si de interpretatione legis quæratur, inprimis inspiciendum est, quo jure civitas retro in hujusmodi casibus uteretur, saies the law. For it is to be suppos'd that the law was obeyed, and in that sense in which the law-giver intended it; and that the people doe their duty in things of public concern is a just and a legal presumption: and therefore nothing is more reasonable in questions concerning the interpretation of a law, then to inquire how the practice of the people was in times bygone, because what they did when the reason and sense of the law was best perceiv'd, and what the law-giver allowed them to doe in the obedience of it, may best be suppos'd to be that which he intended. Upon this account, the judg'd cases in law are the best indication of the meaning of the law; because the sentence of the Judges does most solemnly convey the notice of a custome, and allow it reasonable, and by those customes does interpret the law, so that they give aid each to other; the custome gives assistance to the Judges in understanding the meaning of the law, and the Judges giving sentence according to the custome declare that custome to be reasonable; according to that in the Spanish laws, That custome is for ever hereafter to be observed, si secundum eam bis judicatum fuerit, if there have been two sentences pronounced according to the custome. But this use of custome is expressed both in the Civil and Canon law. In ambiguitatibus quæ ex legibus proficiscuntur, consuetudinem aut rerum perpetuò similiter judicatarum authoritatem vim legis obtinere debere. Custome and precedents of law are as good as law in all questions of law and of doubtfull interpretation: and therefore the Presidents of Provinces were commanded to judge by the measures of custome: probatis iis quæ in oppido frequenter in eodem controversiarum genere servata sunt, causâ cognitâ statuat; see what is the custome of the place, and by the measures of that let the decree passe. And so it is in the Canon law, where a certain Bishop is commanded to inquire what is the custome of the Metropolitan Church and the Churches in the neighbourhood, & diligentius imitari, to follow it diligently, meaning both in practice and in sentences. Now in this, if the Conscience can be relieved and the rigor of the law abated by the aides of custome, it is safe to use it, and to proceed according to the rules of equity, describ'd in the beginning of this Chapter.

4. But all this is therefore reasonable because it is consuetudo secundum legem, it is according to law; all the ease and abatements of which that are reasonable the Conscience may safely use. But if a custome be against a law, the law, and not the custome ought to prevail; for a custome cannot take off off from us the duty and obedience we owe to the juſt laws of our ſuperiors. Conſuetudo nec rationem vincit nec legem. As in Divine laws reaſon and truth can never be prejudic'd by contrary cuſtomes; ſo in humane laws, the authority and obligation cannot be annull'd by deſuetude alone. For although a man may get impunity and ſave his skin whole under the protection of contrary cuſtome; yet our inquiry is for the indemnity of Conſcience: and as to this, it is conſiderable that when a cuſtome contrary to law does enter, it enters by neglect or diſobedience, by rebellion or contempt, it proceeds all the way in the paths of iniquity; for ſtill men goe quà itur, non quà eundum eſt, they goe, like frighted or wandring ſheep, there where the gap is open, not where the way lies: and it will be impoſſible that ſuch cuſtomes ſhould be a warranty to the conſcience, and that it ſhould be lawfull to break a law, becauſe the law is broken; that diſobedience ſhould warrant rebellion *; and that it be innocent to follow the multitude to ſin. So that ſo long as the cuſtome is alone and walks by it ſelf, it walks amiſſe: but if by any means this cuſtome paſs into lawfull, as a traveller that goes ſo far weſtward and ſtill goes on till at laſt he comes to the riſing of the ſun, then it is not by any force of the cuſtome, but by firſt obtaining pardon and then procuring leave.

l. 2. C. quæ ſit long. conſuet.

*Non poſſe præſcribi contra obedientiam. cap. cum non liceat. de præſcript.

5. For it is obſervable that in law, cuſtomes themſelves are eſteem'd illegal and reprobate if they be againſt law. Licet uſus conſuetudinis non minima ſit authoritas, nunquam tamen veritati aut legi præjudicat; Uſe and cuſtome hath great authority, but nothing againſt truth or law: and Non valet conſuetudo contra canonicam inſtitutionem; for the cuſtome is unreaſonable if it be againſt law: for illam dico rationabilem quam non improbant jura, ſaith the Gloſſe in cap. ult. de conſuet. verbo rationabilis; and the Lateran Council defines thoſe cuſtomes to be reaſonable, quæ ratione juvantur & ſacris congruunt inſtitutis, which are aſſiſted by reaſon and are agreeable to the holy Canons. Now becauſe a cuſtome is by no law admitted unleſſe it be reaſonable, and that by all laws thoſe cuſtomes are judg'd unreaſonable which are againſt law; we have reaſon to withdraw our ſelves from the practice of ſuch cuſtomes though they be never ſo general and long, unleſſe they be by ſome other means allowed.

cap. cum cauſa. de re judicata.

6. And therefore there is wholly a miſtake in this doctrine, upon the account of an ἐναντιοφάνεια and ſome antinomies in law: for it is certain that in the Civil law, and in the laws of many nations anciently, the cuſtome of the people was eſteem'd ſufficient to abrogate a law; but it began firſt, and continued long onely in thoſe Common-wealths where the people had power to make a law, or had ſome pretenſions and colours of that power which were not wholly to be taken from them: and therefore, Rectiſſimè receptum eſt ut leges non ſolum ſuffragio legiſlatoris, ſed etiam tacito conſenſu omnium per deſuetudinem abrogentur, Laws are abrogated not onely by the expreſſe revocation of the law-giver, but by the ſecret conſent of all. And the reaſon of this is well expreſs'd by Julianus the Lawyer, Quid intereſt ſuffragio populus voluntatem ſuam declaret, an rebus ipſis & factis? It is all one how the people ſignify their will, by ſuffrages or by actions: meaning that ſo long as the legiſlative power was in them, they had power to revoke their own law by cuſtome as well as by voice, at long running as well as at one convention. But when the people are not their own ſubjects and their own Princes (for ſo they are in all popular governments) but that the Prince

l. de quibus. ff. de legib.

or the Senate hath the legiſlative power, they cannot introduce a cuſtome but by rebellion and diſobedience. In Democracies, when the people did otherwiſe then their own laws requir'd, they diſobeyed themſelves, and ſo were innocent and out of danger; but now they cannot diſobey but they ſin, and a ſin can never of it ſelf lead a man to innocence, nor a lie to truth, unleſſe it be by the help of ſome other intervening cauſe, of it ſelf alone it cannot. But this affair relies upon the ſame ground which I formerly diſ-
Chap. 1. Rule 7. cours'd of in this book; for the miſtake of men is alike in both. The obligation of a law does not depend upon the acceptation of the people; and as a law hath not it's beginning ſo neither can it have it's perpetuity dependantly upon them; and no man thinks it hath, but he who ſuppoſes the ſupreme power to be originally in the people, and in the King by truſt; and there are too many that think that, for there have been ſo many Democratical governments that many wiſe men have ſaid ſo, becauſe then they had reaſon: but ſo many popular governments have alſo produc'd popular opinions, which being too much receiv'd even by wiſe men, have ſtill given the people occaſion to talk ſo ſtill, and to very many to believe them.

7. But if a contrary cuſtome could juſtly abrogate a law, then it were no matter who had the legiſlative power, for whatever the Prince pleaſe, the people ſhall chuſe whether it be a law or no; which becauſe it is a perfect deſtruction to all government, muſt needs proceed from an intolerable principle. To which I adde this conſideration, that whatever effect in law and external regiment a cuſtome may be admitted to have, of which I am not concern'd to give accounts, yet if the cuſtome be againſt law, it is certain the conſcience can have no ſafety, and no peace but in the obedience to the law. For beſides that there are ſo many difficult and indeterminable queſtions in the conduct of the matter of cuſtomes, as whether the cuſtome be reaſonable, and who is to judge of that, and by what meaſures; what are the ſufficient cauſes of cuſtome, whether there muſt be ſome inequality or preſſure or iniquity in the matter, or is it ſufficient that the multitude is willing to introduce a cuſtome againſt law? what time and continuance is requir'd to preſcribe a cuſtome, and when it begins to be innocent, and how long it is diſobedience; how many muſt concurre to the making of it, and whether the diſſent of a few does interrupt it's coalition and growing into a cuſtome, and how ſhall we know whether all or no doe conſent? or how are we ſure that a greater part is ſufficient, and that we have the greater part with us? whether for the abrogation of the law a mere deſuetude or omiſſion is ſufficient, or muſt the cuſtome be contrary to the law and matter of fact? and if that be ſufficient to annul an affirmative precept, how many things and circumſtances ōf things will be further requir'd for the removing the obligation of a negative commandement? and very many more to the ſame purpoſes, that is, to no purpoſes: beſides this, I ſay, the conſcience can never be warranted in any thing but obedience, becauſe it is impoſſible to tell the preciſe time in which the law is actually abrogated by the cuſtome; and therefore a man can never know by all that is before him in this affair, whether he be worthy of love or hatred.

8. There is onely one caſe that can ſet this right, and give warranty to the conſcience, and that is when the Prince or the ſupreme power allows the cuſtome and annuls his own law; for he onely that made it can give it a period: and therefore our inquirie can be onely this, how we ſhall know when the the Prince is willing the law ſhall goe for nothing. Concerning which there are but two ways of our knowing it, or his doing it. The one is by tacit conſent or ſecret approbation of the cuſtome, as by not puniſhing, by not complaining, and by ſilence; and the other is by direct revocation. The former will be very hard to know ſo well as to be able to bring peace to an inquiring and curious conſcience; but I ſhall give accounts of the beſt ways of knowing it in the next book, in the explication of this Rule, Qui tacet conſentire videtur: of the latter I am to ſpeak in the next Rule. In the mean time there is nothing ſure for the conſcience but to obey the laws, onely that we can underſtand that the cuſtome is then approved when it paſſes in rem judicatam, when the Kings Judges have given ſentence in a cauſe againſt an old law, for a later cuſtome; which when they have reaſon to doe, the Princes will is ſufficiently declared; till then, if we cannot ſufficiently know that the Prince does ſecretly approve the cuſtome againſt the law, we muſt ſtay till the law be expreſſely abrogated, and then the cuſtome may ſafely be complied with, becauſe then we are ſure it is not againſt law. For, as Panormitan ſaid well, Oportet ut duæ partes ſint ſcientes conſuetudinis quæ introducitur. Not onely the people, but the Prince too muſt conſent before the cuſtome be approved. For there muſt be two words to this bargain.

RULE VII.

Abrogation of a law by a competent, that is, by the Supreme power, may be juſt and reaſonable, though the law it ſelf be neither unreaſonable nor unjuſt.

1. THE cauſes of abrogating a law are all thoſe which are ſufficient to make a good and a wiſe man change his mind. The alteration of the cauſe of the law, new emergencies, unfit circumſtances, public diſlike, a greater good: for it is no otherwiſe in the public then in the private will; there where a man is maſter of his will and ruler of his own affairs, there is nothing to be conſider'd, but that what he does be done wiſely and juſtly and charitably. The ſame power that makes the law, the ſame can annul it, and the ſame reaſon which introduc'd the law, can alſo change it: and there is no difference but this onely, that a law may not be impoſed unleſſe the matter of it be honeſt, or holy, or profitable; but it may be abrogated though it be all this, provided it be not neceſſary. For to the making of a law all the conditions are requir'd, a competent authority, and juſt matter, and fitting promulgation; but to the abrogation of it, the defect of any one cauſe is ſufficient. And therefore if the law be unjuſt, it ceaſes of it ſelf; if it be uſeleſſe, it falls into juſt neglect; if it be not publiſh'd, it is not born; if it be generally diſlik'd, it is ſuppos'd to be uncharitable, and therefore is as good as if it were not born, for it will be ſtarv'd at Nurſe. But when it is made it muſt continue and be maintain'd by all theſe things together;

gether; and therefore when any one fails, the whole ſtructure deſcends into diſſolution and a heap. But therefore if the will of the Prince changes, and that he will not have it to be a law, it looſes the ſpirit, though the body and the external cauſes of life remain. For though an action muſt not be done unleſſe it be good and innocent, yet it is not neceſſary that it be done, though it be ſo. Every thing that is good is not neceſſary, and many good things are let alone, and at the ſame time others as good as they are done, and ſometimes better: and becauſe there are many good proviſions and counſels which are not taken, and are not made into laws, many ſuch things which are well enough may be laid aſide, either for the procuring a greater good, or for the avoiding of ſome appendant inconvenience. But in theſe caſes, unleſſe the Prince be obliged by oath or promiſe to preſerve this law, his abrogating even of a good law is no queſtion of juſtice, but of prudence and charity, both which alſo may be preſerved, if the good be chang'd, or improv'd, or recompens'd. But whether it be right or wrong on the Princes part, yet if the law be annull'd, the conſcience of the ſubject is no longer bound. The Prince cannot bind the conſcience, unleſſe the law be good; but the conſcience is at liberty, though the abrogation be not good. Becauſe the goodneſſe of the matter cannot make it into a law without the Prince's will, but the Prince's will can alone make it ceaſe to be.

2. Upon this account, it is not unſeaſonable to inquire whether, that a thing hath been abus'd may be accounted a juſt and a prudent cauſe to take it quite away.

3. That it may be a juſt, that is, a ſufficient cauſe, is out of all queſtion, becauſe it is not unjuſt; for then in this caſe it is juſt enough, though it be not neceſſary. But whether it be prudent for the Prince to doe it, and whether it be neceſſary that it be done, is another conſideration. But to this the precedent of Hezekiah King of Judah is a good guide. For he brake in pieces the brazen ſerpent, becauſe the people made it an idol; and he did prudently, becauſe the people who were too apt to that crime could not eaſily be kept from doing it ſo long as that great memorial of the divine power did remain. It is like removing a beautifull woman from the greedy eyes of a yong perſon; he cannot behold her and be ſafe: and thus it is in all caſes, if the evil be incumbent, and not remediable, nor to be cleans'd from miſchief or juſt ſuſpicion and actual danger, then whatſoever is ſo abus'd not onely may, but ought to be remov'd. But if that which was abus'd be now quitted from the abuſe, then it may be kept, if it be good for any thing: and if it were not, I ſuppoſe there would be no queſtion about it.

4. But in the change of laws, or reformation of prevailing evil cuſtomes, prudence is good always, and zeal ſometimes: but certainly the contrary and the exterminating way of reformation is not always the beſt, becauſe he that oppoſes a vice too fiercely may paſſe into a contrary vice as readily as into a contrary vertue. If a Church happens to command ſome rituals and formes of worſhip in a ſuperſtitious manner or to ſuperſtitious purpoſes, or if men doe obſerve them with a curioſity great as to the niceneſſe of ſuperſtition, it is not good to oppoſe them ſuperſtitiouſly. If the obedient doe keep the rituals as if they were the Commandements of God, they are to blame: but if the diſobedient will reject them as if they were of themſelves ſelves againſt God's Commandements they are more to blame, becauſe a ſuperſtitious obedience is better then a ſuperſtitious rebellion; that hath piety and error in an evil mixture, but this hath error and impiety.

5. But as to the ſubject matter and inquiry of the Rule; That a thing hath been abus'd, and a law hath been made the occaſion of evil, it does not make the law of it ſelf to ceaſe, unleſſe that abuſe and deception be not to be cur'd without abrogation of the law. So that if a ſubject ſees the abuſe and is offended at it, and is not tempted to comply with it, he is ſtill tied to obſerve the law, and in his own practice ſeparate it from the abuſe. Thus in the Primitive Church, the obſervation of Vigils and Wakes was a holy cuſtome, and yet it afterwards grew into ſuch abuſe, that the Eccleſiaſtic authority thought it fit to abrogate it; becauſe the cuſtome in the declining piety and corrupted manners of the world was a ready temptation to the evil. But till the Vigils were taken away by authority, the laws of the Church did ſtill oblige, and did not ceaſe of themſelves: and therefore where with innocence and without active ſcandal they could be obſerved, the ſubject was oblig'd. But then this was cauſe enough why the Rulers of Churches ſhould annul that law or cuſtome. If they could eaſily have quitted thoſe meetings from corruption, they might if they pleas'd retain them or annul them, as they liſted; onely they were bound to annul them when the evil could find no other remedy. The abuſe even ſo long as it was curable was yet cauſe enough why the Supreme power might abrogate the law, but not ſufficient to make the abrogation neceſſary, nor yet for the ſubject to diſobey it. For the inferior cannot lawfully withdraw his obedience, till the ſuperior cannot lawfully retain the law: but when to abrogate it is neceſſary, then to diſobey it is no ſin.

6. I conclude theſe numerous inquiries and large accounts of the obligation of Conſcience by Humane laws, with the Apologue taken out of Nicolaus Damaſcenus his Politics. Ἱβήεων αἱ γυναῖκες ἔχουσι μέτρον τι τῆ ζώνης, ἢ τῷ γαστέρα περιλαβεῖν ἂν μὴ δυνηθῶσιν αἰσχρὸν ἡγοῦνται. Laws are like the girdles of the Iberian women: if any mans belly or his heart is too big for thoſe circles, he is a diſſolute and a diſhonour'd perſon.

The Fourth Book.

HE that intends to conſider any thing fully and intirely, muſt conſider it in all the four kinds of cauſes. The Formal cauſe, or the eſſentiality of good and evil is the doing it with or againſt Conſcience, true or falſe, right or wrong, confident or doubtfull, probable or certain; and this I have explicated in the Firſt book. The Material cauſe of good and evil is derived from the object or the Rule, which is the laws of God and Man, by a conformity to which the action is good; and if it diſagrees, it is materially evil. And this I have largely repreſented in the Second and Third Books.

But becauſe it is not enough that any thing be in its own nature honeſt and juſt, unleſſe it be alſo honeſtly and juſtly done, according to that ſaying of the wiſe man, Qui ſanctitatem ſanctè cuſtodiunt judicabuntur ſancti, They that keep holineſſe holily ſhall be adjudged holy; to make up the Rule of Conſcience complete, it is neceſſary that it be conſidered by what Rules and meaſures a good action may be rightly conducted, and how all may be rightly judged, that we paſſe on to emendation, either by repentance or improvement, that a good action may not be ſpoil'd, and an evil may not be allowed, but that according to the words of the Apoſtle we may be εἰς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἡτοιμασμένοι prepar'd for every good work: which will be done by conſidering the efficient and the final cauſes of all humane actions; the nature and rules of which when we underſtand and conſider, as we have the meaſure of humane actions in all the four kinds of cauſes, ſo there will be nothing deficient to the fulneſſe of a general or univerſal Rule of Conſcience.

CHAP. I.

Of the efficient cauſes of all Humane actions good or evil.

§. 1. Of Choice and Election, voluntary and involuntary.

RULE I.

An action is neither good nor evil, unleſſe it be voluntary, and choſen.

1. THis Rule is taken from the doctrine of S. Auſtin, who makes freedome and election to be of the conſtitution and definition of ſin. Peccatum eſt voluntas retinendi vel conſequendi quod juſtitia vetat, & unde liberum eſt abſtinere. The will is the miſtreſſe of all our actions, of all but ſuch as are ne- habetur 15. qu. 1. in princip. lib. De duabus animabus cap. 11.

ceſſary and natural; and therefore to her it is to be imputed whatſoever is done. The action it ſelf is good or bad by it's conformity to, or difformity from the Rule of Conſcience; but the Man is good or bad by the will.

ibid. ubi ſuprá. cap. non eſt. Nemo noſtrûm tenetur ad culpam, niſi propriâ voluntate deflexerit, ſaid S. Ambroſe. If the actions be natural and under no command of the will, they are good by creation and the act of God; but if it be a moral action it is to be conducted by another Oeconomy. For in theſe it is true which the Wiſe man ſaid, Deus poſuit hominem in manu conſilii ſui: God intending to be glorified by our free obedience hath ſet before us good and evil: we may put our hand to which we will; onely what we chuſe that ſhall be our portion: for all things of this nature he hath left us to our ſelves; not to our natural ſtrengths, but to our one choice; he hath inſtructed us how to chuſe; he hath open'd to us not onely the nature of things, but the event alſo of all actions, and invited the will with excellent amabilities and glorious objects; and by all the aides of the Spirit of Grace hath enabled it to doe it's own work well. Juſt as Nature is by Phyſic enabled to proceed in her own work of nutriment and increaſe by a removing of all impediments, ſo does the Spirit of God in us, and to us, and for us: and after all the will is to chuſe by it's own concreated power.

2. I ſhall not here enter into the philoſophy of this queſtion, but conſider it onely as it is to be felt and handled. Let the will of man be enabled by what means it pleaſe God to chuſe for it, without God's grace we are ſure it cannot doe it's work; but we are ſure alſo that we can doe our work that God requires of us, and we can let it alone: and therefore as ſure as God's grace and help is neceſſary, ſo ſure it is that we have that help that is neceſſary; for if we had not, we could not be commanded to work, and there were no need of arguments or of reaſon, of deliberation or inquiry,

lib. de fide contra Manichæos cap. 10. according to the words of S. Auſtin, Quis non clamet ſtultum eſſe præcepta dare ei, cui liberum non eſt quod præcipitur facere; & iniquum eſſe eum damnare, cui non fuit poteſtas juſſa complere? For if in humane actions, that is actions of morality, there be a fate, then there is no contingency, and then all deliberation were the greateſt folly in the world; becauſe ſince onely one part is poſſible (that being impoſſible to come to paſſe which God hath inevitably decreed ſhall never be) the other part is but a chimæra, and therefore not ſubject to conſultation. Adde to this, if all our actions were predetermin'd, then one man were not better then another, and there could be no difference of rewards in heaven or earth; God might give what he pleaſe, but he ſhall reward none, not in any ſenſe whatſoever; & Chriſtian Princes may as well hang a true man as a thief, becauſe this man no more breaks his law then the other, for neither of them doe obey or diſobey, but it is fortune that is hang'd, and fortune that is advanc'd:

Ille crucem [ſortis] pretium tulit, hic diadema;

and there is no ſuch thing as vertue, no praiſe, and no law. But in all this there is nothing new. For theſe were long ſince the diſcourſes of S. Auſtin againſt the Manichees, and S. Hierom againſt the Pelagians; and S. Leo by theſe very Mediums confutes the Priſcillianiſts, as appears in his 19th Epiſtle to Turibius the Biſhop. But certainly that is a ſtrange propoſition which affirms that nothing is poſſible but what is done; and to what purpoſe is repentance? No man repents that he could not ſpeak as ſoon as he was born, and no man repents that he was begotten into the world by the ordinary way way of all the earth. He that repents is troubled for doing what he ought not, and what he need not. But I will goe on no further in this particular; not becauſe I cannot chuſe, for I could adde very many more things, but becauſe if a man hath not a power to will or nill, it is to no purpoſe to write caſes of Conſcience, or indeed to doe any thing as wiſe men ſhould. A fool and a wiſe man differ not, a lazy man and a diligent, a good man and a bad, ſave onely one hath a better ſtarre; they differ as a ſtrong man and a weak: but though one be the better thing, he is not the better man. But I am not here to diſpute, yet I ſhall obſerve a few things which may be uſefull to the queſtion as the queſtion can miniſter to practice.

3. 1. That whereas all men granting liberty of will in actions of natural life and common entercourſe, many of them deny it in moral actions, and many more deny it in actions ſpiritual, they conſider not that they evacuate and deſtroy the very nature and purpoſe of liberty and choice. For beſides that the caſe of moral actions and ſpiritual is all one, for that action is moral which is done in obedience or diſobedience to a law, and ſpiritual is no more, ſave onely it relates to another law, to the Evangelical or Spiritual law of liberty, but in the nature of the thing it is the ſame, and can as well be choſen one as the other, when they are equally taught, and alike commanded, and propounded under the ſame proportionable amability, and till they be ſo they are not equally laws; beſides this, the denying liberty in all moral things, that is in all things of manners, in all things of obedience to the laws of God and Man, and the allowing it in things under no law, is a deſtruction of the very nature and purpoſe of liberty. For the onely end of liberty is to make us capable of laws, of vertue and reward, and to diſtinguiſh us from beaſts by a diſtinct manner of approach to God, and a way of conformity to him proper to us; and except in the matter of Divine and humane laws, except in the matter of vertue and vice, except in order to reward or puniſhment, liberty and choice were good for nothing: for to keep our ſelves from harm, and poiſon, and enemies, a natural inſtinct, and lower appetites, and more brutiſh faculties would ſerve our needs as well as the needs of birds and beaſts. And therefore to allow it where it is good for nothing, and to deny it where onely it can be uſefull and reaſonable and fit to be done, and given by the wiſe Father of all his creatures, muſt needs be amiſſe.

4. 2. Liberty of choice in moral actions, that is, in all that can be good or bad, is agreeable to the whole method and purpoſe, the Oeconomy and deſigne of humane nature and being. For we are a creature between Angel and beaſt, and we underſtand ſomething, and are ignorant of much, and the things that are before us are mixt of good and evil, and our duty hath much good and ſome evil, and ſin hath ſome good and much evil, and therefore theſe things are and they are not to be purſued; Omne voluntarium eſt etiam involuntarium, and there is a weight on both ſides, and our propoſitions are probable, not true and falſe, but for ſeveral reaſons ſeeming both to ſeveral perſons. Now if to all this there were not a faculty that ſhould proportionably, and in even meaſures, and by a ſymbolical progreſſion tend to theſe things, we could not underſtand, we could not ſee, we could not admire the numbers and muſic and proportions of the Divine wiſedome in our creation in relation to this order of things. For ſince in our objects there is good and evil in confuſion or imperfect mixture, if our faculties tending to theſe objects were natural, and not deliberative & elective, they muſt take all in, or thruſt all out, and either they muſt receive no good, or admit every evil. It is natural for every thing to love it's good and to avoid it's evil: now when the good and evil are ſimple and unmixt or not diſcerned, an inſtinct and a natural tendency to the object is ſufficient to inveſt it in the poſſeſſion. But when they are mixt, and we are commanded to chuſe the good and eſchew the evil, if to an indifferent object there be not an indifferent faculty, what Symmetry and proportion is in this creation? If there be two amabilities propounded, and onely one is to be followed, and the other avoided, ſince the hand hath five, the ſoul muſt at leaſt have two fingers, the one to take, the other to put away. And this is ſo in all ſpecies or kinds of moral actions, even that kind which we call ſpiritual; for with that alſo there is mingled ſo much difficulty and diſpleaſure, that is, ſo much evil, ſo much that we naturally and reaſonably deſire to avoid, and the avoiding of this evil does ſo ſtand againſt the chuſing of the other good, that a natural and unchuſing faculty can doe nothing at all in the queſtion. But upon this account God hath commanded induſtry, diligence, toleration, patience, longanimity, mortification; that is, he hath ſet before us ſeveral eligibilities in order to ſeveral ends, which muſt either be wholly to no purpoſe, or an art of vexation and inſtrument of torment to evil purpoſe, or elſe the means of a reward, and the way of felicity by the advantage of a free and a wiſe choice, and this is to very good purpoſe.

Ovid. Triſt. lib. 4. El. 3.

Materiamque tuis triſtem virtutibus imple:
Ardua per præceps gloria vadit iter.
Hectora quis noſſet, ſi felix Troja fuiſſet?
Publica virtutis per mala facta via eſt.

It is difficulty and the mixture of ſeveral amabilities that preſuppoſes choice and makes vertue. But if events and actions were equally predetermin'd, idleneſſe would be as good as labour, and peeviſhneſſe as good as patience; but then a man could never come to God. It was well ſaid of Euſebius, Σῶμα ἀργὴν πίκει, ψυχὴν ὃ ἀμελέτησις· ἀσκήσεως τὸν αὐτὸν ἀείρασης πρὸς τὸ θεοδίδακτον. As idleneſſe is to the body, ſo is careleſneſſe and inconſideration to the ſoul, but exerciſe and difficulty and mortification bring us unto God: but theſe things cannot be underſtood but where there is liberty and election, and yet without theſe there is no vertue.

Sil. Ital. l. 9.

——Nam virtus futile Nomen
Ni decus adfuerit patiendo, ubi tempora lethi
Proxima ſint, pulchramque petat per vulnera laudem.

Difficulty makes vertue, and the contrariety of objects makes difficulty, and the various ends and amabilities make the contrariety, and liberty is the hand and fingers of the ſoul by which ſhe picks and chuſes, and if ſhe gathers flowers ſhe makes her ſelf a garland of immortality.

5. 3. All this ſtate of things thus repreſented muſt needs ſignify a ſtate much more perfect then that of beaſts, but very imperfect in reſpect of that of Angels, and of that which we our ſelves expect hereafter; and therefore that liberty which is made in juſt proportion to fit this imperfection muſt alſo of it ſelf needs be imperfect, and need not be envied to mankind as if it were a jewel of the celeſtial crown. Alas it is an imperfection, fection, fit to humble us, not to make us proud; it is not too much to be given us, it is a portion of our imperfect condition; it onely ſets us higher then a Tulip, and enlarges our border beyond the folds of ſheep or the Oxens ſtall, but it keeps us in our juſt ſtation, ſervants to God, inferior to Angels, and in poſſibility of becoming Saints. For in moral or ſpiritual things liberty and indetermination is weakneſſe, and ſuppoſes a great infirmity of our reaſon and a great want of love. For if we underſtood all the degrees of amability in the ſervice of God, and if we could love God as he deſerves, we could not deliberate concerning his ſervice, and we could not poſſibly chuſe or be in love with diſobedience, we ſhould have no liberty left, nothing concerning which we could deliberate; for there is no deliberation but when ſomething is to be refus'd, and ſomething is to be preferr'd, which could not be but that we underſtand good but little, and love it leſſe. For the Saints and Angels in heaven and God himſelf love good and cannot chuſe evil, becauſe to doe ſo were imperfection and infelicity; and the Devils and accurſed ſouls hate all good, without liberty and indifferency: but between theſe is the ſtate of Man in the days of his pilgrimage, untill he comes to a confirmation in one of the oppoſite termes. Liberty of will is like the motion of a Magnetic needle toward the North, full of trembling and uncertainty till it be fixt in the beloved point: It wavers as long as it is free, and is at reſt when it can chuſe no more. It is humility and truth to allow to man this liberty; and therefore for this we may lay our faces in the duſt, and confeſſe that our dignity and excellence ſuppoſes miſery and is imperfection, but the inſtrument and capacity of all duty and all vertue.

6. 4. In the inquiries concerning the efficient cauſe of moral actions men doe deny one truth for fear of looſing another, and will not allow to man a liberty of choice in ſpiritual actions and moral effects, for fear of diſparaging the grace of God; whereas it is by the grace of God that we have this liberty. Ipſa ratio quemlibet noſtrum quærentem vehementer anguſtat, ne ſic defendamus gratiam ut liberum arbitrium auferre videamur: rurſus nec liberum ſic aſſeramus arbitrium, ut ſuperbâ impietate ingrati Dei gratiæ judicemur. It is very eaſy to reconcile God's grace with our liberty, becauſe by this grace it is that we have this liberty. For no man can chuſe what he does not know, and no man can love that which hath in it no amability. Now becauſe we have all notices ſpiritual and the arguments of invitation to obedience in duties Evangelical from revelation and the grace of God, therefore to this we owe the liberty of our will, that is, a power to chuſe ſpiritual things. Grace and truth come by Jeſus Chriſt, and liberty of will comes from him; for if the Son makes us free, then are we free indeed: but this is not by giving us new faculties, but new ſtrengths and new inſtruments to theſe faculties we have already. But let it be this way or any other, we cannot work till we have powers to work, and we cannot chuſe till we have liberty, and we cannot be under a law, and promiſes and threatnings, if we cannot chuſe: and therefore it matters not as to our preſent inquiry, the explication and manner of ſpeaking of which ſchool of learning we or any man ſhall pleaſe to follow: this onely we are to rely upon, that the man cannot be a good man, if he doe not chuſe the good and decline the evil; and there is no ſuch thing as Conſcience, and there is no need of it, and no uſe (except it be merely to torment us,) unleſſe it be to guide us into the choice of good, and to deterre us from doing evil.

7. But laſtly, It will yet be ſufficient to the verification of this Rule, that whether we affirm or deny the liberty of the will, yet that there be in every action good or bad the action of the will; and if that be not neceſſary to be admitted as the cauſe of morality, then he that kills a man againſt his will is as bad as he that did it with his will, and he that receives the holy Sacrament by conſtraint does as well as he that chuſes it, and to confeſſe Chriſt againſt our Conſcience is as good as if we confeſſe him according to it: for when the material actions are the ſame, there is nothing can diſtinguiſh the men that doe them, but ſomething within that can doe this, or let it alone. Now becauſe a good underſtanding, and a good fancy, and a great reaſon, and a great reſolution, and a ſtrong heart, and a healthfull body may be in a reprobate or vitious perſon, but a good will and the choice of vertue is onely in a good man, it follows that all morality depends on the action of the will; and therefore that all other faculties are natural and neceſſary and obedient, this onely is the Empreſſe, and is free, and Miſtreſſe of the action.

8. And yet beyond this heap of things, there is another reaſon why a man can be good or bad onely by the act of his will, and not of any other faculty, becauſe the act of the will produces material and permanent events; it is acquiſitive and effective, or recuſative and deſtructive, otherwiſe then it is in any other faculties. For the other faculties are like the eye and ear, they can ſee or hear foul things and be never the worſe, and good things and be never the better: but the will of a man is like the hand and the mouth and the belly, if they touch foul things they are defiled, and if they eat poiſon they die; ſo is the will of man, it becomes all one with it's object. For it works onely by love or hatred, and therefore changes by the variety of the object it entertains. He that loves a lie is a liar; but he that onely underſtands it, is never the worſe. Facti ſunt abominabiles ſicut ea quæ dilexerunt, ſaith the Prophet, They are made abominable according as they loved; [as the things are which they loved] ſo the Vulgar Latin: and ſo it is in good things, ὁ κολλώμενος τῷ Κυρίῳ ἓν πνεῦμά ἐστι, He that is joyn'd to the Lord is one ſpirit: love makes the faculty like to the object, and therefore as the object of the will is, whoſe action is love, ſo is the man good or bad accordingly.

Hoſe. 9. 10.

1 Cor. 6. 17.

9. Now this is not ſo to be underſtood as if the actions of other faculties could not be ſins; for a ſin may be in the memory, in the fancy, in the underſtanding, in the eye, and in the members of the body: but then in theſe is onely the material part of the ſin; if the actions ſubjected in them be involuntary they are not criminal, they may be irregular, but not ſinfull; onely as the will commands them and they obey, ſo they are to ſtand or fall in judgment. For ſo ignorance is a ſin when it is voluntary. Qui dixerunt Deo, Recede à nobis; ſcientiam viarum tuarum nolumus. The wicked ſay unto God, We will not underſtand thy ways. So the Pſalmiſt complains, Noluit intelligere ut bene ageret, He refuſed underſtanding. Now ſince in all the faculties the will of man hath a dominion, and is the cauſe of all moral actions, from thence they have their eſtimate, and are acquitted or condemned condemned accordingly; according to that of S. Bernard, Nihil ardet in inferno niſi propria voluntas, Nothing makes fuel for the flames of hell, but the will of man, and evil actions that are voluntary and choſen.

10. The conſequent of this diſcourſe in order to Conſcience is, that no man looſe his peace concerning the controverted articles and diſputes of Chriſtendome. If he inquires after truth earneſtly as after things of great concernment; if he prays to God to aſſiſt, and uſes thoſe means which are in his hand and are his beſt for the finding it; if he be indifferent to any propoſition, and loves it not for any conſideration but becauſe he thinks it true; if he will quit any intereſt rather then looſe a truth; if he dares own what he hath found and believ'd; and if he loves it ſo much the more by how much he believes it more conducing to piety and the honour of God, he hath done what a good and a wiſe man ſhould doe; he needs not regard what any man threatens, nor fear God's anger when a man of another ſect threatens him with damnation: for he that heartily endeavours to pleaſe God, and ſearches what his will is that he may obey it, certainly loves God; and nothing that loves God can periſh.

11. 2. It follows alſo from hence that no unavoidable calamity, no being born of evil parents, no being born from illegitimate embraces, no unjuſt ſentences of men can irreconcile us to God, or prejudice our Eternal intereſt. God will judge us according to our works, not according to his, or any mans elſe, or by any meaſures but by his own law and our obedience.

12. 3. Let no man think that either God will, or that the Devil can make us ſin. God loves not ſin, or that we ſhould die; and therefore will not divide his own kingdome, or ſet up that by his effective power which by his legiſlative and his perſuaſive, and his natural and eternal, he intends to deſtroy. And as for the Devil, he can tempt indeed, but unleſſe we pleaſe, he cannot prevail; it is our conſent and willingneſſe that makes him conqueror. And if we be really perſuaded of theſe plain and evident truths, there is a plain way made to encourage our induſtry, to actuate our caution, to glorify God, to work out our ſalvation with fear and trembling, to walk humbly with our God, to deveſt our ſelves of all excuſes, to lay the burden where it ought; that is, to walk in the right way, in the way of duty and the paths of the Divine commandements, without tempting our ſelves, or being fool'd and coſen'd out of our duty, or hindring our repentance and humiliation, if we have done amiſſe.

13. Theſe are the material events, and that proper uſefulneſſe of this propoſition which can doe benefit to us in the conduct of Conſcience. Our own will and choice is all that upon which we are to make judgement of our actions. For the further declaration of which we are to inquire into divers particulars, in order to the inſtitution and regulating of Conſcience.

Queſtion I.

Whether every action of our life ought to be directed by a right conſcience, or a well-perſuaded will : or, Are not ſome actions not onely in their whole kind, but in their circumſtances and limitations alſo, merely indifferent?

14. To this I anſwer, that actions, if they be conſidered in their Phyſical or natural capacity, are all negatively indifferent; that is, neither good nor bad: the going into a houſe, the entring into a field, the ſtriking of a blow, the act of generation, eating or drinking, as they are taken in their natural capacity, are not moral actions, that is, by all that they are in nature are nothing at all in manners: even homicide it ſelf and adultery, in their natural capacity, differ nothing from juſtice and the permiſſions of marriage; and the giving of almes is no better naturally then giving money to Mercury, or to an Image.

15. 2. Omiſſions of acts are oftentimes indifferent, even always when the omiſſion is not of a thing commanded or morally good from ſome law, or ſufficient principle of morality, as perfection, counſel, praiſe and fame, worthineſſe and charity. The reaſon is, becauſe omiſſions may come in upon a dead ſtock, and proceed from a negative principle, from ſleep and forgetfulneſſe, from a lethargy or dulneſſe, from differing buſineſſe and divertiſements. And that which is nothing can produce nothing, and neither good nor evil can come from that which is not; they both muſt have a poſitive cauſe, if they have in them any morality. Even not to commit adultery is not commendable, unleſſe that omiſſion be choſen. * And this is very remarkable in order to Conſcience. For the whole duty of man conſiſts in eſchewing evil and doing good: but to will and to chuſe good is ſo neceſſary, and if we can, to doe it is ſo requir'd of us, that the very avoiding evil is exacted in that manner, that unleſſe it be a doing good, it is a doing nothing at all, it is good for nothing, it will goe for nothing. To eſchew evil is a labour and a mighty work, it is a running from temptation, a ſhutting the doors againſt it, a praying againſt it, it is a flying from it when we can, and a reſiſting of it when we cannot. A porter cannot be ſaid to eſchew ambition, nor does he doe well by not commencing of a proud warre, when he can think of nothing but how to fill his belly by breaking of his back; and the poor ſhepherd ſhall never be thank'd for not contending for the Arch-biſhopric of Toledo, or not fighting againſt his Prince, when nothing enters into his armory but his bottle and his hook, and nothing into his head, but that his ſheep may wander in wholeſome and pleaſant paſtures, and his lambs be free from dogs and foxes. A mere negative does nothing in God's ſervice. The avoiding evil is neither good nor bad, unleſſe it be by a poſitive act, unleſſe the will be in it: and indeed as things are order'd it is many times harder to decline evil then to doe good; and therefore the eſchewing evil is a contention and a warre, it is a heap of ſevere actions, a ſtate of mortification, it is a reſiſting of temptations. For he that was never tempted may be innocent; but he is not vertuous, and ſhall have no reward.

* This is to be underſtood to be true in all caſes; unleſſe his not acting a ſin, and his not being tempted now, be the effect of a long prayer, and a former former contention; and that either the temptation by his preceding piety be turn'd aſide, or made impotent by mortification, or by his choſen and beloved ſtate of life be made impoſſible; that is, unleſſe by the arts of the ſpirit he hath made it vain, or by his frequent victories he hath made the Devil flee away, and ſo bought his peace at the price of a mighty warre, and his reſt at the charge of a pertinacious labour. In all theſe caſes the omiſſion is negative as to the preſent ſtate of things; and yet it is vertuous, becauſe it had a poſitive and a vertuous cauſe, which now it may be lies ſtill, becauſe it hath produc'd a permanent and perpetual effect.

16. And upon this account we alſo can hope for the reward even of thoſe graces which we never exerciſe. The Prince that refuſes the offer of a crown or the poſſibilities of Empire becauſe they doe not belong to him, ſhall certainly have a great reward, becauſe upon the nobleſt account he avoids a very great evil. But the poor herdſman that dwells upon his own acre, and feeds his little yokes and couples of ſheep on high ways and mountains, and looks not ambitiouſly on his neighbours farm, nor covets the next cottage, which yet he likes well, and thinks it excellent becauſe it hath a chimny, nor would doe an act of falſhood to get his own tenement rent-free, this man ſhall have a reward in proportion great as that juſt Prince who refuſes to oppreſſe his brother when his ſtate is broken by rebellion and diſadvantages. For there is no vertue but may be lov'd and courted, delighted in and commended in every ſtate and circumſtance of life: and though it be not exercis'd in noble temptations and trials proper to the moſt excellent and remarked perſons; yet the very images and little records of trial may expreſſe a love and choice which may be equal to that which is proſperous by the greateſt exerciſe and indication. For there are little envies & ambitions even in cottages, and therefore there may be the choice and volition of humility and peacefull thoughts and acts of charity: and there may be unchaſtity even in marriage; and therefore though the contention is eaſier, and the temptations but inconſiderable; yet they alſo when they are immur'd by their Sacramental defenſatives and ſecurities may delight in chaſtity, and therefore rejoyce in that ſtate becauſe it ſecures them from uncleaneneſſe; and therefore for this love, and act of choice, even for delighting in that ſafety, may find a reward of chaſtity: and there may be covetouſneſſe amongſt them that are full of plenty, and therefore even the richeſt perſon can be imployed in ſecuring the grace of contentedneſſe, though he have but little temptation to the contrary. * Indeed if a begger were tempted with the offer of 20000, the temptation would be too big for him, if he underſtood the ſumme; and poſſibly if he be a vertuous man, and would not be tempted to tell a lie for 20^{s}, or for one of his own poſſible and likely ſummes, yet for ſo vaſt a heap of gold bigger then his thoughts, he might be put beyond his vertue. But therefore God in his goodneſſe to mankind does ſeldome permit ſuch trials and unequal hazards, and to our not being ſo tempted (without diſparagement to our vertue and our choice) we may well confeſſe we owe our innocence. But becauſe God ſuffers our temptations to be by accidents happening in our own condition, and we are commonly tried by that which is before us, or next above us; every one can either exerciſe or chuſe the worthineſſe of every grace, and may hope for the reward of the whole vertue by reſiſting the moſt inconſiderable temptation to it's contrary, if in caſe he have no bigger, he equally chuſes the vertue and rejoyces in his innocence. And he that does reſiſt, or by any means expedite himſelf from his own temptation, ſhall be rewarded equally to him, to whom the greateſt is but his next beſt. * For our vertue is not to be eſtimated by the inſtance, but the willingneſſe and the courage, the readineſſe of mind and alacrity of choice, by the proportion of the man and the methods of his labour, the reſolution of the will, and the preparation of the heart; and we muſt account our omiſſions or eſchewings of evil to be vertuous, by what we have done againſt it, by our prayer and our watchfulneſſe, our fear and caution, not by an unactive life, and a dull peace, and a negative omiſſion: for he does not eſchew evil that does not doe evil, but he that will not doe it.

17. 3. All acts that paſſe without any conſent of the will are indifferent; that is, they are natural, or unavoidable, or the productions of fancy, or ſome other unchuſing faculty, or they are the firſt motions of a paſſion, or the emotions of ſome exterior violence; as the ſudden motion of an eye, the head or heart, the hands or feet. Now that theſe are as indifferent as to grow, or to yawn, to cough or to ſneeze, appears becauſe they are of the ſame nature, and partake equally of the ſame reaſon. But theſe inſtances can be made to differ. For thoſe which are ſo natural that the whole effect alſo is natural, and cannot paſſe on to morality or be ſubject to a command, are always indifferent in their whole kind, and in all their degrees and in all their circumſtances. Thus to grow taller, to digeſt meat, to wink with the eye in the face of the Sun, are not capable of morality. But thoſe things which are at firſt onely natural, and afterwards are nurs'd by the will and diſcourſe, they are onely at firſt indifferent, becauſe they then onely are unavoidable. To look upon a woman is no ſin, if ſhe ſuddenly comes into our preſence, though every ſuch look by reaſon of the mans weakneſſe were a temptation: for at firſt there was no time to deliberate, and therefore we could not be bound not to look, and if we had not ſeen her, it had not been good at all, nor evil. But to look upon her ſo long till we luſt after her, to look upon her but to the entertainment of any faculty that miniſters to luſt, to obſerve that which is precious in her but ſo long that the will doe conſent to that which is, or is likely to be vile, that corrupts the manners and prevaricates the law.

18. 4. No action of the will is indifferent, but is either lawfull or unlawfull, and therefore good or bad. For although there is in many actions that which the School calls indifferentiam ſecundum ſpeciem, an indifference in the kind of action, or in reſpect of the object; yet when ſuch actions come under deliberation and to be inveſted with circumſtances, they cannot be conſider'd at all, but that firſt they muſt be underſtood to be lawfull or unlawfull; for that very objective or ſpecific indifference ſuppoſes the action lawfull: and he that does a thing though but with that deliberation and precaution, does doe well, unleſſe there be ſomething elſe alſo to be conſider'd, and then it may be he does better, or it may be ill; but when it is come as far as to be choſen and conſidered, it muſt be good or bad. For whatſoever that is about which we deliberate, we doe it for a reaſon that to us cannot ſeem indifferent; it is for an innocent and a good end, for good to our ſelves or others: and nothing can come under the conſideration of being an end of humane actions, but is directed by the words or by the reaſon, by the deſigne or the proportion of ſome law. For even our profit or our pleaſure are to be conducted by the meaſures of the ſpirit: and there is nothing elſe beſides profit and pleaſure that is good, or can become the end of an action, excepting onely what is honeſt: and therefore every thing that is good or can be the reaſon of an action is under a law, and conſequently cannot be indifferent, according to the doctrine of S. Auſtin, Quanquam voluntas, mirum, ſi poteſt in medio quodam ita conſiſtere, ut nec bona nec mala ſit: aut enim juſtitiam diligimus, & bona eſt, & ſi magis diligimus, magis bona, ſi minus, minus bona; aut ſi omnino non diligimus, non bona eſt. Quis vero dubitet dicere voluntatem nullo modo juſtitiam diligentem non modo eſſe malam, ſed peſſimam voluntatem? Ergo voluntas aut bona eſt aut mala, &c. Whatſoever we doe, we doe it for a good end or an evil; for if we doe it for no end, we doe not work like men: and according as the reaſon is which moves the action ſo is the will, either good or bad: for though vertue oftentimes is in the midſt between two evils; yet the will of man is never ſo in the middle as to be between good and evil; for every thing that can move the will is good, or it ſeems ſo, and accordingly ſo is the will. de Peccator. merit. & remiſſ. c. 18.

19. Indeed every action we doe is not in an immediate order to Eternal bleſſing or infelicity; but yet mediately and by conſequence, and in the whole diſpoſition of affairs it addes great moments to it. Bonum eſt continentia, malum eſt luxuria; inter utrumque indifferens, ambulare, capitis naribus purgamenta projicere, ſputis rheumata jacere. Hoc nec bonum, nec malum: ſive enim feceris, ſive non, nec juſtitiam habebis nec injuſtitiam, ſaid S. Hierom. Continence is good, and luxury is evil; but between theſe it is indifferent to walk, to blow the noſe, to ſpit. Theſe things are neither good nor bad, for whether you doe them or doe them not, you are by them neither juſt nor unjuſt. For beſides that S. Hierom inſtances in things of a ſpecific and objective indifference, of which I have already ſpoken, that which he ſaies is true in reſpect of the ſupernatural end of man, to which theſe things (concerning which oftentimes we doe not deliberate at all, and even then when we doe deliberate, they) operate but little. But becauſe the inſtances are in natural things, where the will hath very little to doe, we ſhall beſt underſtand this propoſition by the inſtance of S. Gregory; Nonnulli diligunt proximos, ſed per affectionem cognationis & carnis, quibus in hac dilectione ſacra eloquia non contradicunt. Our natural love to our kindred is a thing ſo indifferent, not in it's own nature, but of ſo little concern to eternity if it be onely upon the ſtock of Nature, that all that can be ſaid of it is, that the Scriptures doe not forbid it. That is, whatſoever is natural is not conſiderable in morality. But becauſe this which firſt enters by nature is commanded by God, and can be confirm'd and improv'd by the will, therefore it can become ſpiritual: but that which is natural is firſt, and then that which is ſpiritual: ſo that although at the firſt and when it is onely the product of nature, it is but a diſpoſition and a facility towards a ſpiritual or moral duty; yet as ſoon as ever the will handles it, it puts on it's upper garment of morality, and may come to be inveſted with a robe of glory. And this was very well diſcours'd of by the Author of the Υπογωσικὸς in S. Auſtin; Eſſe fatemur liberum arbitrium omnibus hominibus, habens quidem judicium rationis, non per quod ſit idoneum quæ ad Deum pertinent ſine Deo aut inchoare, aut certè peragere, ſed tantum in operibus vitæ præſentis, tam bonis quam etiam malis. Bonis dico quæ de bono naturæ oriuntur, id eſt, velle laborare in agro, velle manducare & bibere, In things pertaining to God we cannot begin, or at leaſt we cannot finiſh any thing without God and Epiſt. 11. ad Auguſtin. homil. 27. in Evang. tom. 7. l. 3.

his grace. But in the things of this life we have a free choice, whether the things be good or evil. For thoſe I call good which doe natural good, as to be willing to work in the field, to will to eat or to drink. Now even theſe things are always good or bad when they are once choſen by the will, and to theſe very things the Divine grace does give aſſiſtance. So the ſame author, Velle quicquid bonum ad præſentem pertinet vitam, non ſine Divino gubernaculo ſubſiſtunt, A man cannot chuſe well even in things belonging to this life, without the Divine aſſiſtance. And therefore in things of great concernment we pray to God to conduct and direct our choice. And ſince the order and perfection of every creature is to doe actions agreeable to the end and perfection of his nature, it is a purſuance of the end of God and of his own felicity. Although to doe ſo is not vertue in beaſts, becauſe they are directed by an external principle, and themſelves chuſe it not; yet in men it is vertue, and it is obedience: and although it is natural to doe ſo, and it is unnatural to doe otherwiſe; yet becauſe it is alſo choſen in many inſtances, in them it is a vertue or a vice reſpectively: and though it be no eminent vertue to doe ſo, yet it is a prodigious ſin to doe otherwiſe; for ſins againſt nature are ordinarily and in moſt inſtances the worſt; which does demonſtrate, that even things of nature and the actions of our prime appetites, when they can be conſider'd and choſen, never can be indifferent; and for other things which are not of nature, there is leſſe queſtion. Thus to walk, to eat, to drink, to reſt, to take phyſic for the procuring health, or the eaſe of our labours, or any end of charity to our ſelves or others, to talk, to tell ſtories, or any other thing that is good or can miniſter good to nature or ſociety is good, not onely naturally, but morally, and may alſo be ſpiritually ſo: for it being a duty to God to preſerve our ſelves, and againſt a commandement to deſtroy our ſelves; it being a duty to be affable and courteous in our deportment, to be gentle and kind and charitable; it being charity to make our own lives and the lives of others pleaſant, and their condition not onely tolerable but eligible; there is no peradventure but every thing of our lives can be good or bad, becauſe if it can miniſter to good or evil ends, it can be choſen for thoſe ends, and therefore muſt partake of good or evil accordingly. How theſe ends are to be conſidered, and with what intention and actual or habitual intuition, I am afterwards to conſider: for the preſent it ſuffices that upon this account the actions themſelves are not indifferent.

20. And this doctrine is to great and ſevere purpoſes taught by our Bleſſed Matth. 12.36. Saviour, Of every idle word that a man ſhall ſpeak, he ſhall give account in that day. It was a known ſaying among the Jews, Cavebit vir ne cum uxore loquatur turpia, quia etiam propter ſermonem levem viri cum uxore adducetur ille in judicium, ſaid Rabbi Jonah; Even the looſeneſſe of a mans talk with his wife ſhall be brought into judgement: and Maimonides ſaid, Pleraque verba ſunt otioſa & cauſam præbent iniquitatis, Moſt words are ſuch which ſome way or other miniſter to iniquity, and therefore ſhall certainly paſſe the fiery trial. Πᾶν ῥῆμα πονηρόν, ſo it is in ſome Greek copies, every wicked word: for an idle word is not indifferent; it may have in it ſome degree of wickedneſſe, and therefore may be fit to be forbidden, and conſequently ſhall be judged. Otioſum verbum eſt quod ſine utilitate & loquentis dicitur & audientis, ſi omiſſis ſeriis de rebus frivolis loquamur, & fabulas narremus antiquas. Cæterum qui ſcurrilia explicat, & cachinnis ora diſſolvit, & aliquid profert turpitudinis, hic non otioſi verbi, ſed criminoſi tenebi-

tur reus, ſaid S. Hierom, That which neither profits him that ſpeaks nor him that hears, is an idle word; any thing that is not ſerious, but frivolous and like an old tale. But if it be diſſolute or wanton, it is not idle but criminal. S. Chryſoſtome expounds the words to the ſame purpoſe, calling that an idle word, which is ſpoken without juſt inducement in ſome kind or order of good things, and that which is mixt with lying or ſlander. Omne verbum quod non conducit ad propoſitam in Domino utilitatem vanum & otioſum eſt, ſaid S. Baſil; That word which is not for edification, that is, that which does no good at all, muſt needs be evil: Nay further yet, Verbum otioſum eſt quod, etiamſi bonum ſit, ad ædificationem fidei tamen non aptatur. Et ſi ejuſmodi verba in celeberrimo illo totius orbis conventu examinabuntur, quid ſcurrilibus, & detrahentibus, & obſcœnis verbis fiet? That is an idle word, which although it be good, yet does not tend to the edification of faith: and if ſuch words as theſe ſhall be examin'd in the great aſſembly of all mankind, what ſhall be done to detracting, ſcurrilous and laſcivious talkings? I ſuppoſe, S. Baſil's meaning is that all thoſe propoſitions which being built upon the foundation are not fit for the promotion of it, they are not ſilver or gold, but a ſuperſtructure of wood or hay or ſtubble: even theſe and thoſe ſhall be examin'd in the eternal ſcrutiny; nothing ſhall eſcape there; if it will not endure the fire, it ſhall be conſumed. For if the action here have any material end, it ſhall hereafter have a material reward: if it have no end, yet the man that did it was ſent hither to a better end then to doe fooliſh and uſeleſſe things. The very doing or ſpeaking that which is good for nothing, is evil, and ſhall be diſcern'd and judged. We ſee it even in the judgements of men. Martial tells of a good man that had got a trick to invite his friends to walk, to bath, to eat, to drink with him, and in all his enterviews he would be perpetually reading of his verſes: one would have thought the thing it ſelf were innocent, if the queſtion had been ask'd concerning the thing alone; but they that felt the folly and the tediouſneſſe of it, were afraid to ſee him.

And Sidonius tells of ſome idle perſons, quos execrabilis popularitas agit; civium maximos manu prenſant, éque conſeſſu publico abducunt, ac ſequeſtratis oſcula impingunt, operam ſuam ſpondent, ſed non petiti. Utque videantur in negotii communis aſſertione legari, evectionem refundunt, ipſoſque ſumptus ultro recuſant, & ab ambitu clam rogant ſingulos, ut ab omnibus palam rogentur, &c. their very civility is troubleſome, their idleneſſe is hugely buſy, and their imployment ſignifies nothing.

Ardelionum natio, occupata in otio,
Gratis anhelans, multa agendo nihil agens,
Sibi moleſta & aliis odioſiſſima.

Phædr. fab. l. 2. 36.

They doe nothing, and yet never ſtand ſtill, and are very troubleſome to themſelves and others. Such an idleneſſe as this, whether in words or deeds, if it can be conſider'd and obſerved here, ſhall not eſcape a ſtricter conſideration hereafter. For none of theſe things in the event of affairs ſhall prove to be indifferent.

11. The effect of this queſtion is very great; for it ingages us upon a ſtrict watchfulneſſe over all our words and actions, and to a wiſe inquiry when they are done, and ſcatters that incurioſneſſe and inadvertency of ſpirit which ſeizes upon moſt men while they doe actions which they conſider not whether they be right or wrong, and ſuppoſing actions, many more then there are, to be in their whole kind indifferent, would fain make them ſo in their individual, and by never diſputing the particulars, detain the action in a neutrality as to the Conſcience, never repreſenting it either as lawfull or unlawfull, much leſſe as good and evil. But our actions ſhall be judg'd by Gods meaſures, not by our wilfull and ignorant miſtakes. 2. Every thing we doe muſt twice paſſe through the Conſcience; once when it is to be done, and again when it is done: And not onely whatſoever is not of faith is ſin, ſo that we ſin if we are not perſuaded it is lawfull; but it becomes a ſin, when we are careleſſe and conſider not at all, either actually or habitually, either openly or by involution, as it is alone or as it is in conjunction with ſomething elſe, by direct intuition or conſequent deduction, by expreſſe notices or by reaſonable preſumptions, by rule or by fame, by our own reaſon or by the reaſon of others whom we may fairly truſt.

Queſtion II.

22. Whether is it neceſſary for the doing of good that we have an expreſſe act of Volition? or is it not ſufficient in ſome caſes that we are not unwilling? Is it not enough that we doe not oppoſe it? but muſt we alſo promote it? That is, Although actions of themſelves be not indifferent when they are choſen; may not the will be allowed to be indifferent to ſome good things that are laid before her? and what kind or degrees of indifference to good can be lawfull, and in what caſes?

23. This is not a queſtion of ſingle actions principally, but of ſtates of life and being, and of ſingle actions onely by conſequence and involution in the whole: But of great uſefulneſſe in the conduct of Conſcience and making judgements concerning the ſtate of our ſouls; and it is a great endearment of the actions, the zeal and forwardneſſes of the will and an active piety. Firſt therefore in general I anſwer, then more particularly.

24. In the Law of Moſes the righteouſneſſe commanded was a deſigne for Innocence, their great Religion was Reſt, their Decalogue was a ſyſteme eſpecially of Negative commandements, the ſanction of the Law was fear and terror, which affrights all men, but invites none, it makes them afraid, but never willing; their offices were purifications and cleanſings away: but ſo little of good was to be done, that God was more carefull that the people ſhould not commit idolatry, then ſevere in calling them to admire his beauties; that they ſhould learn no evil, then that they ſhould learn much good. Now to this negative ſtate of duty, a will doing nothing, an underſtanding not conſidering, a forgetfulneſſe of the queſtion, and a ſitting ſtill might in many caſes miniſter; and then the will is accidentally indifferent, when the action never ſtands before it, either as good or evil. But now under the Goſpel we are unclean unleſſe we have active purities, and we are covetous unleſſe we deſpiſe the world, and we are malicious by interpretation of law, unleſſe we take what opportunities we have of doing good to them that have us'd us ill, and even to be luke-warm is abominable to God, and our tongues may ſin with ſilence, and we are to keep holy-days not by reſt, but by religious labour, and we diſhonour the holy Name of God not one-

ly by curſed ſwearing, and falſe oaths, and evil covenants, but if we doe not doe him honour; if we doe not advance his kingdome we are rebels, if we doe not ſet his glory forward we have prophan'd his holy name that is called upon us.

25. And this is with ſome myſteriouſneſſe intimated in the ſeveral ſenſes of thoſe words of Scripture [Therefore let my Name be called upon them.] So Jacob's name was called upon Rebeccah, and Uriah's name upon Bathſheba; Rebecca Jacobi, & Uriæ Bathſhebæ: and upon Ephraim and Manaſſeh when Jacob's name was called, the purpoſe was that they ſhould be reckon'd not as if they had been ſons of Joſeph, but the ſons of Jacob, having an equal portion in the diviſions of Iſrael. So in the Prophet *, Onely let thy Name be called upon us, that is, let us be reckon'd in thy portion, accounted to be thy people, thou our Father, and we Sons and Daughters unto God. Now in theſe inſtances of the Old Teſtament, it ſignifies honour and privilege, ſecurity of title and advantage of relation, ſomething that on their part was paſſive all the way. But in the New Teſtament we find the ſame expreſſion rendred to ſuch purpoſes as will ſignifie ſomething on our parts alſo, ſome emanation of our will and choice, even an active duty. Βλασφημοῦσι τὸ καλὸν ὄνομα τὸ ἐπικληθὲν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, They blaſpheme that holy Name which is invocated upon you, that is, they blaſpheme the Name of Jeſus Chriſt which was put upon them in baptiſme, by invocation and ſolemn ſacramental prayer. The Name of Chriſt was then put upon us in that manner which teaches us how to wear it for ever after: it was called upon and ſo put upon us; it muſt be called upon, and ſo worn by us. Here is invocation relative to two termes, both active and paſſive. And ſince it is evident and clear in the Scriptures of the New Teſtament that calling on the Name of the Lord is us'd for being Diſciples and ſervants of the Lord, as appears in thoſe words, Whoſoever ſhall call on the Name of the Lord ſhall be ſaved, that is, all that have given up their names to Chriſt, all that have taken his Name and live accordingly; it follows that all we who bear the name of Chriſtians muſt not be content with the glorious appellation, or the excellency of the relation, but we muſt by our holy lives, by our active obedience, by an operative faith, and a buſy love doe honour to Chriſt, and glorify that Name by which we are called and made illuſtrious.

James 2. 7.

26. And this is rarely well taught us by a proverbial ſaying uſed by our Bleſſed Lord, He that is not with us is againſt us; and he that gathereth not, ſcattereth abroad: that is, it is not enough that our will doe not chuſe evil, or oppoſe it ſelf againſt God, and his holy laws and ſermons. For many unconverted Gentiles, children and ſtrangers, the luke-warm and the indifferent, the deaf and the dumbe, the ſtones of the ſtreet and the gold of the Temple, the ſtarers and the talkers, the Sceptic and the careleſſe, theſe have a negative indifference of will; they doe not take part againſt Chriſt, but neither doe they fight of his ſide, and therefore are not populus voluntarius, their will and choice is not on Chriſt's ſide. But the particulars are theſe, which determine the caſes of Conſcience which can ariſe from this inquiry.

Matth. 12. 30. Luke 11. 23.

27. There are in the Goſpels two proverbial ſayings, each of them twice us'd. He that is not with us is againſt us] and, * He that is not againſt us is with us.] The ſayings are of contrary purpoſe and effect. For as the firſt injoyns us to the labour of love, and an active will, and an effective zeal, and a religion productive of permanent effects; ſo the latter ſeems to be content with negative meaſures, to approve of an indifferent will, to allow a neutrality, and that not onely many ſingle actions, but that a whole ſtate of life may have a negative indifference and indetermination. Now becauſe both the propoſitions muſt needs be true, they muſt have diſtinct meaſures, and proper ſignifications. Therefore

28. 1. When Chriſt ſaid, He that is not againſt us is with us, he meant it principally of ſtrangers and aliens, perſons not admitted into the ſtrictures of the Covenant Evangelical. For when the Princes of the nations conſpire againſt the Lords Chriſt, he that refuſes to joyn with them, declares that he will not be Chriſts enemy; and eſt quiddam prodire tenus, this little is more then nothing. Thus Gamaliel was on Chriſt's ſide, when he gave a gentle counſel in a caſe of the Apoſtles, with whom although he did not joyn, yet becauſe he would not joyn againſt them, he was ſo far with them, that he was not eſteem'd an enemy: and it was noted of Joſeph of Arimathea, that he was not conſenting to the ſentence of the high Prieſts in putting our Bleſſed Lord to death, and therefore he was a good man. His not doing that evil was a great indication of a friendly mind.

29. 2. This is alſo true in queſtions of religion of difficult underſtanding, and leſſe neceſſary knowledge, or not of immediate concernment to ſalvation. He that does not disbelieve the miracles of Chriſt, he that does not ſtop his ears againſt the voice of Chriſt, he that does not run after a ſtrangers voice, is not far from the kingdome of heaven: though the man knows little, yet if he believes nothing againſt any word of Chriſt, though many words of Chriſt were deliver'd of which he knows nothing, he hath put his head into the folds of Chriſt. For in articles of belief which are not of the foundation, an implicite belief in God and his Chriſt is ſufficient, when there is no vitious poſitive cauſe of the not knowing them explicitely: and if this were not true, ignorant and unletter'd perſons were tied to as great learning and explicite knowledge as the profoundeſt Clercs; which becauſe it is no where commanded, and is very often impoſſible, and always unreaſonable to be exacted, it muſt follow that it will in moſt caſes be enough for the ideot or unlearned that they doe not oppoſe what they doe not underſtand, but humbly ſubmit themſelves to God and their ſuperiors, by a confident confeſſion of what they underſtand, and a modeſt conformity to thoſe other articles in which public peace is more concerned then public truth, or their private duty. In this caſe a negative indifference of the will by reaſon of the ignorance of the underſtanding, that is, a not oppoſing what they underſtand not, and cannot underſtand, is their ſecurity and their innocence.

30. 3. He that is not againſt Chriſt is with him, is true in the preparations and diſpoſitions to converſion. For he that makes uſe of a little grace ſhall have more; and he that well uſes the laws of his country, and keeps the juſtice of his nation, and obſerves the principles of reaſon, and walks according to the light he hath, though he hath not the broad noon-day of the Goſpel, yet he is ſo far on Chriſt's ſide, that Chriſt will joyn himſelf to his, and draw him nearer, and advance his Nature, and promote his excellent diſpoſitions, and by the methods of the ſpirit bring him to God.

Upon

Upon this ſtock it was that God ſent S. Peter to Cornelius, and that ſo many of the Jewiſh Proſelytes were converted to Chriſtianity, and ſo many wiſe Heathens, who had juſt and ingenuous ſouls and liv'd good lives, were brought into the ſchools of Chriſt.

31. 4. This is true alſo in the habits or actions of any one vertue when it is alone, or when it comes in upon the ſtock of nature, or education, or paſſion, or humane laws. He that does one good act for Chriſt, though he doe no more, by that one action declares himſelf to be no enemy, and therefore he ſhall not looſe his reward; though he give but a cup of cold water to a thirſty diſciple, in that capacity of his being a diſciple; nay if it be but in the conſideration of his being thirſty, if it be but by a natural pity and tenderneſſe, by the emotions of humanity, by the meltings of a worthy diſpoſition and of tender bowels: and therefore much more ſhall every worthy habit, though it be alone, though entring from a leſſe perfect principle then a ſpiritual and Chriſtian grace. The chaſtity of Lucretia, the honeſty of Decianus, the truth of Rutilius, the bravery of Scævola, the repentance of Ahab, the humiliation of Manaſſes, the zeal of Jehu, the compaſſion of Titus over Jeruſalem, theſe things and theſe perſons are conſider'd by God, and have their portion of reward. And he is not wholly againſt Chriſt that does any thing for him: for our Bleſſed Lord is ſo gracious, that no man ſhall ſpeak a word for him, or relieve any of his ſervants, or keep a memorial, but as far as that action goes, according to the proportion of the choice and the good will, Chriſt will reckon him to be on his ſide, and allot him a portion of his bleſſing, a yonger Brothers part, though not the inheritance.

32. 5. This is true of thoſe who being ſecretly convinc'd cannot yet ſhake off their prejudices and their pitiable fears, who own Chriſt in their hearts, whoſe faith is weak and their doubts are ſtrong, who fear God heartily, and yet cannot quite ſhake off the fear of men; they alſo are reckon'd on Chriſt's ſide ſo far, that they are not preſent and actual enemies, but actual friends, and but potential profeſſors and Diſciples. Thus Nicodemus was on Chriſt's ſide by not being againſt him. He owned as much as he durſt; he ſpake in behalf of Chriſt, but profeſs'd him not; he believ'd in him, but fear'd the Jews. This was not enough to adopt him into the kingdome, but this brought him from the enemies ſide, like the Kenites and the ſons of Rechab in the land of Iſrael.

33. 6. To be with Chriſt hath many parts and degrees of progreſſion and avail. Every man that profeſſes Chriſt is with him; he that is baptized, he that is called Chriſtian, he that delights in the name, he that is in the external communion of the Church is in ſome ſenſe with Chriſt, becauſe he is not againſt him. For whoever is a member of the Church, whoſoever retains his baptiſmal right, he that hath not renounced Chriſtianity, loſt his faith, defied Chriſt, or turn'd Apoſtate, he is ſtill within the covenant of mercy, within the limits of grace and the power of the ſpirit; that is, he hath a right to the privilege and grace of being admitted to repentance and the conſequent grace of pardon: for baptiſme is for the remiſſion of ſins, and as long as that is not renounc'd, we have a perpetual title to remiſſion of ſins, the Sacrament as to this purpoſe being of perpetual effect. Every ſuch perſon is yet a member of Chriſt, though barren and unfruitfull: his leaf doth not proſper and his fruit ſprings not, yet there is a root remaining. For thus the Goſpel is compar'd to a net with fiſhes good and bad, to a field of corn and tares. For no man is thrown from grace and mercy but the open, profeſs'd, irreconcileable enemies of Chriſt, voluntary and malicious Apoſtates; for they are cut off from the root, and have no portion in it, as S. Paul largely diſcourſes in the ſixth and tenth Chapters to the Hebrews. But thoſe who ſin againſt Chriſt, & diſhonour and grieve the holy Spirit of Chriſt, who ſin and repent and yet ſin and repent again, being always ſorrowful, and always have cauſe, theſe men have hopes, and time, and helps, and arguments, and probabilities of life, which they could not have but by being members of Chriſt's myſtical body. They are with Chriſt in Covenant and deſire, in title and adoption, becauſe they are not againſt him in profeſſion and voluntary hoſtility: but they muſt goe further, or they die.

34. For all this effects nothing elſe, but that we are tied to treat ſuch perſons not as enemies but as brethren; it expoſes ſuch to be chaſtis'd and guided by the rod of Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, but not to be cut off by the ſword of exciſion and anathema, and ſentences of deſpair; it does manifeſt the goodneſſe of God, the glorious mercies of our Redeemer, his aptneſſe to pardon, his readineſſe to receive us, his deſires to have us ſav'd, his paſſion for our felicity, and the preſence of his preventing and auxiliary grace. But this was but the Proverb of ſtrangers and beginners, of infants and babes in Chriſt.

35. 7. But when we are entred into the Covenant of Grace, when we have declar'd, when the queſtion is concerning final pardon and the hopes of glory, then the other Proverb is onely true. It is not enough that we are not againſt Chriſt, but we muſt be with him and for him, earneſt and zealous, paſſionate and obedient, diligent and true, induſtrious and inquiſitive; then it is, He that is not with Chriſt is againſt him. For it is not enough that we are in the root, that is, in preparation and diſpoſition, but we muſt
John 15. 1, 2. alſo bear fruit in the root; for ſo ſaith our Bleſſed Saviour, I am the Vine; my Father is the Husbandman: Every branch in me that beareth not fruit ſhall be cut off. Firſt they are in Chriſt as in the vine, before they can bear fruit; and there he ſuffers them to be in expectation of fruit; of which if they fail in their ſeaſon, they ſhall be cut off. * For the caſe between Chriſt and the world is as it was between Cæſar and Pompey. Pompey had the poſſeſſion and the right: and therefore as Cicero in his Oration pro Ligario affirms, Pompey's party acknowleged none but his certain and profeſſed friends; adverſarios autem putare niſi qui nobiſcum eſſent, and all to be againſt them that were not with them: Te autem (ſaith he to Cæſar) qui contra te non eſſent, tuos. For Cæſar was but entring upon his new fortune, and all that he could get to himſelf, and all that would not aſſiſt his enemy, were his purchaſe or ſecurity. So it is with Chriſt in the beginnings of our Converſion; it is a degree of victory to arreſt our thoughts, and our not conſentings to the world and it's fond affections, is an approach and an acceſſion to Chriſt. But when our Lord hath gotten the firſt victories, when he hath acquir'd poſſeſſion as well as right to a ſoul, and hath a title to rule alone, then the propoſition is chang'd. Chriſt will not be ſatisfied with neutrality and an indifferent undetermin'd will, but he will have our love and active choice, and he will be honour'd by all our ſervices: and then the Chriſtian philoſophy philoſophy relies upon theſe principles: * He that does not love God is his enemy; * Not to goe forward is to goe backward; * Not to doe good is a doing evil, and luke-warmneſſe is an evil ſtate; and * We muſt not onely not reſiſt the word of truth, but we muſt contend earneſtly for it; and * We muſt confeſſe with our mouth, what we believe with the heart; * To be a Chriſtian is to hurt no man, and to doe good to every man; and * We muſt not onely proceed when we are not hindred, but we muſt take care that we be not hindred, we muſt remove every impediment, and pare away that which is uſeleſſe; for obſtat quicquid non adjuvat, if it does no good, it does hurt: and when the talent is intruſted to us it muſt not onely not be ſpent riotouſly, but it muſt not be laid up in a napkin. Penſemus quod lucrum Dei fecimus nos qui accepto talento ad negotium miſſi ſumus. Unleſſe we gain and put ſomething to God's heap, we are unprofitable ſervants.

Quintil. l. 8. c.

S. Greg. Homil. 7. in Evang.

36. By the proportion of this truth in the ſtate of our life, we are to account concerning our ſingle actions; not that every ſingle action muſt be effective of a real, diſcernible event of piety, but that it be fitted to the general deſigne of a Chriſtians life; nothing of evil, but miniſtring to good ſome way or other, or at leaſt in ſome good order of things; good for edification, or good in charitable ſociety, or good for example, or uſefull to ſome purpoſe that is fit to be deſign'd, and fit to be choſen.

RULE II.

The virtual and interpretative conſent of the Will is imputed to Good or Evil.

1. THis Rule is intended to explicate the Nature of Social Crimes, in which a mans will is deeper then his hand, though the action of the will is often indirect and collateral, conſequent or diſtant; but if by any means it hath a portion into the effect, it is intire in the guilt. And this happens many ways.

2. 1. By Ratihabition and Confirmation.

In maleficio Ratihabitio mandato comparatur, ſaith the law: To command another to doe violence is imputed to him that commands it more then him that does it. So Ulpian interpreting the interdict Unde tu illum vi dejeciſti, affirms eum quoque dejicere qui alteri mandavit vel juſſit: and therefore Ptolemy was guilty of the bloud of Pompey when he ſent Pothinus to kill him,

ff. de reg. ju. l. 152.

Hic factum Domino præſtitit....

Now becauſe ratihabition is by preſumption of law eſteem'd as a Commandement, therefore Ulpian affirms of both alike, Dejicit & qui mandat, & dejicit qui ratum habet. He that commands, and he that conſents after it is done are equally reſponſible. Now though the law particularly affirms this onely In maleficio in criminal and injurious actions, yet in the edition of Holoander that clauſe is not inſerted; and it is alſo certain that it holds and is true in contracts and civil affairs. Thus what a ſervant or a

ſon imployed by his Father or his Maſter ſhall contract for, is the Father's act if he accounts it valid. If the ſon borrows money in the Father's name, the Father is the debtor. But in matters Criminal and Civil there is a real difference as to this particular.

3. For in matters Criminal, ratihabition or approving of the act does always make the approver guilty. The Jews crucified their Lord and King: he that ſaies it was well done, is guilty of that intolerable murder, and for an ineffective malice and ſpite, procures to himſelf a real and effective damnation. But in actions Criminal there is this difference to be obſerved. Some actions are done by the luſt and appetite of the Criminal agent onely, as adultery, rape, fornication; and if this be the ſtate of that affair, that ſin is wholly imputed to him that acted it, not to him that approves it. He that approves it is indeed guilty of the ſame kind of ſin, becauſe he hath applied his will to that which God forbids, and for his luſtfull diſpoſition approv'd and conſented to by his will commits a ſin like it, but is not guilty of that. 2. But if ſuch approbation become an incouragement to the Criminal to doe ſo again, if it fortifies his heart in ſin, or hardens his forehead, or makes it pleaſant, he that approv'd the firſt is not onely guilty of a ſin like the firſt, but partakes with the Criminal really in the guilt of the ſins that follow upon that account. 3. But there are other ſins which are, as the law ſpeaks, ratihabentis nomine geſta, which are done in anothers Name, and either partly or wholly for his intereſt; and therefore if by him they be approv'd, the ratihabition is valid to all evil purpoſes, and is therefore all one as if the actions were by him commanded for whoſe intereſt they were acted, and by whoſe will they are approved. And thus it is alſo in the former ſins which ſerve the luſt of him that acts them, if beſides the ſerving of his luſt they are deſigned to ſerve anothers intereſt; as if Titius ſteal Sempronia and run away with her, or lie with Mævia the daughter of Amilius to doe a ſpite to the Father for the injury he did to Tubero, not onely Titius but Tubero is guilty of the crime, if Tubero approves what Titius did for his ſake.

4. But now if it be inquir'd what real event as to Conſcience this nice diſtinction without greater difference can have, that in one caſe he that approves the ſin is not guilty of the ſame but another like it, and in the other caſes he is partner of the ſame fault; I anſwer, Firſt, in humane laws the difference of effect is very great. For to approve an act of ſin done not in my name introduces no puniſhment upon the approver; but if it be done in my name and for my intereſt, by a fiction or preſumption of law it is ſuppos'd I gave command or warranty, and therefore I alſo ſhall partake of the puniſhment, unleſſe by the conſideration of other circumſtances I be relieved in equity, and the preſumption be found to fail. But in the court of Conſcience the difference depends not upon preſumption; but upon what it is in the truth of the thing, which ſhall be judged well enough by him that knows the ſecret. For whether the crime was done for me or not, I ſhall be judg'd according to that influence which I would have upon the effect. If I will'd it directly and caus'd it to be done knowingly, or by ſome cauſality which I at any time us'd to that purpoſe, I am liable to all the evil that can be conſequent to that ſin: but if I be guilty onely by ratihabition, that is, if really I did not command it, or effect it, or cauſe it to be effected, but onely rejoyce in it and uſe it when it is done, then my ratihabition is ordinarily (though very evil) yet much leſſe then the other's action.

I ſay ordinarily, that is in all caſes where craft and machination, plots and contrivances, intermedial violences and deceivings, and other evil things of the retinue of the ſin are previous to the crime. For in all theſe things he that onely approves the act hath commonly no intereſt, or care, or notice, or conſideration. If it happens that he conſiders and approves them too, then the caſe is alter'd: but it is not always ſo. This caſe will explicate the Rule. Ventidius was married to Romanella; but growing rich, and being made a Roman Knight, grows weary of his firſt bed-fellow, becauſe he hopes now to get a richer wife if ſhe were gone. While he tumbled this often in his head, it hapned that a ſlave of Ventidius upon ſome trifling occaſion, but in a great paſſion, flings ſomething at Romanella, which cauſed her to miſcarry, and to die. Ventidius obſerving his good fortune, ſecretly puts away his ſervant that he may eſcape the hand of juſtice, and promiſes him liberty, making what pretences he found convenient to his purpoſe. He went preſently to get him a new wife, but was arreſted in his deſigne, becauſe he was told that he that was guilty of his wives death was to looſe the privilege of a ſecond marriage; but becauſe he confirm'd it and rejoyc'd in it, it was eſteem'd in law as a Commandement. Upon this he takes advice, and was told, that though in Conſcience he was guilty of murder, becauſe he delighted in and approv'd it, yet mere ratihabition in ſuch things which muſt be judg'd not by the effect but by the previous machination and deſigne, did not produce that puniſhment of impeding his future marriage. And there is reaſon for it; becauſe though Ventidius was ſo baſe as to wiſh his wife dead or kill'd, yet he would not doe it himſelf, nor procure it to be done, his covetouſneſſe had not prevail'd ſo far with him; and therefore neither ought the puniſhment goe to the extremity of the law. 2. In Divine laws and in the direct obligation of Conſcience there is this great difference. If a crime be done in my name, and I approve it, I am not onely guilty before God of the crime, and liable to an equal ſhare of the puniſhment (according to the foregoing meaſure) but I contract a new neceſſity of duty; I am bound to reſtore the man that ſinn'd for my intereſt to his former ſtate of juſtice and integrity as far as I can, by diſallowing the act, by diſcountenancing it, by profeſſing my own repentance, by inviting him to the like: which obligation is not at all upon me by a ſimple and mere ratihabition of an act in which I have no intereſt, and to which I had no previous concurſe, directly, nor by interpretation. This is the ſtate of this queſtion in relation to matters Criminal.

5. But in matters Civil, as in contracts, debts, pledges, proviſions for pupils, the law is to determine the whole affair, and to account the ratihabition at what rate ſhe pleaſe, and upon what conditions; and therefore we are to be determin'd by our own laws in all ſuch inquiries. That which can be a general meaſure and relates any way to Conſcience is this; Where the law does require an expreſſe command pro forma, the after-ratification is of no effect in law, nor conſcience, if the law impedes the effect. Thus if a Minor makes a contract without the conſent of his Guardian, though afterward the Guardian allow it, the contract is invalid: becauſe the law requir'd in the very form and ſolennity of the contract that the authority of the Guardian ſhould be interpos'd; and ea quæ pertinent ad ſolennitatem contractus, à contractu dividi non poſſunt, ſay the lawyers; and ubi forma actus deficit, corruit actus, l. Julianus. 9. §. ſi quis. ff. ad exhib. If there be an eſſential defect of what is by law requir'd to the validity of the act, the act is null and invalid, and therefore is alſo invalid and effects nothing in Conſcience, unleſſe where the law of Nature intervenes; of which I have already given accounts*. Thus alſo it is in puniſhments which are not to be incurred but in caſes nam'd in the law, and therefore are not to be impos'd in caſes of preſumption or fiction of law, amongſt which is this, of the equivalence of ratihabition to a command. If the ſon marries a widdow within the year of mourning, he is legally infamous; but ſo is not the Father, though he approves it, unleſſe he did conſent in the beginning; becauſe theſe effects being wholly depending upon poſitive laws, can have no other meaſures but what the laws put upon them. But in the Court of Conſcience the matter is not ſo eaſy.

* lib. 2. Chap. 1. Rule 5.

Vide Petrum Peckium ad c 10. Ratihabitionem. de regul. jur. in 6to.

6. But ſince ratihabition is at the worſt but an interpretative command, and yet is ſo very bad as to imprint the guilt of the whole action upon him that ſo hath influence into the effect by interpretation, it muſt needs be that a direct command is more evidently criminal, and in greater degrees; which I needed not to have obſerved but in order to a further inquiry, and that is,

Queſtion.

Upon whom doth the greater portion of the Guilt lie; upon him that commands a ſin, or him that ſins in obedience?

Although the queſtion of degrees may here be uſefull to ſome purpoſes of Conſcience, yet it is juſt to condemn them both with a downright ſentence. For ſo the wiſe Ape in Eſop judg'd the queſtion between the wolf and the fox about a piece of fleſh which the fox had ſtoln from the village, and the wolf had ſtoln from the fox, who now complain'd of the wrong. The judicious ape anſwer'd, Phædr. fab. 10.

Tu non videris perdidiſſe quod petis:
Te credo ſubripuiſſe quod pulchre negas.

The fox ſaies he hath loſt it, but he lies; and the wolf ſaies he hath not ſtoln it, and he lies too. They were both in the wrong, and it was hard to ſay which was the worſe. But becauſe although they were equally wicked in their nature and their manners, yet in this cauſe there might be ſome difference, and in the partners and confederates in a crime ſome have more cauſality then others, though both of them are in a ſad condemnation; therefore

7. To this I anſwer by a diſtinction known in the Civil law, of Mandatum & Fuſſio. Mandatum is amongſt equals, by bidding, incouraging, warranting and ſetting on; and in this caſe, they are both equally guilty, except what difference can be made by the degrees of confidence and earneſtneſſe, and by wit and folly, by the advantage and reputation of the man that bids, and the weakneſſe of him that is bidden. But Fuſſio is from Superior to Inferior; Father to Son, Maſter to Servant, Prince to Subjects. In this caſe and amongſt theſe perſons the efficiency is unequal, and hath it's eſtimate from the grandeur and ſacredneſſe of the authority, and the degree of the fear which can be the inſtrument of prevailing and determining. And

And therefore when Attilius had ſpoken gently with Gracchus ut Patriæ parceret, ſeeming to have diſcover'd his deſign, Gracchus looking terribly upon him, one of his ſervants, non expectato ſigno, ex ſolo vultu conjectans adeſſe tempus, ratuſque initurum ſe gratiam apud Patronum ſi primus rem aggrederetur, ſtricto ferro trajecit Attilium, ſaith Appian, ſtaied neither for command nor ſign, but ſuppoſing by his forwardneſſe he ſhould pleaſe his Patron, and gueſſing by his cruel aſpect it would not be diſpleaſing to him, he kills Attilius upon the place. Now ſuch an influence as this from a ſuperior to an inferior is ſo little, that the ſervant is much more to blame then the Maſter. But when Henry the ſecond in a rage complain'd that none about him would rid him of that peeviſh man, meaning Arch-Biſhop Becket, it was more then the frown of Gracchus, but yet not ſo much as to leſſen the fault of the ſacrilegious homicides; becauſe there was no violence done to their choice, but the crime entred upon the account of luſt and ambition, and that was as bad as if it had begun and ended upon the ſtock of their own anger or revenge. But when a Prince or a Lord commands his ſubject to ſin, as Domitius the Father of Nero commanded his freed man to drink to drunkenneſſe, ſo earneſtly that he kill'd him for refuſing it, and as Cambyſes did to Praxaſpes; then it is evident that the Prince is ſo much more guilty then he that obeys, by how much it is evident that the ſubject ſins with leſſe delight, and a more imperfect choice, and with a will which in it's actions ſuffers diminution: and therefore in ſuch caſes ſervants are very much excuſed from puniſhment in exterior courts, as knowing that ſuch actions proceed from an excuſable principle, from a regardfull obedience, and an undiſcerning ſubjection; which becauſe in moſt things it ought not to diſpute, they not diſcerning their utmoſt limit, being born to ſerve, not to rule and diſtinguiſh by their reaſon, and beſides this, having all their fortune bound up in their Maſters frown or favour, are very much to be pitied if they obey too much; etenim quod imperante te ſervus tuus Faciebat, abs te id eſſe factum exiſtimo. And this the law it ſelf obſerves in the commands of ſome ſuperiors: Qui juſſu judicis aliquid facit, non videtur dolo malo facere, cui parêre neceſſe habet; The command of ſuch a ſuperior whom we eſteem it neceſſary to obey, exempts our obedience from being Criminal. And though this of Judges be a particular caſe, becauſe Res judicata pro veritate accipitur, ſaies the law, they declare law by their ſentence and commands; yet the Romans obſerv'd it in the caſe of Clients and freed men to their Patrons, as Livy reports it in the caſe of the freed man of Appius the Decemvir; and the old books of Philoſophers obſerv'd it in the obedience of children to their parents, as Aulus Gellius recites out of them.

8. But then this alſo admits of one diſtinction more, which the law thus expreſſes; Ad ea quæ non habent atrocitatem ſceleris vel facinoris, ignoſcitur ſervis, ſi vel Dominis vel his qui vice Dominorum ſunt, velut Tutoribus & Curatoribus, obtemperaverint, Servants and inferiors are excus'd if they tranſgreſſe at the command of their ſuperiors in a ſmall matter, but not in a great. This is obſerved by the Sages of our Common law. If a Feme covert doth ſteal goods by the commandment of her husband (without other conſtraint) this hath been holden to be felony in her, ſaith S^r Richard Bolton the L. Chancellor of Ireland: and for this he quotes Bracton, and addes this reaſon out of him; For licet Uxor obedire debeat viro, in atrocioribus tamen non eſt ei obediendum, In great matters, and ſins of high nature, a wife is not to be excus'd for her obedience. But if the husband not onely commands, but uſes compulſion, then it is ſo far excus'd, that in the wife the theft is not felony; but murder is, becauſe the greatneſſe of the horror in ſuch a fact is ſufficient to prevail againſt the husbands threatnings and her own fear, unleſſe there were in her ſome evil principle. If a ſervant defending his lords right doe ſome injury, he is excus'd in law, but not if he kills a man; if he ſpeaks a rude word he may be born with, but not if he ſteals a horſe. And this alſo hath ſome proportions of truth in the Court of Conſcience, that if the ſuperior be great, and the command be urgent, and the inſtance not very conſiderable, the fault is by every of theſe conſiderations very much leſſen'd, but the man is not totally excus'd; his excuſe is upon the ſtock of fear or a great temptation: ſo far as they intervene in the preſent caſe, and ſo far as they can excuſe in any (which I am afterwards to conſider) ſo far the guilt ſuffers diminution. But the advice of the ſon of Sirach is the great rule in this queſtion, Accept no perſon againſt thy ſoul, and let not the reverence of any man cauſe thee to fall.

9. But all this is to be underſtood of thoſe actions which are Criminal both in the Commandement and in the obedience, in the ſanction and in the execution, ſuch as are adultery, murder, treaſon, blaſphemy, and all the prevarications of the natural law, in all moral precepts, the tranſgreſſion of which can by no intention become legitimate. But in the poſitive and temporary laws of God which enjoyn no moral, natural rectitude, but ſimple and juſt obedience during the abode of that law, the ſubject, the ſon or the ſervant if he be commanded by his juſt ſuperior to an external miniſtery in the ſin of the ſuperior, if he conſents not to the ſin, and declares againſt it according as he can be requir'd, ſins not at all in the obedience. Thus when Joab and the Captains numbred the people againſt their wills upon the peremptory command of David their King, they had no part in the ſin, becauſe they explicitely diſſented all the way, and the execution and obedience did not implicitely and by interpretation involve them in it. The reaſon is, becauſe the act of numbring the people was of it ſelf innocent, and made criminal onely by David's circumſtances; of which when they had advertis'd their King, and diſclaim'd the malice and irregularity, they intereſted themſelves in nothing but the material part: which when it can be ſeparated from the evil heart, as in this it was, and in all the like it may, the obedience is innocent, though the commandement be impious; and therefore David wholly takes the fault upon himſelf,

I have ſinn'd and done wickedly, but what have theſe ſheep done? * To this alſo is to be added, that even in the caſe of poſitive precepts our obedience muſt be wholly paſſive, and in no ſenſe active; that is, it muſt be wholly an act of obedience, without any promoting or advancing the ſin in him that commands, no way increaſing, or incouraging, or confirming the ſin or the ſinner.

2. Under this head is reduc'd the praiſing of an action: Which if it be done with a deſigne to promote it, is firſt a ſin in the approving it ſecretly, and is another ſin in ſetting it forward publicly. According to this is that ſaying of the Arabians, Qui laudat obſcœnum perpetrat illud, He that praiſes an unclean action is himſelf an unclean perſon. And therefore it was good Counſel, for by our words we ſhall be judged: but, as Saluſt ſaid of Cæſar and Cato, Alius aliâ viâ, ſome one way, and ſome another get great names. Cato was famous for diſcountenancing, Cæſar for being a patron of evil men; but Cato was the better man: and upon this account Pliny commends one, ornavit virtutes, inſectatus eſt vitia, he adorned vertues with a fair character, but reproach'd vitious perſons: and he that by praiſes and diſpraiſes reſpectively does not diſtinguiſh vertue and vice cannot be a good man.

Concerning which it was excellently ſaid by Maximus Tyrius, Qui largiuntur indignis ea quæ dignis conferenda eſſent, tria præſtant abſurda: Nam & ipſi jacturam faciunt, in bonos ſunt injurioſi, maloſque roborant ſegete ac materiâ vitiorum ſuppeditatâ. To give to vice any of the treatments or rewards of vertue is a treble miſchief: The gift or reward is loſt, and injury is done to vertue, and evil men are incouraged in their evil courſes. Serm. 8. de Benef.

10. 3. By conſent, ſilent and implicite, we are partakers of the fact of others: by not contradicting we are ſometimes adjudged willing.

Of the main part of the propoſition there is no doubt, but that a conſenting to evil is a ſin; a conſenting to any action gives it as much authority, being and warranty as his conſent can effect: but the queſtion here is what are the ſignes of conſent when it is not expreſs'd, and when the man that is ſilent is juſtly preſumed willing. This inquiry is of uſe in the matter of preſumptive diſpenſations, and in the participation of good and evil actions and rewards. But it hath in it but little difficulty.

11. For 1. It is evident that then ſilence is an implicit conſent, when the ſuperior or the intereſted perſon, whoſe conſent can verify the act, and whoſe power can eaſily hinder it, and who is bound to hinder it if it be unlawfull, does yet hold his peace, and forbids it not. The reaſon of this is, becauſe every man is ſuppos'd to doe his duty, unleſſe the contrary be known: and therefore when a Prince ſees his ſubjects doing what the law forbids, and which he can eaſily hinder, it is to be preſum'd that he diſpenſes with them in that caſe, becauſe he knows that they will expound his ſilence to be a licenſe; and therefore he alſo intends it ſo, ſo long as he is ſilent, or elſe he does unreaſonably, and to no good purpoſe holds his peace.

12. But this is not true in thoſe things which to their ſtabiliment or warranty require a poſitive act. For ſometimes a ſilence is but an indifference and neutrality, according to that of the law, Qui tacet non utique fatetur, ſed tamen verum eſt eum non negare; He that holds his peace neither confeſſes nor denies: and in the Canon law, Id in tua Eccleſia diſſimulare poteris, ita quod nec contradicere, nec tuum videaris præſtare aſſenſum; The Biſhop's diſſembling or taking no notice in ſome caſes, is expounded neither to be a contradiction nor conſent: and the gloſſe in cap. cum jamdudum de præben. affirms, Multa per patientiam tolerantur, quæ ſi deducta fuerint l. 142. ff. de reg. jur. c. ſuper eo. de cognat. ſpiritual.

in judicium, exigente juſtitiâ non debent tolerari, Some things are patiently ſuffer'd, which if they were publicly complain'd of, ought not to be ſuffer'd. But theſe ſeeming antinomies are both very reaſonable in their own ſenſes, and therefore are eaſy to be reconcil'd.

13. For if the act about which the ſuperior is patient be conniv'd at, it is either becauſe for ſome reaſonable cauſe he pardons the Criminal; or elſe becauſe his patience is neceſſary and by conſtraint, he cannot help himſelf. For no ſilence is eſteem'd a ratihabition of a paſt act: becauſe when the thing is done without the leave of the ſuperior, his ſilence or ſpeaking cannot alter it, or legitimate the action if it was evil; at the moſt it does but pardon what is paſt, which is no allowance of any future action of the ſame nature. Indeed in the Court of Conſcience, ſuch a ſilence, or not reproving of a paſt fault, may be want of duty and diſcipline, and a criminal omiſſion of what we are oblig'd to; but hath no legal or natural cauſality upon that action which is paſt, and can be but an accidental cauſe or occaſion of a future.

14. But then ſilence is an interpretative conſent, when it is 1. a ſilence of a thing obſerved, and 2. at preſent, and 3. that can be hindred: and then indeed in law it is a great preſumption, but not always in Conſcience; becauſe it may proceed from a neglect of duty that the ſuperior takes no notice of the action, or from many other cauſes, as puſillanimity, juſt fear, or weakneſſe, which becauſe they cannot always be prov'd or obſerv'd, they may conclude legally from ſilence to conſent or diſpenſation: yet the proceſſe of Conſcience muſt be upon more wary grounds, and where there is ſo much fallibility in the preſumption, the conſcience muſt proceed to action upon more certain accounts, and muſt ſtrictly follow her rule, or muſt have greater cauſes to juſtify her liberty.

15. And therefore though the ſuperior be ſilent, and does obſerve the action, and can hinder me; yet I am not to preſume that he diſpenſes, or conſents, or gives me leave to goe beſides the law, unleſſe there be in the ſtate of my affairs a juſt cauſe of diſpenſation, and yet a reaſonable cauſe of hindring me from asking, or him from expreſſing his leave; then ſilence may be preſum'd to be leave, though the cauſe of diſpenſation be probable onely, and not very neceſſary.

16. In the reducing this to practice three cautions are to be attended.

1. When a ſubject proceeds to action upon the preſumption of leave, or a tacit diſpenſation, this preſumption or ſuppoſition muſt be made uſe of before the action be done, not afterwards. For it can never be honeſt to doe an act in hope to get leave afterwards; for untill the leave be actually given or reaſonably preſum'd, it is prohibited, and conſequently unlawfull; and if a diſpenſation were afterwards given and obtained, it were nothing but a pardon, which is ſo far from making the paſt action to be innocent, that it ſuppoſes it to be Criminal, for elſe there were no need of pardon. He that ſins in hope of pardon, fears nothing of the ſin but the ſmart, he thinks there is no evil but puniſhment; and therefore hath nothing towards vertue but the fear. If therefore before the action be undertaken the diſpenſation be not preſum'd, nothing that comes after can change the action.

2. This

17. 2. This presumption is not to be extended beyond that very action that is done in the presence, or within the notice and observation of the superior. For although it should be true that he does give tacit consent or leave to this particular, yet it follows not that therefore he does so to any or all of the same kind. For that may be just or tolerable once, which if repeated may be chang'd in circumstances, or become evil example, or of intolerable effect by the very repetition; or the mind of the superior may change, or the causes of dispensation may cease: and after all, since this dispensation wholly depends upon the consent of the superior, and this consent is then onely justly presum'd when he observes the action and forbids it not, the presumption is wholly at an end when he does not see it; and therefore a tacit consent or leave to an observed action can at no hand be extended to a consent or leave to others that are not observ'd by him.

18. 3. If the tacit dispensation be of such nature that it cannot give leave to a present observed action, but by introducing a faculty, or state, or potentiality of doing the like, then it is certain that if the present action be tacitly dispens'd withal or consented to, it may be extended to all of the like kind; but it is also as certain, that such a tacit consent is not so easily to be presum'd. The Bishop of Bitonto for his exercise was flinging of a leaden weight, and by chance kill'd his servant who unfortunately cross'd the way as the lead was irrecoverably passing from his hand, and for this misfortune in the chance of bloud is made irregular. Afterwards in the presence of his superior seeing a yong Turk dying who had express'd some inclinations to Christianity, baptizes him in the instant before his death, and was observ'd and conniv'd at by his superior, and therefore had a presumptive leave or dispensation for his irregularity. But because this single action could not have been dispens'd withall but by taking off his irregularity, it took away all that which could hinder his future doing his Episcopal office; and therefore he hath the same presumptive leave for the future actions which will not be observed, as for the present which was. But then the first presumption must be very reasonable and sure: for although a probable presumption may suffice to conclude for leave in a single present action whose effects determine with it self; yet if it have influence upon the future (as in the case before cited) it ought to be better consider'd, and more warily conducted by the superior, and therefore not readiy presumed by the subject. These are the measures of guessing at a consent by silence. There is also one way more of implicit or secret consent, viz.

19. 2. He does implicitely consent to an action, who consents or commands any thing to be done, from whence such an action or leave must necessarily follow: and the reason is, because he ought not to doe things repugnant to each other. He that makes it necessary for me to doe a thing, is the cause of my doing it, as much as if he commanded it. And this is more then a tacit consent or dispensation respectively, for it is a virtual. He that collates the order of Priesthood upon me, intends I should doe the whole office. Princeps enim qui illi dignitatem dedit, omnia gerere decrevit, saith the law. Thus he that dispenses in the irregularity, consents to all the actions which he does by virtue of the removing that impediment, who is so dispens'd with. Which proposition is onely so to be understood, when there is nothing wanting to the effecting such an action but the removing that impediment: but it is suppos'd that he that is dispens'd with, will uſe his liberty; and the diſpenſation if it be at all is directed ſo, and is in order to it. But if the ſuperior does an action which is not in order to an end, neither in order of nature or of intention, but yet it can be conſequent to it, that conſequent action is not to be imputed to him who did ſomething precedent, without which that action could not have been done. Thus if a Prince pardons a thief, or a friend begs his pardon that kill'd a man, although he could not have ſtoln any more without that pardon, yet that after-theft or murder is not imputable to him that gave or to him that beg'd the pardon, unleſſe they did it with that very intention; for the pardon is not in any natural order to any ſuch conſequent action, and therefore without his own actual or deſign'd conjunction and intuition, cannot convey the crime and guiltineſſe.

Queſtion.

20. Upon the occaſion of this, it is ſeaſonable to inquire how far it may be lawfull, and can be innocent to permit a ſin.

See Book 1. Chapt. 5. Rule 8. Numb. 17, 18.

The caſe is this. Pancirone an Italian Gentleman invites a German Embaſſador to dinner, feaſts him nobly, ſets before him plenty of delicious wine, enough to exhilarate him and all his company; but the German after his country faſhion thinks it no entertainment unleſſe he be drunk. The queſtion is whether Pancirone ſins in ſetting before him ſo much more as will fill the utmoſt capacity of his intemperance. Is it lawfull to ſuffer him to be drunk?

21. If this Queſtion had been ask'd in the Primitive Church, the anſwer would have been a reproof to the inquirer, as one who no better underſtood the laws of ſobriety and hoſpitality, and the meaſures of the Chriſtian feaſtings. Poſidonius tells of S. Auſtin, Uſus eſt frugali menſâ & ſobriâ, quæ quidem inter olera & legumina etiam carnes aliquando propter hoſpites & quoſque inferiores continebat. Semper autem vinum habebat, quod tamen moderatiſſime bibebat, quia noverat & docebat, ut Apoſtolus dicit, quod omnis creatura Dei bona ſit, & nihil abjiciendum quod cum gratiarum actione percipitur. He had that which was good and uſefull for himſelf according to his own meaſures, and ſomething better for ſtrangers. He always had wine, but it was drank very ſparingly; becauſe every creature of God is good, if it be received with thankſgiving. But if the gueſts be permitted to drink to drunkenneſſe, who ſhall ſay Amen at thy giving of thanks? or how ſhalt thou give thanks at the ſpoiling of the gifts of God? There is no peradventure but as a feaſt is the enlargement of our ordinary diet, ſo the entertainment of gueſts is a freer uſe of our liberty, ſo it be within the limits and capacities of ſobriety. But though the gueſts meal may be larger then our ordinary, yet we muſt ſecure our own duty more then we can ſecure theirs. When the Greeks whom Lucullus feaſted wondred why for their ſakes he ſhould be ſo large in his expences, he anſwer'd, Nonnihil, O Hoſpites, veſtri cauſâ, ſed maxima pars Luculli gratiâ, Something of this, O Gueſts, is for your ſakes, but the moſt of it is for my own magnificence. We ſhould take care to doe ſo, that though for our gueſts we doe ſomething more then ordinary, yet our greateſt care ſhould be for our ſelves, that we doe nothing that may misbecome the houſe of one of Chriſts ſervants. Would Plutarch. in apoph. Rom.

Pancirone

Pancirone ſuffer the German Embaſſadour to lie with his women when he entertains him, and make his chambers a ſcene of luſt? Certainly he would eſteem it infinitely diſhoneſt, if to an honeſt family he ſhould offer ſo great an injury; and why may not his chambers miniſter to luſt, as well as his dining-room or cellars to beaſtly drunkenneſſe? and is it not as honorable that the family ſhould be accounted ſober, as to be eſteemed chaſt? or is not drunkenneſſe diſhoneſty as well as luſt? and why may not Pancirone as well bid his ſervants keep the door to wantonneſſe, as hold the chalice to beaſtly vomitings? In theſe things there is no other difference, but that as cloths, ſo vices alſo are in and out of faſhion as it happens. He that means to be a ſervant of God, muſt for himſelf and all his houſe take care that God be not there diſhonour'd. I and my houſe will ſerve the Lord, ſaid Joſhuah: and when God gave to the Iſraelites the law of the ſabbath, he gave it for themſelves and their families and the ſtrangers within their gates. * But ſo corrupt and degenerous are the manners of Chriſtians, that our feaſts are miniſteries of ſin, and every gueſt hath leave to command the houſe even when he cannot command himſelf: but this is not καὶ ἀναλογίαν πίστεως, the Chriſtian ſobriety hath other laws. Does any man when he relieves the poor at his gate give them leave to drink till they be drunk? and yet what they give to the poor is given for God's ſake: but when they miniſter to the rich man within, for whoſe ſake is that exceſſe given? If Codrus askes an almes, we refuſe him, if we ſuppoſe he will make himſelf drunk with it, and we think we are bound to refuſe him: & can it be lawfull to give to a gueſt within what it is unlawful to give to a gueſt without? If it be unlawful, it is certain it is not unavoidable: but if there be difficulty in declining it to ſome men, then beſides that which is principally intended by our Bleſſed Saviour, we ſee alſo there is very great reaſon in thoſe words, When thou makeſt a feaſt, call not the rich, but call the poor: Theſe will not tempt you to make them drunk, it may be the others will. If our Gueſt makes himſelf drunk with the uſual proviſions which muſt be indiſtinctly miniſtred at feaſts, that cannot be help'd, but by refuſing to receive ſuch perſons again to our Table: but he that knowingly and obſervingly eſpies the meeting turn to God's diſhonour, and does not put a limit to that ſea of drink, and place a ſhore and a ſtrand to the inundation, will find that God is departed from that meeting, and the pleaſing of his drunken gueſts will not make him recompence for the loſſe of ſuch an inhabitant. A man muſt at no hand conſent to his brothers ſin: and he that can and ought to hinder it, and does not, by interpretation does conſent. For he that gives a man a goblet of intemperance, with which he ſees him about to drown his ſoul, is juſt as innocent as he that lends him a knife to cut his own throat. But this is to be underſtood when the caſe is evident and notorious, for in the approaches and acceſſes to drunkenneſſe the matter is leſſe then in the lending of a knife, becauſe it is yet diſputable whether he will finiſh his intemperance: but if it be plain that drunkenneſſe is deſign'd, the caſe is all one; and if it be not perfectly deſign'd, yet as it ſteals on diſcernably, ſo the ſin of him that miniſters to the crime increaſes up to the ſame proportion of effect and guiltineſſe. Hoſpitality is one of the kinds of charity: and that is but an ill welcome which firſt procures a feaver, and it may be after it an irrevocable damnation.

3. He

22. 3. He that gives Counſel or aid to an action good or evil, conſents to it, and it is imputed to him as a product of his will and choice.

cap. ſi quis viduam. 50. diſtinct. c. 2. de cler. pug. in duello. c. ſicut dignum. 5. clericos. de homici.

This is expreſſely affirm'd by all laws Civil and Canon, and the Municipal laws of all thoſe Nations of which I have ſeen any records concerning this matter: and the interpreters univerſally conſent, with this proviſo, that the counſel be ſo much cauſe of the action, that without it it would not have been done. For if the action would have been done however, then he that counſels to it is guilty in Conſcience always; but unleſſe it be in great crimes, and in deteſtationem facti, it is not always puniſh'd in law. But if it were it would be very juſt, ſo that a difference were made in the degree of puniſhment: For he whoſe counſel is wholly author of the fact is guilty of more evil then he who onely addes hardneſſe to him who was reſolved upon the crime. But in the Court of Conſcience he ſtands guilty that gives evil counſel, whether the Criminal would have done it with or without his counſel: and therefore the laws doe very well alſo to puniſh evil counſellors.

Claudian. lib. 1. in Eutrop.

Quam bene diſpoſitum terris, ut dignus iniqui
Fructus conſilii primis authoribus inſtet?
Sic multos fluvio Vates arente per annos,
Hoſpite qui cæſo monuit placare Tonantem
Inventas primùm Buſyridis imbuit aras,
Et cecidit ſævi, quo dixerat, hoſtia ſacri.

So Claudian. The evil counſellor is firſt to feel the evil effect of his own pernicious counſel; that is, if his counſel perſuade to ſin, not if it prove infortunate: not but that even counſel that is given with purpoſe to doe a miſchief is highly to be puniſh'd not onely by the degree of the evil effect, but by the degree of the malice that advis'd it; but that thoſe events which were not foreſeen or deſign'd cannot be imputed to him that gave the beſt advice he could, but could not help it if he were deceiv'd in his judgment. But if the counſel be to a ſin or an unworthy action, there is no need to expect the event to make a judgement of the counſel.

23. The ſame alſo is affirm'd in the caſe of giving aides to an action good or bad; in which there is no variety, but of degrees onely: for when they are σὼν τι δὺ ἐρχόμενοι in combination, it is miſchief with a witneſſe.

Non caret effectu quod voluere duo.

It is an aggravation of the impiety when the zeal of malice is ſo potent, that it is greater then the power, and therefore calls in aide to ſecure the miſchief. But he that ſo aſſiſts, that he is the great effective cauſe of the evil which without his aide would not have been done at all, is intirely guilty.

Claud. ibid.

Sic opifex Tauri, tormentorumque repertor,
Qui funeſta novo fabricaverat æra dolori,
Primus inexpertum Siculo cogente Tyranno
Senſit opus, docuitque ſuum mugire juvencum.

Perillus invented and made witty inſtruments of cruelty, to invite Phalaris to a witty miſchief; but the Tyrant was juſt that once, and made him teach his own brazen bull to roar. * But if the aide doe but facilitate the work, the aſſiſtant is puniſhable according to the efficacy of his aide, in humane laws;

laws; but in Conſcience he is guilty according to the ſecret malice of the principle: and therefore when Lucius Carpentus kill'd Nicanor, his page that hated Nicanor mortally, and did nothing but thruſt his Maſters ſword further into his heart, to ſhew his ill will, though Carpentus had ſufficiently kill'd him, was as much a Murderer as his Maſter was. In humane laws there is great difference in theſe things.

1. For if many by joyn'd counſel ſet upon a man and kill him together, though one onely gave him a deadly wound, yet all are guilty of the murder, becauſe they all intended it, and did ſomething towards it.

2. But if in heat of bloud and by the ſurpriſe of paſſion this be done, he onely that gave the deadly wound is the homicide, and the reſt are injurious, and are puniſh'd accordingly.

3. If one give the deadly wound, and the other knock him on the head and ſo ſpeed him, they are both murderers alike.

4. If many ſtrike a man, and of all theſe wounds together he dies, they are equally guilty; for the law juſtly preſumes that their malice is equal, by their conjunct attempt, and there being nothing in the event to diſtinguiſh them, the preſumption is reaſonable and ought to paſſe into effect.

5. If the man be dead but with one wound, and it be not known which of the aſſiſtants did it, they are all alike accounted homicides; for every of them is juſtly ſuppos'd to have had malice enough to have done it, and which of them had the hap to doe it is not known; therefore there can be nothing to diſtinguiſh them in the puniſhment, becauſe the guilt is alike, and the event not diſcernably any ones peculiar. But although in external judicatories the proceedings are various, and conſidering there is no other way of judging what is ſecret and indiſtinguiſhable, this way is neceſſary and unavoidable of proceeding by the moſt reaſonable and probable methods of juſtice; yet in the Court of Conſcience there is a more certain proceeding, and the anſwer is regular, and one; according to the degree of the will and choice, and the tendency of our affections to the event, ſo we ſhall be judged: and therefore concerning this, our own conſcience is the onely meaſure of our expectations; and the will is the meaſure of reward. But theſe things onely two can know, the Spirit of God, and the ſpirit of a man; and that's enough to finiſh the proceſſe at the day of judgement.

Queſtion.

24. Whether or no is the making and providing the inſtruments which uſually miniſter to ſin, by interpretation ſuch an aid to the ſin, as to involve our will and conſent to the ſin, and make us partakers of the guilt?

To this I anſwer, firſt in general, that all thoſe arts and trades of life which miniſter onely to vanity and trifling pleaſures are of ill fame, ſuch as are Juglers, Tumblers, Players, Fencers and the like; it being an injunction of the Apoſtle that every Chriſtian ſhould labour with his hands τὸ ἀγαθὸν that which is good, that is, ſomething profitable to the Commonwealth, and acceptable to God: and to the ſame purpoſe it is that all that a Chriſtian does muſt be apt to be reckon'd amongſt one of theſe heads, τὰ ἀληθῆ, τὰ σεμνὰ, τὰ δίκαια, τὰ ἁγνὰ, τὰ προσφιλῆ, τὰ εὔφημα, either the true or the honeſt, the juſt or the pure, the lovely or of good report; and it will be hard to reduce ſome of thoſe trades to any of theſe heads. But I cannot ſee ſee reaſon enough to ſay that if any man ſins by the uſing of theſe arts, and their productions, that the artiſt is partaker of the crime; becauſe he deſigning onely to maintain himſelf, and to pleaſe the eyes and ears and youthfull paſſions of others, may poſſibly not communicate in their ſin, who over-act their liberty and their vanity. But becauſe ſuch perſons are not ſo wiſe or diſcerning as to be able to diſcern ſo nicely one formality from another, but deſire upon any termes to get as much money as they can, and that if they were ſo wiſe as to be able to diſcern the meaſures of their duty, they would imploy themſelves better, therefore in the whole ſuch perſons are to be reprov'd, though the arts themſelves might otherwiſe be tolerated. They are not unlawfull becauſe they are directly evil, but becauſe they doe but little or no good, ſuch as are jeſters, and buffoons, and juglers; at the beſt they are but ματαιοτεχνία vain arts, and if they be not directly puniſhable, they can have no reward at all. But Alexander did very well to a fellow who made it his trade and livelyhood to ſtand at diſtance and throw little peaſe in at the eye of a needle made on purpoſe juſt ſo big as would receive them: the fellow ſeeing the Prince admire his dexterous aime expected a great reward; and the Prince obſerving the fellows expectation, rewarded him with a whole Buſhel of peaſe. It was a reward worthy of ſuch an imployment. A man cannot be blam'd for having ſuch an art, but he that makes that to be his trade, cannot be otherwiſe then an idle perſon: and therefore although he may be tolerated in the Common-wealth where there live many perſons more idle and uſeleſſe then himſelf, and although, if other things were well, the man could not be directly condemn'd for this, and ſaid to be in a ſtate of damnation; yet becauſe if other things were well he would quickly imploy himſelf better, therefore ſuch perſons when they come near a ſpiritual guide are to be called off from that which at the beſt is good for nothing, and ſtands too near a ſin to be endur'd in the ſcrutinies after life eternal.

25. But ſome inquire whether the trade of Card-makers and Dice-makers be lawfull: and the reaſon of their doubt is, becauſe theſe things are us'd by the worſt of men, and to very vile purpoſes; to which theſe arts doe miniſter, and therefore are reaſonably ſuſpected as guilty of a participation of the conſequent crimes.

26. To which I anſwer, that ſome things miniſter to ſin immediately, others mediately onely and by the intervention of ſomething elſe; ſome miniſter to ſin inevitably and by their deſign and inſtitution, others by the fault of them that uſe them ill; and laſtly, ſome things miniſter to evil and to no good, others to good and evil promiſcuouſly. Theſe three diſtinctions make but one difference of things, but give ſeveral reaſons of that difference. Thoſe things which miniſter to ſin immediately, by their very nature and deſigne, and therefore miniſter to no good unleſſe it be accidentally and by the virtue of ſomething elſe nothing appertaining to them, are certainly unlawfull: and of this there is no queſtion, and that for all thoſe reaſons contain'd in their deſcription, they are of evil, and they are evil, and they tend to evil. But if they can miniſter to good, if they of themſelves are innocent, if they can be us'd without doing hurt, although they are generally abus'd, yet he that makes them in order onely to ſuch uſes to which of themſelves they can and ought to miniſter, partakes not of the ſin of them that abuſe the productions of his art and labour. And this is remarkable markable in the caſe of pictures and images: concerning the making of which there was a great queſtion in the Primitive Church; but the caſe of Conſcience they thus determined: It was unlawfull to make pictures or images for heathen Temples, or for any uſe of religion: imò tu colis, qui facis ut coli poſſint; He that makes them that they may be worſhipped, is a worſhipper of them, that is, he partakes of his ſin that does worſhip. But becauſe the art ſtatuary and of painting might be us'd to better purpoſes, therefore they were advis'd to doe ſo, but to ſeparate them from all approaches toward religion; of which I have already given accounts out of Tertullian De ſpectaculis c. 23. And the ſame is the anſwer concerning the trades of making cards and dice. But although this be but an inſtance of this Rule; yet becauſe it relates to the practice of ſo great a part of mankind, it may deſerve to be conſidered alone in order to that relation and that practice. For it wholly depends upon this, If it be innocent, if it can be good to play at cards and dice, then the trade of making the inſtruments of playing is alſo innocent. If not, that which miniſters to nothing but ſin, muſt be of the kinred of ſin, and in the ſame condemnation.

Queſtion.

Whether it be lawfull to play at Cards or Dice.

27. S. Chryſoſtome affirms, Non Deum inveniſſe ludum, ſed Diabolum, Not God, but the Devil found out play.* It may be he alluded to that of [a] Plato, who ſaies that the ſpirit Theuth invented tables and dice; but then he ſaies that the ſame ſpirit found out Arithmetic, Geometry and Aſtronomy; and therefore from hence we can make no conjecture. S. [b] Cyprian ſaies that, quidam ſtudio literarum bene eruditus, multum meditando hocmalum & perniciosum ſtudium adinvenit, inſtinctu ſolius Zabuli qui eum artibus ſuis repleverat. Hanc ergo artem oſtendit, quam & colendam ſculpturis cum ſua imagine fabricavit, Some very learn'd perſon inſpired and filled with the arts of the ſpirit Zabulus taught the art of dice and tables: and he addes, that he ſo order'd it, that no man might touch the tables till he had firſt ſacrific'd to Zabulus. And therefore M. Mantua affirm'd it to be very unlawfull to play at dice or tables, upon this very reaſon; Non tantum alea luſum crimen eſſe, ſed malorum dæmonum inventum, It muſt needs be unlawfull when it is more then ſo, as being the very invention of the devil. And this fierce declamation hath prevail'd amongſt many wiſe men to the condemnation of it. Vincentius ſaies, Manus Diaboli eſt ludus taxillorum: and Bodinus is yet more particular, he tells us how; for, ſaies he, in alea & fortuito illius jactu geomantiam artemque diabolicam ſitam eſſe, The chance and luck of it is a kind of geomancy or diabolical art. Indeed if he had meant that the art of conducting the fall of the contingent die had been diabolical and a jugling art, he had ſpoken reaſon and truth: but that there is a diabolical art in the contingency and chance of it, is little better then a contradiction; unleſſe he could make it appear that the fall of the dice was by God committed to the Devils conduct: which truly is not very improbable in ſome caſes to be admitted; but becauſe it is uncertain, Apherdianus calls it diabolical or found out by the Devil, by reaſon of the craft us'd in it, and the evils conſequent to it.

Dæmonis inſtinctu ſibi quod reperêre maligni
Cum variis homines in ſua damna dolis.

And indeed this is almoſt the whole ſtate of the queſtion; for there are ſo many evils in the uſe of theſe ſports, they are made trades of fraud and livelyhood, they are accompanied ſo with drinking and ſwearing, they are ſo ſcandalous by blaſphemies and quarrels, ſo infamous by the miſpending our precious time, and the ruine of many families, they ſo often make wiſe men fools and ſlaves of paſſion, that we may ſay of them that uſe theſe inordinately, they are in an ocean of miſchiefs, and can hardly ſwim to ſhore without periſhing. And therefore it is no wonder that holy men and wiſe Commonweaths, obſerving the great evil of them, and having not skill or experience enough to tell of any good that is in them, have forbidden them utterly.

lib. 1. Origin. c. 67. This is the obſervation of S. Iſidore; Ab hac arte autem fraus & mendacium atque perjurium nunquam abeſt, poſtremo & odium & damna rerum. Unde & aliquando propter hæc ſcelera interdicta legibus fuit, Fraud and lying and perjury are the inſeparable attendants upon cards and dice, and hatred and great loſſes follow; and therefore becauſe of this appendant wickedneſſe, ſometimes theſe are wholly forbidden by the laws.

28. For ſo we find it forbidden in the Civil laws of Princes and Republics. M. Mantua tells that by an old law of Egypt, every man was eaſily admitted to the accuſation of a gameſter or dice-player; and if he were convicted of it, he was condemned to the quarries: and Joſephus Maſcardus tells that thoſe who were remark'd as daily and common gameſters were infamous, and not admitted to give teſtimony in a cauſe of law. It is certain it was forbidden by the laws;

Horat. Ep. 1.

Ludus enim genuit trepidum certamen & iram;
Ira truces inimicitias & funebre bellum.

The public peace cannot be kept where public dicing-houſes are permitted, and therefore the Romans were ſo ſevere againſt ſuch public houſes and ſcenes of debauchery, that the Prætor ſaid, Si quis eum apud quem aleâ luſum

ſum eſſe dicetur, verberaverit, damnúmve ei dederit, ſive quid eo tempore domo ejus ſubtractum erit, judicium non dabo, If the Gentlemen beat the Maſter of ſuch gaming-houſes, or ſtole any thing from his houſe at that time, he ſhould have no remedy. For theſe were houſes of public hatred, and therefore outlawed. And therefore Seneca calls them loca ædilem metuentia, houſes afraid of the Magiſtrate. Virtutem in Templo invenies, in foro, in Curia, pro muris ſtantem, pulverulentam, coloratam, callosas habentem manus; Voluptatem latitantem ſæpius ac tenebras captantem, circa balnea ac ſudatoria, ac loca ædilem metuentia, You may find Vertue ſtanding in Courts, and Temples, and upon the walls of a city, duſty and diſcolour'd, and with brawny hands; but Pleaſure ſneaks up and down to baths, and ſweating-houſes, and places that fear the preſence of the Ædile; that is, gaming-houſes, which we learn from Martial,

But in the Civil law the puniſhments of the Gameſters, and eſpecially the keepers of the gaming-houſes, by the confiſcation of the houſe, nay the deſtruction of it, that no man may dwell in it for ever, in that place where God hath been ſo many times diſhonour'd and blaſphem'd, are ſufficient indication of that juſt deteſtation in which the laws had them: and who pleaſe may ſee them largely deſcrib'd in [a] Danæus and [b] Jodocus Damhouderius. But I obſerve that the eſpecial remarks that the Civil laws of Princes and republics put upon this kind of gaming is that it cauſes many quarrels;

the contention for the victory begets a more cruel war: but this is eſpecially upon the account of money which is then loſt, and which the laws moſt regard, as the cauſe of all the miſchief.

29. But when this queſtion and theſe obſervations fell into the hands of the Church, that is, of Chriſtian and pious Princes and Prelates, and they that were and ought to be zealous for ſouls had obſerv'd that God was exceedingly diſhonour'd, that his name was infinitely blaſphem'd, that much of that precious time which God had allowed to us for the working out our ſalvation with fear and trembling was ſpent in luxury, and ſwearing, and paſſion, and lying and curſing, and covetouſneſſe, and fraud, and quarrels, and intemperance of all ſorts, & that μέθαι and κῶμοι drinking and gaming are joyned ſo frequently that they are knit in a proverb, and that theſe together baffle the ſpirit of a man and drive away the ſpirit of God;

they diſarme and weaken the mind of a man without a wound; it is, I ſay, no wonder that they forbad it ſo fiercely, and cenſur'd it ſo ſeverely. Aleator quicunque es, Chriſtianum te dicis, quod non es, ſaid S. Cyprian, A common gameſter or dice-player may call himſelf Chriſtian, but indeed he is not: and S. Clemens Alexandrinus ſaies, inconſideratum luxuriæ amorem otioſis iſthæc aleæ oblectamina ſuppeditare, deſidiámque in cauſa eſſe, idleneſſe and wantonneſſe provides theſe games for the lazy and uſeleſſe people of the world.

Et ſi emendatus ceſſaverit poſt annum poterit reconciliari*; A Chriſtian playing at dice or tables is not to be admitted to the Holy Communion, but after a years penance and abſtention, and his total amendment: and the Canon law forbids a Clergy-man either to play at tables, or to be preſent at thoſe places where they doe. But the Capitular of Charles the Great joynes dicing and drunkenneſſe together, as being uſual companions, and forbids them both alike to Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons. And indeed when the caſe is thus, I may ſay as Schonæus ſaid in the caſe of Saul,

No laws are too ſevere, no ſentence is too rigid for it's ſentence and condemnation.

30. But if the caſe can be otherwiſe, if playing at dice and tables can become an innocent recreation, then all theſe terrible and true ſentences will not reach them that ſo uſe it. And indeed even amongſt thoſe places and republics where ſuch gaming was ſo highly condemn'd & ſeverely puniſh'd, ſome of their braver men did uſe it, but without the vile appendages, and therefore without ſcandal and reproach. For firſt in general, it cannot misbecome a wiſe and a good man to unbend his bow, and to relaxe the ſeverities, the ſtrictures and more earneſt tendences of his mind.

Lælius and Scipio would play till they had digeſted their meal. And of Archias of Tarentum it was ſaid, Κεῖνος ἐν παισὶ γέρων, ὃν ἦ βελαῖς πρίσκος, He was an old and a wiſe man in public Counſels and imployments, but he would play like a yong man. And concerning very many wiſe Princes and Philoſophers you ſhall find many ſtories of their confident uſing lighter but innocent ſports for the refreſhment of their ſpirits tir'd with ſtudy and labour, collected by Alexander ab Alexandro. But in particular concerning dice and tables we find in Valerius Maximus related of Q. Mucius, *Aleæ quoque & calculis vacaſſe interdum dicitur, cum bene ac diu jura civium ac cæremonias deorum ordinaſſet: Ut enim in rebus ſeriis Scævolam, ita & in ſcurrilibus * luſibus hominem agebat*: that ſometimes he would play at dice and tables, when he had firſt diſpatch'd the buſineſſe of the Commonwealth proſperouſly, and the affairs of religion wiſely: In ſerious things doing as Scævola ſhould, in his recreations doing as a man: quâ quidem aleâ Porcius Cato luſiſſe fertur animi laxandi cauſâ, and Porcius Cato himſelf, wiſe and ſevere though he was, yet play'd at tables to refreſh and relaxe his mind. And if cards or tables have in their own nature nothing that is evil, provided it can be alſo ſeparated from all the evil appendages, from the crimes and from the reproach, proach, from the danger and from the ſcandal, that which onely remains is, that they as well as other innocent recreations and divertiſements may be us'd. In the caſe ſo ſtated we ſuppoſe them onely to be recreations and relaxations of the mind: ἐγὼ γὰρ ὥμην τὴν παιδιὰν ἄνεσίν τε εἶναι τῆς ψυχῆς, καὶ ἀνάπαυσιν τῶν φροντίδων, ſaid Julian, ſuch little imployments are like the pauſes of muſic, they are reſts to the ſpirit and intervals of labour. And therefore Johannes Sarisburienſis allows of every game, quæ abſque vitio curarum gravium pondus allevat, & ſine virtutis diſpendio jucundam interpolationem gaudiorum affert, if it can eaſe our griefs, or alleviate our burdens without the loſſe of our innocence. in Cæſarib. Polycr. lib. 1. c. 5.

31. Now that cards and dice are of themſelves lawfull I doe not know any reaſon to doubt. For if they be unlawfull, it is becauſe they are forbidden, or becauſe there is in them ſomething that is forbidden. They are no where of themſelves forbidden: and what is in them that is criminal or ſuſpicious? Is it becauſe there is chance and contingency in them? There is ſo in all humane affairs; in Merchandiſe, in laying wagers, in all conſultations and warres, in journeys and agriculture, in teaching and learning, in putting children to ſchool or keeping them at home, in the price of the market, and the vendibility of commodities. And if it be ſaid that there is in all theſe things an overruling providence; though no man can tell in what manner or by what means the Divine providence brings ſuch things to a determinate event, yet it is certain that every little thing as well as every great thing is under God's government, and our recreations as well as our wagers. But what if it be and what if it be not? He can never be ſuſpected in any Criminal ſenſe to tempt the Divine providence, who by contingent things recreates his labour, and having acquir'd his refreſhment, hath no other end to ſerve, and no deſires to engage the Divine providence to any other purpoſe: and this end is ſufficiently ſecur'd by whatſoever happens. I know nothing elſe that can be pretended to render the nature of theſe things ſuſpicious; and this is perfectly nothing: and as for the evil appendages which are ſo frequently attending upon theſe kinds of games, beſides that they alſo are as near to other exerciſes as to theſe, as to bowling, horſe-racing, cock-fighting, the fight of quailes and of partridges, bulbaiting, pall-mall, billiards, and all other games for money and victory, to ſome more and to ſome leſſe, beſides this, I ſay, the evil appendages are all ſeparable from theſe games, and till they be ſeparated they are not lawfull: but they may be ſeparated by the following advices.

Rules of conducting our Sports and Recreations.

32. 1. Let no mans affections be immoderately addicted to them. And this requires a great diligence and caution. For as Petrarch ſaid well, Hoc eſt in regno ſtultitiæ commune, ut quarum rerum minor eſt fructus, & cupiditas & delectatio major ſit, In the kingdome of folly we are moſt pleaſed with thoſe things by which we have the leaſt profit. And the want of doing us good, is ſupplied by doing us pleaſure. But the moderation of our affections to our ſports is beſt expreſs'd, by uſing them according to thoſe meaſures which wiſe and ſevere men uſe in their recreations, that is, not to be frequent or long in them. For it is in theſe as in meat and drink, which are then good when they are neceſſary and uſefull to the purpoſes of our nature and imployment. Sleep is neceſſary, and ſo long it is good: but a man muſt not therefore ſpend the beſt of his time in ſleep, but that time that is allowed to it, and without which he cannot well doe his buſineſſe. The limits of theſe things are not ſo ſtreight as neceßity, nor yet ſo large as humor or deſire; but as a man may drink to quench his thirſt, and he may yet drink more to refreſh his ſorrow, and to alleviate his ſpirits, and to eaſe his grief, provided that he turn not his liberty into a ſnare, ſo he may in his recreation and his ſports.

Phædrus. LIII

Cito rumpes arcum ſemper ſi tenſum habueris:
At ſi laxâris, cum voles, erit utilis.
Sic luſus animo debent aliquando dari,
Ad cogitandum melior ut redeat tibi.

Within this bound he muſt keep,* that he looſe none of his buſineſſe for his ſport; * that he make his other time more uſefull; * that this be the leſſe principal; * that it be taken as Phyſic, * or as wine at moſt: * and the minutes and little points of this meaſure are no otherwiſe to be weighed and conſider'd, but that we take thoſe proportions which our ſelves think we need to good purpoſes, or which we are adviſ'd to by a wiſe guide. To this purpoſe was that ſaying of Plato reported by Laertius; Parum eſt aleâ ludere, at non parum eſt aſſueſcere, It is no great matter to play at dice or tables, but to be accuſtom'd to it is a great matter; that is, to make it a portion of our buſineſſe, an expence of our time due to worthy imployments: and therefore in the laws, not the action it ſelf, but the abuſe, and particularly the frequency, is noted and forbidden. Ludentes quotidie ad aleam, & tabernarum frequentatores inter infames habentur, ſaies the conſtitution. Quorum aut latrunculi, aut excoquendi in ſole corporis cura conſumpsêre vitam, Men that ſpend their lives in cards and dice, and making much of themſelves, Haunters of drinking and gaming-houſes. A man may innocently and to good purpoſes goe to a Tavern; but they that frequent them have no excuſe, unleſſe their innocent buſineſſe does frequently ingage, and their ſevere religion bring them off ſafely. And ſo it is in theſe ſports, with this onely difference, that there can be no juſt cauſe to frequent theſe ſports: there is onely one cauſe of uſing them, and that comes but ſeldome, the refreſhment I mean of my ſelf or my friend, to which I miniſter in juſtice or in charity; but when our ſports come to that exceſſe that we long and ſeek for opportunities, when we tempt others, are weary of our buſineſſe, and not weary of our game,

Petrus Follerius. Senec. de Brevit. vitæ c. 13.

... Cum mediæ nequeant te frangere noctes, Nec tua ſit talos mittere laſſa manus, when we ſit up till midnight, and ſpend half days, and that often too; then we have ſpoil'd the ſport, it is not a recreation but a ſinne.

33. 2. He that means to make his games lawfull muſt not play for money, but for refreſhment. This, though (it may be) few will believe, yet it is the moſt conſiderable thing to be amended in the games of civil and ſober perſons. For the gaining of money can have no influence into the game to make it the more recreative, unleſſe covetouſneſſe hold the box. The recreation is to divert the mind or body from labours by attending to ſomething that pleaſes and gives no trouble; now this is in the conduct of your game, in the managing a proſperous chance to advantage, and removing the unprounproſperous from detriment and loſſe of victory, ſo to croſſe the proverb, Πέπωκεν ἕξω κακῶν ὁ Χίος. ἀλλὰ Κῶος,

and that by wit he may relieve his adverſe chance, and by a ſymbol learn to make good and vertuous uſe of every croſſe accident. But when money is at ſtake, either the ſumme is trifling, or it is conſiderable. If trifling, it can be of no purpoſe unleſſe to ſerve the ends of ſome little hoſpitable entertainment or love-feaſt, and then there is nothing amiſſe; but if it be conſiderable, there is a wide door open to temptation, and a man cannot be indifferent to winne or looſe a great ſumme of money, though he can eaſily pretend it. If a man be willing or indifferent to looſe his own money, and not at all deſirous to get anothers, to what purpoſe is it that he playes for it? if he be not indifferent, then he is covetous, or he is a fool; he covets that which is not his own, or unreaſonably ventures that which is. If without the money he cannot mind his game, then the game is no divertiſement, no recreation, but the money is all the ſport, and therefore covetouſneſſe is all the deſigne: but if he can be recreated by the game alone, the money does but change it from lawfull to unlawfull, and the man from being weary to become covetous, and from the trouble of labour or ſtudy remove him to the worſe trouble of fear and anger and impatient deſires. But here indeed begins the miſchief, here men begin for the money to uſe vile arts,

Quærit compoſitos manus improba mittere talos, here cards and dice begin to be a diabolical art, and men are witty to undoe or defraud one another,

..... Neque enim loculis comitantibus itur
Ad caſum tabulæ, poſitâ ſed luditur arcâ.

Men venture their eſtates at it, and make their families ſad and poor, becauſe the dice turn up an unlucky chance: and what ſport is it for me to looſe my money if it be at all valuable? and if it be not, what is it to my game? But ſure the pleaſure is in winning the money. That is it certainly. But Hoccine credibile eſt aut memorabile, Terent. Andria.

Tanta vecordia innata cuiquam ut ſiet
Ut malis gaudeant, atque ex incommodis
Alterius ſua comparent ut commoda? ah!
Idne eſt verum? Imo id genus hominum
Eſt peſſimum .....

Nothing is more baſe then to get advantages by the loſſe of others; they that doe ſo, and make the loſſe of their neighbour their game & paſtime, are the worſt of men, ſaid the Comedy. But concerning the loſſe of our money, let a man pretend what he pleaſe, that he plaies for no more then he is willing to looſe; it is certain, he is not to be believ'd: for if that ſumme be ſo indifferent to him, why is not he eaſy to be tempted to give ſuch a ſumme to the poor? to give that ſumme? his ſport will not be the leſſe if that be all he deſignes. Poſitâ dum luditur arcâ, ſtat pauper nudus atque eſuriens ante fores, Chriſtuſque in paupere moritur, Whileſt men play for great ſummes of money, a poor man at the door, redeem'd by the bloud of Chriſt, wants a ſhilling, and begs it for Chriſts ſake, and goes without it. S. Hieron. ep. ad Gaudent.

Whenever the caſe is this or like this, he ſins that plays at cards or dice or any other game for money. It is alike in all games, for I know no difference; Money is the way to abuſe them all: and cards and dice, if there be no money at ſtake, will make as good ſport and pleaſe the mind as well as any the ſports of boys, and are as innocent as puſh-pin. For if we conſider it rightly, from hence is taken the great objection againſt cards and tables, becauſe men at theſe venture their money, and expoſe their money to hazard for no good end, and therefore tempt God; and certainly to doe ſo is unlawfull, and that for the reaſon alleged: but when we play onely for recreation, we expoſe nothing of conſiderable intereſt to hazard, and therefore it cannot be a criminal tempting of God, as it is in gaming for money,

Plaut. Perſa. Ubi centuplex murus rebus ſervandis parum eſt, where no wit, no obſervation, no caution, can ſave our ſtake: for Adverſis punctis doctum ſe nemo fatetur;

Vulnera plus creſcunt punctis quam bella ſagittis, ſaies the Epigram, No man is crafty enough to play againſt an ill hand; and therefore to put a conſiderable intereſt, to the hazard of the ruine of a family, or at leaſt more then we find in our hearts to give to Chriſt, is a great tempting of God. And in theſe caſes, as I have heard from them that have skill in ſuch things, there are ſuch ſtrange chances, ſuch promoting of a hand by fancy and little arts of Geomancy, ſuch conſtant winning on one ſide, ſuch unreaſonable loſſes on the other, and theſe ſtrange contingencies produce ſuch horrible effects, that it is not improbable that God hath permitted the conduct of ſuch games of chance to the Devil, who will order them ſo where he can doe moſt miſchief; but without the inſtrumentality of money he could doe nothing at all.

34. There are two little caſes pretended to leſſen this evil, and bring it from unlawfull to lawfull. The one is, that when a man hath loſt his money, he deſires to play on for no other reaſon but to recover his own: the queſtion is whether that be lawfull or no. To this I can give no direct anſwer, for no man can at firſt tell whether it be or no: but at the beſt it is very ſuſpicious, for it engages him upon more loſſe of time, and he tempts God in a further hazard, and gives himſelf the lie by making it appear that, whatever he pretended, he did play for more then he was willing to looſe.

Ovid. Sic ne perdiderit, non ceſſat perdere luſor,
Et revocat cupidas alea ſæpe manus.

He plays on that he may give over, and looſes more that he may not looſe ſo much, and is vexed with covetouſneſſe, and chides his fortune, and reproves he knows not what: ſo that by this time I can tell whether he ſinn'd or no; for though it was hard to ſay whether he did well or ill to deſire the recovery of his money, yet when we ſee upon what termes it is deſign'd and acted, the queſtion is very eaſy to be reſolved, and the man had better ſit down with that loſſe then venture a greater, and commit more ſins.

35. The other caſe is this; If I can without covetouſneſſe of the money play, is it then lawfull? and to ſhew that I am not covetous, I will give the money I win to the ſtanders by, or to my ſervants, or to the poor. When Theodoric King of the Goths did win at dice or tables he was very bountifull to to his ſervants, and being over-pleas'd with his own good fortune, would grant them any thing. But Auguſtus Cæſar did uſe to doe this thing bravely. He gives this account of himſelf in a letter of his to Tiberius; Ego perdidi viginti millia nummûm meo nomine: ſed cum effusè in luſu liberalis fuiſſem, ut ſoleo plerumque. Nam ſi quas manus remiſi cuique exegiſſem, aut retinuiſſem quod cuique donavi, viciſſem vèl quinquaginta millia: ſed hoc malo. Benignitas enim mea me ad cæleſtem gloriam efferet. He loſt (ſuppoſe) 20000 Crowns; but it was not his ill fortune or his ill conduct, but his exceſſive liberality: he forgave to many what he had wone, and other ſummes which he took, he gave to the ſtanders by, and choſe this bounty as the way to immortality. Now it is true this is a fair indication that covetouſneſſe is not the prevailing ingredient; but to him that conſiders it wiſely it will appear to be but a ſplendid nothing. For what kind of ſport is that to bring it into my power to oblige my play-fellow with his own money? and what bounty is that by which I reward my friends and ſervants with another mans eſtate? Paryſatis did it yet more innocently, when playing with her yong ſon Artaxerxes, ſhe on purpoſe loſt a thouſand Darics at a throw, to help the yong Prince to money. Thus far it was well enough; for I doubt not but it is as lawfull to looſe my money as to give it away, if there be nothing elſe in it: but beſides that it is not ſo honourable, it may be, he that plays againſt me is not of my mind, or of my ability, and I correſpond to him in an action in which he is not ſo innocent as I ſhould be, if I did not ſomething miniſter to his evil: ſo that though I play that I may oblige him, yet there are ſo many circumſtances requir'd to keep my ſelf and him innocent, that it is a thouſand times better in ſome caſes to give him ſomething, and in all caſes to play for nothing. apud Sueton.

36. 3. For it is a worthy inquiry, if we ask whether it be lawfull for a man to poſſeſſe what he gaines by play. For if it be unlawfull, then when he hath wone he hath got nothing, but is bound to make reſtitution, and cannot give almes of that; and then it can be good for nothing, but on all ſides pierces his hand that holds it like a handfull of thorns. But in anſwer to this queſtion, if I ſhall ſpeak what I think, I am like to prevail but little, becauſe the whole world practiſes the contrary;

> ..... Et nunc in hacce publica
> Contage morum, congreges inter malos
> Malum eſſe jus eſt. Nam nunc
> Leges nihil faciunt quod licet, niſi quod lubet,

Nothing prevails but evil manners and evil propoſitions: and in ſuch things as theſe it is eaſy to confute a good counſel or a ſevere reproof, by ſaying, The man is angry, or too ſtrict, and all men are not of his mind. Therefore in this inquiry I ſhall onely tell what I have learn'd in the ſchools of wiſedome, in the laws of wiſe people, and the ſayings of holy men. In the Civil laws of the Romans, all the money that theſe gameſters wone was taken from them and ſpent upon public works; and he that loſt and paid the money was puniſhable, for the Senate forbad to play for money, or to make any promiſe or give any pledge for payment. The ſame hath been forbidden by the laws of many republics, ut quod ille in alea perdiderat, beneficio legis diſſolveret, that the law ſhould pay what the fool and the prodigal had loſt. An old Epigrammatiſt affirmes that ſuch gains will never thrive, lib. 3. Cod. tit. 43. Vide ibi Cujacium, & Weſenbech. ff. l. 11. tit. 5. Cicer. ad Atticum, Ep. 1. l. 1.

Per

Per ſcelus immenſas quid opes cumulare juvabit?
Turpiter è manibus res malè partà fluit.

And no wonder if ſuch gains be the purchaces of a thief, and no better then robbery. Ariſtotle joyns them together in the ſame kind of diſhonourable crime, Ὁ μὲν τοι κυβδυτὴς, καὶ ὁ λωποδύτης, καὶ ὁ λῃστὴς τῶν ἀνελευθέρων εἰσίν· ἀἰσχεροκερδεῖς γάρ, He that plays at dice for money, and the thief are illiberal gameſters, for they are guilty of filthy lucre: and Seneca ſays, lib. 4. Ethic. c. 1.

——immenſas opes
Jampridem avaris manibus, ut perdat, rapit.

He is greedy, and gets nothing; he wins much, and looſes more; he ſnatches from his neighbour what belongs to him, and looſes that and his own beſide. Paſcaſius Juſtus obſerves that the Spaniards call ſuch gameſters Tahur, which is the Metatheſis of Hurta, a thief; for to caſt the dice for money what is it but to deſire to take another mans money againſt his will? and that is theft. S. Bonaventure ſaies that which is gotten by play is poſſeſs'd by no good title, and cannot be lawfully retain'd: he that loſt it, hath indeed for his folly deſerv'd to looſe it; but he that hath it, does not deſerve to keep it, and therefore he muſt not, nor yet muſt he reſtore it to him that loſt it, unleſſe he perſuaded or compell'd him to play; but therefore the money is to be given to the poor: and the ſame alſo is expreſſely affirmed by S. Auſtin. Now if it be not lawfull to retain ſuch purchaces, they are not our own when we have wone them, and therefore it is no thanks to us if we give them away. Aleatoris eleemoſyna invalida eſt & nihili apud Deum, ſaith S. Bonaventure. Oblatio enim de rapina reprobatur, ſaith the Canon law, and eleemoſynæ & ſacrificium non placent Deo quæ offeruntur ex ſcelere. The money is gotten by an equivocal contract, and an indirect rapine, and therefore can never become a pleaſing ſacrifice to God; it is a giving our goods to the poor without charity, and that profits not, ſaith S. Paul. But at laſt, although he that looſes his money, deſerves to looſe it; yet becauſe by laws ſuch purchaces and acquiſitions are forbidden, and we have no right to give almes of what is not our own, and as God will not accept it when it is done by us, ſo he hath no where commanded that it ſhould be done at all, therefore it is certain that all ſuch money is to be reſtor'd, if the looſer pleaſe. Bona aleâ amiſſa tanquam furto ablata [veteres] reſtituenda putabant. S. Auſtin ſaid, that the Ancients did affirm, money wone by dice and tables ought to be reſtor'd, like the money that was ſtollen. But if the owner will not, let it aſcend to pious uſes. And if this be the ſtate of this affair, it cannot be lawfull to play at cards or dice for money. For the love of money is the root of all evil, which ſome having coveted, have pierced themſelves through with many ſorrows. And this appears yet more in the next advice.

37. 3. No man can play lawfully at ſuch games but thoſe who are diſpaſſionate, and of ſober ſpirits, under the command of reaſon and religion; and therefore to play for money will be quickly criminal, for Juven. ſat. 13.

Ploratur lachrymis amiſſa pecunia veris;
Et majore domus gemitu, majore tumultu
Planguntur nummi quam funera.

Men may weep ſolemnly for the dead, but they will be heartily troubled when

when their money is departed; and therefore there is but little ſport in ſuch games. And this Alexander the Great rightly obſerv'd, when he ſet a fine upon ſome friends of his, quod in ludo aleæ ſenſiſſet eos non ludere, ſed velut in re maximè ſeria verſari, fortunas ſuas omnes aleæ permittentes arbitrio, becauſe they did not play at dice, but contend as in a matter of greateſt concernment. And certainly ſo it is. For doe not all the nations of the world think the defence of their money and eſtates a juſt cauſe of taking up armes and venturing their lives? He that plays at games of fortune ſhould put nothing to fortunes conduct, but what he can perfectly ſubject to reaſon every minute. Seneca tells that Julius Canus was playing at tables, when the Centurion being ſent upon a deſperate ſervice, and went out leading agmen hominum perituroruм a troup of men to death, hapned to call him out to march in that ſervice. Julius Canus knew the danger well enough, but being ſummon'd, call'd to his play-fellow to tell the men upon the tables; and now, ſaies he, doe not ſay when I am dead that you had the better of the game; and deſir'd the Centurion to bear him witneſſe that he had one man more then the other. He that is thus even and ſerene may fairly play; but he that would be ſo, muſt not venture conſiderable portions of his eſtate, nor any thing, the loſſe of which diſpleaſes him and ſhakes him into paſſion. Not that every diſpleaſure, though for a trifle, is criminal; but that every degree of it tends to evil, and the uſe of it is not ſafe, and the effect may be intolerable. Plutarch. in Reg. & Imper. apoph.

Ludit cum multis Vatanas, ſed ludere neſcit:
Et putat imperio currere puncta ſuo.

If the chances will not run as we would have them, or if our paſſions will not, then it is at no hand ſafe to play; unleſſe to fret, and vex ſecretly for trifles, to ſwear and lie, to blaſpheme and curſe, to cheat and forſwear, to covet and to hate can be innocent.

38. 4. Upon theſe accounts it is that wiſe men adviſe that yong men be at no hand permitted to play at dice or the like games. Ab iſto luſu arcendi ſunt pueri, tum propter pecunias quas perdunt, tum propter vitia quæ colligunt, & mores pravos quos inde addiſcunt: Yong men and boys looſe their money and learn evil manners at ſuch games, they have great paſſions, fierce deſires and quick angers, and their flames are ſtirr'd perpetually with chance. It is a ſad ſtory that is told of the yong Prince, the onely ſon of Claudius the Emperor, who when he had loſt all his money at dice, and had tir'd out all his invention for the getting more, and could not doe it fairly, being impatient of his loſſe, and deſirous of new hopes and ventures, he ſtole a rich jewel from his Fathers cloſet, the Princes Tutor knowing and concealing the theft. But it came to the Emperors ear, and produc'd this tragedy. He diſinherited his ſon, he baniſhed all the Princes play-fellows, and put the Tutor to death. Yong men are not to be truſted to play with ſuch aſpics. And therefore Sidonius ſaies, Alea eſt oblectamentum ſenum, ut pila juvenum, Tables for old men, and the Ball for yong men. Cato allows to yong men, armes, horſes and bows, and ſuch like ſports; but would have dice and tables permitted to old men, whoſe minds are more to be refreſhed with diverſion then their bodies by laborious exerciſe. And in alluſion to this, Auguſtus in his letter to Tiberius mention'd by Suetonius hath theſe words, Inter cænam luſimus γερντικῶς & heri & hodie, Yeſterday and to day we plai'd like old men; that is, at tables. But this is matter of prudence, Anton. Gueva-ra. horol. Princ. per Anton. Guevara.

dence, and not of Conſcience; ſave onely that old men are more maſters of reaſon and rulers of their paſſion, and a ſedentary exerciſe being fitteſt for them, they who cannot but remember that they are every day dying, though poſſibly they need ſome divertiſement to their buſied and weary ſpirits, yet they doe more need to remember their later end, and take care to redeem their time, and above all things not to play for any conſiderable money, not for any money the loſſe whereof is bigger then a jeſt: and they that doe thus, will not eaſily doe amiſſe. But better then all theſe permiſſions is that reſolution of Cicero, Quantum alii tribuunt intempeſtivis conviviis, quantum denique aleæ, quantum pilæ, tantum mihi egomet ad hæc ſtudia recolenda ſumpſero, What time other men ſpend in feaſting and revellings, in dice and gaming, all that I ſpend in my ſtudies: and that is very well. For though there is good charity in preſerving our health, yet there is a greater neceſſity upon us that we doe not looſe our time.

39. 5. That our games may be innocent, we muſt take care they be not ſcandalous, that is, not with evil company, not with ſuſpicious company. Ciceroni nequiſſimorum hominum in ludo talario conſeſſus? ſhall Cicero ſuffer baſe perſons to ſit and play at tables in his houſe? That's not well: and therefore he objected it as a great crime to Marc Anthony, domum ejus plenam ebriorum aleatorumque, his houſe was frequented with gameſters and drunkards. We muſt neither doe evil, nor ſeem to doe evil: We muſt not converſe with evil perſons, nor uſe our liberty to our brothers prejudice or grief: we muſt not doe any thing which he with probability or with innocent weakneſſe thinks to be amiſſe, untill he be inſtructed rightly; and if he be, yet if he will be an adverſary and apt to take opportunities to reproach you, we muſt give him no occaſion. In theſe caſes, it is fit we abſtain: where nothing of theſe things does intervene, and nothing of the former evils is appendant, we may uſe our liberty with reaſon and ſobriety. * And then, if this liberty can be ſo us'd, and ſuch recreations can be innocent, there is no further queſtion, but thoſe trades which miniſter to theſe divertiſements are innocent and lawfull.

ad Attic. ep. 13. l. 1.

in 2ª Philippic.

Rule III.

The act of the Will alone, although no external action or event doe follow, is imputed to good or evil by God and men.

1. THe will of man in the production and perfecting of a ſin hath ſix ſteps or degrees of volition, in all which the ſin is actual, excepting the firſt onely. 1. The inclination of the will is the firſt; and that ſo far as it is natural, ſo far it is innocent. Sin oftentimes enters in at that door, but the door was plac'd there in the firſt creation; it was a part of that building which God made and not man, and in which every ſtone and ſtick was good. It was not made for ſin, but for vertue; but it was made ſo, that if we would bring ſin in that way, it was in our choice, and at our perill. But although this be the caſe of our natural inclination, yet if our inclinations be acquir'd, acquir'd, or increas'd, or habitual, that is, if they become facilities and promptitudes to ſin, they are not innocent: for this ſtate is a ſtate of ſin and death, it is the effect of many vile actions and vile deſires, it is an averſion from and an enmity againſt God; it is a bed of deſires which are ſometimes aſleep, and then doe no more miſchief then a ſleeping wolfe, but when they are awake they doe all the evil they can. And therefore the caſe of an habitual ſinner is ſuch, that even his firſt inclinations to any forbidden action in the inſtance of his own habit are criminal as the external effect. But in natural inclinations the caſe is different. 2. The firſt beginning of the ſin is when the will ſtops and arreſts it ſelf upon the tempting object, and conſents onely ſo far that it will have it conſider'd and diſputed. Then the will is come too far, not when it is willing a thing ſhould be diſputed whether it be lawfull or unlawfull, good or evil; but when it is willing it be conſidered which is to be followed, Reaſon or Senſe, wiſe counſels or ſenſual pleaſures: for when the will is gone ſo far it is paſt beyond what is natural, and come ſo far towards choice and guiltineſſe, that it is yet no more friend to vertue then to vice, and knows not which to chuſe. 3. The next ſtep the will makes is when it is pleas'd with the thought of it, and taſts the honey with the top of a rod, a little phantaſtic pleaſure before-hand in the meditation of the ſin. This prelibation is but the antepaſt of the action, and as the twilight to the dark night, it is too near an approach to a deed of darkneſſe. 4. When the will is gone thus far and is beyond the white lines of innocence, the next ſtep towards a perfect ſin is a deſire to doe the action; not clearly and diſtinctly, but upon certain conditions, if it were lawfull, and if it were convenient, and if it were not for ſomething that lies croſſe in the way. Here our love to vertue is loſt, onely fear and God's reſtraining grace remains ſtill for the revocation of the man to wiſedome and ſecurity. 5. But when this obſtacle is remov'd, and that the heart conſents to the ſin, then the Spirit is departed, and then there remains nothing but that the ſin be [6] contriv'd within, and [7.] committed to the faculties and members to goe about their new and unhappy imployment; and then both the outward and the inward man have combin'd and made up the body of a ſin. But the ſin begins within, and the guilt is contracted by what is done at home, by that which is in our own power, by that which nothing from without can hinder. For as for the external act, God for ends of his own providence does often hinder it; and yet he that fain would, but cannot bring his evil purpoſes to paſſe, is not at all excuſed, or the leſſe a Criminal before God.

Vide Unum neceſſar. cap. 5. of Habitual ſins.

Queſtion.

2. But is it not a mercy for a man to be recalled from acting his adultery? is it not charity to two perſons to keep Autolycus from killing the ſteward of Stratocles? and if ſo, then there is ſin in the action as well as in the affection, and the hand ſins diſtinctly from the heart: but then it will be found untrue to ſay that all our good and evil comes from the will and choice, and yet it will not be poſſible to tell from what principle the evil of the hand is derived, if not from the evil will. This brings a neceſſity of inquiring into the union, or difference of the actions internal and external, and the influence the will hath upon the external act, and whether it can have any aggravation or degree beyond what it receives from the inward principle.

3. To this therefore I anſwer, That all the morality of any action depends wholly on the will, and is ſeated in the inner man; and the eye is not adulterous, but it is the inſtrument of an adulterous heart; and the hand is not the thief before God, but the covetous deſire is guilty: and this appears in this, becauſe if a man takes the goods of his neighbour, which he would not have taken if he had ſuppos'd they had been his neighbours, he is innocent before God. And yet it cannot be denied but it is worſe to ſteal then to covet, it is worſe to humble and diſhonour our neighbours wife then to luſt after her. But the reaſon is, becauſe the doing of the action ſuppoſes a great many precedent acts of luſt, even the whole method and œconomy of ſin: for every act of the will, every degree of deſire is luſting or covetouſneſſe; and the external act which ſuppoſes them all, is worſe then all them except the laſt. The natural inclination of the will is but a capacity or readineſſe and diſpoſition of the faculty, and is no act. But the arreſt and ſtop of the will, the delight in fancying, the deſire of action, the conſent of the heart, and the deliberation and reſolution, theſe are the acts and products of the will; and the ſecond is worſe then the firſt, and the third worſe then the ſecond, and ſo till we come to the immediate addreſſe to the action: but that action is not worſe then the laſt reſolution and deliberate purpoſe of the will; and therefore when it is charity to hinder the man from acting his luſt, it is therefore charity, becauſe in the acting of the ſin externally there are more acts of the will, even the whole method of death is completed, and the ſame acts of will are repeated, or confirm'd, and there is miſchief done to ſome perſon or to ſome intereſt, to ſomething beſides the ſinning man, and there are ſome contingencies and ſome circumſtances to which new actions of the will muſt be conſenting and give their influence and renew their acts: but ſtill, if we compare every conſent and deliberate purpoſe of the will with the action, or that part of the action which is immediately produc'd in it, there is in that event no morality, and no good, and no evil but what is firſt within. So that he who hinders a man from acting of his luſt, does hinder him not from ſins diſtinct from thoſe of his will, but from more ſins of the will, from repetition, or confirmation, or abiding in the ſame choſen folly.

4. Upon this account it will be eaſy to anſwer whether is the greater ſin, the wiſhing and deſiring a very great evil, and willingly doing but a little one, or the doing a very great evil and an intolerable miſchief with a little malice. For it is certain that the ſin is much more increas'd by the malice of the action and effect then by the malice of the will, if the malice of the will be little, and the evil of the event be great and intolerable. For at firſt to deſire a very great miſchief, and then to act but a little one, ſuppoſes that the great malice went not to it's utmoſt period; it was deſir'd, but not reſolved on, and deliberately determin'd: and then that malice though in it ſelf great, yet it was ineffective, and was retracted before it was conſummate by the will, and acted by her ſubjects the other faculties and members. But now, if a great miſchief be done by a little malice, to that little malice all that event is to be imputed: though not to it alone, yet to that malice manag'd by ignorance, careleſſeneſſe and folly; which being no excuſes, but of themſelves criminal appendages, the man ſhall be judged by his action, not by his ignorant and imperfect choice; becauſe though the choice was naturally imperfect, yet morally and in the whole conjunction of it's circumſtances it was completely Criminal. If this thing happens to be be otherwiſe in any particular, God will diſcern it, and not man; for the greatneſſe of the miſchief in humane laws and accounts ſuppoſes the greatneſſe of the malice, if malice at all, and not chance wholly was the principle. But if the queſtion be in the acting of a great miſchief where the ſin moſt lies, in the will or in the event, I ſay it is originally in the will; and it is equally in the event, if all that event was foreſeen and known, although it was not principally or at all deſign'd. He that ſteales a cow from a widow, and does verily believe that the loſſe of her cow will not onely undoe her, but break her heart, though he does not deſigne this, yet becauſe he knows it, all that event is to be imputed to him. They that abuſe their own bodies by abominable and unclean contacts, & the ſin of Onan, though they deſign onely the pleaſing of their luſt, yet if they conſider what they doe, and what will be the event, they ſecondarily chuſe all that event, and are as guilty of it as of that which they principally deſign'd.

Uteris, & Veneri ſervit amica manus,
Hoc nihil eſſe putas? ſcelus eſt, mihi crede, ſed ingens,
Quantum vix animo concipis ipſe tuo.
Ipſam crede tibi naturam dicere rerum,

For the internal act of the will and the external act of the man are but one act, unleſſe the inſtrument and the efficient cauſe produce two diſtinct effects in every concourſe; and whatſoever is done without is firſt conſented to within, and is but the miniſtery and execution of the ſin within. For the act of chuſing is the foundation of all morality: and therefore when not onely the firſt deſign, but the appendages and other conſequents are foreſeen, and yet the action is choſen, the will is guilty of ſo many evils as it chuſes directly and indirectly, principally and conſequently.

5. But to reduce this doctrine to more minute and particular conſiderations and order.

Of the identity and diverſity reſpectively of actions internal and external, and the multiplications of ſins by them.

1. Every external act proceeding from the internal makes but one moral act, whether it be good or bad. The election and choice is the foundation: and as they are many houſes which are built upon many foundations, but many chambers and galleries built upon one foundation is but one houſe, though there be many rooms; ſo the internal and external relying upon one baſis operating to the ſame end, effecting the ſame work, having the ſame cauſe, and being but ſeveral lengths of the ſame thrid, doe not make two acts; as the ſoul ſeeing by the eye hath but one viſion, and the will acting by the hand does but her own act by her own inſtrument: and therefore although they are Phyſically or Naturally ſeveral actions, becauſe elicite and acted by ſeveral faculties, yet morally they are but one; for what the hand or eye alone does, is neither good nor evil, but it is made ſo by the mind and will.

6. 2. If there be two acts of will in one external act, there is a double malice or goodneſſe reſpectively. A Prince commands his Almoner to give much almes to the poor; the almoner being alſo a good man loves the imployment, and does it very often: the external act is but the one miniſtery of almes, but the internal is both obedience and charity.

7. 3. The external act is the occaſion of the intending or extending the internal, but directly & of it ſelf increaſes not the goodneſſe or the badneſſe of it. For the external act is not properly and formally good or bad, but onely objectively and materially; juſt as a wall cannot increaſe the whiteneſſe, unleſſe the quality it ſelf be intended by it's own principle. But as heat in iron is more intenſe then it is in ſtraw; ſo may the goodneſſe or the badneſſe of an internal act be increaſed by the external: but this is onely by accident. By inſtances of theſe ſeveral aſſertions, they will be more intelligible. When John ſurnam'd the Almoner commanded his boy to carry an almes to a poor man that was ſick in the next village, the boy ſometimes would detain it and reſerve it for his own vanity; but S. John loſt not the reward of his charity, for his internal act was good, but it was no cauſe of the outward event at all. And on the other ſide, when Mævius lay with his wife Petronilla, ſuppoſing ſhe had been Nicoſtrata, he was an adulterer before God, though by the laws of men he was harmleſſe. And if a man ſteals a horſe in the night from his neighbours field, and carries him away ſecretly, and by the morning perceives it to be his own, he is no leſſe guilty before God and his Confeſſor then if he had indeed ſtoln his neighbours. The reaſon is, becauſe the external act hath another cauſe, which is or may be innocent, but the internal act was of it ſelf completely evil and malicious. In theſe caſes, where the internal volition is not the cauſe of the external event, the ſin is terminated within, and that to him who is to be our Judge is as viſible as any thing. But when the internal volition is properly the cauſe of the action external, there more is done then it could doe alone. For in a good work the will finds the difficulties which it could not perceive while it was onely in purpoſe; and it is eaſy to reſolve to be patient in ſickneſſe when we feel nothing of it, but onely diſcourſe it, and caſt about in our eaſy minds what we ſuppoſe it will be: but Tu ſi hic eſſes, aliter ſentires, ſaid the ſick man; it may be when it comes to be acted, the will ſhall find new work, new difficulties, and will need new fortifications, and renewed reſolutions, and the repetition of acts, and freſh aids of reaſon: ſo that although all the good or evil that is in all this, is the good or evil of the will; yet this is it which I ſaid, that the external action hath in it the materiality of good and evil, and by accident the external act is better then the internal, that is, the will does better when ſhe reduces her purpoſes to act very often, then when ſhe does onely reſolve. And for this very reaſon

8. 4. The external act does ſuperadde new obligations beyond thoſe which are conſequent to the mere internal volition though never ſo perfect and complete. For the external act is exemplar in vertue, or ſcandalous in evil; it obliges to reſtitution, to Eccleſiaſtical cenſures and legal penalties, in which there are active and paſſive duties incumbent on us (as I have repreſented in the third book.) Thus alſo in good things; the external participation of the Sacraments hath in it ſome advantages beyond the internal: but theſe things are accidental to the action, and nothing of the nature of it; they are nothing of the direct morality, but the conſequent of it; which which the ſinner ought indeed to have conſider'd beforehand, and to act or to omit accordingly.

9. 5. If the courſe and continuance of the outward act be interrupted, and then proceeded in again, when the cauſe of the interciſion is over, that action ſeeming but one, is more then one ſin, or vertuous act reſpectively. He that reſolves to bring up a poor orphan in learning and capacities of doing and receiving worthy benefit, does often ſleep and often not think of it, and hath many occaſions to renew his reſolution: although his obligation be ſtill permanent, yet if he delights in it, and again chuſes, ſo often is the almes imputed to him, he does ſo many acts of charity. Titius intends to give to Codrus a new gown at the next Calends, but forgets his intention; but yet at the Calends does upon a new intention give him a gown. This act is but one, but hath no morality from the firſt intention, but from the ſecond, though there were two internal acts of volition to the ſame external; becauſe the firſt did ceaſe to be, and therefore could have no influence into the effect. But this multiplication of actions and imputations cannot be by every ſuddain and phyſical interruption, but by ſuch an interruption onely where the firſt intention is not ſufficient to finiſh the external act. Thus if a man againſt his will nod at his prayers, and awakening himſelf by his nodding proceed in his devotion, he does not pray twice, but once, becauſe the firſt intention is ſufficient to finiſh his prayer. But if he falls aſleep over-night and ſleeps ſtill morning, his morning-prayer is upon a new account, and his will muſt renew her act, or nothing is done. But in inſtances of good this part of the Rule hath but little uſe; for no man will dare to call God to a ſtrict and minute reckoning, and require his reward by number and weight. But in ſinfull actions there is more conſideration; and if we be not ſtrict in our weights and meaſures, God will; and if we will not be ſure to put enough into the ballance of repentance, there will be too much in that of judgment and condemnation: and therefore it concerns us as much as we can, to tell the number of our ſins. Therefore

10. 6. External actions in order to one end, though produc'd by one internal act or reſolution of the will, yet doe not make one external act, unleſſe the end be at the ſame time acquir'd. Thus if the man reſolves to lay wait for his enemy till he have deſtroyed him, and therefore lays wait to day and to morrow, and prevails not untill the third day, his ſin is more then one, though his reſolution was but one. The reaſon is, becauſe there muſt of neceſſity be a repetition of the ſame reſolution, or at leaſt of ſome miniſtring acts toward the perfecting that reſolution; and although the reſolution and the end were one, yet to every miniſtring intermedial act there is alſo ſome internal act proportionate. Thus every impure contact in order to impure embraces are ſins diſtinct from the final adultery, and ſo is the joyfull remembrance of it afterwards. But becauſe theſe things have in them ſome little intricacy, therefore I add this which is plain and uſefull: Every renewing of an external action ſubordinate to a ſinfull end is either a repeating of the ſin, or, which is all one, it is an aggravation of it; it extends it, or intends it. He that calls a man fool three times together either commits three ſins, or one as great as three: and he that ſtrikes ſeven blows to kill a man, hath ſo many times lift up his hand againſt God; and though he hath kill'd the man but once, yet he ſhall be avenged ſeven times. But if after any notable interruption of the act, the intention be renewed, ſo often is the ſin repeated, though it be but one external event afterward. He that reſolves every day of the week to be abſent from Divine ſervice the Sunday following, is to eſtimate his ſin by the number of his internal actions, and not by the ſingularity of that omiſſion.

11. 7. Internal acts of the will are then multiplied, when they proceed after an expreſſe revocation, or a deliberate intermiſſion, or a conſiderable phyſical interruption, or by an actual attendance to things incompoſſible and inconſiſtent with the firſt reſolution. There is no difficulty in theſe particulars, ſave onely that in making judgments concerning them we proceed by prudent and moral proportions, by the uſual meaſures of laws, and the accounts of wiſe men; onely the extremes are evident and notorious. For he that being upon his knees looſes his attention for a minute & then recalls it, does not pray twice, or ſo often as he again thinks actually of what he is doing; and we are ſure that he who ſaies a Pater noſter to day, and another to morrow, does pray twice: and between theſe no certain rule can be given but what is meaſur'd and divided by prudence and ſimilitude with the unity of natural and artificial compoſitions. But he onely does well who ſecures his caſes of conſcience in this inquiry, by interrupting his evil acts as ſoon as they begin, and gives them quite over as ſoon as they are interrupted, and when he hath choſen well, perſeveres as long as nature and exteriour accidents will give him leave, and renews that choice as ſoon as his divertiſement can ceaſe.

Queſtion.

12. In the purſuit of the matter of this Rule, it is ſeaſonable to inquire concerning [what degrees of guiltineſſe are contracted by the beginnings and deſires of wickedneſſe which are imperfect and unfiniſh'd.]

* Lib. 3. Chap. 1. Rule 4. I have already*given account that the inward acts of will are very often puniſhable by humane laws, and from thence ſome light may be reflected to this inquiry, which is concerning the eſtimate which God and the Conſcience are to make of imperfect actions: for though in humane accounts and the eſtimate of our laws, that a thing is ſecret or public is a great difference and concernment; yet in this queſtion, and in relation to God and the conſcience immediately, it is nothing at all, for nothing here is ſecret, every thing is viſible, and it is always day here. But now the inquiry is concerning thoſe things which are imperfect, and ſo ſometimes are ſecret as to men becauſe they are onely in deſires, and ſometimes they are public, but yet not finiſhed & completed: And here the rule is, Nunquam mens exitu æſtimanda eſt. God judges not by the event, but by the mind, by the good or ill will: ſo Apuleius, In maleficiis etiam cogitata ſcelera, non perfecta adhuc, vindicantur, cruentâ mente, purâ manu. He that thinks it, that is, that reſolves it perfectly, putting the laſt hand of the will to it, his mind is bloudy, though his hand be pure, and ſhall find an equal vengeance. But this is to be underſtood of the laſt act of the will, and that which is immediate to the external action; if it be in counſel, that is, not whether it ſhall be done or no, but how it ſhall be done, it is as bad and hatefull in the eyes of God as the external violence. To this purpoſe is that of Paulus the Lawyer, Conſilium uniuſcujuſque, non factum puniendum eſt, Not the fact, but the Counſel is to be puniſhed:

Quintil.

puniſhed: by Counſel meaning the deſign and reſolution, the perfect and complete volition, which is then without all queſtion come to the perfection of its malice and evil heart, when it is gone as far as to the beginning of action. Inſidiatus civi etiamſi non effecerit ſcelus, pœnas tamen legibus ſolvet, ſaid Quintilian, He that lays a ſnare for a mans life ſhall ſmart for it, though the man eſcape; the laws ſhall puniſh him: but if they doe not, it is all one in Conſcience. For as Donatus ſaid well, Non perficere, ſed conari velle aliquid ad ſcelus, effectio eſt, etiamſi non poteſt fieri. It is nothing to the ſinner that God defends the innocent and reſcues him from his fraud or violence, or ſlander; he hath done his work when he reſolv'd and endeavour'd it. For there is no degrees of morality beyond the laſt act of the will: the ſin or vertue may be extended by multiplication or confirmation of the ſame acts, but no way intended beyond that act of the will which commands execution. in Andria, act. 1. ſc. 4.

13. But this diſtinction ought to be obſerved not onely in order to puniſhments inflicted by humane laws upon Criminals accus'd of imperfect acts, but in order to conſcience. For though the whole morality of the act depends upon the laſt purpoſe of the will, and is before God the fulneſſe of the ſin in reſpect of degrees of any ſimple ſin; yet when it paſſes on to execution the will may grow worſe by repetition of her acts, or abiding in them, ſhe may ſin more ſins. For the acts themſelves about which there are endeavours made, are not always perfect, ſo as the criminal can perfect them; for it is not to all purpoſes perfect when the will hath commanded the reſolution to be acted, no nor when ſomething is done towards it by the ſinning man, but ſomething elſe may be added, and till it be, there is ſome difference in the caſe. The examples will clear it. Priſcus Merula reſolves to kill his brother Taurinus, and in order to it, buyes a dagger, way-lays him as he goes to Auguſtus, ſets upon him, throws him down; but as he is lifting up his hand to ſtrike, hears a noiſe behind the hedge, and being affrighted, curſes his brother and wiſhes him dead, and runs away. Merula is in the ſight of God guilty of murder, and if he had kill'd him effectively, there had been no greater malice, but more miſchief, and more acts of malice; and therefore the judges are to diminiſh ſomething of his puniſhment, not onely becauſe the life of a citizen was not loſt, but becauſe Merula had not done all his part of the murder, that is, his brother could not have died, unleſſe he had done ſomething beyond what he did. But when the Egyptian nobility being weary of a dull melancholy Prince, who by his healthleſſe ſpirit was good for nothing, gave him a brisk poiſon to diſpatch him; that which would have burnt to aſhes any perſon that had any fire within him, did but heighten him to the ordinary temper of another man, it onely warm'd him into an active ſpirit, and he became a wiſe Prince. Here the murder was not effected, but there was on the traytors part nothing wanting to the completing of the wickedneſſe: and therefore as in humane laws they are to have no abatement of ſentence extraordinary, ſo in the Court of Conſcience they are to think of no excuſe, no diminution, but every thing is preſent that can make all that greatneſſe which can be in the nature of that ſin: and in the firſt caſe there may be an alteration ſo timely as to change the mind before it was at the utmoſt end of the line of wickedneſſe; but in the ſecond caſe, whether the effect follow or no, there is place left for nothing, unleſſe peradventure for repentance. That part which concerns humane laws is alterable as men pleaſe, and in Chriſtendome (unleſſe leſſe it be in the greateſt crimes) cuſtome hath againſt the purpoſe of laws given impunity to them who without effect have attempted to commit vile actions; yet in the Court of Conſcience and by the meaſures of religion the matter is unchangeable.

14. There are ſome other ways of imperfect acts, which are to be regulated by the proportion of theſe meaſures. 1. He that kills a child in his Mothers wombe is as guilty of murder as he that kills a man in the field, if he did equally intend it. In this it is true that the Lawyers and Phyſicians diſtinguiſh the time of the abortion. If the child was efform'd into a humane ſhape it is capital by the laws; but not if it was inform and unſhapen. But in order to Conſcience I perfectly conſent to the doctrine of the old Chriſtians, recorded by Tertullian, Etiam conceptum utero, dum adhuc ſanguis in hominem deliberatur, diſſolvere non licet. Homicidii feſtinatio eſt prohibere naſci. Nec refert natam quis eripiat animam an naſcentem diſturbet. Homo eſt, & qui futurus eſt: etiam fructus omnis jam in ſemine eſt. While the bloud is in deliberation whether it ſhall be male or female, it is not lawfull to diſſolve it; and he that intends to hinder it from life is but a haſty murderer. He is guilty of inferring death who prevents that to have life to which God and nature did deſign it. But this is owing to the choice and deſign of the will, for the effect of one is much leſſe then the effect of the other upon many conſiderations: but if the malice was not leſſe, the difference of the effect makes no diminution.

15. The other caſe is, If a man ſmite his neighbour that he die, he ſhall ſurely be put to death, ſaid God to Moſes. That is, if he purpoſe to ſmite him, though he did not purpoſe to kill him, but wound him onely, he hath ſinn'd unto death. The Vulgar Latin reads it, Qui percuſſerit hominem volens occidere] He that ſmites a man, willing to kill him. But this laſt clauſe is neither in the Hebrew nor the Greek. And though it is ſomething leſſe to intend to wound him grievouſly, then to kill him; yet he that willingly gives that wound which he would have doe him a miſchief, and gives it ſo that it does give him his death, had a malice ſo great that it could not well diſcern between wounds and death. But in this caſe though it is certain God will judge righteouſly, and make abatement if there be any cauſe; yet in humane laws, and in the meaſures of his own repentance he will not and ought not to find gentle ſentences, but the whole perfect event will be imputed to the imperfect act of his will. For it was too much that he was willing to doe any miſchief; and ex toto noluiſſe debet qui imprudentiâ defenditur, ſaid Seneca: He cannot pretend that the evil event was againſt his will, when it is certain he did perfectly conſent to a great part of it.

Exod. 21. 12.

RULE IV.

An involuntary effect proceeding from a voluntary cauſe is imputed to the agent, as if it were voluntary and directly choſen.

1. HE that is Husband of the wife is juſtly preſum'd to be the Father of the child, and he that chuſes the cauſe muſt own all thoſe which are the effects and proper productions of it; and all cauſes are not immediate and contiguous to the effect. He that drinks himſelf drunk that without fear and ſhame he may fornicate, though when he fornicates he hath not the uſe of his reaſon any more then of his modeſty, and cannot deliberate, and therefore cannot chuſe, yet he is guilty of fornication as well as drunkenneſſe. He that eats high and drinks deep that in his ſleep he may procure pollution, is guilty of that uncleanneſſe as well as of that exceſſe, which S. Paul intimates in thoſe words, Make not proviſion for the fleſh to fullfill the luſts thereof; that is, what you deſign as the purpoſe of your intemperance, is your crime, though it be a natural effect when things are by your choice ſo diſpoſed: and when our Bleſſed Saviour commanded us to take heed of ſurfeting and drunkenneſſe, he forewarned us as well of the effect as of the cauſe; for κραιπάλη παρὰ τὸ κάρα πάλλειν, ſurfeting hath it's name from the event, becauſe it cauſes diſſolutions of the nerves and dilutions of the brain, and conſequently palſies, which when we have contracted, we are by our own fault diſabled in the ſervice of God. Κραιπάλη ἀπὸ προπεραίας· ἀπὸ χθιζῆς οἰνοποσίας, ſurfeting is the product of yeſterdayes debauchery: and ſince the effect is alſo forbidden, he that chuſes it by delighting in the cauſe, chuſes alſo what is forbidden, and therefore that which will be imputed to him. But this I have largely proved upon a diſtinct account, by making it appear that even a vitious habit, the facility and promptneſſe to ſin is an averſion from God, and makes us hateſull by a malignity diſtinct from that which is inherent in all the ſingle actions. Thus he ſins that ſwears by cuſtome, though he have no advertency to what he ſaies, and knows nothing of it: he choſe thoſe actions which introduc'd the habit, and he can derive no impunity from his firſt crime: and he that is the greateſt ſinner can never come to that ſtate of things that he ſhall take God's name in vain, and yet be held guiltleſſe.

Unum neceſſar. cap. 5.

2. But this Rule is to be underſtood with theſe Cautions.

1. The involuntary effect is imputed to the voluntary cauſe, if that effect was foreſeen, or if it was deſign'd, though when it be acted, the fooliſh man knows but little of it, no more then a beaſt does of his own acts of pleaſure, which he perceives by ſenſe, but does not by Counſel enter into it. Of this there is no queſtion, becauſe he put his hand to a hook of iron, and that being faſtned upon the rich veſſels in the houſe draws forth what the man it may be knows not to be there; but his hand willingly mov'd the iron hook, and therefore his hand and his will is the thief.

2. The

3. 2. The involuntary effect is not imputed to the voluntary cauſe, if after it is choſen by the will in one act, it is revok'd by another before the miſchief be effected. Thus if Mævius ſhoot an arrow to kill Paternus, and in the inſtant of it's egreſſion nollet factum, repents of the intended evil, that miſchief which is then done ſhall not be imputed to him. This indeed is generally ſaid both by the Divines and Lawyers; but it hath no effect at all that is material and conſiderable, ſave onely this, that the repentance does waſh away the guilt: but in true ſpeaking the whole guilt was contracted, becauſe the act of the will was completed up to action and execution, beyond which there can be no intenſion of the evil; but then the effect is therefore not imputed becauſe the cauſe alſo is pardon'd by the meanes of repentance, and ſo it is even after the miſchief is done. He that by repentance recalls the miſchief, ſhall by pardon be clear'd from guiltineſſe, whether that repentance be before or after.

4. 3. But that which we can rely upon in this particular, and of which great uſe is to be made, is this, That though all the evil events which are foreſeen, or ought to have been conſider'd, are imputed even then when they are not in our power, to him who willingly brought in the cauſe of thoſe evils; yet whatſoever was not foreſeen, and therefore not deſign'd, nor yet choſen, by conſequence and implication is not imputed to him that brought that fooliſh neceſſity upon himſelf. Conſonant to this is the doctrine of S. Auſtin, Culpandus eſt Loth non quantum inceſtus in ebrietate admiſſus, ſed quantum ebrietas meretur, Lot was anſwerable for his drunkenneſſe, but not for his inceſt cauſed by his drunkennneſſe, which he foreſaw not and deſigned not. But this caſe alſo ſuffers alteration. For if Lot had been warned of the evils of his firſt nights drunkenneſſe, and yet would be drunk the next night, he is not ſo innocent of the effect, the inceſt lies nearer to him. Onely if after that monition he ſuſpected as little as at firſt, he was not indeed guilty of the inceſt directly, but of a more intolerable drunkenneſſe and a careleſſe ſpirit, who by the firſt ſad event did not conſider and was not affrighted from the intolerable cauſe. But thus if a ſervant throws himſelf into a pit, and breaks a leg or an arme that he might not work, his not working is as much imputed to him as his uncharitable injury to himſelf: but if afterwards, as Pyrrho ſaw his Maſter faln into a ditch, and by reaſon of that firſt fall he cannot help his Maſter out, that is not to be imputed to him; for he will'd it not, it was not included virtually in any act of his will or underſtanding. And thus it is alſo in the Divine judgements, which if we procure by our own vileneſſes, all that impotency and diſability of obeying God in external religion which is conſequent to the ſuffering that judgment which himſelf procur'd, & by which he is faln ſick or mad or lame, is not imputed to him; becauſe to make himſelf guilty of a thing, it is not ſufficient that he be the meritorious cauſe of that which procur'd it, but he muſt be the voluntary and diſcerning cauſe. That evil of which a man is onely the meritorious cauſe depends upon another will beſides his own, and is indeed an effect deſerv'd by him, but not willingly conſented to, but very much againſt him; and therefore can never be imputed to him to any other purpoſe but to upbraid his infelicity, who juſtly ſuffers what he would not foreſee, and now cannot avoid.

lib. 22. contr. Fauſt. cap. 44.

5. 4. When a man falls into a ſtate or condition in which he cannot chuſe, thoſe acts which are done in that ſtate are imputed to him, if they be ſuch acts acts to which no new consent is requir'd, but that it be sufficient that he doe not dissent, and if those acts be consonant to his former will, all such effects are imputed to the will. Thus if Titius being a Catechumen desir'd to be baptized, and then falls into madnesse, or stupidity, or a lethargy, he is capable of being baptized, because nothing is in some persons requir'd but a mere susceptibility, and that there be no just impediment; the grace of the Sacrament being so mere a favour, that it is the first grace to which nothing on our parts is previous but that all impediments be removed. Since therefore in this a man is passive, his present indisposition of making new acts of election renders him not incapable of receiving a favour; always provided that there was in him no indisposition and impediment before his present accident, but that he did desire it and was capable before: that volition hath the same effect in the present state of madnesse or stupidity as it could have if he had been well. But when this comes to be reduc'd to practice, I know of no material change it works upon the man in case he dies in that sad affliction, but what was by the mercies of God laid up for him upon the account of his own goodnesse and the mans former desire. But if he does live, that susception of the Sacrament of baptisme is sufficient for him for his whole life, and the daies of his recovery; that is, all that which he could be bound to in the susception, is perform'd effectively in that state in which he could not presently chuse. But I shall resume this consideration and inquiry upon occasion of something to be explicated in the sixth Rule of this Chapter.

6. 5. But in matter of punishment the case is something different. The case is this; Mizaldus a Florentine smote an Officer of the Great Duke in the Court, and apprehending that he was in great danger of suffering a great punishment, grew sad and impatient, and at last distracted: the question upon the case is,

Question.

Whether or no Mizaldus may, being mad, be punished by death, or the abscission of his hand, for a fact he did in his health and the days of understanding. To this the answers are various by reason of the several cases that may arise.

7. 1. If the punishment cannot be inflicted without legal processe, trial, conviction and sentence, the mad man cannot be punish'd, because he is not capable of passing through the solennities of law: but if the sentence was pass'd before his madnesse, then the evil may be inflicted, that is, it is just if it be; and it may be done unlesse some other consideration interpose to hinder it.

8. 2. In punishments where no judicial processe is requir'd, a man that is mad may be punish'd for what he did when he was sober. If a son strikes his Father, and then falls mad, the Father may disinherit him for all his madnesse, because the Father may proceed summarily and upon sense of the crime; and he that by his own voluntary act did deserve it, is not by madnesse made uncapable of the punishment, to which in this case nothing but a passiveneſse is requir'd. Bartol. in l. ex facto. in principio. ff. de vulg. & pupilla substit.

3. This

9. 3. This alſo holds in caſes of puniſhments ipſo facto incurr'd, that is, which a man is fallen into as ſoon as ever the crime is committed. And of this there is a double reaſon; the one is becauſe the puniſhment is actually incurred before he is actually mad, for the very crime it ſelf is to him as a Judge and ſentence, and the ſanction of the law is all the ſolennity: and that's the other reaſon, conſequent to the former; in this caſe there needs no proceſſe, and therefore the ſinners indiſpoſition cannot make him uncapable of paſſing into puniſhment.

10. 4. In puniſhments Emendatory, that is, ſuch which beſides the exemplar juſtice, intend to reform the Criminal, he that is fallen into madneſſe ought not to ſuffer them, whether the ſentence be to be paſs'd by the law or by the Judge, whether it be ſolemn or ſummary, whether it be paſs'd before his calamity or after. The reaſon of this is plain, becauſe ſuch puniſhments being in order to an end which cannot be acquired, are wholly to no purpoſe, and therefore are tyrannical and unreaſonable; the man is not capable of amendment, and therefore not of ſuch puniſhments which are emendatory.

11. But after all this, the moderation of charity in Chriſtian Judicatories is ſuch, as that they refuſe to inflict corporal penalties on diſtracted people, it being enough that they are already but too miſerable.

Senec. Herc. Fur.

Solus te jam præſtare poteſt
Furor inſontem: proxima puris
Sors eſt manibus, neſcire nefas.

He that knows not what he does, or what he hath done, is next to him that is innocent. And when the man is civilly dead, it is to little purpoſe to make him ſink further under the civil ſword. That's a dreadfull juſtice and ſecurity that would kill a man twice over. Onely when any thing of example, or public intereſt, or deteſtation of the fact is concern'd, it may be done according to the former meaſures, and for the preſent conſiderations; juſt as it is in ſome caſes lawfull to puniſh a man after he is dead, by denying him an honourable or Chriſtian ſepulture: where although there be ſomething particular in the caſe, the nature of this puniſhment being ſuch, that becauſe we doe not bury them before they be dead, this evil muſt be inflicted upon him that feels it not, or not at all be inflicted; yet indeed it is true that it ought not at all to be inflicted upon any direct account of juſtice, but upon collateral conſiderations, as for terror and exemplarity; and ſo it may be in the caſe of the preſent queſtion.

§. 2. Of the Diminutions of voluntary actions: and firſt of Ignorance, and it's influence into the morality of Humane actions.

RULE V.

Nothing is good or bad, but what we know, or concerning which we can deliberate.

1. THE great meaſures of morality are, Chuſe the good, and eſchew the evil: before theſe can be choſen or avoided they muſt be conſider'd and diſcern'd. And therefore thoſe things concerning which there can be no deliberation are neither morally good nor bad, and thoſe perſons who cannot deliberate, can neither be vertuous nor vicious; but the things may be lawfull, and the perſons be innocent, but both of them negatively, that is, the things are not evil, and the perſons are not criminal. And therefore S. Paul celebrating the immenſe love of God to mankind, ſays that God would have all men to be ſaved; and in order to this, he addes, he would have all men come to the knowledge of the truth, as knowing this to be the onely way: no man can be ſav'd unleſſe he knows ſaving truth, but every man may be ſav'd unleſſe it be his own fault; and therefore there is to every man reveal'd ſo much truth as is ſufficient to his ſalvation. It may be this ſaving truth is reveal'd by degrees, and ſo that he who hath the firſt general propoſitions of nature and reaſon, and uſes them well, ſhall have more, even ſo much as is neceſſary untill he comes to all ſufficient knowledge. He that comes to God (ſaith S. Paul) muſt believe that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him. This is the Gentiles Creed, but ſuch as at firſt will be ſufficient to bring them unto God; whether when they are come he will give them his Holy Spirit, and teach them whatſoever is yet neceſſary. I am not here to diſpute what is likely to be the condition of Heathens in the other world: it concerns not us, it is not a caſe of Conſcience: but we are ſure that all men have the Law of God written in their hearts; that God is ſo manifeſted in the creatures, and ſo communicates himſelf to mankind in benefits and bleſſings, that no man hath juſt cauſe to ſay he knows not God. We ſee alſo that the Heathens are not fools, that they underſtand arts and ſciences, that they diſcourſe rarely well of the works of God, of good and evil, of puniſhment and reward: and it were ſtrange that it ſhould be impoſſible for them to know what is neceſſary, and ſtranger yet that God ſhould exact that of them which is not poſſible for them to know. But yet on the other ſide, we ſee infinite numbers of Chriſtians that know very little of God, and very many for whom there is no courſe taken that they ſhould know him; and what ſhall be the event of theſe things is hard to tell. But it is very certain that without a mans own fault, no man ſhall eternally periſh: and therefore it is alſo certain that every man that will uſe what diligence he can and ought in his circumſtances, he ſhall know all that in his circumſtances is neceſſary; and therefore Juſtin Martyr ſaid well, voluntate ignorare illos, qui res ad cognitionem ducentes habent, nec de ſcientia laborant. 1 Timoth. 4.

Every man hath enough of knowledge to make him good if he pleaſe: and it is infinitely culpable and criminal that men by their induſtry ſhall become ſo wiſe in the affairs of the world, and ſo ignorant in that which is their Eternal intereſt; it is becauſe they love it not.

Boeth. lib. 3. de Conſol. Philoſ.

Non aurum in viridi quæritis arbore,
Nec vite gemmas carpitis:
Non altis laqueos montibus abditis
Ut piſce ditetis dapes,

No man looks for Emeralds in a tree, nor cuts his vines hoping that they will bleed rubies or weep pearls. Which of all the Heathens or Chriſtians ever went to take goats in the Tyrrhene waters, or look'd for Cryſtall in a furnace? Many know what pits have the beſt Oyſters, and where the fatteſt Tortoiſe feeds.

Sed quonam lateat quod cupiunt bonum
Neſcire cæci ſuſtinent:
Et quod ſtelliferum trans abiit polum
Tellure demerſi petunt, and yet they look for immortality in money, and dig deep into the earth, hoping there to find that bleſſedneſſe which their reaſon tells them dwells beyond the ſtarres. Men have enough of reaſon and law put into their hearts by which they read the will of God; and therefore no man can in the univerſall lines and meaſures of ſalvation pretend ignorance: I am ſure we cannot, and that is all that concerns us. And therefore ignorance in the Law of God, in that which concerns our neceſſary duty, is ſo far from excuſing any thing it cauſes, that it ſelf is very criminal. Non eſt levius omnino neſcire quod liceat, quam facere aliquid quod ſcias non licere, To doe ſomethings that we know to be unlawfull, is not ſo great a crime, as to be wholly ignorant of what is and what is not lawfull. So that ſince the great end why God hath given us liberty and election, reaſon and underſtanding, is that by theſe we ſhould ſerve him and partake of his felicities, it follows that in all that is of neceſſity to our ſalvation God is not wanting to give us ſufficient notice; and of good and evil in general every man that hath the uſe of reaſon does or may underſtand the rules and differences.

Seneca.

2. But if we deſcend to particular rules and laws, the caſe is different. So Gregory Nyſſen ſaid, Univerſalium ſecundum electionem non eſſe involuntariam ignorantiam, ſed particularium, A man cannot againſt his will be ignorant of the univerſal precepts that concern our life Eternal and Election, but of particulars a man may. That a man muſt not oppreſſe his brother by cruel or crafty bargains every man ought to know: but there are many that doe not know whether all uſury be a cruelty or oppreſſion, or in any ſenſe criminal. But concerning theſe things we may better take an eſtimate by the following meaſures.

lib. 5. de Philoſoph. cap. 2.

Of what things a man may or may not be innocently ignorant.

3. 1. No man can be innocently ignorant of that which all the Nations of the world have ever believed and publicly profeſſed; as that there is a God

God; that God is good and juſt and true; that he is to be worſhipped; that we muſt doe no more wrong then we are willing to receive or ſuffer. Becauſe theſe things and the like are ſo conveyed to us in our creation that we know them without an external Teacher; and yet they are ſo every where taught, that we cannot but know them, if we never conſulted with our natural reaſon.

4. 2. No Chriſtian can be innocently ignorant of that which the Catholic Church teaches to be neceſſary to ſalvation. The reaſon of this is, becauſe every one that knows any thing of God, and of heaven and hell, as every Chriſtian is ſuppos'd to doe, cannot but know it is neceſſary he learn ſomething or other in order to it; and if any thing, then certainly that which is neceſſary: and of that nothing can ſo well judge, nothing can teach ſo readily as the whole Church; for if the whole Church teaches it as neceſſary, then it is taught every where, and at all times, and therefore to be ignorant of ſuch things can never be ſuppos'd innocent.

5. 3. Of that which is by ſeveral Churches and ſocieties of wiſe and good men diſputed, a man may be innocently ignorant; for there is ſuppos'd difficulty, and obſcurity, and every degree of theſe is the greateſt indication that there is not of them any abſolute neceſſity. What God hath made neceſſary to be known, he hath given ſufficient means by which it can be known. But becauſe every man cannot diſpute, and of them that can, very many doe it to very little purpoſe, and they had better let it alone, and by diſputing men often make more intrigues, but ſeldome more manifeſtations of what is obſcure; it is certain that which cannot be known but with ſome difficulty and more uncertainty, may be unknown with very much innocence.

6. 4. Thoſe things which doe not concern good life, and the neceſſities of this world and of the other, are not of neceſſity to be known by every one; becauſe there is beyond theſe no common and univerſal neceſſity. But beyond theſe

7. 5. Whatſoever concerns every mans duty in ſpecial, to which he is ſpecially oblig'd, of that he cannot innocently be ignorant, becauſe he hath brought upon himſelf a ſpecial obligation of a new duty, to which he muſt take care that ſufficient aides and notices be procur'd. Thus muſt a Biſhop underſtand not onely the articles of faith, but the rules of manners, not onely for himſelf, but for thoſe which are under his charge; he muſt be able to inſtruct others in the myſteries of religion, and to convince the gainſayers; that is, he muſt have knowledge ſufficient to doe what God requires of him, and what himſelf hath undertaken. * But then as there is in the duty of every Chriſtian, ſo there is in the charge of every office, ſome things that are primely neceſſary, ſome things that are onely uſefull, and ſome for ornament, and ſome for excellency and perfection. So that as of every Chriſtian ſo much knowledge is requir'd, that he be not ignorant of what is neceſſary for his great calling, but of other things leſſe neceſſary there is leſſe knowledge requir'd; ſo it is in every ſpecial calling. For although a Biſhop muſt know how to teach ſound doctrine, and to reprove evil manners; & if he knows not theſe things, his ignorance is criminal: yet a Biſhop may be innocent and laudable though he be not ſo learned as S. Gregory Nyſſen. Valerius the Biſhop of Hippo was a good man and a good Biſhop, yet he was not ſo inſtructed and able as his ſucceſſor S. Auſtin; and Nectarius of Conſtantinople was accounted a good Patriarch, yet he was very far ſhort of S. Chryſoſtome. Of what is more then of ſimple neceſſity, ſome may be innocently ignorant, but yet very few are. Becauſe God hath not confin'd his providence and his ſpirit to the miniſtery onely of what is merely and indiſpenſably neceſſary: and therefore when God hath largely diſpenſed and open'd the treaſures of his wiſedome and heavenly notices, we ſhould doe well not to content our ſelves with ſo much onely as will keep us from periſhing. Therefore that the Conſcience may be directed how far it's obligation of inquiry does extend, and may be at peace when it inquires wiſely whether the duty be done, theſe are the beſt meaſures whereby we can take account.

What diligence is neceſſary that our ignorance may be innocent.

8. 1. Our inquirie after things neceſſary muſt have no abatement or diminution, nothing leſſe then that it be ſo great and diligent as that the work be done. Becauſe whatſoever is neceſſary is ſufficiently communicated, and without that we cannot doe our duty, or receive the felicity deſign'd for us; and in that where God's part is done, if the event anſwer not, it is becauſe we have not done our part, and then we are not innocent. So that in theſe inquiries we are no otherwiſe to make a judgement of our diligence then by the event: whatſoever is leſſe then that, is leſſe then duty.

9. 2. But in things not abſolutely neceſſary, ſuch which are of conveniency and ornament, of advantage and perfection, it is certain we are not tied to all diligence that is naturally poſſible: and the reaſon is, becauſe theſe things are not ſimply neceſſary, and therefore not of neceſſity to be acquir'd by all means. Adde to this, if a man were bound to uſe all diligence to acquire all notices that can be uſefull to him in his general or in his ſpecial calling, he ſhould fall under a perpetual rack of Conſcience. For conſidering that a mans life were not ſufficient to doe this in ſome callings, and it is neceſſary in this world that a man doe many things more then the works of his office, he could never be ſuffer'd to attend to any neceſſity but what is mere and indiſpenſable and indiviſible, and never uſe any divertiſement, recreation, variety or eaſe, but he muſt firſt be tied upon the wheel, and feel the pains of a doubting and tormenting Conſcience, by reaſon of the impoſſibility of knowing whether we have done all that we can.

10. 3. In acquiring notices concerning doing any work with advantages a moral diligence is neceſſary: for he that ſtops at the gate of ſimple neceſſity hath ſome love to himſelf, and great dread of God, but no love to him; for love cannot conſiſt with a reſolution of knowing no more then we muſt needs; to get ſo much and no more will well enough ſerve the ends and the deſign of fear, but not of love: and therefore although the man that does ſo is innocent as long as he is in that ſtate, and as long as that ſtate is acceptable; yet becauſe the ſtate of fear is but the ſtate of infancy and imperfection, it muſt proceed further, or be imperfect for ever; that ſtate will not be accepted long. For if a man does his duty in that ſtate, he ſhall be enabled enabled to goe further; and then he muſt, or elſe he ſins by deſpiſing the ſpirit of grace. But if he does not doe his duty in the firſt ſtate, then he muſt not in that ſtate of careleſneſſe and neglect of uſing moral diligence pretend that he is innocent. A man that hath been bleſſed in his firſt attempts muſt ſtill follow the method and Oeconomy of the Divine ſpirit; that is, as God increaſes in aides, ſo the man muſt increaſe in diligence and labour, and muſt uſe what means are before him to doe ſtill better and better.

11. 4. In acquiring notices not ſimply neceſſary, a moral diligence is ſufficient. This is an immediate conſequent of the ſecond Rule, and therefore needs not particular confirmation, but explication rather.

Therefore by Moral diligence is to be underſtood ſuch a diligence in acquiring notices as can * 1. conſiſt with our other affairs, and the requiſites of our calling and neceſſities; * 2. ſuch as is uſual by our ſelves in the obtaining things which we value; * 3. ſuch which is allowed by wiſe men, ſuch which a ſpiritual guide will approve; * 4. and ſuch as we our ſelves doe perceive to be the effects of a real deſire. For there ought to be nothing of ſcruple or vexation in the acts of this diligence, nor in the inquiries concerning it. And therefore if we are ſure we deſire to know what we can, and doe towards it ſuch like things as we doe in the purchaſe of other things which we greatly value, we may be at peace. For this thing does not conſiſt in an indiviſible point, it is not juſt thus much, neither more nor leſſe; but it is more or leſſe according as our love is and our leiſure, our opportunities and abilities: and if we cannot judge concerning our ſelves ſo well as to reſt in peace, let us aſk a ſpiritual guide, having firſt declar'd to him the narrative of our life and actions whereby he ſhall be enabled to make a judgement.

What is a probable ignorance?

12. Upon this account we can alſo give the meaſures and definitions of a probable ignorance, that is, ſuch an ignorance which is next to an invincible or an irremediable ignorance: this the Schools call probable. For as the invincible ignorance is a mere neſcience, and is either of ſuch things which we are not bound to know, becauſe God requires them of no man; or of ſuch things which we cannot know, becauſe we never heard of them, and are not taught ſufficiently, and ſo God will not require them of us: ſo next to this ſtands the probable ignorance, that is, when the things are propounded to be known, and can be known if we would uſe all our natural and poſſible diligence; but yet becauſe God hath not plac'd them in a neceſſary order to ſalvation, he hath not tied us to uſe all our natural diligence, but ſome diligence he does require, which when we have us'd, and yet miſſe, the ignorance is probable. Now when that is ſo, we ſhall learn by the proportions to the deſcription of the parts and requiſites of a moral diligence, and by theſe following meaſures.

13. 1. Then our ignorance is probable, when we enter upon the action without temerity, and yet without doubt or trepidation; that is, when our addreſſe is with conſideration, but we find no reluctancy againſt the action, nor remorſe after it. For then it muſt be that we have faith, and doe it with a good mind, not againſt our Conſcience; and yet having no fierceneſſe of paſſion or fancy, and a mind wary enough to diſcern any objection that is near, it will be very probable that there is none at all but what ſtands a great way off, and therefore farre enough from diſturbing the innocence of the action.

14. 2. But this is to be underſtood onely in the ordinary accidents and traverſes of our lives. But if it be in matters of great concernment, ſuch as are above our ordinary imployments, as if it be in the actions and duties of an eminent office, it is not ſufficient that we have no regret or remorſe, but we muſt have an actual conſideration, a plain perceiv'd deliberation and counſel, and then no regret. It is not here enough that we have nothing againſt it, but we muſt have ſomething for it, becauſe in ſuch perſons and in ſuch accidents the proceſſe ought to be more then ordinary; that as there are greater abilities requir'd to the performance of that office, ſo there may be a proper uſe and exerciſe of thoſe abilities. And there is in this a great evidence of truth. For in ordinary things, it is very often ſo that they are well enough if they have not evidently any evil in them. But in the actions of public imployments things are not ſo indifferent; they doe hurt unleſſe they doe good, they are ſcandalous if they be ſuſpicious; they are deſign'd always to doe benefit, and if they doe not they cannot be juſtified, and therefore they muſt be look'd on with an actual conſideration: in which ſtate of things it is certain that every thing will occurre that is obvious to be conſidered; and what is not obvious to ſuch perſons is indeed very difficult, and may well be ſuppos'd to leave a probable and very excuſable ignorance.

15. 3. This alſo is to be extended to the caſe of confident aſſeverations, and confirming any propoſition with an oath, in which no man can have a probable ignorance, but he that hath us'd a diligence of inquiry ſo great as to give confidence great enough to an oath, which muſt be of a thing ſo ſure, that nothing can be a cauſe of doubt, unleſſe ſome ſecret and undiſcerned thing, to which a great and proportionable diligence hath not arriv'd and made diſcovery, doe accidentally intervene. No man muſt ſwear a thing is ſo, and yet at laſt ſay, I did bonâ fide ſuppoſe it ſo: but I examin'd it, I ſearch'd as well as I could, I entred into all the corners of it, I had great reaſons to believe, I had fair aſſurances it was ſo, and I every day am aſſur'd of many things of which I had leſſe teſtimony. If beyond this any thing eſcapes him, the ignorance is probable and excuſable. But the rule is the ſame as at firſt: He is ſufficiently and innocently confident, who hath no diſtruſt, and upon inquiry finds no cauſe of diſtruſt; always provided that the inquiry be in proportion to the dignity, and difficulty, and duty of the occaſion and ſubject matter.

16. By the uſe of theſe premiſſes it will be eaſy to determine Plato's Caſe
l. de Mendacio. of Conſcience which he propounded to Hippias the Sophiſter. Whether is the better or worſe, he that ſins willingly, or he that ſins by folly & ignorance? of them that wraſtle, whether is the more inglorious, he that falls willingly, or he that is thrown in deſpite of himſelf and all his ſtrength? whether foot is better, that which halts upon deſigne, or that which halts with lameneſſe? whether were it better for a man to have a fool or a knave

to his ſervant? But this diſcourſe of Plato concerns arts onely and ſciences. But Hippias anſwer'd well, It was not ſo in vertues; the differences of which Plato did not ſeem to diſcern, but Ariſtotle afterwards very well explicated. The ſenſe of which in order to the purpoſe of the preſent Rule is well expreſſed by Seneca; Vis ſcire quam diſſimilis eſt aliarum artium cognitio & hujus? In illis excuſatius eſt voluntate peccare quam [caſu,] ignorantiâ: in hac maxime culpa eſt, ſponte delinquere. If a Grammarian ſpeaks a ſoloeciſme on purpoſe, he bluſhes not; but if ignorantly, he hath reaſon to be aſham'd. If the Phyſician knows not what his patient ailes, it is more ſhame to him then if he on purpoſe names a wrong diſeaſe. At in hac parte vivendi, turpior volentium culpa eſt; But in manners to erre willingly is the more intolerable. The reaſon of theſe things is plain, which who pleaſe may read in [a] Gifanius the interpreter of Ariſtotle, and [b] Marſilius Ficinus the expoſitor of Plato: for indeed it is evident that to moral actions the rectitude of the appetite is requir'd, not ſo to arts and ſciences and the vertues intellectual. It is enough to art that the work be well done, though with what mind it matters not as to that: and when the Italian painter, who was to depict a Crucifix, hir'd a ſlave to be tied to a Croſſe, that he might lively repreſent a body ſo hanging and ſo extended, did afterward ſtab him to the heart, that he might ſee and perceive every poſture and accent and little convulſion of a dying man, he was very much the worſe man for it, but no whit the worſe Painter; as appear'd by the incomparable excellency of that piece; and the principles of Art cannot be corrupted with the evil manners of the Man: but becauſe evil deſires pollute the manners, the will is to be taken care of, as the principle of all morality. To which we may adde that he who in arts erres willingly, can mend it when he pleaſe; but ſo cannot he that erres ignorantly. Ignorance is the onely diſparagement of his art, and malice is the onely diſparagement of our manners.

[b] in Hippia minor.

17. But this, though diſputed to little purpoſe amongſt the Philoſophers, may be of good uſe in Caſes of Conſcience. Cardinal Campegius having wickedly ſaid to the Senate at Norimberg, that it was worſe for a Prieſt to marry then to fornicate, offer'd in juſtification of it a reaſon that could leſſe be juſtified. For (ſaith he) the Prieſt that fornicates knowes he does amiſſe, and therefore may in time repent; but the Prieſt that marries thinks he does well, and therefore will never change his mind, he will never repent. It is true, he needs not, becauſe he believes he does well; and he is not deceiv'd. But ſuppoſe he were deceiv'd, and abus'd by error, what man before him was ever ſo impious as to ſay that he that knows he does evil is in a better condition then he that erres with a good mind, & ſuppoſes he does very well? For the preſent, the ſtate is infinitely different: & for the time to come, which is the more likely to obtain mercy, he that does a thing ignorantly, or he that does it maliciouſly, we ſhall not need to appeal any whether but to all the notiees of vertue and vice which are in mankind.

Sleidan. lib. 4.

18. Indeed there are ſome ſins of ignorance, that is, ſuch which are ſubjected in the underſtanding, which are worſe then ſome ſins of malice, or ſuch which are ſubjected wholly in the will and the faculties which obey it. Thus to be ignorant of the fundamental articles of faith is a worſe ſtate of things then to have committed an act of gluttony, or to have entertain'd a wanton thought, or to have omitted Divine ſervice upon a Feſtival. The Jewes had an opinion that thoughts were free, and God did not require them of us with ſeverity; but a thought againſt faith, that was highly criminal. Cogitationem pravam Deus non habet vice facti, niſi concepta fuerit in Dei fidem atque religionem, ſaid R. David Kimchi; meaning that no ſin was greater then hereſy, or an error in faith. But the reaſon of this is, not onely becauſe the effect of hereſy is, like the plague, infectious and diſſeminative; but becauſe by how much the articles of faith are more neceſſary to be believed, by ſo much is the ignorance of them more criminal, and more voluntary, and therefore leſſe excuſable. But even in matters of faith, where there is leſſe of malice or wilfull negligence ingredient into the ignorance of them, there the crime is leſſe then any thing elſe, be the inſtance what it will. But this will be more explicite in the ſequel.

in Pſal. 66. v. 18.

Rule VI.

Ignorance does always excuſe the fact, or diminiſh the malignity of it, or change the kind and nature of the ſinne.

1. IGnorance according to it's ſeveral capacities, and the ſeveral methods of art and ways of ſpeaking, hath ſeveral diviſions. But all are reducible to this in order to Conſcience. Ignorance is either voluntary or involuntary. It is vincible or invincible, that is, it can be helped or it can not. It is the cauſe of an action, or it onely goes along with it. And of theſe ſeveral ignorances there are many degrees, but no more kinds that are here fit to be conſidered.

2. 1. The firſt ſort of ignorance, which is involuntary, invincible, and antecedent, that is, is the cauſe of an action, ſo that the thing would not be done but by that ignorance, does certainly make the action alſo it ſelf involuntary, and conſequently not criminal. In this ſenſe is that of the law, Errantis nulla voluntas, nullus conſenſus, They that know nothing of it, conſent not. This is meant of ignorance that is involuntary in all regards, that is, ſuch as is neither choſen directly nor indirectly, but is involuntary both in the effect and in the cauſe. Thus what fools and mad-men and infants doe is not at all imputed to them, becauſe they have no underſtanding to diſcern good from evil, and therefore their appetite is not deprav'd or malicious which part ſoever they take. Επεὶ γὰρ ἀπὸ διαθέσεως ἡ ὕβρις σωίσταται, ἀκολούθως λέγομεν τὸν μαινόμενον, καὶ τὸν νήπιον, εἰ καὶ ὠθήσουσί τινα, ἢ διὰ λόγων ὑβρίσωσι, μὴ κατέχεσθαι, διότι ἃ δοκοῦσι διάθεσιν ἔχειν ὑβριζόντων μὴ αἰσθανόμενοι, ſaith the law, according to the interpretation of the Greeks. Injury proceeds from the affection, and conſequently we ſay that a mad-man or an infant if they ſtrike or reproch anyone they are not criminal, they have done no injury becauſe they perceiv'd it not. Nec reputantur infantiæ anni qui ſenſu carent, ſaith Pliny; The years of infancy come not under the notice of laws and judges, of right or wrong, for they have no reaſon, that is, they uſe none. So Galen, Τὸ μὲν ὃ, μὴ χρῆσθαι λογισμῷ μήτε τὰ θηρία, μήτε τὰ βρέφη, καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς περὶ τὸν Χρύσιππον ὁμολόγηται, All the ſcholars of Chryſippus conſtantly affirm that beaſts and babies have no uſe of reaſon.

And

And Iamblichus ſuppos'd that the rational ſoul was not infus'd into children before the tenth year of their age. But that is more reaſonable which almoſt all wiſe men (excepting the Stoics) affirm, and is thus expreſſed by [a] Gregory Nyſſen, and his contemporary [b] Nemeſius in the very ſame words; Εἰ γὰρ καὶ κομιδῇ νέοις οὖσι τοῖς βρέφεσιν ἡ ἄλογος μήνη κίνησις προσέστιν, ἀλλὰ ψυχῇ λογικῇ φαμὲν ἔχειν αὐτά, ἐπειδήπερ αὐξανόμενα καὶ τὴν λογικὴν ἀναδείκνυσιν ἐνέργειαν, Although in infants there is no action or motion of reaſon, yet we ſay that they have a reaſonable ſoul, for they manifeſt the uſe of it when they are growing up.

apud Stobæum in Phyſicis Eclogis.

[a] de Anima. [b] de Nat. Hom. cap. 2.

3. But this occaſions a difficulty in this ſubject. For we ſee the rational ſoul exerciſing it's operations in ſome ſooner in ſome later; and as the body grows in ſtrength and grandeur, ſo does the ſoul in the uſe of reaſon and powers of deliberation and choice.

Nam velut infirmo pueri teneroque vagantur
Corpore, ſic animi ſequitur ſententia tenuis.
Inde ubi robuſtis adolevit viribus ætas,
Conſilium quoque majus, & auctior eſt animi vis.

Lucret. l. 3.

And Hippocrates addes that the ſoul does always grow, ἀνθρώπῳ ψυχὴ ἀεὶ φύεται ἄχρι θανάτου, A mans ſoul is born every day of a mans life, it always receives ſome increment. Now the queſtion is

How long ſhall infant ignorance or childſhneſſe excuſe ſo far as that the actions they doe ſhall be reckon'd neither to vertue nor to vice?

4. To this it will not be poſſible to give a ſtrict and definite anſwer, but a rule and a meaſure may be given. Poſidonius ſaid, Μικρὸν μὲν τὰ πρῶτα καὶ ἀσθενὲς ὑπάρχειν τοῦτο [λογιστικὸν,] μέγα δὲ καὶ ἰσχυρὸν ἀποτελεῖσθαι περὶ τὴν παναρεσκαιδεκαέτη ἡλικίαν, The rational faculty is at firſt very weak, but it is great and ſtrong about the age of fourteen years: and Plutarch ſaies that the Stoics affirm'd ἀρχεσθαι πλειότητος περὶ τὴν δευτέραν ἑβδομάδα, about the ſecond ſeptenary, or the fourteenth year, they begin to be perfect: but Zeno ſaid that from that year complete, πλεῖσθαι it is perfect, that is, as to all capacities of reward and puniſhment. But in this there was great variety. For ſome laws would puniſh boys after twelve years, not before: ſo the Salic law, Si quis puer infra duodecim annos aliquam culpam commiſerit, fredus ei non requiratur, A boy before he is twelve years old, committing a fault is not tied to make amends or compoſition. Servius upon that of Virgil,

tit. 26.

in 8. Eclog. Virgil.

Alter ab undecimo tum me jam ceperat annus, ſaies, the thirteenth year is meant, becauſe that was next to puberty; for, ſaies he, the law judges of maturity not onely by years but by the habit and ſtrength of the body. But though this be leſſe by one year then that of the Stoical account, and more by one year then that of the Salic law; yet we find in the law of the Greeks and Romans that after ſeven years complete boys were puniſhable: ſo the * Baſilica, † Michael Attaliotes and ſome others.

5. But this variety was not wholly arbitrary, but it was commonly eſtabliſhed upon reaſon; for the differences were made by the different nature of the crimes of which boys were not equally capable in every year: but although in every crime ſome were forwarder then others, yet all were capable ble of ſome ſooner then of others. Spite and malice comes ſooner then luſt: and therefore if a boy after ſeven years old kill'd a man, he was liable to the lex Cornelia de Sicariis; but not ſo if he were a pathic and a correſpondent in unnatural luſts, as appears in Matthæus Blaſtares and Leo; if he were under twelve years, he had impunity, quum ætas ipſa argumento ſit neſcire eum quid patiatur, ſaid the Emperor, His age is an argument of his ignorance, that he knows not what he ſuffers. For in theſe things it was reaſonable that Galen ſaid of Hippocrates, νήπια λέγει τὰ μέχρι ἥβης, infancy is to be reckon'd untill youth, or a power of generation: and that was it which I obſerv'd before out of Servius, Bene cum annis jungit habitum corporis. Nam & in jure pubertas ex utroque colligitur. The ſtrength of body muſt be ſuppos'd before you allow them ſtrength of reaſon, that is, a power to deliberate and chuſe thoſe ſins to which they cannot be tempted before they have natural capacities. But this, I ſay, relates onely to the crime of uncleanneſſe. Now becauſe this was commonly the firſt of our youthfull ſins, malice in infancy being prodigious and unnatural, which caus'd that advice of S. Paul, In malice be children; therefore wiſe men and the laws did uſually reckon that age to be the firſt beginning of their choice as well as of their ſtrength. But this rule is very far from being certain, and therefore S. Auſtin blames thoſe that doe not impute any ſins to boys before the age of fourteen; Meritò crederemus (ſaith he) ſi nulla eſſent peccata niſi quæ membris genitalibus admittuntur, We might well doe ſo if there were no ſins but the ſins of luſt: but they can ſteal ſooner, and they can lie, and, as unnatural and as unuſual as it is, they can be malicious, ſome ſooner, ſome later, according to the baſeneſſe of their diſpoſition, their pregnancy and education. A. Gellius tells that the Decemviri, who wrote the laws of the XII Tables, ex cæteris manifeſtis furibus liberos verberari, addicique juſſerunt ei cui factum furtum eſſet, They caus'd thieving boys to be whipp'd and given up to them from whom they had ſtoln; and if they cut corn by night and ſtole it, they were to be chaſtis'd by the diſcretion of the Prætor; which alſo Pliny notes. But then this alſo is to be added, that even in theſe things although they did not eſteem them innocent, yet becauſe their underſtanding was but little, and their choice proportionable, they inflicted but eaſy puniſhments: which Theophanes expreſſed by δι' ἁβλιῶν μαστιγῶσαι, they were beaten with thongs, or rods, or ferula's.

6. From hence we may take an eſtimate how it is in this affair as to the queſtion and relation of Conſcience. For then theſe wiſe men and wiſe law-givers did declare them puniſhable when they did ſuppoſe them criminal; though in the Sanction of laws they were to proceed by rule, and determine ὡς ὅπι τὸ πολὺ as things were moſt commonly. But then it is to be conſider'd, that ſince they being to make a rule could not at all take in extraordinaries, and there would many particulars and haſty inſtances be paſs'd before it could come to a juſt meaſure and regular eſtabliſhment, we muſt therefore proceed ſomething otherwiſe in the Court of Conſcience. For, as Libanius ſpeaking concerning boys, ſaid, Τοῦτο δέ ὄζει τοὔνομα τῆς ὑ πάντα ἀναμαρτήτου καὶ πόρρω μέμψεως ἡλικίας, this is not a name of age that cannot ſin and cannot be puniſhed. But Anaſtaſius Sinaita ſaies that ſometimes God imputes ſins to boys from twelve year old and upwards. But S. Auſtin confeſs'd the ſins of his firſt years, the peeviſhneſſe of his infancy, his wrangling with his nurſes, his very envying for the nurſes milk and fondneſſes: this was indeed a greater piety then reaſon. But when he was a boy boy and robb'd an Orchyard, he had reaſon then to be troubled for it. The ſins of children are but little, but they are ſins. Puerorum ſenſus in qualiacunque verba prorumpens, qui certè ad ea quæ majores ſapiunt penè nullus eſt. When boys give evil words, it is almoſt nothing. But becauſe it is but almoſt and comparatively nothing, it is of it ſelf and abſolutely ſomething; and we know not at what period of time any child firſt comes to the uſe of reaſon, and therefore neither can we tell when God will impute their follies; and when he does not impute their follies to damnation, it may be he will impute them ſo far as to cauſe a ſickneſſe or an immature and a haſty death. And therefore Parents and Tutors can never diſcharge their duty but by a coercion and ſtrict reſtraint of children, from the very firſt beginning of their being capable of laws, of the laws I mean of their parents, and even before that to reſtrain them from the material parts of any evil, even from evil words which they underſtand not. For when they once have learnt the ſound they will quickly perceive the ſenſe: and although we account their infant malices pretty and ſportive, yet becauſe we know not from what an early principle they come, nor how ſoon God will impute them, nor whether they will tend, nor what impreſſion they leave, we ſhould betimes exerciſe our legiſlative; and it is God's great mercy to children that they can underſtand fear as ſoon as they can learn to ſin, that their evil company and evil inclinations may not prevent the diſcipline of the parents, but that God and the good things of his law may get the firſt poſſeſſion. And he that will let his children alone till they have φρόνημα σαπρὸν, animum conſilio ac ratione firmatum, a fixed and ſettled judgement, ſhall find evil habits fixt and permanent as the foot of a rock, and that good counſel will be too late, too eaſy a remedy. The ſumme is this; So long as they are ignorant, that is, ſo ignorant that they know not how to deliberate ſufficiently to avoid a ſin, ſo long their evil is not imputed, but together with their reaſon begins their vertue or their vice.

Epiſt. 57.

Cicer. pro Cluent.

7. 2. The ſecond ſort of ignorance is concomitant, that is, ſuch which is really and actually conjoyn'd with the cauſe of the action, but it ſelf is not the cauſe; for if the man were not ignorant, he would doe the thing nevertheleſſe. Thus the boy that flung a ſtone at a bird, and hit his cruel ſtepmother whom he knew not to be there, ſaid he did not then deſign it, but the ſtone was well thrown. He that ſhoots an arrow at a ſtag and hits his enemy whom he reſolved to kill when he could well doe it, but knew not at all that he was in the buſh, hath an ignorance and a malice at the ſame time; and here the queſtion is which prevails, the ignorance to excuſe, or the malice to condemn. To this I anſwer, that the ignorance excuſes that action, but not that man. He is not a murderer in that ſhooting, nor in the counſels and deliberation of that action; but for his mind and his malice diſtinct from that action, he is proportionably guilty. But if the man have no malice to the unfortunate man that is kill'd, then he is intirely innocent, if his ignorance be innocent. The mind of the man is, and the action is; and if the ignorance were invincible and irremediable, then there is innocence on all parts. Non conſentiunt qui errant, ſaith the law. For there is in this concomitant ignorance the ſame reaſon as in the antecedent, ſo far as relates to that event, though not as to that action: the action was indeed voluntary and not procur'd by ignorance, but that event was; and that being the thing onely in queſtion, is to be accounted for, juſt as thoſe actions which are wholly produc'd by ignorance antecedent.

I deny

8. I deny not but the laws of wiſe Republics have principally regarded the mind and Counſel of him that ſin'd, and that therefore the laws of the Romans under their Chriſtian Princes did profeſſe to follow the law of God in the matter of involuntary murder, and ſo did the Lombards and the Viſigoths; yet ſometimes this chance-medly was puniſh'd by a leſſer puniſhment: ſo we find in the laws of the Thuringians, Qui nolens ſed caſu quodam hominem vulneraverit vel occiderit, compoſitionem legitimam ſolvat. If a man unwittingly wounds or kills a man, ſi telum fugit potius quam jecerit, as Cicero expreſſes the inſtance, if his arrow or weapon ſlipt from him, rather then was flung, he ſhall not be put to death; but yet neither ſhall he wholly eſcape, but muſt pay a fine appointed by law. And there is ſome reaſon for this. 1. Becauſe the law muſt require the life and bloud of every of her citizens from whom it is taken, and the external event, of which ſhe is the moſt competent judge, muſt as well as it may be repair'd. But 2. although it may appear that the event was not intended, yet it cannot ſo well appear whether the man did uſe all that diligence and precaution which wiſe and good men ought to doe to prevent miſchiefs. And 3. ſomething is to be indulged to the injur'd perſon, ſome conſideration had of the grief and loſſe and the paſſion of the relatives of the ſlain perſon. And upon theſe conſiderations God was pleaſed to appoint ſanctuaries for ſuch perſons; which in true ſpeaking is but a juſt remedy for an unjuſt calamity, and ſuppoſes that ſomething was permitted in favour of the relatives of the unhappy man that died, ſomething, I ſay, which yet was not always deſerv'd of him that was in danger to ſuffer it.

l. 5. Epiſt.

9. 3. The third ſort of ignorance is the worſt, it is that which is vincible and voluntary, that is, procur'd by the will, is not the prime cauſe of it's actions but the effect, brought in on purpoſe to make way for an eaſy miſchief with a colour and excuſe. Of this there are two noted and diſcernible degrees: An ignorance craſſe and dul, and introduc'd by negligence voluntary and obſerved more or leſſe; and an ignorance affected, that is, choſen and delighted in, to ſerve evil purpoſes. Now concerning theſe degrees of this criminal ignorance it is true of them both that they bring guilt upon the head of the ignorant, according to their ſeveral proportions: but concerning the actions themſelves which are acted by men in that ſtate of ignorance and diſorder, there is ſomething of particular conſideration. For we find our Bleſſed Saviour praying for pardon for his perſecutors upon this very inducement: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they doe; that is, they doe not now know, for they are blinded and are in a ſtate of ignorance: but that it was vincible and voluntary appears by thoſe words of Chriſt, If ye were blind, ye had not ſinn'd; but now ye ſay that you ſee, therefore your ſin remains; and having eyes they ſee not, that is, they would not ſee, they did it ignorantly, and they would not cure their ignorance, for it was evident that Chriſt ſaid and did enough infinitely to convince them that he was the Meſſias. So alſo S. Paul's ignorance was very culpable, when in zeal and rage he perſecuted the Church of God; but yet this ignorance leſſen'd the malice of the effect, and diſpos'd him greatly towards pardon. Upon theſe conſiderations, it is a worthy inquiry into that effect or influence which proceeds even from a criminal ignorance and undiſcerning eſtate, and what it can operate towards pardon. The queſtion then is, whether what is done by perſons that know not what they doe, when that diſability to know is procur'd by themſelves, either by voluntary tary negligence, or malicious purpoſe, is a ſin as great as if it were done knowingly.

Queſtion.

10. The caſe is this, Marcus Bibulus falls frequently into drunkenneſſe; when he is drunk he fights, and fornicates, and ſteals, and does (as it happens) all manner of impiety. Does his drunkenneſſe excuſe, or does it extenuate, or does it aggravate his fault?

11. The Greeks call'd theſe things παροινίας, that is ἡ ἐκ τοῦ οἴνου ὕβρις καὶ οἱαδήποτε ἁμαρτία, Contention and every miſchief that comes from wine, ſaith Heſychius; which when a man hath obſerved to be conſequent to his intemperance, or hath been foretold of it by laws and wiſe perſons, he may juſtly fall under the ſentence not onely of drunkenneſſe, but of homicide, or inceſt, or whatever happens to be the vile daughter of ſo diſgrac'd a Mother. Drunkards are very often proud and quarrelſome: and therefore to that of Solomon, Look not upon the wine when it is red, Rabba ſaith, Ne ſpectes vinum cujus finis eſt ſanguis, Look not upon the wine whoſe end is bloud: and Euſtathius ſaith that the nurſes of Bacchus were painted κατέχουσαι χερσὶν αἱ μὲ ἐγχειρίδια, αἱ δὲ ὄφεις. τοῦτο δὲ πρὸς αἴνιγμα τοῦ καὶ θηριώδεις καὶ φονικοὺς εἶναι τοὺς μεθύοντας, having ſnakes and daggers in their hands, to ſhew that drunkards were beaſtly and bloudy. And therefore if ſuch perſons could have impunity, there were no ſafety for the lives of innocent men, or the chaſtity of modeſt women. But they neither have, nor have they reaſon why they ſhould. Οἱ γὰρ μεθύοντες καὶ πράξαντές τι κακὸν ἀδικοῦσι. Τῆς γὰρ ἀγνοίας αὐτοί εἰσιν. ἔδει δ' ἴσως οὐ γὰρ αὐτοῖς μὴ πίνειν τοσοῦτον, ὥς γ' ἀγνοήσαντας τύπτειν τὸν πατέρα, ſaid Ariſtotle; They that being drunk doe evil, are guilty of the injury. Becauſe they are cauſes of their own ignorance: for they might have abſtain'd from that exceſſe which caus'd them ignorantly to ſmite their Father. Pittacus by a law caus'd a double puniſhment to be inflicted upon drunkards, one for the cauſe, and the other for the evil effect. The ſame alſo ſeems to be the ſenſe of Plato both in his firſt and in his ſixth book of Laws: but generally all the interpreters of Ariſtotle, the old Philoſophers, the Mahumetans and the Chriſtians and the Heathens, are perfectly of this perſuaſion, that the ſins they doe in their drunken fit are perfectly to be imputed to them. To this purpoſe is that of Cicero, Nam qui ſe propter vinum aut amorem aut iracundiam fugiſſe rationem dicet, is animi vitio videbitur neſciſſe, non imprudentiâ. Quare non imprudentiâ ſe defendet, ſed culpâ contaminabit, He that with wine or anger or luſt looſes his reaſon, cannot pretend ignorance or want of knowledge for his excuſe, for by his own fault he is polluted. And this is the ſenſe of the Doctors of the Church. S. Baſil ſaies drunkenneſſe is αὐθαίρετος δαίμων· ἑκούσιος μανία, ſo S. Chryſoſtome; voluntaria inſania, ſo S. Auſtin; αὐθαίρετος μανία, ſo Iſidore Peluſiot: A voluntary Devil, a choſen madneſſe, a ſpontaneous fury. And the very ſame words are us'd by Seneca and Ammianus Marcellinus. And therefore the ſinning man muſt not excuſe him by his ſtupidity, and blame the wine, but himſelf onely; as Callicles in the Comedy convinc'd Dinarchus when he pray'd him to give him pardon,

Sed vino ſolent qui quidem probi ſunt: verum

Tamen ab ingenio eſt improbus.

Blame not the wine; for wine does not govern a good man, but a good man the wine: But he that is wicked is wicked from within, whether he drinks or no. By theſe ſayings of wiſe men we perceive that they held not the drunkard innocent even in thoſe vileneſſes which he did in his drunkenneſſe; and their reaſon was Philoſophical, The effect from a voluntary cauſe is to be imputed to the firſt principle.

12. But Commonwealths have another intereſt to ſerve; they are to ſecure the lives and good things of their citizens, and therefore they are by all means to effect what is neceſſary: and if drunken miſchiefs were unpuniſh'd, men might pretend drunkenneſſe for an excuſe, and make it really to be the warrant of their licentiouſneſſe, their rapine, their luſt or their revenge.

ſaid old Euclio to Lyconides. If drunkenneſſe may be our excuſe, let us goe and drink drunk that we may rob the Matrons in the ſtreets. And Manuel Palaologus tells of one that had a mind to be reveng'd and put ſome affront upon a great man; and becauſe he durſt not when he was ſober, he drank himſelf into an impudent fierceneſſe, that he might firſt have boldneſſe and then, as he hop'd, impunity. And therefore there may be great reaſon why the Civil laws of any Nation ſhould puniſh the evil effects of drunkenneſſe not onely for the evil mothers ſake, but for the ſecurity of the citizens.

Orat. 3.

13. But in Theology and in the juſt eſtimate of things in order to Conſcience we are to ſpeak and to proceed with ſome little difference. For if it be ask'd concerning the drunkenneſſe, or concerning the man, there is no peradventure but he is for theſe evil effects the worſe man, and the drunkenneſſe is alſo the greater crime. The drunkenneſſe makes the injury or the murder leſſe criminal then if it were done with actual reaſon and choice, but theſe make the drunkenneſſe more intolerable and criminal. The man in chuſing drunkenneſſe with or for theſe effects is much the worſe man; but the crime is the voluntary drunkenneſſe, not the involuntary rage and injury. And this appears upon theſe reaſons.

14. 1. Becauſe by how much more the ſenſe and reaſon is depraved, by ſo much the leſſe the man hath pleaſure in his ſin. For if he be wholly mad or ſenſeleſſe, his ſin is wholly uſeleſſe to him, it does him no preſent delight, any more then to a beaſt to puſh with his horns; which therefore is not not criminal becauſe he cannot reflect upon his own act, he cannot chuſe it for a reaſonable conſideration, he hath no will to entertain it. But if he be not ſo far gone, then there is ſome proportion of guilt, becauſe there is of choice in the ſhipwracks of his reaſon and his will: and therefore Theodoret ſaid, Τὸ δὲ τῆς μέθης ἔχει τινὰ μέμψιν κεκεραμένην συγγνώμῃ, Drunkenneſſe hath ſome reproof, and ſome pity; ſome puniſhment, and ſome pardon. And Arrius Menander ſaid that per vinum aut laſciviam lapſis capitalis pœna remittenda eſt, They that ſin by drunkenneſſe or paſſion may be puniſh'd, but not capitally; the ſame with that in Stobæus, Τῷ μέθυσι ἀναμαρτήτως τι προσέχειν. Even in the follies and ſtupidities of drunkenneſſe there is ſomething amiſſe beſides the material part. But this is when there is ſomething left by which he can underſtand and chuſe ſomething of the crime. qu. 59. in Geneſ. in l. 6. de Re milit.

15. 2. The miſchiefs conſequent to drunkenneſſe are therefore leſſe moral evils, becauſe they doe leſſe moral miſchief. For no man by his luſt acted in his drunkenneſſe is made more luſtfull, or by any act then done is promoted towards a vitious habit; for he knew not what he did, and remembers it not: it is like Lot's inceſt, no more known after then before, and therefore it leaves no ſediment or lees behind it; which ſhews it to have more natural vileneſſe then moral, and therefore is nearer to pardon.

Et cauſa juſta eſt, ſiquidem ita eſt ut prædicas,
Te eam compreſſiſſe vinolentum virginem. Aulul. Act. 4. Scen. 7.

If the yong man was drunk when he lay with her, he hath ſome excuſe, that is, as to his luſt; but that is an aggravation of his drunkenneſſe, and he is not the more acquitted, when the aggravation of his ſin and puniſhment is onely plac'd upon the right cauſe.

16. 3. If the conſequent miſchiefs of drunkenneſſe were formally thoſe ſins which materially they are, that is, if they were properly guilty of all that they ignorantly doe, then it would follow that becauſe murder is worſe then drunkenneſſe, and yet that murder was involuntary, ſome action that is involuntary would be more malicious then that which is choſen. If it be replied that thoſe conſequent acts are choſen becauſe the cauſe of them is choſen, according to what is diſcours'd in the 4th Rule of this Chapter; I anſwer, that this is true if drunkenneſſe were not an accidental cauſe of them: but theſe effects being but contingent to drunkenneſſe, and the effect of ſome other evil principle, which then prevails when by drunkenneſſe the mans guards are called off, therefore they cannot be intirely attributed to drunkenneſſe; and therefore if a man be ſurpris'd with drink, or is advis'd to it as to a medicine, if he falls into ſuch conſequent diſorders, it would be hard to damne this man as a murderer or as an inceſtuous perſon, when he is ſo neither by his preſent, nor his antecedent choice. Therefore it is that Libanius ſaies that one who hath grievouſly offended another πολλάκις ἀνδρὶ συγγνωστὸν ἀπῆλθεν εἰς οἶνον καταφυγών, oftentimes is not puniſhed when wine was his excuſe; and the Scholiaſt upon the βασιλικὰ ſaies that he that kills a man ἀπὸ μελέτης with deliberation is ἀσύγγνωστος not to be pardon'd: If he does it by chance, he is free; but if by drunkenneſſe, he was by the Roman law baniſh'd for five years: and thus juſtice is preſerved on all hands, that the drunkenneſſe ſhould be puniſh'd more then drunkenneſſe, and the murder leſſe then murder. For that is the worſe for having ſuch a daugh- Declamat. 21.

ter, but this is more pardonable for having ſuch a Mother.

17. But if the drunkenneſſe be but imperfect, if the conſequent crimes be remembred and delighted in afterwards, (for that is a certain indication the ſtupidity was not extreme, nor equal to an excuſe) then ſuch a drunkard is alſo all that which he acts and profeſſes in his folly: a remembring drunkard, as he is but an ill companion, ſo if he falls into the horrid conſequents which too often are the puniſhments of intemperance, hath no excuſe. But if he choſe drunkenneſſe on purpoſe that he might have impudence enough to doe a miſchief, he committed the ſin beforehand, and was before he acted it guilty before God; and when he hath acted it, he is alſo guilty before men *. But unleſſe it be in theſe caſes, the actions done by him that underſtands not what he does are as the actions of a mad man or a fool. The ſin was done before, and the miſchief and the puniſhment doe follow: but the guilt is in the cauſe, not in the effect that is involuntary; though proceeding from a cauſe that was indeed voluntary, but not univocal and proper.

Μισῶ μνήμονα συμπότην, Πεῤῥικλέ·

* See Rule 4. of this Chap. Num. 2.

18. The ſenſe of this queſtion thus explicated agrees with the doctrine of the Fathers, who in the inſtance of Lot declare him criminal onely as to his drunkenneſſe, not to his inceſt. So Origen, S. Chryſoſtom, S. Auſtin: and S. Ambroſe gives this account of the whole queſtion; Sanè diſcimus vitandam ebrietatem, &c. We learn that drunkenneſſe is to be avoided, by which we are brought to that evil ſtate of things, that we cannot beware of crimes. For thoſe things which being ſober we avoid, when we are drunk we ignorantly commit. And a little after; They who have been too free in drinking wine, know not what they ſpeak, they are like men dead and buried: ideóque ſiqua per vinum deliquerint, apud ſapientes Judices veniâ quidem facta donantur, ſed levitatis damnantur authores, Therefore what vileneſſes they commit in their wine (meaning when they know not what they doe) for the deeds themſelves ſo ignorantly committed they find pardon amongſt wiſe Judges, but for their temulency a condemnation.

Homil. 5. in Geneſ. Homil. 44. in Geneſ. lib. 2. contr. Fauſt. Manic. cap. 44. lib. de Patriarch. cap. 6.

19. The reſult of theſe diſcourſes is this. The vileneſſes which are done by drunken and ſtupid perſons unwittingly, are not of the ſame kind of which naturally they are and would be if the actors were ſober: they are not the crimes of murder or luſt or inceſt reſpectively, but circumſtances of great horrour aggravating the drunkenneſſe, and deeply condemning the man. And yet, if the drunkenneſſe be not extreme, I mean the ſtupidity and ignorance, if that be not ſuch as to take away wholly the uſe of reaſon and moral choice, all the remaining portions of reaſon doe in their proper degree make the imperfect drunkard guilty of other perfect crimes, even of whatſoever he then ſhall act; and they ſhall for their own degrees of remaining choice be imputed to him as certainly as the drunkenneſſe.

20. The ſame is the caſe of Inconſideration and Oblivion, whoſe effects are innocent upon the ſame accounts and no other. If they come in upon a negative principle, that is, begin and proceed upon a natural deficiency and an unavoidable cauſe, that which is forgotten, or that which is done by forgetfulneſſe getfulneſſe muſt be amended and repair'd as well as we can; but by a preceding morally-diligent care, and an after-revocation, nolition or amends, it may be kept innocent. This onely thing is to be interpos'd, that if by the precontract of a vitious habit there is ingenerated in our ſpirits and exteriour faculties ſuch a promptneſſe and facility of ſinning, that many of the acts of ſuch a habit are done without advertency, as in vile and habitual ſwearing, every ſuch action though paſſing without notice is criminal, becauſe it is the product of the will habitually depraved; and there is no other cauſe why the actual conſent of the will is not at it, but becauſe it was not requir'd, but preſum'd, and taken without diſpute. A yong Luteniſt diſputes and contends for every ſingle touch of a ſtring: but when he hath made it eaſy and habitual, he reſolves to play a ſet of leſſons, and every ſtroke is voluntary, though every one is not now actually conſider'd.

Queſtion.

21. To this §. of Ignorance belongs the queſtion concerning Fraud and Guile. For if another man coſens and abuſes my underſtanding, he places me in ignorance; and then it is worth our inquiry, What morality or what obligation there is in thoſe actions which are done by us ſo abus'd, ſo deceiv'd, ſo made ignorant, and incapable of judging rightly.

22. The anſwer relies upon the ſame grounds as formerly, with this advantage, that he who is deceiv'd by the crafts of another, hath moſt commonly an ignorance that is very innocent; and then if that ignorance be wholly the cauſe of any action, the cauſe is innocent and ſo is the production. And upon the ſame accounts we are to judge concerning the obligation of promiſes and contracts made by perſons in error and deception. 1. If the error be concerning the ſubſtance of the thing contracted for, the contract is naturally invalid, and obliges not at all. If Titius buy a horſe, and Caius ſend him a Mule or an Oxe, there is nothing done, Titius hath made no bargain at all. If I buy a man-ſervant, and the Merchant ſells me a maiden dreſs'd in mans apparrel, this makes the contract invalid; I made no bargain for a maid-ſervant, but for a man. When Jacob married Rachel, and lay with Leah, that Concumbency made no marriage between them; for the ſubſtitution of another perſon was ſuch an injury as made the contract to be none at all: and unleſſe Jacob had afterwards conſented, Leah had been none of his wife. 2. If the error and ignorance be not in the ſubſtance of the contract, whatever elſe the error be, the contract is naturally valid, that is, without a new contract and renewed conſent it can ſtand; but if that error was the cauſe of the contract, which if the error had not been would not have been at all, then it is in the power of the abuſed perſon to reſcind the contract, and the fraudulent contractor is in Conſcience bound to recede from all his ill-acquir'd advantages. The reaſon is, becauſe he did injury to his neighbour, and plac'd him in evil diſpoſitions and unaptneſſe to chuſe wiſely, otherwiſe then God and the laws of nations and the common intention of contractors doe intend: and therefore although there was ſo much of the ſubſtantial requiſites as could make a contract naturally valid, yet it was ſo ill, that all laws and intentions and tacit conditions of contractors have thought fit to relieve the abuſed perſon. Dolo vel metu adhibito, actio quidem naſcitur, ſi ſubdita ſtipulatio ſit: per doli mali tamen

l. Dolo. 5. C. de inutilib. ſtipulat. & inſtit. de exceptionib. in initio.

tamen vel metûs exceptionem ſubmoveri petitio debet: and the reaſon is given l. ſi dolo. 5. C. de reſcindenda venditione; Si dolo adverſarii deceptum venditionem prædii te feciſſe Præſes provinciæ aditus animadverterit, ſciens contrarium eſſe dolum bonæ fidei (quæ in hujuſmodi contractibus maxime exigitur) reſcindi venditionem jubebit. In Contracts the honeſty of the contractors is principally to be regarded, and fraud is deſtructive of all honeſt intentions; and therefore the Prætor ſhall reſcind ſuch fraudulent bargains. 3. But if the error was not the intire cauſe of the contract, but that upon other accounts we would have bargain'd, onely we would not have paid ſo great a price, then the bargain is valid, and the Prætor cannot reſcind it, nor the injur'd perſon revoke it; but the Civil law in this caſe did permit actionem quanti minoris, that is, an amends for ſo much detriment as I ſuffer apparently by the fraud. If Caius ſells to Mævius ſheep which he affirms to be ſound, but they are indeed rotten, the law permits not reſciſſion of the bargain, but forces Caius to reſtore ſo much of the price as the ſheep were overvalued. And this is alſo the meaſure in the Court of Conſcience. But this is to be underſtood in ſuch caſes where the fault of the vendible commodity cannot be diſcerned by the buyer, and where the ſeller did deceive voluntarily. For in other caſes Caveat emptor is the rule of the law, let the buyer look to it, and it is alſo the rule in Conſcience. The ſeller muſt not affirm the thing to be without fault, if he knows it vitious and faulty. But neither is he bound to proclaim the faults of his goods, if they be diſcernible. And of this Cicero diſcourſes reaſonably, Num te emere coegit, qui ne hortatus quidem eſt? Ille quod non placebat proſcripſit; quod placebat emiſti. Quod ſi qui proſcribunt villam bonam benéque ædificatam, non exiſtimamur fefelliſſe, etiamſi illa nec bona eſt, nec ædificata ratione; multo minus qui domum non laudarunt: ubi enim judicium emptoris eſt, ibi fraus venditoris quæ poteſt eſſe? Sin autem dictum non omne præſtandum eſt, quod dictum non eſt, id præſtandum putas? Quid vero eſt ſtultius quam venditorem ejus rei quam vendat vitia narrare? Quid autem tam abſurdum, quam ſi Domini juſſu ita præco prædicet, Domum vendo peſtilentem? Who compell'd thee to buy? The man that ſold it did not (it may be) ſo much as deſire thee. He ſold it becauſe it did not pleaſe him; and becauſe it did pleaſe thee, thou haſt bought it. He that ſets up a bill of ſale and proclaims a houſe fair, and well-built and well-ſeated, hath not deceiv'd thee, though it be neither well-built, nor well-ſeated; becauſe if it be intire for thee to make a judgement, he hath not deceiv'd thee. Much leſſe if he hath not prais'd it. For if all that is ſpoken in the bill is not of neceſſity (viz. in order to the bargain or thy choice) to be verified, much leſſe muſt that be perform'd or requir'd which was not ſpoken. But does ever any man cry ſtinking fiſh to be ſold, or ſay, Come and buy a houſe that hath the plague in it? All this is great reaſon: Onely this is to be added, that ſuch faults as cannot be diſcerned by the buyer, muſt be declar'd, or muſt be allowed for in the price: and the caſe is the ſame, if the buyer be a child, or a fool, or an ignorant undiſcerning perſon; for no man muſt be made richer by the injurie and folly of his Brother. I know that in all the public contracts of mankind, that which all men conſent in is, to buy cheap and to ſell dear: but Chriſtian religion, and the contempt of the world, and the love of ſpiritual intereſts, are ſent from heaven, to cauſe merchandiſe to be an inſtance of ſociety, and not a craft and robbery. 4. If the buyer be deceiv'd, but not by the ſeller, but by a third perſon, and that deception be the cauſe of the contract, the buyer may reſcind the contract if he can; that is, he is not not in Conſcience oblig'd to ſtand to it, if he can be quit in law: but he that deceiv'd him is bound to repair his injury if he have ſuffer'd any, or to break the bargain, if the goods be unalter'd. Theſe things have no particular reaſon, but are evident upon the former accounts.

§. 3. Of Fear and Violence, and how theſe can make an action involuntary.

RULE VII.

Fear that makes our reaſon uſeleſſe, and ſuffers us not to conſider, leaves the actions it produces free from crime, even though it ſelf be culpable.

1. THE caſe is this; Roberto Mangone a poor Neapolitan travelling upon the Mountains to his own houſe, is ſeized on by the Banditi, a piſtol is put to his breaſt, and he threatned to be kill'd unleſſe he will be their guide to the houſe of Signior Seguiri his Landlord, whom he knows they intend to rob and murder. The poor Mangone did ſo: his Lord was murder'd, his goods rifled and his houſe burned. The queſtion is, whether Mangone be guilty of his Lords death.

2. To this the anſwer is eaſy, that Mangone is not innocent; and though he did not conſent clearly and delightingly to Seguiri's death, yet rather then die himſelf he was willing the other ſhould. No man is deſirous in a ſtorm to throw his goods into the ſea, if he could help it, and ſave his life; but rather then looſe his goods and his life too, he heaves them overboard. Μικταὶ μὲν οὖν εἰσιν αἱ τοιαῦται πράξεις· ἐοίκασι δὲ μᾶλλον ἑκουσίοις, ſaid Ariſtotle, Theſe kind of actions are mixt, but they have more of ſpontaneity and election in them then of conſtraint. No Chriſtian remaining a Chriſtian is willing to offer ſacrifice to Dæmons, or to abjure Chriſt, if he be let alone: but he that in time of perſecution falls away, not changing his heart, but denying his profeſſion, this man is not excus'd by his fear, but betray'd by it. Ἔνια δ' ἴσως οὐκ ἔστιν ἀναγκασθῆναι, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον ἀποθνητέον, παθόντα τὰ δεινότατα, There are ſome things to which a man muſt not ſuffer himſelf to be compell'd by any force, but he muſt rather die then doe them. And becauſe there are ſome things ἃ δὲ τὴν ἀνθρωπίνην φύσιν ὑπερτίνει, which are inſufferable to humane Nature, and therefore there is in laws aſſign'd a certain allowance of fear qui poteſt cadere in fortem & conſtantem virum, that is, in the caſe of danger of ſuffering the extremeſt evils, and our obedience to humane laws is excus'd in ſuch caſes, becauſe no man is ordinarily bound by the laws to ſuffer a greater evil in keeping the law, then is threatned by the law it ſelf to him that breaks them; therefore the law allows an omiſſion of obedience in the fear of the greateſt evils, as I have already explicated *. But in Divine lawes it is otherwiſe, becauſe no man can threaten or inflict on another an evil comparably ſo great as God does on them that break his laws; and therefore the leſſe fear cannot be a reaſonable excuſe againſt a greater; and in all caſes, the fear of man muſt yield to the fear of God. And therefore in the matter of a Divine Commandement, no fear of temporal evil is an excuſe or warranty. Becauſe we are taught to deſpiſe poverty and pain and death, and to doe all this chearfully and glorioufly. And therefore this caſe of Conſcience and it's whole dimenſions are quickly meaſur'd.

3. But this is onely in Negative commandements, for they can never be broken with innocence upon what pretended neceſſity or violence ſoever. But in poſitive Commandements the caſe is not ſo clear, but fit to be more conſider'd: But it will quickly alſo come to an iſſue, if we diſtinguiſh omiſſions from commiſſions. For no man may upon any pretence doe any thing againſt a poſitive Commandement. He may omit to viſit a Chriſtian in priſon, if he fears he ſhall looſe his life in the viſitation, or be threatned with any great calamity; but he may not doe him any injury or oppreſſion to ſave his life and liberty. But I have to this alſo given particular anſwer upon another occaſion. That which I am to adde here is this; There is no peradventure but the obedience to a poſitive commandement, till it be plac'd in it's own circumſtances and requir'd here and now and ſo, will give place to ſo juſt a cauſe of deference and ſtay as is the ſecuring our ſelves againſt a great fear. For where God hath not requir'd us in particular manner to doe a duty, he hath requir'd it in a very particular manner to preſerve our ſelves. But when the caſe is ſo, that the particular is requir'd, no fear of man can hinder us. For in all things God is to be preferred. And therefore it is ſo rarely well order'd that unleſſe it be in extraordinary caſes, as the Apoſtles preaching the Goſpel, their open confeſſions of faith, their declaring againſt the religions of the world at that time, for which they had ſpecial commands, and were to doe them and not to fear the fear of men, there is ſcarce any poſitive law of God but either it may be perform'd by an internal ſuppletory, by a deſire and willingneſſe and endeavour, or elſe will be ſufficient to be done in the article of death, that is, then when we need not fear the worſt that man can doe unto us. Thus it is in the ſuſception of the Sacraments; from the actual ſuſception of which by a great and juſt fear if we be frighted, we cannot be hindred from the deſire and ſpiritual and moſt effective ſuſception of them: and from the actual if we be by a juſt fear delayed (though the caſe cannot often happen) yet it is generally ſuppos'd that if they be done before our death, the commandement is obeyed, if the delay was not on our part; and at our death no new fear of death can be a juſt excuſe. However, if it or any thing elſe be poſitively and determinately requir'd in circumſtances, we muſt not be afraid of them that can onely kill the body; or if we be, the fear and the omiſſion are both criminal, and this is not excus'd by that.

ubi ſuprá. & lib. 2. Chap. 3. Rule 11.

4. But if in theſe or any other caſes the fear be a ſurpriſe, ſudden, and violent, and impetuous, that is, ſuch that our reaſon is invaded and made uſeleſſe, ſuch as by a natural effort diſorders all our faculties, ſuch as that of Arachne in Ovid,

Quid mihi tunc animi miſera fuit? anne quod agnæ eſt
Siqua lupos audit circum ſtabula alta frementes?
Aut lepori, qui vepre latens hoſtilia cernit
Ora canum, nullos audet dare corpore motus?

ſuch a fright as a hare or lambe are in when they are purſued by dogs and foxes, when nature is in a lipothymie, and our ſtrengths are made extravagant, when we can doe any thing in flying and nothing at all to conſider; then our underſtanding cannot deliberate, and then our will does not conſent, and then the effect is pityable but not crimin al, but the fear it ſelf poſſibly may be both. For ſometimes our fear may be ſo great, that it fills all our faculties, and then there cannot be any deliberation; for that muſt be at leiſure, and muſt look upon two objects. Statius well deſcribes this kind of fear in the ſimilitude of a hunted ſtagge.

..... qualis cum cerva cruentis lib. 5. Thebaid.
Circumventa lupis, nullum cui pectore molli

Credit, & illuſos audit concurrere morſus:

ſhe hath no courage, no confidence, no hope of any thing; ſhe dies if ſhe ſtayes, but ſhe cannot ſtay to conſider ſo long; and when ſhe runs, ſhe dies too, and ſhe hears the wolf at her ear, and ſees him with her eye, and feels the teeth in her heart, and dies with fear. In ſuch caſes as theſe we are as men without reaſon, and therefore to be judg'd accordingly. I have heard of a Trouper who in the late ſad warres of England being alarm'd, was ſo affrighted that he bridled his Comerade inſtead of his horſe: and in the laſt inroad which the Turks made into the Empire, a German carrier was ſo affrighted with the noiſe of Turkiſh horſes coming, that he knew not how to make uſe of his own to fly away, but deploring his condition that his horſe being loaden could not run faſt, had not the reaſon left him, though he had time, to throw off his pack, but ſtaid in that amazement, till the priſoner of fear became a ſlave to the Turks. What a man does in ſuch a caſe, no equal eſtimator of things will impute to choice or malice. He that flies from a lion purſuing him, and in his affrightment runs into a River, is not criminally guilty of his own death. He runs into one death before another, but prefers it not: for if he were in the ſame fear of drowning, he would leap aſhore though a Lion did ſtand there expecting of a prey.

5. Concerning degrees of fear which are leſſe, ſuch which leave us in a power to conſider and deliberate, they may leſſen the malice of the crime to which they drive, but cannot make the fact innocent. He that is taken by a Tyrant and an unjuſt power and put amongſt the troups, is not innocent though in that fear and againſt his will he fight againſt his Prince. Ἐς πόλεμον ἐθέλουσι (εἰσὶ γὰρ ἑκόντες τοὺς ἀναγκασθέντας φόβῳ καλεῖν δεῖ) ἥλθον, ſaid Dio Cocceius, They went willingly to warre, if at leaſt they may be ſaid to be willing who are conſtrain'd by fear. It is an unwilling willingneſſe, and therefore it is a ſin almoſt againſt their will. For in deſpite of ſuch a conſtraint, a man may uſe his liberty; as Lucian ſaies of the yong man, Dial. Meretric. ὃς οὐ νῦν γεγάμηκεν, ἀλλὰ καταναγκαζόμενος καὶ βιαζόμενος ἠρνήσατο, He did not marry, but though his Father forc'd and compell'd him, yet he refus'd.

6. The ſame is the caſe of Superſtition, which is an exceſſive and inordinate fear in the matter of religion. If the fear be ſupreme and diſtracting, the effects of it are very pityable; but criminal onely in that degree in which it is vincible and can be ſubdued by reaſon. When Michael Stifelius a German in Luther's time had affrighted the people with a confident and terrible prediction of the day of Judgement within a few days to be revealed, the poor affrighted people left off their daily labours, and took care of no duty for this life. This omiſſion at another time would have been very criminal; but now their ſuperſtitious fear did alleviate it, if not wholly take it away. But in this there is nothing particular, ſave onely that the cauſes of fear in this caſe are worſe then in other things; but the effects themſelves are not commonly very bad.

7. But this paſſion of fear hath in it yet more difficulty in relation to humane contracts and obligations, which can be evacuated and declar'd never to have oblig'd if they commenc'd with fear. For upon this account ſome pretend contracts of marriages, abſolutions from Eccleſiaſtical cenſures, teſtimonies in teſtamentary cauſes, vowes, donations, ſentences, reſignations of Benefices, conſtitutions of Proctors, election to offices, and oaths of obligation to men, and promiſes, not to oblige, if the promiſer or contractor was conſtrained by fear.

8. But to all theſe the anſwer will be the ſame, for they are all diſcernable by the ſame reaſon. If the fear was ſuch that it might affright a wiſe and a conſtant perſon, the law judges the contract to be null, and not to oblige in law, which is the meaſure of contracts and legal obligations. But although the law declares many particular caſes, in which the fear does annul the contract, and in ſuch caſes ordinarily there needs no further inquiry; yet becauſe many caſes happen in which the law hath not regularly declar'd her ſentence, by that meaſure which the law goes by, we may without trouble determine our ſelves. The rule therefore is this; When any evil threatned is ſo great, that to ſuffer it is more intolerable then to doe the thing to which you are compell'd, there the fear is ſuppos'd great enough to nullify the contract. If a rich perſon be threatned, that he ſhall be forc'd to pay a hundred pound, or marry the oppreſſors daughter; if he promiſes to marry her he is oblig'd, and that fear and that threatning ſhall not prevail to evacuate his promiſe. Becauſe he that ſo threatens intending but an evil that is very tolerable, if the marriage be of worſe miſchief, he did not chuſe it out of fear; for he that does ſo, chuſes the leſſe evil to avoid a greater, not a greater to avoid a leſſe: ſo S. Auſtin obſerves, Neque enim dici ſolet quiſpiam voluntate feciſſe, ſiquid fecit invitus; quanquam ſi ſubtiliùs advertamus, etiam quod quiſque invitus facere cogitur, ſi facit, voluntate facit: ſed quia malit aliud, ideo invitus, hoc eſt, nolens, facere dicitur; and Simplicius to the ſame purpoſe, quia licet inviti agamus, tamen ſic agere eligimus, It is indeed againſt our will; but when things are in an evil ſtate, we chuſe the leaſt. If therefore he chuſes that which he ſaies is a worſe evil, he cannot pretend it is for that fear; and conſequently it muſt be upon ſome other motive, ſomething of his own; and if it be, it will verify the contract. Titius finds Caius at an advantage with a Watch & a Ring about him of no great value; he threatens to take them from him, unleſſe Caius will promiſe the next day to bring him twenty talents. Caius promiſes it, and therefore is oblig'd, for he cannot ſay, he was compell'd. For no leſſe violence can conſtrain us to ſuffer a greater, becauſe that is far more eligible then this. And therefore the law calls nothing a juſt cauſe of fear, but the fear of the greateſt evils, as death, torment, diſmembring, intolerable diſgrace; that is, ſuch things

things which to avoid a man would ſuffer any evil that is leſſe. Now becauſe in contracts we intend ſome advantage to our ſelves, real or imaginary, and in contracts effected by a great fear we can deſign none but the avoiding of a greater miſchief, the law and right reaſon wholly attribute it to fear, and therefore annul the contract. Martial's caſe is pertinent to this inquiry, Quod ſi me tonſor, cum ſtricta novacula ſupra eſt, lib. 11. Ep. 59.

Tunc libertatem divitiaſque roget,
Promittam: nec enim rogat illo tempore tonſor;
Latro rogat: res eſt imperioſa timor.
Sed fuerit curvâ cùm tuta novacula thecâ,
Frangam tonſori crura manuſque ſimul.

If a Barber when the raſor is upon my throat contracts with me for twenty pound, if I fear he will cut my throat if he be denied, I promiſe to him as to a thief, with whom whatſoever contract I make in my intolerable fear, no law of man does verify it. But Martial as to his inſtance was no good Caſuiſt.

9. For if it be inquir'd whether I am oblig'd in Conſcience to keep my promiſe to a thief or a bandito, which I made to ſave my life; I anſwer that I am. Becauſe he being an outlaw and rebell againſt all Civil laws, and in a ſtate of warre, whatever you promiſe to him, you are to underſtand it according to that law under which then you are, which is the law of Nature and Force together. So that you cannot be guarded by the defenſative of the Civil laws, nor is your contract under it's guard and conditions. In contracts under the protection of Civil laws, we are to goe by it's meaſures, and the contract is good or bad accordingly. But when we have no meaſures but what we can get of our ſelves, our contracts are to begin and end between our ſelves, and by our own proportions. But in law no man is ſuppos'd to have conſented, but he in whoſe power it is to diſſent. Si vis ſcire ut velim, effice ut poſſim nolle: and every contract muſt have ὄρεξιν κατεξούσιον, as Damaſcen calls it, a deſire free from all bond. Seneca. Ἀυτεξούσιον ὄρεξιν, ὅ, τι μὴ ἐξ ἀνάγκης. If there be force and a ſad neceſſity in it, it is a calamity rather then a contract; and therefore the laws intend to defend and reſcue us from the oppreſſion.

10. I am to adde one caution, That no reverential fear, let it be never ſo great, and the perſon never ſo timorous, ſo that the uſe and miniſteries of reaſon be left, can excuſe a ſin, or nullify a contract. The reaſon is given by Ariſtotle, Ἡ μὲν ἐν πατρικὴ πρόσταξις οὐκ ἔχει τὸ ἰσχυρὸν, οὐδὲ τὸ ἀναγκαῖον, The Fathers Empire hath in it no violence and no coaction. And Heliodorus Pruſæus in his paraphraſe ſaith the ſame thing, that the commands of Parents, or ſuch whom we reverence and fear, τῷ ἰσχὺν οὐκ ὄντων μεγάλην ἔχειν ὥστε βιάζεσθαι, have not ſuch force as to compel: not but that we are to obey; but that what we doe out of reverential fear to them is not compell'd, but voluntary and choſen. Ethic. lib. 10. c. ult.

11. What is ſaid of Fear, is not true of other paſſions, luſt and anger, or whatever elſe is productive of thoſe effects which uſe to make men aſham'd, and diſorder all their intereſts. 1. Becauſe theſe paſſions are ſeldome of that nature and degree of violence as to take away all powers of deliberation, and therefore they are but ſeldome fit to be pretended in excuſe of any action.

action. 2. They are commonly the true Mothers, the univocal parents of their productions, otherwiſe then it is in fear and drunkenneſſe and ignorance; for theſe produce things of a nature different from their immediate principles, as drunkenneſſe produces effects of anger, of luſt, &c. that is, it is the occaſion of them, not the proper Mother. But luſt produces luſt, and anger ſends forth angry words, and ſpitefull actions, and reſolutions of revenge. 3. The products which come from theſe paſſions are ſo very far from being rendred involuntary, that by theſe paſſions they are made moſt delightfull, and without them they could not pleaſe at all. 4. Whenever they prevail to any violence or extremity of degree, it is by an increaſing will; not by weakneſſe and natural infirmity, but by a moral ſtate of infirmity, that is, a ſtate of ſinfulneſſe. 5. It is not in theſe as it is in fear, or vincible ignorance, that what is voluntary in the cauſe may be involuntary in the effect: but in theſe paſſions and temptations, the Mother and the daughter are choſen; not the one directly and the other by interpretation, but both of them properly, directly and immediately. For theſe reaſons the caſe of theſe paſſions is curiouſly to be diſtinguiſh'd from the precedent. But when theſe paſſions doe come to extremity, although their proper acts are not the leſſe ſins but the greater, as an act of anger is the more deviliſh by how much the paſſion is the more extreme; yet if any æquivocal and contingent effects be produc'd, as if in the violence of luſt a child be run over and hurt, or any thing that is not natural to that paſſion, nor intended by the man, then according to the degree of the ecſtaſy and tranſport by the paſſion, the contingent effect may be leſſen'd in it's malig-Declamat. 22. nity. And in this ſenſe is that of Libanius to be underſtood; or elſe it is not true, that injuries are very often to be remitted if the man hath drunkenneſſe for his excuſe, ἢ θυμὸν, ἢ ἀφροσύνην, ἢ ὕβριν, ἤ τι τοιοῦτον, or anger, or forgetfullneſſe, or arrogance, or any ſuch like thing. Like to this is that of Arrius ubi ſuprà. Menander, Capital puniſhments are not to be inflicted per vinum aut laſciviam lapſis, to them that offend by the follies of drunkenneſſe or the violence of luſt.

——— Et vino tortus, & irâ:

Wine & rage are like two racks, & compel men to open ſecrets. Now when the caſe is ſo that the effect is æquivocal; as it is in drunkenneſſe in many inſtances, and in other paſſions ſometimes, there onely there is ſome diminution or excuſing of the crime. But the Ancients gave too much liberty, and an indifferent ſentence in theſe caſes, becauſe wanting the Chriſtian meaſures they underſtood no better.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the Finall Cauſe of Humane actions; and it's influence or Cauſality of Good and Evil.

RULE I.

In every good action the means and the end muſt be Symbolical: ſo that, 1. a good action done for an evil end, and 2. an evil action done for a good end, are alike Criminal.

1. THE firſt part of this Rule is in the expreſs words of our Bleſſed Lord, Take heed that you give not your alms before men to be ſeen of them. Even alms, which are our righteouſneſs, and ſo rendred both by the Arabick and the Vulgar Latin, yet if done to vainglorious purpoſes, are good for nothing, but are directly acts of vainglory. Τῆς δύπτιας σαλπιζομένης ὄφελος ἐδὲν, ſaith S. Baſil, The noiſe of a trumpet ſpoils our alms. For from the end every action is qualified; and an indifferent action is made good and bad by the end; and that which is ſo already, is made more ſo by a participation of that to which it is deſign'd. For the end changes the nature as well as the morality of the action. So Ariſtotle, Εἰ ὁ μὲν τοῦ κερδαίνειν ἕνεκα μοιχεύοι καὶ προσλαμβάνῃ, ὁ δὲ προσπόνεις καὶ ζημιούμενος διὰ ἐπιθυμίαν· οὗτος μὲν, ἀκόλαστος δόξειεν ἂν εἶναι μᾶλλον ἢ πλεονέκτης· ἐκεῖνος δ', ἄδικος, ἀκόλαστος δ' οὔ. He that commits adultery for gain is covetous, not laſcivious: but he that ſpends his money and ſuffers loſs for his luſts ſake, he is the wanton. And therefore God and all wiſe men regard not the exterior action in their accounts of vertue, but the manner and purpoſe of doing it. Quoniam quidem non in facto laus eſt, ſed in eo quemadmodum fiat. Eadem res ſi gulæ datur, turpis eſt: ſi honori, reprehenſionem effugit. Amico ægro aliquis aſſidet: probamus: at hoc ſi hæreditatis cauſâ facit, vultur eſt, cadaver expectat. So Seneca. The praiſe and vertue is not in the thing done, but in the manner of doing it. If we ſpend great ſums of money in our Kitchin, it is ſordid: but if upon publick works, on Colleges and Hoſpitals, on the Poor or upon Religion, it is brave and noble. He that viſits his ſick friend in charity, does well; but he that ſits by him and watches with him in hope to get a legacy, is a vultur, and watches for the Carcaſſe and the Prey.

Matth. 6. 1.

Lib. 5. Ethic. cap. 2.

2. Now concerning this, the beſt Compendium of all the Caſes of Conſcience which can relate hither, is, that with hearty ſimplicity we purſue that rule of S. Paul, Whether ye eat or drink, and whatſoever ye doe, doe all to the glory of God: the ſame with thoſe other words of his, for the one illuſtrates and explicates the other, Whatſoever ye ſhall doe in word or deed, doe all in the name of the Lord Jeſus, giving thanks to God even the Father by him. Concerning the obligation and full ſenſe of theſe precepts, the following meaſures are our Rule.

1 Cor. 10. 31.

Coloſſ. 3. 17.

3. 1. He that in every action that is conſiderable, and fit to be noted and diſcerned, and is diſtinguiſhed by counſels and conſultations, by deliberation and obſervation, does actually deſign the glory of God, does his work moſt perfectly. It will ſhame the tepidity and incurioufneſs of Chriſtians, if I tell them that this advice is given to us by ſome wiſe Heathens. When Marcus Brutus had given many excellent precepts to parents, and children, and brethren, he adds, Hæc nemo faciet quemadmodum debet niſi habuerit quò referat. Proponamus oportet finem ſummi boni, ad quem nitamur, ad quem omne factum noſtrum dictúmque reſpiciat, veluti navigantibus ad aliquid ſidus dirigendus eſt curſus. No man can doe theſe things as he ought, unleſs he direct them to ſome proper end. We muſt propoſe to our ſelves the chiefeſt good for our end, to which every word and every deed of ours muſt have regard; as mariners in their ſailing look to a ſtar for conduct. This is not ſo to be underſtood as if we were to make actual directions and dedications of every ſingle word, or little minute action we doe, to the glory of God: this is a ſnare to Conſciences, and an Hypochondriacal devotion which ſome Friers have invented, and attributed to S. Gertrude, of whom they report that Chriſt admoniſh'd her that ſhe ſhould conſecrate every little part of action and word unto him; not only every writing, and every diſcourſe, and every meal, and every prayer, but every bit ſhe put into her head, & every letter ſhe did write, every ſingle ſtep ſhe did tread: juſt as if a man that were to receive a thouſand pound ſhould tell it over by ſo many ſingle Maravides, and not be content to tell every ſhilling, but reckon how many farthings are in the whole ſum; this would ſound great as the Spaniſh Coblers portion to his daughter, but certainly a wiſe man will find ſomething elſe to doe, which may be more really for God's glory, then ſo to tell his little minutes and particles of actions. It is a great piety if we dedicate to God all our ſtates of life, and all our great actions in every ſtate, and all changes, and every day, and every night, and every meal, and every beginning of labour, and give God thanks at every end, and invocate his help in every progreſſion; for ſo doing, we ſhall conſecrate our whole life to God. And this counſell S. Macarius of Alexandria gave to Palladius Biſhop of Helenopolis; who when he was a young man was much troubled in Conſcience concerning his unprofitable life, and ſuppos'd that he did nothing that was good, nothing that was profitable, but all he did was vain and trifling. Macarius told him, Dic tu tuis cogitationibus, Propter Chriſtum cuſtodio parietes, when ſuch afflictive thoughts doe intervene, ſay unto them, For Chriſts ſake I keep the walls. Nothing could be a meaner imploiment, nothing could be leſs uſefull; for the walls were not likely to run away. His meaning was, whatſoever the imploiment of a mans day or a mans life be, though never ſo mean, yet if it be done with a ſingle eye, and with an intuition to Chriſt, it is a holy imploiment.

Hiſt. Lauſiac. c. 20.

4. 2. Although our intentions by how much the more they are actual, by ſo much they are the better, yet it is not neceſſary that they be alwaies actual; but they are right if they be virtually and habitually directed unto God:

God: that is, that by ſome general deſignation of our actions, by the renewing of our intentions actually in certain periods of time, as in the morning of every day, or at evening, or both, or in every change of imploiment, we have an actual intuition on God and God's glory; and then, though we only attend to the work without any more actual conſideration of the end, the intention may be right, and the action ſanctified.

5. 3. But becauſe thouſands of words and actions may paſs wiſe and good men in which they do not actually reflect upon the end of God's glory, and that poſſibly the thinking of it, and ſaying, I deſign this to God's glory, is of no more value then if a man ſaies, I love God; which if it be only an act of fancy, or of ineffective affection, is no ſure indication of the true love of God, but muſt be expreſſed by ſomething that is more material and properly ſignificative of love according to the Commands of God and the manner of Men; therefore we cannot better judge of the goodneſs of our intentions, or that we do our actions for the glory of God, then when we are in all things carefull that we doe nothing againſt any of the laws of God. For this is that charity which is the ſingleneſs of a Chriſtian eye: Ut noverimus omnia opera noſtra tunc eſſe munda, & placere in conſpectu Dei, ſi fiant ſimplici corde, id eſt, intentione ſuperna, fine illo charitatis, quia & plenitudo legis charitas eſt. Oculum ergo hic accipere debemus ipſam intentionem quâ facimus quicquid facimus: qua ſi munda fuerit & recta, & illud aſpiciens quod aſpiciendum eſt, omnia opera noſtra qua ſecundum eam operamur, neceſſe eſt bona ſint. So S. Auſtin. He does all to the glory of God, that does all his works, and ſpeaks all his words in charity; juſt as he works for a reward, who does that good thing which ſhall be rewarded, though it may be he thought not of it ſince his firſt beginning of his Undertaking. To doe all things by the rule of God's will, is to doe all things for the end of God's glory. For he that walks with his eye upon the rule, is all the way carefull that he may not diſhonour God; and that's a great matter towards it: and he may at leaſt ſay of himſelf, Non ideo tamen eximiam gloriam meruiſſe me credo, ſed tamen effugiſſe flagitium; if God hath acquired no honour by my action, I am glad I have not diſhonoured him: and yet he that actually takes care that God be not diſhonoured, does obey God, and that's our beſt love to God, and in this world our greateſt glorification of him; it is more then all ſongs and thankſgivings expreſſed in words or tranſports of fancy. If we take care that all our actions be obedience, and nothing be againſt God's will, we glorifie God rightly. Adjice nunc, quod nihil honeſte fit, niſi cui totus animus incubuit atque affuit, cui nullâ parte ſui repugnavit. That is done honeſtly that is done with an honeſt and a whole heart, and is all of a piece, nothing at all repugnant to the Rule.

Seneca ep. 82.

6. 4. He does all things for the glory of God, that does nothing for an evil or a forbidden end: that is, if we take care that there be no foulneſs or any unlawfull thing in our purpoſes. For if a man does things wiſely, he muſt deſign ſome end; and therefore if his end be not evil, then it is a lawfull end: and if he ſtudiouſly declines every end that is evil, he is carefull that God be not diſpleaſed, that God be not diſhonoured, and whatever ends can be beſides all ends that are evil, are certainly good, that is, eligible for ſome good purpoſe; it comes from God, & to him it returns. The firſt of theſe waies is a doing all things to the glory of God actually. The ſecond does it virtually, or habitually. The third is a glorifying of God interpretativè, by equivalence and interpretation: and this fourth does it conſecutivè, by way of conſequence and acceptation.

7. 5. There is yet another way of doing it, which is ſo perfect an indication of the deſigning God's glory, that unleſs our hearts deceive us, the ſign will not; and that is, a beginning all our actions and changes with prayer, and ending them with thankſgiving: this is that which S. Paul cals a doing all things in the name of the Lord Jeſus; giving thanks to God the Father by him. For to doe things in the Name of Chriſt can ſignifie nothing but a doing them at his word, and by his aid; which when we pray for of God in his Name, and then return thanks to God by him, we have evidently directed that action to the Divine glory. And this is the full meaning of thoſe words of the Apoſtle, Every creature is ſanctified by the word of God and prayer. That is, whatſoever is taken according to God's word, and upon whatſoever ſo taken we pray for the Divine bleſſing, it is ſanctified, and miniſters to the good pleaſure and glory of God. So that if God be at any end of the action, and be at no end of it diſpleaſed, we have ſecur'd our intentions: and there will be the leſs need by ſcrupulous fears to afflict our ſelves concerning actual remembrances and intuitions of the end; ſince there are ſo many waies of ſupply and equivalent performances. For

8. 6. He that does all that he does becauſe he ſuppoſes God commands him or allows him, and abſtains from all things from which he does abſtain only becauſe God hath forbidden thoſe things, this mans intentions are right, and his actions pointed to a proper end. For then every act is an act of obedience, and that is love, and that is the great inſtrument of the glorification of God.

The ſecond part of this Rule, viz. An evil action done for a good end is Unlawfull, is plainly enough taught us by S. Paul, Rom. 3. 8. and I have already * given account of ſuch particulars as are under the general Conſideration. This only is to be added; that an evil done for a good end merely and intirely, is leſs then that which is not ſo alleviated; according to that ſaying of S. Auſtin, Pejor eſt qui concupiſcendo quam qui miſerando furatur, He that ſteals that he may give alms is not ſo bad as he that ſteals in Covetouſneſs and for his own increaſe.

* Book 1. ch. 5. rule 8.

Rule II.

To doe an action of it ſelf lawfull, for temporal regards, for ends of profit, pleaſure or honour, is not unlawfull, except it be accidentally.

1. THE Arabians have an excellent Proverb, Anima boni operis bona eſt intentio, A good intention, or a good Mind, is the Soul of a good work. Now by how much the more noble that end is which is the deſign and purpoſe of the agent, by ſo much the more excellent is the action. We ought therefore to conſider that every thing that God hath made is good, and every deſire of man which is Natural is alſo good; and God made amabilities amabilities in ſeveral objects, and inclinations and tendencies towards them in ſeveral faculties; and he that gave us deſires to them, intended alſo that we ſhould obtain and uſe them, and therefore he alſo fitted us with means to acquire them. It follows therefore that thoſe actions which proceed from thoſe deſires as thoſe deſires proceed from God, and tend towards thoſe ends whether God himſelf by the meaſures and laws of Creation hath directed them, muſt needs be very innocent and lawfull. If God gives Riches as a bleſſing and a reward of piety, it is lawfull to deſire riches, and to labour for them. If Honour be a gift of heaven to them that honour God, then to deſire honour and to doe actions for that end cannot be criminal. If Pleaſure be created by God as an inſtrument to ſerve many ends of Nature and Grace it ſelf, then to deſire pleaſure, and to doe actions in order to it, is not againſt the end of God's glory, becauſe it is not againſt his will. Theſe things are as evident as a demonſtration. All that remains is, that in theſe we alſo glorifie God; that is, ſo uſe them, ſo deſire them, ſo deſign them, that they be ſtill left in that place and in that order where God appointed them: that is, that they entertain our intermedial deſires, and ſatisfie the needs of our journy and travel, and pleaſe our miniſtring appetites in order to their ſervice to their Superior: that as this life is but a paſſage to a better, ſo theſe deſires may miniſter to higher, and by the comforts and ſatisfactions of this world promote our affections and purchaſes of the other. The particulars of which are briefly theſe.

2. 1. Theſe temporal ends muſt not fill our affections and divert them from things better and more excellent. Si ipſa cordis intentio quâ facis quod facis, quæ tibi nota eſt, ſordidatur appetitu rerum terrenarum & temporalium, atque cæcatur, quanto magis ipſum factum, cujus incertus eſt exitus, ſordidum & tenebroſum eſt? ſaid S. Auſtin. Our appetites muſt not be polluted with earthly affections. Which S. Baſil expreſſes well in anſwer to that queſtion, How in eating and drinking can we glorifie God? Menſam accedas animo non nimium ſoluto, & in ſolum cibum hiante, Come not to "the table with a diſſolute mind and a greedy deſire. Say not, Bring me, "bring me, the meat is mine own, I lick my own plate, I live of mine "own proviſions; and therefore I will pleaſe my ſelf, that I may feel my ſelf "to live. You muſt not ſo ſpeak, and you muſt not ſo eat: but rather "revolve in thy mind, Inſpectorem habeo Deum, God beholds me; I will "therefore ſo eat that no man may be offended, nor God's glory leſſened. "I will not be the ſlave of my own belly, or follow it's pleaſures alone; "neither will I live to eat, but eat that I may live, and be enabled to bear "the burdens of my life and duty. Plainly thus; He that obſervs the meaſures of Temperance, the limits and ends of Nature, aud materially ſerves thoſe ends which he is bound to take care of; he eats and drinks to God's glory: although he doe not formally deſign by actual intuition this meal to God's glory. Let him ſo eat that he may be fit to ſerve God, and that he neither deſire, nor actually do ſerve his luſt; let his pleaſure extend no further then to ſerve his health and natural and religious ends, that is, let it be intermedial to that end whether the eating it ſelf is deſign'd; and the intention is innocent. For he that chuſes this diſh rather then another, becauſe it is pleaſant, hath not corrupted his intention; if this pleaſure ſerves no more but that intermedial end which is in a natural or proper order to a further end of God's appointing. That he eats this and not that, his end is pleaſure; but becauſe that he eats at all hath another end, even to enable him to live in duty to God and his Neighbour, and to preſerve his life according to the meaſures of charity and duty, this end of pleaſure is innocent, becauſe it is Natural, and produc'd by God, and goes on further towards the other ends of God. So that the reſult is this; Actions may be done innocently for temporal ends, if thoſe temporal ends be but intermedial, and be carried on further according to the purpoſes of God.

3. 2. We may ſerve our temporal ends according to our Natural or Political deſires, alwaies provided that we obſerve thoſe meaſures which God hath preſcribed; for then we are ſure they will bear us on to the glory of God; for that's their purpoſe, and that muſt be ours. A man may ſeek to be honoured, but he muſt not ſeek it by ill means; *he muſt not make the ſervice of God to give way to that; *his affections muſt not dwell in that purchaſe; * it muſt leave no vanity upon his ſpirit; * it muſt not ſerve the end of pride; * it muſt be ſome way or other for God, in the beginning or in the latter end: that is, if it be not actually or virtually deſigned for Gods glory and ſervice, that is, for the good of our Neighbour or our own Soul, by that means to incourage us in vertue; it muſt at laſt be referred to God, and paſſing through us reſt upon him. Cajetan, Navarre and Reginaldus from this inſtance except two caſes; ſaying that if the honour be our due, as if we receive it from our Subjects and inferiors; or if it be matter of favour and grace, indulged to us by our Superiours, it is lawfull to receive it without either actually or habitually referring it unto God: that is, we may take honour to our ſelves without referring it to God, when that honour is our due, and when it is not our due; when it is paid us in juſtice, or when it is given us in kindneſs; which are almoſt all the caſes in the world of receiving honour. But this doctrine ought not to be receiv'd, as being infinitely unreaſonable and very impious; ſince in the caſe of Herod God declar'd his anger mightily becauſe he received honour from his Subjects, and did not in ſo doing glorifie God.

Vide Reginald. prax. lib. 12. cap. 3. n. 27.

4. 3. All deſigns of profit, pleaſure and honour, muſt be the leſs principal; that is, ever ſubordinate to duty and religion: for although the profit or the pleaſure ſwim uppermoſt, and be the actual mover to the particular inſtance, and be more perceived then any actual conſideration of the laſt and nobleſt end; yet this is not ſufficient to condemn the intention, unleſs it be made the principal; that is, that it be not only more delighted in by the contacts of ſenſe, but preferred alſo in our underſtanding part, and our abuſed reaſon. Concerning which we may take accounts by the proportions I have formerly deſcribed *. But in General, Our beſt meaſure we can take in the regulating this Caſe of Conſcience is, that we enquire whether we prefer the ultimate or the intermediall end; which trial we may eaſily make when they croſs one another, as it often happens they doe in the very inſtance, and very often in their proportions, circumſtances and degrees. If we will not receive our profit or our pleaſure without innocence, our purpoſes and our hearts are right; only then we are to take care that the love of our profit doe not hinder us in making right judgments concerning Lawfull and Unlawfull. For very often we think our affections and our purpoſes are right, when there is no other cauſe to think ſo but becauſe our underſtandings are not right.

* See Book 1. ch. 2. Rule 5.

But

But for the fuller underſtanding of our meaſures in this inquiry, there are ſome particular Caſes of Conſcience to be reſolved.

5. 1. Whether it be lawfull to ſerve God for any end leſs then himſelf; for riches, for honour, for defence and ſecurity of our lives, for health and ſecular ſatisfactions: that is, Whether it be lawfull to make God and his ſervice to be intermedial to the things of the world, the ultimate end to be intermedial, and this to be the ultimate.

6. I anſwer; It is at no hand lawfull to doe ſo, if the meaning be ſuch, that if theſe ends ſhould fail, we would no longer ſerve God; for then theſe temporal ends are principal, when without them the ſervice would not be done, and with them alone it would. But it is lawfull to ſerve God for temporal ends, provided that theſe being but ſome or all the firſt incentives of duty, they bear us on indeed to the ſervice of God. For he that ſerves God for temporal ends does well; and it matters not where the ſervice of God begins; whether by fear or hope, whether for temporal regards or upon wiſe diſcourſes: the more imperfect motives are more uſual with beginners. But then although it matters not where we begin, yet it is a very great matter whether theſe beginnings carry us: for if upon theſe firſt incentives we do indeed ſerve God, then our love to God begins from them; and if theſe imperfect principles be the beginning of our love, they will certainly end in God. But if the queſtion be concerning a ſingle action, whether it be lawfull to be done only for a temporal regard, as to get fame or money; I anſwer, that a ſingle action done alone for any ſuch conſideration with actual rejection, or poſitive neglect of all other conſiderations, is in it's whole conſtitution criminal: and in this ſenſe thoſe words of Publius Mimus are true, Malus eſt vocandus qui ſuâ causâ eſt bonus, He is no good man that does good only for his own ſake. For it is a direct preferring the world before God, and is not a ſerving God for temporal ends, but wholly a ſerving our ſelves by actions which in thoſe circumſtances are no ſerving of God, but a doing of ſome material actions of religion in mere hypocriſie. But to ſerve God for temporal ends is very lawfull, 1. when theſe temporal ends are either the incentive and argument uſed by God to move us to his ſervice; eſpecially if no other be uſed, and if the Covenant be founded upon temporal promiſes, as the Law of Moſes was; 2. or when theſe temporal ends are but the firſt and beginning motive, and lead us on to other and better; 3. or when they doe actually conſiſt & are conjunct with others; 4. or when they are in true eſtimate and value ſubordinate and leſs principal; or 5. when the temporal end is firſt ſerved, and the ſervice is a return of gratitude, and the effect of preceding obligation.

The firſt of theſe was the caſe of them in the old Law. The ſecond is the ordinary caſe of beginners in religion. The third was the caſe of Moſes, who deſpiſed to be called the ſon of Pharaohs daughter, becauſe he had an eye to the recompence of reward: which reward was both temporal and eternal. The fourth is the caſe of all them who follow after godlineſs becauſe it hath the promiſes of the world that now is, and of that which is to come; and that ſeek the Kingdom of heaven and the righteouſneſs thereof, knowing that all theſe things (which they need here) ſhall be added to them; added ex abundanti, beſides thoſe greater and more glorious promiſes belonging to the Kingdom of grace. And the laſt was the Caſe of Job. Doth

Job ſerve God for nought? No, he had received many bleſſings which had endeared and obliged his ſervices. But as in all caſes God gives us temporal bleſſings in order to his ſervice and the communication of Eternal; ſo muſt our intentions and deſigns be, ever ſubordinate, ever apt to yield in caſe of oppoſition, but alwaies miniſtring in caſe of compatibility and conſiſtency.

7. 2. The ſecond inquiry is, In what ſenſe it is true that God muſt be ſerved purely for his own ſake; and vertue purſued for vertues ſake, and not for low regards, for fear or hope, or ſecular conſiderations.

8. To this I anſwer, that this queſtion hath it's principal effect in diſcourſe and contemplation, and but little in practice and in the real events of actions. For the firſt thing that any man knows of God is, that he is, and is a rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him: and no man does chuſe to ſerve God but he really is aſſured and believes he ſhall have a very great reward: and all the laws of God are eſtabliſhed upon promiſes and arguments of amability and deſire. So that to ſerve God for his own ſake, is nothing but an extaſie of love uſed by ſome excellent and contemplative perſons, in which they only actually conſider the excellencies and perfections of God; being built up in the love of God by the inſtruments of fear and hope and experience, and the ſpirit of God: and to ſerve God without reward, can never be any more then a fiction of law or fancy, a ſuppoſition, and a caſe put, which can never be reduced to act. But even as the ſerving of God with intuition of the reward is virtually a ſerving God for love of him; ſo ſerving God out of mere love of him, is virtually a ſerving God for reward.

See Book II. chap. 1. rule 4.

Epigr. l. 8. 54.

Diligeris populo non propter præmia, Cæſar:
Propter te populus præmia, Cæſar, amat.

For as no man can wiſely hope for the reward but he that does love God; ſo no man loves God purely and for himſelf but he knows alſo that he is moſt ſure of his reward. It is like S. Paul's wiſhing himſelf anathema for his Brethren: the greater charity he had in ſo wiſhing, the further that thing was from being effected.

9. 2. But yet there is ſomething more material in the anſwer to this queſtion. For by God and wiſe men it is intended we ſhould love God purely and for himſelf; but ſo he does who loves God above every thing elſe; for all that ſupereminent love by which God is more loved then all the world, all that love is pure and for himſelf. He that loves God only for riches or health, loves theſe better then God: but he that loves God above theſe, loves him for theſe and for himſelf too; for the good that he is, as well as for the good which he does.

10. 3. He is underſtood to love God for himſelf, who abſtains from ſin not only becauſe it is forbidden, or becauſe it will bring him to miſchief, but becauſe he hates it; though it may be the prohibition and the fear firſt brought in that hatred. For this they uſually called the love of vertue and honeſty; but the other is neceſſity. Neque enim minus apud nos honeſtas, quam apud alios neceſſitas valet, ſaid Pliny. And of this we ſtill receive the greater evidence, by how much the leſs we are moved with any of the leſſer appendages of vertue. Quam me juvat (ſaid Secundus) quod in cauſis agendis non modo pactione, dono, munere, verum etiam Xeniis ſemper abſtinui. Oportet ſiquidem quæ ſunt inhoneſta, non quia illicita, ſed quaſi pudenda vitare. Jucundum tamen, ſi prohiberi publicè videas quod nunquam tibi ipſi permiſeris. I am pleaſed that in the adminiſtration of juſtice I did not only abſtain from bribes and preſents, but even from new-years gifts and gratuities. For we ought to abſtain from diſhoneſt things not only becauſe they are unlawfull, but becauſe they are ſhamefull. But when a man had rather doe a baſe action then ſuffer trouble, then he gives in evidence, that he loves not God and vertue in any ſenſe principally. So he in the Comedy,

It is better to bluſh then to be hungry, to be aſhamed then to ſmart. Lucrum pudori præſtat. That's the intention and deſign of theſe men: they ſerve vertue as long as vertue will ſerve their ends of pleaſure and profit, and no more: and this is therefore infinitely againſt the will and glory of God, becauſe it deſtroies the nobleſt conjugation of graces that are in Chriſtianity; it makes that there ſhall be no ſuch thing as ſelf-denial and Chriſtian fortitude, and the greateſt love in giving our lives for God, and Martyrdome. But the ſureſt conjecture we can make of our intentions when they are complicated is by the actual ceſſion of one to the other. Theodoric adviſed well to Marcellus the Advocate of his Exchequer, [in Caſsiodore] Non quoties ſuperes, ſed quemadmodum vincas inquirimus. Non quæras de poteſtate noſtra, ſed potius de jure victoriæ: quando laudabilius à parte fiſci perditur, cum juſtitia non habetur. I have alwaies power on my ſide, but do you take care that I have right. I am willing my revenue be increaſed, but at no hand would I have juſtice violated. Such men as theſe & in theſe caſes do love God for himſelf, therefore becauſe they love good actions for other conſiderations then the temporal reward; they love God and ſerve him whether it does them hurt or good, pleaſure or diſpleaſure: and that's the true meaning of the old brave Philoſophers and Poets, of loving vertue for vertues ſake; they lov'd it when it was diſcountenanced, when it was the Enemy of their temporal ends and proſperities; and what they call'd loving vertue for vertues ſake, the Chriſtian calls loving God purely, or for God's ſake.

11. 4. But if we ſearch the Scriptures, we ſhall but ſeldom ſee foot-ſteps of any ſuch Metaphyſical love, as to love God or doe our duty without conſiderations of hope or fear: and amongſt the braver Gentiles, and amongſt the better Chriſtians in imitation and contentions to excel them, it is further obſervable, that when they ſpeak of loving vertue for vertues ſake, they only mean to exclude all conſiderations of ſordid ends, of ſlaviſh fear of laws, or the acquiſt of money. But even in their greateſt bravery, ſome of them deſigned to themſelves the reward of Honour and an immortal Name; and the beſt of them did reſt in the peace of their minds, and that ſatisfaction which uſes to reward a good action even in this life: but by both theſe they were by God ſecretly conducted to an expectation of a reward hereafter: and there was no love of God ever ſo abſtracted by any command or expreſs'd intention of God, as to lay aſide all intuition of that reward; becauſe in the receiving of that reward we are moſt united unto God, and ſhall in the beſt manner and meaſures glorifie him for ever.

Rule III.

The end and intention of a Law is under the Commandement, as much as the action it ſelf commanded in order to the end.

Vide lib. 2. ch. 3. rule 4.

THIS Rule is meant principally of the Laws of God: Becauſe the end of all theſe laws is that which is ſimply and abſolutely good, and nearer to the chief end which is primarily deſign'd: and this is an endearment of our ſervices and a Monitor to our duty in many particulars not expreſs'd. God hath commanded us to honour our Parents; his end is, that we may receive the fruits of Government, proviſion and order, defence and maintenance reſpectively. Upon this account, ſince we are more bound to comply with the purpoſe and end of God then with the means to that end when it is evident and known, becauſe the end is greater in God's account then the means; we are taught that it is the will of God ſo to expound the words of that Commandement, as may beſt promote that end: and by Honour is underſtood all thoſe duties whereby the Parent is confeſſed Honourable; and by Parents is meant all that are in the place of Parents, and who miniſter to the ends of Government.

2. Now this muſt not be underſtood as if God did deſign the end, and car'd not for the means; for he is the beſt chuſer of the inſtruments alſo of his own ſervice and his own glory: and though the end is better then the means, yet thoſe are the beſt means which God hath appointed: but if we cannot obtain the means, then it will ſuffice that the end be acquired as well as we can by other inſtruments Symbolical. Thus we are bound to profeſs the faith of Chriſt in the ſuſception of baptiſm: but if we cannot obtain baptiſm, which is the uſual and appointed publication of our faith, yet we are obliged ſtill to purſue the end, and confeſs the faith of Chriſt by profeſſion, by holy living, by declaring our deſires of baptiſm, by dying for Chriſt if it be requir'd.

3. This alſo hath effect upon the inſtances of our duty ſo as to enforce the ſincerity and ingenuity of them, and to make them really uſefull in order to their proper ends. Thus we muſt confeſs our ſins, becauſe we will forſake them; pray to God for his grace, becauſe we intend to make uſe of it; not reſting in forms of godlineſs, but living in the power of it. Diodorus lent to Caius ten Attic talents; but Caius is not able to pay a drachm, and therefore Diodorus forgives him; that he may be thank'd indeed for nothing.

Condones aut ſuſtineas, Diodore, neceſſe eſt:
Nam tibi quod ſolvat non habet arca mea.

But if Diodorus will be truly charitable let him lend to Caius ſo much more; for he ſerves no end of charity that lets that alone which he knows he can never get.

Avian. fab. Ridiculè hac homines, nequeunt qua vendere, donant.

I deny not but it may accidentally ſerve the ends of charity to forgive him that is inſolvent; it may free him from fear of trouble, and make his life comfortable; comfortable; and he that does it upon theſe conſiderations ſerves the end of the Commandement. But he that forgives it for no other reaſon but becauſe he cannot have it, he does nothing at all; for though he perform the inſtance of the law, yet he does nothing toward the end of it.

4. But in humane laws the caſe is ſomething different; for we are only obliged to doe nothing againſt the end of the law: for in this ſenſe is that of the law to be underſtood, Fines mandati ſunt diligenter cuſtodiendi. l. diligenter, ff. mandati. The ends of the law are with diligence to be kept. But we are no otherwiſe bound to promote that end then by obſerving of ſuch means as are appointed; that is, if the end be only civil and humane, and do not alſo include a duty of religion commanded by God. If the Church command a faſting-day in order to a corporal affliction of our ſelves and an external miniſtery of repentance, we are bound to obey it; and though that faſting-day ſhould accidentally be no affliction, yet by virtue of that law we are no further obliged to afflict our ſelves. But we are indeed obliged to doe nothing that ſhall be againſt the end of that law. Finem certum reſpicientia non debent contrarium operari. l. quod favore. C. de legibus. We muſt not careſs our ſelves with delicious juice of fiſhes and coſtly wines upon a fiſh-day. The reaſon of theſe things is briefly this. In humane laws the end is not alwaies good; or if it be, it is not alwaies neceſſary; or if it were in any degree neceſſary, yet the neceſſity of it is to be judg'd by the Supreme, and is no otherwiſe to be eſtimated neceſſary by the Subject, then by the conjecture, the proportion and efficacy of the means or inſtrument appointed by the Supreme to effect that end: and therefore we are bound to reſtrain our liberties no more then the law reſtrains them; and we need not be wiſer then the laws: but he that goes againſt the mind of the law, upbraids the inſufficiency of her proviſions, and ſhews that he obeys with an ill will.

5. But the laws of God have it in their intention to regulate all the purpoſes and whole intention of the Subject; and therefore our obedience cannot be meaſured only by the inſtance of the precept, but by the purpoſe of it: and becauſe we muſt ſerve God with all our heart and all our skill, our duty muſt be coextended with all the holineſs & deſigns of God in every Commandement; that is, we muſt doe all that which we really ſuppoſe God would have to be done in every of his laws, whether it be expreſs'd or only implied. For he that intends the juſt end of all humane actions, that is, the glory of God, can be aſſured that his purpoſes are right, when he meaſures them by their tendency to the end, better then by their commenſuration with the expreſſed means.

6. Χρυσᾶ ἡ πάντα ἐραῖα, ſaid Philoſtratus. That's the ſum of all; we muſt take care that the end of our actions be all of gold. If they be deſign'd well, they are likely to end well; for this is truly χρυσῶν ὑπὸ πάντων χρεών· for in the ſervice of God, a Golden head ſhall never have the feet of clay. Euſtath. in Iliad. 4.
